1. Even though the OT has the concept of service and contains the commandment to love one's neighbour (Lev. 19:8), and Israel knew charitable acts as did the ancient Near East generally, diakoneō is not found in the LXX. The seven instances of diakonos are used exclusively for court servants (Est. 1:10; 2:2; 6:1, 3, 5 l.), and torturers (e.g. 4 Macc. 9:17). The other instance is Prov. 10:4. diakonia is used only in two unimportant cases (Est. 6:3, 5 v.l.; 1 Macc. 11:58). Instead of them, we find the word-groups douleuō (→ Slave) → latreuō and → leitourgeō in cultic contexts.

2. (a) In late Judaism diakoneō is found both in Philo and Josephus, the latter using it particularly in connexion with the Essenes (see below, 3). Though Judaism in the time of Jesus knew and practised its social responsibilities, e.g. to the poor, this was done mainly by alms, not by service (cf. Lk. 10:30–35). Lowly service, e.g. waiting at table, was beneath the dignity of a free man (cf. Lk. 7:44 ff.). Sometimes the greater would wait at table, but this was unusual (cf. SB I 838; II 257 f.).

(b) There was, however, organized care for the → poor. Every Friday those who lived in the locality received enough money from the poor basket (quppâh) for fourteen meals; strangers received food every day from the poor bowl (tamhûy). This food had been collected earlier from house to house by the officers of the poor (SB II 43 ff.; cf. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 131 ff.). In addition there were common meals and alms. In the diaspora, synagogues often set up a committee of seven for its service. The title parnāsîm, from parnēs, feed, points to service at table and in general (cf. also → Poor art. ptōchos).

3. Josephus says that the Essenes “neither marry wives, nor are desirous to keep servants . . . but minister one to another” (Ant. 18, 21). CD 14:12 ff. mentions regular contributions for the needy, poor and aged. The sick were also well looked after according to Philo (Omn. Prob. Lib. 12, 87). Service to the poor and common meals, possibly with eschatological connotations (1QSa 2:17 ff.), belonged to the fulfilling of righteousness and the expectation of the kingdom. On the question of poverty and community of goods at Qumran → Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4 (b); → Possessions, art. ploutos OT 3. The community's holding its goods in common had aemporary counterpart in the Jerusalem church (Acts 2:44).

NT 1. Both in the Synoptics and Paul diakoneō is found relatively frequently, with the exception of Lk. 10:40 diakonia is not found in the Gospels, though not uncommon in Acts, and is very frequent in Paul. diakonos is also a predominantly Pauline concept.

(a) diakoneō, serve, is found with the meaning of serving at table in, e.g., M 8:15 par. Mk. 1:31, Lk. 4:39; 10:40, cf. Jn. 12:2; Lk. 17:8; Acts 6:2. It is found in the sense of take care of in Matt. 27:55 par. Mk. 15:41, Lk. 8:3; Matt. 4:11; 25 (in the context of service to individuals), and in 2 Tim. 1:18; Heb. 6:10; 1 Pet. 4:1 (in that of the church). It is used specifically of the work of deacons in 1 Tim. 3:13; in connexion with the offering for the saints in Jerusalem in Rom. 15:25; 2 Cor. 8:19 (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4 (a)); as an expression for the proclamation of gospel in 2 Cor. 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:12; of Jesus himself as an expression of his humiliation and giving up of himself for others through suffering and death in Matt. 20:28 par. Mk. 10:45; cf. Lk. 18:26 f. (→ Redemption art. lytron), and in this connexion also for the voluntary self-humiliation of the disciple in Lk. 22:26 f., and his following Christ in Jn. 12:26. So used, the concept extends beyond the limits of its former sphere of meaning. Already the eschatological saying in Lk. 12:37 points to a radical change in the previously held values. This is also true of Lk. 22:27, linked with previous v. in which Jesus' humility becomes the norm for the life of the disciples (see below, 2).

(b) diakonia is found 34 times in the NT. It means service at table in Lk. 10:4; Acts 6:1, etc. It is used in a general sense for loving service in 1 Cor. 16:15 and R 2:19; for loving service through the making of a collection in Acts 11:29; 12:12 (RSV "mission"); Rom. 15:31; 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1, 12 f. (where the grace of Christ clearly seen as the motive); for the → proclamation of the word and the Christ mission in 2 Tim. 4:11; Acts 6:4; 20:24; 21:13; 2 Cor. 11:8, etc.; for all services to the Christian community in Eph. 4:12; for service by → angels in Heb. 1:14; charismatic office in Acts 1:17; Rom. 11:13; 2 Cor. 3:7 f.; 4:1; 5:18; 6:3; Col. 4:2; 2 Tim. 4:5. Every service and every office, however, finds its meaning in the unity of the → body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:5; Rom. 12:7). The glory of the → diakonia develops from this (2 Cor. 3:8 f.; see below, 3).

(c) diakonos is found 29 times in the NT. Its primary meaning is the one who serves at table (Matt. 22:13, where there is an eschatological note; Jn. 2:5, 9), means a servant in a wider sense in Matt. 20:26 par. Mk. 10:43; cf. Lk. 18:26; M 23:11, and a helper in Eph. 6:21; Col. 4:7. Especially in Paul, the word receives specifically Christian sense; e.g. a servant of the new → covenant (2 Cor. 3:6), a servant of → righteousness (2 Cor. 11:15), a servant of Christ (2 Cor. 11:23; Col. 1:1; 1 Tim. 4:6), a servant of God (2 Cor. 6:4), a servant of the → gospel (Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:23; cf. 1 Cor. 3:5), a servant of the → church (Col. 1:25). Christ himself is called diakonos in Rom. 15:8 (of Israel) and Gal. 2:17 (of sin, used paradoxically). In Rom. 13:4 the secular ruler is called a servant of God.

In Phil. 1:1 and 1 Tim. 3:8–13 diakonos is used of a man holding the office of deacon in the church; the same title is applied to a woman, Phoebe, in Rom. 16:1. This office may be intended by 1 Tim. 3:11. Sometimes diakonos is replaced by hypēretēs; e.g. Lk. 1:2 (servant of the word); Acts 26:16; 1 Cor. 4:1 (servant of Christ). The word originally meant a rower, hence a servant, helper, attendant (Hb 3, 65; 5, 111). Elsewhere in the NT it normally means the (armed) servant neone in authority, an officer of a court of law, etc. (e.g. Jn. 18:3, 12, 18, 22; Matt. 25:1-7; see below, 4; 26:58). The vb. hypēreteō, serve, render service, be helpful, occurs Acts 13:36 (of David serving the counsel of God); 20:34 (of Paul tending to his needs); and 24:23 (of Paul's friends being allowed to tend to his necessities). 2. The NT meaning of diakoneō is derived from the person of Jesus and his gospel att. 20:28 par. Mk. 10:45; cf. above 1 (a)). It becomes a term denoting loving action for brother and neighbour, which in turn is derived from divine love, and also describes the outworking of koinōnia, → fellowship.

When Jesus served his disciples and men in general, it was a demonstration of the love of God, and of humanity as God willed it. "I am among you as one who serves" (Lk. 22:27; cf. Jn. 13:1-15), and "The Son of man came not to be served but to serve" (Matt. 20:28). Jesus washed his disciples' feet as an example (Jn. 13:15) to challenge the disciples; the leader among them was to be as one who serves (Lk. 22:26; cf. Matt. 20:26 par. Mk. 10:43; Matt. 23:11). Everyone should serve with the gift God has given him (1 Pet. 4:10). Anyone giving food to the hungry, shelter to the homeless, clothing the naked, or visiting the sick and imprisoned (Matt. 25:35 f.) is serving Christ himself. "As you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me" (Matt. 25:40). The service done to Jesus on earth, especially by → men (cf. Lk. 7:44 ff.), will not be forgotten (Mk. 14:9). Various women served Jesus also "out of their means" (Lk. 8:3).

This summons to service becomes binding because behind it stands the sacrifice of Jesus, who came "not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mk. 10:45 par.). 1 Jn. 3:16 draws from this sacrifice the conclusion that "we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren."

3. The fellowship of the common meal, which involved serving at table (Acts 6:1), remains basic for the understanding of diakonia in the NT. We have to think of "the breaking of bread" in private homes, of the agapes in which the rich cared also for the poor (cf. 1 Cor. 11:17-34), and the house-churches like that in the house of Stephanas which had devoted itself to diakonia (1 Cor. 16:15). This service, in which strength and possessions were used for others, can be seen as the principal and main element of fellowship (2 Cor. 9:13; cf. Acts 5:4; 2 Cor. 9:7). This service also extended from the local church to churches elsewhere that needed help (Acts 11:29; 13:25; 2 Cor. 8:3 f.; 9:1-5). The spiritual and physical diakonia of giving and receiving takes place in acknowledgment of the sacrifice of Christ (2 Cor. 8:9; 9:12-15). This service, comprehending body and life (2 Cor. 8:5) as well as money and possessions, becomes a means of edification of the whole body of Christ (Eph. 4:12). That is why Paul calls the charismatic gifts services diakonai (1 Cor. 12:5), parts of the organic whole. diakonia can also be used for each particular spiritual → gift (Rom. 12:7), just as the deacon is one among all the others who serve (see below, 4).

Paul expanded the concept of diakonia even further. He saw the whole of salvation, God's diakonia in Christ for and among men, expressed in the diakonia of the apostles. Already in the OT there was a divine diakonia, but expressed in the law and therefore in death and condemnation (2 Cor. 3:7, 9, RSV "dispensation"). In Christ, however, the service of the → Spirit, of → righteousness, of → reconciliation has begun (2 Cor. 3:8 f.), and this service has been entrusted to the → apostle, who as Christ's ambassador proclaims, "Be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:18 ff.). Hence the term diakonia can be used as a technical term for the work of proclaiming the gospel

(Rom. 11:13; 2 Cor. 4:1; cf. 2 Tim. 4:5). Even more, the whole church become body for service in the world (Eph. 4:1–16); it is composed of members, the “servants”, and functions in preparation for the Lord’s return.

4. The difference between it and doulos (→ Slave), is important for our understanding of diakonos. doulos stresses almost exclusively the Christian’s complete subjection to the Lord; diakonos is concerned with his service for the church, brothers and fellow-men, for the fellowship, whether this is done by serving at table with the word, or in some other way. The diakonos is always one who serves Christ’s behalf and continues Christ’s service for the outer and inner man; he is concerned with the salvation of men. Hence, Paul can see himself as a servant of the gospel (Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:23), a servant through whom the Christians in Corinth have come to faith (1 Cor. 3:5), a servant of the new → covenant (2 Cor. 3:6), a servant of Christ (2 Cor. 11:23), a servant of God (2 Cor. 6:4), a servant of the church (Col. 1:25). This concern with God’s salvation includes body and spirit. Hence, Paul is also concerned with the collection (2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1, 12 f.; in each case diakonia = Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4 (a)) as with the gospel. Proclamation and help through these functions complement one another.

Paul’s various companions and helpers, who stood with him in the work of proclamation, are also called diakonoi by him (Eph. 6:21; Col. 1:7; 4:7; 1 Th 3:2) and more frequently synergoi, fellow-workers (Rom. 16:3, 9, 21; 2 Cor. 8:19; Phil. 2:25; 4:3; Col. 4:11; → Work, art. ergon).

Acts 6:1–6 belongs in this context, although only diakoneō and diakonia are used. Luke avoids diakonos. The Seven, who are here placed alongside the apostles, take over the care of the poor in the church because the Hellenists complained that their widows were neglected in the daily distribution. But they doubtless had spiritual functions as well; at least these emerged when this particular ministry was terminated (cf. Stephen in Acts 6:8 ff. and Philip “the evangelist” Acts 21:8; cf. 2 Tim. 4:5; Acts 6 see E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 258–69; F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles, 1952², 150–54).

The work of a deacon finally developed into a special office, whose beginnings can be traced already in the NT (Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8–13). In the course of the church history the office developed a standardized form, though its precise form is not clear from the NT. Nor was it evidently universal in the church. Originally all the manifold functions exercised in the church could be called “services” or ministries (1 Cor. 12:5). Hence, the various office-bearers (→ apostle, → prophet etc., cf. Eph. 4:11) were “servants”, diakonoi, of the church (cf. 1 Cor. 3:5; Col. 1:25). But in the more specialized sense the concept was narrowed down to the material care of the church which was closely linked with the office of the bishop (e.g. 1 Tim. 3:1–7, 8–13; 1 Clem. 42:1 f.; Ignatius, Mag. 2:1; 6:1; Trall. 2:1). This means that for the “servant” there was always a task for spirit and body expressed by his rôle in public worship, care of the poor and administration. The service of God and of the people were, after all, a unity, as the agape, the common meal implied. Originally it was obvious that all the “servants” stood in a brotherhood of service, but the concept was increasingly eroded by the growth of a hierarchy with its different grades. In the Orthodox Church the diakonos was retained, but in the Roman Catholic and Anglican Episcopal Churches the diaconate became merely a transitional stage on the way to the priestly office.

The NT knows also the work of the female deacon, but her rôle is left undefined (Rom. 16:1; perhaps also 1 Tim. 3:11). The position is still recognized in some churches today. It was closely connected with that of the widow (→ Woman, art. iēra).

In Gal. 2:17 Paul rebuts the implied objection of the Judaizers that his doctrine of justification by faith makes Christ “an abettor of sin” (NEB), because it contains the prollary that no one can be justified by the → law (cf. Gal. 2:15 f.) and thus does away with the law. “But if, in our endeavour to be justified in Christ, we ourselves were found to be sinners, is Christ then an agent of sin [hamartias diakonos]? Certainly not” (Gal. 2:17). The thought takes up the contrast in v. 15 between “Jews by birth” who live by the law (v. 16) and “Gentile sinners” who do not. But the believer is not justified by the law (v. 16), and to the Jew this would mean that Christ is an agent of sin by doing away with the law of God. Paul replies that the real transgression would be to bring back the law (i.e. by practising → circumcision, and so endeavouring to put oneself right with God by keeping the commandments of the law, cf. Gal. 2:1–14). For, on the one hand, keeping of the law never enabled a man to become righteous before God. And on the other hand, God has provided a way of righteousness in Christ which both satisfies the law and supersedes it. “But if I build up again those things which I tore down, then I prove myself a transgressor. For I through the law died to the law, that I might live to God. I have been crucified with Christ; it is no longer I that live, but Christ who lives in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. I do not nullify the grace of God; for if justification were through the law, then Christ died to no purpose” (Gal. 2:18–21).

In Rom. 13 Paul urges obedience to the secular ruler, even though he is not a believer, “for he is God’s servant [theou gar diakonos] for your good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword in vain; he is the servant of God to execute his wrath on the wrongdoer” (Rom. 13:4; cf. 1 Pet. 2:13–17; Matt. 22:15–22 par. Mk. 12:13–17; Lk. 20:20–26; Isa. 10:5; → Might, art. exousia NT; → Caesar).

K. Hess

λατρεύω

λατρεύω (latreuō), serve; λατρεία (latreia), service or worship (of God); θρησκός (thrēskos), pious; θρησκεία (thrēskeia), service of God, religion.

Ⲙ latreuō is derived from latron, wages, and means in secular Gk. work for wages, and then to serve without wages. It is not found very frequently. It was originally used predominantly of physical work, but was then used more generally and could include cultic service. latreia has the same meaning, i.e. work for wages, work, care, service. Finally at a later stage it had a cultic use, honouring of the gods, worship (cf. H. Strathmann, TDNT IV 59).

Ⲙ 1. latreuō is found much more frequently in the LXX than in secular Gk. Like leitourgeō the concept is taken up and developed, and given a specific meaning. It is found about 90 times, especially in Exod., Deut., Jos., Jdg., but, with the exception of Ezek. 20:32, it is not found in the prophets.

Almost everywhere it translates 'āḥād, serve, which is rendered in the LXX douleō (→ Slave) as well as latreuō, the latter being used mostly where 'āḥād has a religious reference (TDNT IV 60). Thus in Exod. 4:23; 8:1 (MT 7:26); 8:20 (8:16); 9:1, → Moses asks Pharaoh to let the people go, that they may serve God. In other words, it is a question of worship, which, as in the case of other ancient peoples, was carried out through the cultus. See also Exod. 3:12; 7:16, 26; 10:3, 7 f., 26; 20:5; 23:24 f.; Deut. 4:19, 28; 5:9; 6:13; 7:4, 16; Jos. 22:27; 24:14–24,

It is, however, characteristic of the OT that it is not the meticulously performed cultus which is the true worship of God, but obedience to the voice of the Law which grows out of gratitude for God's acts of salvation in history, although such obedience included the outward ritual of worship. "And now, Israel, what do Yahweh your God require of you, but to fear Yahweh your God, to walk in all his ways, to love him, to serve Yahweh your God with all your heart and with all your soul and to keep the commandments and statutes of Yahweh?" (Deut. 10:12)

Hence, in the LXX latreuō is very close to → leitourgeō in meaning, but the latter is used exclusively for the service of the priests, while the former means the service of God by the whole people and by the individual, both outwardly in the cultus and inwardly in the heart. The noun latreia is found only 9 times in the LXX; with the exception of 2 Macc. 4:14 (where it means forced labour) it is used in the same way as the vb. In Exod. 12:25 f.; 13:5 it refers to the sacred custom of the Passover. See also Jos. 22:27; 1 Chr. 28:13; 1 Macc. 1:43; 2:19, 22.

2. In late Judaism, just as in the OT, the relationship of man to God was expressed as service. Man is the servant or slave of God. So 'āḥād and its derivatives can have a specifically cultic meaning, in which case it means worship of the true God or of false gods. The meaning of worship has been perpetuated in the synagogue. But it is used also of the inner worship of the heart. So with reference to Deut. 11:13 and Dan. 6:11, 16, it is said that to serve him means prayer (SB III 1).

NT 1. All 21 cases of latreuō in the NT are used in a religious sense, which includes the worship of strange gods (Rom. 1:25; Acts 7:42). Its use throughout, and not merely in the 3 quotations (Matt. 4:10 par. Lk. 4:8 = Deut. 6:13; Acts 7:7 = Exod. 3:12), is fixed by the OT. This is true of passages like Lk. 1:74; 2:37 and those where the God of the fathers is mentioned, whom Paul (Acts 24:14) or the twelve apostles (Acts 26:6, 7) worship. It is just in passages like this that we see that latreuō has largely lost its cultic connotation in favour of that of the inner worship of the heart by faith (cf. Acts 24:14b), and → prayer (see above, OT 2).

Hebrews shows the closest links with the OT. Of the 6 uses, 4 refer to the → tent (tabernacle) cultus (Heb. 8:5; 9:9; 10:2; 13:10; → Tent). There is no need, however, to restrict these passages to the priest's vicarious acts for the people in the sacrificial worship; they can refer to the old worship in the tent, including that of the people in general, which was temporary, and not final and perfect. For as Heb. 9:14; 12:18 show, only the conscience which has been cleansed and brought to life by Christ, only the one who has been received into the true and eternal community of God (Heb. 12:22 ff.) can worship God acceptably "with reverence and awe".

When Paul wishes to describe the Christian's → walk, he also uses the OT cultic term (latreia, Rom. 12:1; → Prayer, art. entynchanō) and says of himself that he serves God with his spirit in the gospel (Rom. 1:9). Similarly in Phil. 3:3, he writes ose “who worship God in spirit” or “by the Spirit of God”. Both passages give ear expression to Jesus’ statement that true and genuine worship as God wills it ust be in Spirit and through the Spirit, for God himself is Spirit (Jn. 4:23 f.; →ayer, art. proskyneō NT 4). Such worship is freed from all the restrictions of culticles, circumcision and the struggle to attain righteousness through works. The manho has been reconciled and renewed carries out his worship of God through thepirit by presenting his whole being. Since the Spirit of God takes control of a man’spirit for service in the gospel (Rom. 1:9), it leads to the surrender of the whole life,high is spiritual worship (Rom. 12:1; NEB “the worship offered by mind and:art”). The expression “in the gospel” (Rom. 1:9) includes for Paul everything,ayerful mention (v. 9b), witness and proclamation, which are inseparably linkedith prayer and pastoral care.

2. latreia, apart from Rom. 12:1 (see above, 2), is found another 4 times in theT. In Rom. 9:4, Heb. 9:1, 6 it refers to the OT cultus; in Jn. 16:2 it expresses theervice which those who hate the gospel think they bring God, when they persecuteid kill Christ’s witnesses.

3. There is little difference between latreia and thrēskeia, which means worship ofod (Jas. 1:26 f.; RSV, NEB ‘religion’), worship of angels (Col. 2:18) and religion ineneral (Acts 26:5). Correspondingly the adj. thrēskos (Jas. 1:26) can be renderedous (RSV, NEB “religious”).

K. Hess

λειτουργίᾳ

leitourgikos), serving.

λειτουργέω (leitourgeō), serve; λειτουργία (leitourgia), service; λειτουργός (leitourgos), servant; λειτουργικός leitourgeō (older Att. form lētourgeō) is compounded from laos (Ionic lēos), people, and ergon, work, and is found from Xen. and Lysias on. It means do ublic work at one’s own expense. It is a political, almost legal, concept. The noun imilarly means service for the people. In the later classical period it was as common term as “taxes” today (O. Cassel, Oriens Christianus 3, 7, 1932, 289). We seldom id leitourgos in secular Gk.; where it is found it is rarely used in a religious sense, it normally means an artisan. leitourgikos is found only a few times in the papyri.

In Hellenistic Gk. leitourgeō covers all kinds of service to the community (H. rathmann, TDNT IV 217) which a person was under obligation to do because of e size of his income, but which could also be carried out voluntarily. The concept adually expanded, especially in Egypt, to cover every conceivable compulsory serce for the state, with regulations laid down for every detail. Then it became widened o cover any sort of service. Beside this legal meaning in public life, there developed n entirely new, religious and cultic use of the words. The only connexion seems to e that the cultus had a public importance for the community. There are, however, o important deductions to be drawn from this.

⌈ In the LXX leitourgeō (about 100 times) and leitourgia (about 40 times) acquired a clearly defined meaning. They are used almost exclusively for the service → priests and → Levites in the temple. This explains the striking fact that both ords are used above all in the sections describing priestly functions and ritual (cf. kod. 28–39; Num.; Chron.; Ezek. 40–46). leitourgeō renders šerēt (piel) and leitourgia ^a*ḥôdâh*, where these are used cultically. These terms were specially suited for expressing the cultic service, because the priestly cultus was public, fixed and regulated by law, and the welfare of the people of God depended on it. It is, however, surprising that the LXX should use these terms without hesitation also for the heathen cultus (e.g. Ezek. 44:12).

In late Judaism, especially as it was developed in the synagogue, and in the diaspora, we find a gradual spiritualizing of this concept of service, especially in the interpretation of prayer as "sacrifice" (cf. Wis. 18:21).

We may summarize by saying that the use of this word-group in the LXX does not entirely coincide with that in contemporary secular Gk. The terms were adopted specially to express the relationship of the people to God. The only connexion with their original use seems to be the relationship of the service to the people. This was transferred to the relationship of his people to God and given a new form.

NT The concepts are only seldom found in the NT; leitourgeō 3 times; leitourgia 1 time; leitourgos 5 times; and leitourgikos only once.

1. In Hebrews and in some Pauline and Lucan passages, the word-group is used strictly in its cultic-sacred sense. We need not wonder at this in Heb., which moves entirely in the world of OT concepts. According to Heb. 8:2, Christ, as leitourgik exercises the service of the high priest in the true, heavenly sanctuary. There, he is the one, true high priest, who has obtained a "better ministry" (8:6, leitourgia). He has accomplished through his sufferings and death the one eternally valid → sacrifice (10:10), and by so doing he has shown that, through the daily sacrificial service (10:11, leitourgia) of the priest, no sins can be taken away. Heb. seeks to make clear the unique meaning of the → cross and exaltation by using the cultic concepts of the OT. In this OT context we find leitourgia again in Heb. 9:21 in reference to the cultic vessels.

Rom. 15:16 also presupposes cultic usage. Paul justifies what he has written by pointing to the fact that, by the grace of God, he had become Christ's leitourgos, i.e. priest, to the Gentiles (the RSV and NEB do not bring out the force) and so through his activity in "the priestly service [hierourgountal]" of the gospel the converted Gentiles are brought as a sacrifice to God (→ Sacrifice, art. thyō NT 2). By this Paul expresses not only his complete dedication and dependence upon God; he also redefines the nature of sacrifice and priestly service in terms of the gospel, its service and fruit. We should also add Phil. 2:17 here, where Paul uses cultic terms to express his apostolic ministry. He sees himself as the messenger of Christ performing the service (leitourgia) of offering up the obedient faith of the Philippian believers to God. His own self-giving in martyrdom is seen as a libation on the sacrificial offering of their faith (→ Sacrifice, art. thyō NT 2).

The last NT passage with cultic meaning to be mentioned is Lk. 1:23, where the term is used for Zechariah's priestly service. Apart from this passage, the NT shows a strong spiritualizing of the concept, e.g. Paul as priest, the believers as sacrifice.

2. The use of leitourgeō in Acts 13:2, compared with the LXX usage, is something completely new, but it is derived from it. Here the cultic meaning is completely spiritualized and applied to Christian worship in prayer.

3. There is no unanimity as to how Rom. 15:27 and 2 Cor. 9:12 are to be understood. Many commentators see the cultic use here also, where the terms are used or the loving service in the collection for Jerusalem (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4 (a)). If that is so, the point would be that it was a religious service of God. Others interpret it in terms of the original secular Gk. usage. Then the stress would be on the official and public aid to the Jerusalem community. However, we can no longer be certain whether Paul really implied anything beyond general service in his use of these words. Both in Rom. 15 and 2 Cor. 8 and 9 this word-group and the diakoneō word-group stand parallel.

4. Clearly there is no cultic use in Phil. 2:25, 30. Epaphroditus had become a leitourgos (2:25), helper, when he served Paul in his hour of need. Thus he rendered Paul the service (leitourgia), which the church, owing to circumstances, was not able to render (2:30). Similarly in Rom. 13:6, where diakonos could stand equally well for leitourgos, no priestly functions are ascribed to the state. In Heb. 1:7 the term leitourgos also lacks specific cultic connotation. In the latter passage, citing Ps. 104:4, the angels are merely called servants. They are contrasted with the immutability of Christ (1:8 f.), for their form and function are controlled by God. They are what they are in virtue of their service (Heb. 1:14). K. Hess

→ Apostle, → Bishop, → Child, Boy, Servant, → Fellowship, → Lord's Supper, → Love, → Mercy, → Poor, → Possessions, → Prayer, → Priest, → Sacrifice, → Slave, → Temple, → Tent

a). H. W. Beyer, diakoneō etc., TDNT II 81–93; C. Brown, “Ministry in the New Testament”, in J. C. Porthouse, ed., Ministry in the Seventies, 1970, 10–22; O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship, 1953; G. Dellling, Worship in the New Testament, 1962; E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 258–69; H. Strathmann, latreuō etc., TDNT IV 58–65; H. Strathmann and R. Meyer, leitourgeō etc., TDNT IV 215–25.

b). P. Abbing, “Grundlinien zu einer theologischen Lehre vom Diakonat”, MPTH 50, 1961, 348 ff.; E. Barnikol, Das Diakonenamt, 1941; and “Die ersten Diakonen, die Zwölf nach Apg. 1.25”, Theologisches Jahrbuch, 1941, 88 f.; S. Bihel, “De septem diaconis (Acta 6.1–7)”, Antonianum 3, 1928, 129–50; W. Brandt, Dienst und Dienen im Neuen Testament, 1931; O. Cassel, “leitourgia – munus”, Oriens Christianus 3, 1932, 289–302; P. Gaechter, “Die Sieben”, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 74, 1952, 129–66; W. Hahn, Gottesdienst und Opfer Christi, 1951; E. Käsemann, “Liturgie”, RGG ³ IV 402 ff.; and “Gottesdienst im Alltag der Welt”, in Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche. Festschrift J. Jeremias, 1960, 165 ff.; H. Krimm, Das diakonische Amt der Kirche, 1953; E. Lohmeyer, Kultus und Evangelium, 1942; G. Noske, Heutige Diakonie in einer veränderten Welt, 1958; K. Rahner and H. Vorgrimler, Diakonia in Christo, Quaestiones Disputatae 15/16, 1962; E. Schering, Erneuerung der Diakonie in einer veränderten Welt, 1958; G. Uhlhorn, Die christliche Liebestätigkeit, 1895²; H. Wagner, “Diakonie”, RGG ³ II 162 ff.; K. Weiss, “Paulus, Priester der christlichen Kultgemeinde”, TLZ 79, 1954, 355–64; H. Wenschkewitz, Die Spiritualisierung der Kultusbegriffe, Angelos Beihefte 4, 1932.

Shadow

σκιά

σκιά (skia), shade, shadow, overshadowing; ἐπισκιάζω (episkiazō), overshadow, cover; ἀποσκίασμα (apokiasma), shadow, darkness.

CL 1. The noun skia (Ionic skiē) is found in cl. Gk. from the time of Homer (Od. 10, 495; 11, 206), meaning both a shade (of one dead) and the shade (e.g. of trees). The only verbal form of this root to be found in the NT is the Hellenistic episkiazō, to overshadow, cover (Hdt., 1, 209), which is an intensive form, found already in Homer of skiazō, to shade (cf. also skiaō, to overshadow, make shady).

Another NT word belonging to this group is the noun apostiasma, found only Jas. 1:17, and nowhere in pre-Christian literature, signifying a darkening caused the movements of constellations.

2. skia has in cl. Gk. both a proper and a transferred meaning. On the one hand means a shadow, thrown by an object (e.g. a tree or a rock) or a person. On the other hand, it can assume the meaning of skotos and indicate the sphere of → darkness particularly important example of this is in the expression skia thanatou, shadow of death. skia here underlines the suggestion of threat already contained in the concept of → death. But apart from this combination, skia can also be used to signify vanity (→ Empty, art. mataios) of human actions (e.g. Lucian, Hermotimus 79, pursue a shadow, a fiction) and of man in general (e.g. Pindar, Pyth. 8, 95 f., man the dream of a shadow). Occasionally skia may be translated → image, reflection. Plato it is used alongside eikōn almost as a synonym for that term, which like skia describes a mere likeness of the true and eternal realities (cf. Rep. 6, 510e; 7, 517d).

3. The Platonic distinction between shadowy image and real → form, which is ultimately equivalent to that between appearance and reality, plays an important part in the religious philosophy of Philo of Alexandria. In seeking to enable man to draw conclusions from the visible world about the invisible God, he describes God's work of creation as skia (Leg. All. 3, 99 f.). The Logos, which has in addition a mediatorial function, can also be called eikōn and skia, that is in relation to God. For to man is archetype and paradigm, i.e. the pattern of real being. It is interesting that Philo makes a conscious distinction between the exceptional, mediatorial rôle of → Moses and that of the → prophets, attributing to Moses a knowledge of God en eidei, in form, while the prophets know him only en skia (Leg. All. 3, 103 f.). The meaning of eidos here is on a level with that of archētypos, original, substance. The same is true of Philo's use of sōma, → body, which is likewise contrasted with skia.

OT 1. In the OT the term shadow has various meanings. The LXX constantly uses skia to translate the Heb. šēl, and its derivative šalmāwet is sometimes rendered by skia thanatou, shadow of death. Most frequently it is found in a concrete sense: the shadow of mountains (Jdg. 9:36), plants (Ezek. 17:23; 31:6; Jon. 4:6), a boot (Jon. 4:5), and a sundial (2 Ki. 20:9 ff., where the details of the text are obscure, as in Isa. 38:8 which is dependent on 2 Ki. [→ Miracle, art. sēmeion OT 2 (c)]). The difficult reference in Isa. 25:5 to the shadow of a cloud does not appear in the LXX.

2. There is, perhaps coincidentally, no mention of a human shadow; but the thought is in the background of Isa. 51:16, with its mention of the shadow of God → hand (cf. Isa. 49:2 LXX, skepē), and in the places where the "shadow of the Almighty" is mentioned (Ps. 91:1; cf. Pss. 57:1; 17:8). Similar to the references to God's wings are those which speak of the cloud whose shadow is a demonstration of God's authority (Exod. 40:34 f.). Paradoxically, words of this group assume a positive meaning akin to that of phōs, → light, in passages where they refer to the sphere of God's protection and shelter. This is surprising in view of the fact that skia would seem at first sight to have its place among metaphors of → darkness. But see also Glory, art. doxa.

3. The negative sense is retained in all those places where, in poetic literature, skia is mentioned in conjunction with thanatos, death (cf. Job 3:5; 12:22; 16:16; 24:17

3:3; Pss. 23:4; 44:19; 88:6 [LXX only]; 107:10, 14; Isa. 9:2). In these places skia used of the realm of darkness, threatening to life. It is therefore understandable at the metaphor of shadow is a favourite one for describing the short and transitory nature of human life. For “man is like a breath, his days are like a passing shadow” (s. 144:4; cf. 1 Chr. 29:15, kai ouk estin hypomonē, there is no abiding; Job 14:2).

4. In apocryphal literature also the term “shadow” is used chiefly to demonstrate the nothingness of human life (cf. Wis. 2:5; 5:9) and effort (cf. Sir. 34:2, “As one who catches at a shadow . . . is he who gives heed to dreams”). But the lit. meaning is so found (cf. Wis. 19:7, cloud; Bar. 5:8, plant); and the term can also refer to an earthly empire (cf. Bar. 1:12).

¶ In the NT the group of words is comparatively rare: skia is found 7 times; the vb. episkiazō 5 times; and aposkiasma once. The words are totally absent from the Vulgine and Johannine writings.

1. At Mk. 4:32 we find the lit. meaning: → birds will be able to nest in the shadow of the mustard when it has grown into a tree. The shadow of the shrub affording shelter to the birds (cf. J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 1963², 147) thus indicates a place of security such as is offered by nature.

2. The sphere of God’s rule is characterized in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 17:5 or Mk. 9:5; Lk. 9:34) by use of the OT image of the bright cloud which overshadows Jesus and his disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration (→ transfiguration). Here the cloud’s shadow symbolizes the gracious presence of God. At Lk. 1:35 the concrete image of the cloud throwing its shadow is lacking. Instead there is a more abstract and yet more direct reference to the divine subject of episkiazō, overshadowing, when Mary is told: “The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you.” The vb. recalls the Shekinah presence of Yahweh (cf. also D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 32–6, who compares it with the words of Ruth, “spread therefore thy wing over thy handmaid” [Ruth 3:9], in the light of rabbinic teaching). The passage which tells of the sick who were carried out on to the street, “that as Peter came by at least his shadow might fall on some of them” (Acts 5:15), is intended to point to the healing power of God, whose sphere of operation is in this case identified with Peter. Thus in all 5 instances of episkiazō, God is ultimately the cause of the overshadowing, which serves to demonstrate his power and glory.

3. As in the OT, skia can also refer in the NT to the sphere of darkness in which men find themselves before they come to the light. For by nature man lives in the light and the shadow of death, i.e. his existence is determined by death (cf. the citation of Isa. 9:1 in Matt. 4:16, and the words about John the Baptist at Lk. 1:79). Here death and darkness are intensified to mean the darkness of separation from God, so that “the expression ‘shadow of death’ . . . denotes the sphere of perdition which characterises the Gentiles who are separated from the Messiah and Son of God” (S. Schulz, TDNT VII 397).

4. It is not only the transitoriness of human life, however, with its threatened termination by death, that is expressed by skia. As in Philo, the word plays an important part in the distinction drawn between real and unreal existence in Col. and Heb. Here skia stands with hypodeigma, copy (Heb. 8:5), and parabolē, likeness (Heb. 8:9), in stark contrast to typos, pattern (Heb. 8:5), and eikōn, form (Heb. 10:1). Unlike Philo, the author of Heb. understands this contrast christologically: in comparison with the high-priestly work of Jesus Christ, who is “in the heavens”, earthly worship, as conducted in the tabernacle, takes on secondary importance. Thus the Mosaic law may not be regarded as absolute in its validity, for it belongs to the “shadow of heavenly things” (Heb. 10:1; cf. 8:5). Col. 2:17 asserts that questions of food and drink, festival, new moon and → sabbath “are only a shadow [skia] of what is to come; but the substance [sōma] belongs to Christ.” The person who belongs to Christ, the bearer of true reality (note that as in Philo sōma [lit. “body”] is seen as the contrary to skia), does not have to submit to the judgment of others in such matters. It is not that the ordinance has been suspended. Rather, it is made clear that the direct relation of faith in Christ, in the dimension of eschatological hope, has priority, since the latter links man with genuine reality, with God in Christ. Before this God all that is earthly, even certain religious and cultic formalities, cannot but appear transient. Earthly things are marked by the characteristics of the shadow: change and darkening. With God, on the other hand, the Father of lights, there is “no variation or shadow [aposkiasma] due to change” (Jas. 1:17), i.e. “processes of change and of darkening, such as are known among the constellations, are excluded in the case of God” (F. Hauck, Das Neue Testament Deutsch 10, 11).

H.-C. Hahn

→ Darkness, → Light

P. W. van Horst, “Peter’s Shadow: The Religio-Historical Background of Acts V 15”, NTS 1976–77, 204–12; H. Schultz, skia etc., TDNT VII 394–400; J. H. Paterson, “Shade, Shadow”, ZP IV 368 f.; J. A. Wharton, “Shadow”, IDB IV 302.

Shake

σειώ

σειώ (seiō), shake, cause to quake, agitate; σεισμός (seismos), shaking, commotion, earthquake; ἀνασειώ (anaseiō), stir up, incite, excite; διασειώ (diaseiō), shake violently, intimidate; κατασειώ (kataseiō), shake down, motion, shake or wave the hand as a sign; ἐπισειώ (episeiō), incite.

CL seiō (poetical siō) means to shake, move to and fro (Homer), e.g. a poised spear, a door; the head, as a sign of discontent; the ground (earthquakes were attributed to Poseidon); metaph. to agitate, disturb, upset; accuse falsely, spitefully; etc. (shake out) hush-money, blackmail; seismos, shaking, shock, earthquake, blackma; anaseiō, shake back (hair from head), swing to and fro, brandish, threaten, stir up; diaseiō, shake violently, wag (tail), shake off (people), throw into confusion, intimidate; kataseiō, shake down, throw down; metaph. listen carefully, by throwing back the ears; be dead drunk (thrown on the floor); beckon, signal with the hand; shake the head in contempt; episeiō, shake at or against, with a view to scaring; urge on.

OT seiō occurs 37 times in the LXX and usually translates rā‘aš, to shake, move to and fro. In the Song of Deborah the earth is said to have been shaken, eseist (Jdg. 5:4), and this expression of the divine presence occurs frequently in the OT particularly when God comes in judgment, the anticipation of which causes a shaking, a trembling, among the peoples (Ezek. 38:19 f.). When Judah is threatened, the word is said to shake, i.e. with fear, in anticipation of the thundering horses of the invader (Jer. 8:16). In its day, the terror of Babylon caused other nations to tremble (Isa. 14:16). Paradoxically, her end produces a similar effect (Jer. 50:46, LXX 7:46), for if so mighty and self-sufficient a power can be overthrown, what may happen to lesser nations? Nebuchadnezzar's heavy chariots and wagons driving into the city (Ezek. 26:10) will cause the walls of Tyre to shake, literally with the vibration, and metaphorically because the strength of a city, symbolized by its wall, has been destroyed, and who knows what the enemy will now do to a defenceless people? In Prov. 24:5 f. (MT 30:21) upstarts are said to cause the earth to tremble (rāḡaz, quiver violently), i.e. they are liable to upset the smooth running of affairs, whether domestic or national.

seismos occurs 15 times in the LXX, and usually translates ra'aš. In Job 41:20(21), the crocodile laughs at being threatened with a waving (seismos) firebrand. seismos means an earthquake, lit. or fig., in Amos 1:1; Isa. 29:6; Jer. 40:22; 23:19; Ezek. 3:12 f.; 38:19; Zech. 14:5; the rumbling of wheels, Nah. 3:2; the rattling of chariots, Jer. 29:3 (MT 47:3); trembling for fear, Isa. 15:5; the rattling of dry bones in the valley as they come together, Ezek. 37:7. diaseiō is used of intimidation, especially to extort money (3 Macc. 7:21). In Job 4:14 it translates pāḡad, tremble, and describes a great shaking of bones caused by a fearful nightmare. In the LXX kataseiō occurs twice. Daniel's servants sprinkled (kataseiō) ashes over the floor of Bel's temple to betray the footprints of the nightly intruders (Ad. Dan. Bel 14). In 1 Macc. 6:38 kataseiō is the verb used of horsemen being placed in position on either wing of an army, as though spread or sprinkled over an area. episeiō translates sūt, persuade, excite. Achsah urges (episeiō) Othniel to ask her father for a favour (Jdg. 1:14). In 1 Sam. 26:19 episeiō means to stir up feelings against someone, and in 2 Sam 24:1 and 1 Chr. 21:1 the verb is used for the inciting of David to number the people.

NT seiō is a powerful term to describe the effect on the people when Jesus entered Jerusalem seated on an ass: all the city was stirred, eseisthē (Matt. 21:10), shaken to its foundations. His deliberate fulfilling of the prophecy of messiah's entry (Zech. 9:9) was unmistakable. At the resurrection the guards at the tomb trembled (eseisthēsan), shook violently, at the sight of the angel (Matt. 28:4).

Heb. 12:26 refers to the giving of the law on Sinai (Exod. 19:12 f.), when the divine voice shook (saleuō) the earth. The earthquake at the time (Exod. 19:18) was an event which was never forgotten by Israel (Ps. 68:17 f.). At the end of the present world-order God would shake (seiō, as in Hag. 2:16, quoted here) not only earth but heaven too. The opening of the sixth seal leads to cataclysmic events of cosmic proportions, including stars falling to the earth, like so many figs being shaken off the tree by a gale (Rev. 6:13; cf. Isa. 34:4).

In Matt. 8:24 seismos is used to describe the violence of the sudden storm which threatened to engulf Jesus and the disciples on the lake. The other eleven occurrences of seismos in the NT all refer to earthquakes, and always as divine interventions: at the moment of Jesus' death (Matt. 27:54); at the resurrection, where it is linked with the rolling back of the stone (Matt. 28:2); and at Philippi, as Paul and Silas sing God's praises in prison (Acts 16:26). Earthquakes are one of the eschatological signs (Matt. 24:7; Mk. 13:8; Lk. 21:11; Rev. 6:12; 8:5; 11:13, 19; 16:18).

The passage Matt. 27:51–54 includes a piece of primitive christology. The resurrection of the righteous was expected as one of the great events of the end, which as a result of the Mt. of Olives splitting in two (Zech. 14:4) the dead were to appear (Dan. 12:2). The earthquake at Jesus' death relates to the first part of this sequence while the second (the appearance of some of the saints) takes place after Jesus' resurrection. This witness to the significance of Christ's death and resurrection does not survive in the main stream of tradition (only Matthew includes the incident) since it did not fit comfortably into what became the accepted christology that Christ was the first fruits of those who had fallen asleep (1 Cor. 15:20), with all the others waiting for the general resurrection (1 Thess. 4:16). The six instances of resurrection mentioned in Scripture as preceding that of Jesus are only restorations to the present earthly life: the widow of Sarepta's son, 1 Ki. 17; the Shunammite's son, 2 Ki. 4; the effect of Elisha's bones, 2 Ki. 13; Jairus' daughter, Matt. 9; the widow of Nain's son, Lk. 7; Lazarus, Jn. 11. Enoch and Elijah were translated without going through death (Gen. 5:24; 2 Ki. 2; → Resurrection, art. anastasis OT 5). Matt. 27:52–54 signals that with Christ the general resurrection has begun (K. Stendahl, "Matthew in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. Black and H. H. Rowley, 1962, 79). The earthquake symbolizes Christ's shattering of the power of death. He burst through the grave in entering it. The local tremor at Calvary and the subsequent resurrection of some saints in the holy city foreshadowed the eschatological earthquakes, the general resurrection, and the new Jerusalem, the destruction of the present earth and the formation of the new (Rev. 21:1). anaseiō occurs only at Mk. 15:11 and Lk. 23:5, where Pilate observes that the chief priests have incited (aneseisan) the crowd. diaseiō appears in Lk. 3:14, where John the Baptist tells the soldiers who responded to his preaching not to use their position to intimidate anyone (mēdena diaseisēte), i.e. not to extort money. They were probably not Roman soldiers but a Jewish paramilitary force used to suppress tax-collectors. John exhorts them to behave fairly, but says nothing about leaving their jobs. kataseiō is used four times in Acts, of Peter (12:17), Paul (13:16; 21:4) and Alexander (19:33) motioning with their hands to gain people's silent attention before speaking to them. episeiō is only in the expanded D text of Acts 14:19, where the Jews incited (episeisantes) the mob at Lystra (B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament, 1971, 424 f.). N. Hillyer σαλεύω	σαλεύω (saleuō), shake, cause to waver or totter, unsettle, drive away; σάλος (salos), rolling or tossing motion; ἀσάλευτος (asaleutos), unshakable, firm, enduring.

--------	---

CL From Aesch., saleuō means to rock, vibrate (sea, ground), loosen (tooth, nail), shake in measuring, so as to give good weight; roll, toss, of ships in stormy sea; metaph. to be in distress, be unstable, roll in walking; shake, due to sickness or a fall (Plato). Hence, life in the world beyond is asaleutos, not subject to trouble or disturbance. asaleutos also refers to the calmness of the sea, or metaph. of the mind. salos ossing motion, earthquake, rolling swell of the sea; perplexity, restlessness (political or personal).

τ In the LXX saleuō appears 77 times and translates no less than 12 different Heb. words, the commonest of which is mûṭ, to totter, shake, slide; frequently in the psalms for the man of God not being moved, i.e. weak, in the face of enemies. salos occurs 8 times and renders mûṭ, and several other Heb. terms: the tumult (nāsā', lit. fling up) of the waves (Ps. 88:9); the raging (zā'ap̄, to be angry) of the sea (Jon. 1:15); the tumult (sē'ārâh, storm) of threatening (Zech. 9:14). For Philo, the laws of the nations are variable, but the law of Moses, like nature itself and the cosmic order, is unshakable, asaleutos. In the LXX asaleutos occurs in Exod. 13:16; Deut. 6:8; 10:1:18 for ṭôtāp̄ôṭ, in reference to the immovability of the signs which were to be worn on hands and forehead as a reminder of the Exodus deliverance. It is from these verses that the Jewish practice of wearing phylacteries (Matt. 23:5) arose, i.e. binding small rolls of parchment, endorsed with sentences from the law, upon the forehead and left arm when the Shema' was recited (J. A. Thompson, Deuteronomy, 1974, 23).

Ⓜ saleuō is used of the action of the wind and storm, to shake, disturb violently, as in the parable of the two men whose houses, built on sand and rock respectively, escaped the violence of a storm with dramatically different consequences (Lk. 6:48). After the release of Peter and John from prison, the house where the Christians in Jerusalem had met to pray was shaken as in an earthquake (esaleuthē) as a sign of divine approval (Acts 4:31; cf. Acts 2:2; Exod. 19:18; Isa. 6:4; 2 Esd. 6:15, 29). At Philippi, the foundations of the prison were shaken by a literal earthquake (Acts 6:26). No doubt, as known in modern times, the swaying building not only unfastened doors but momentarily opened up the rough mortar between the stones, thus causing the staples holding the prisoners' chains to fall out.

After answering the messengers from John the Baptist, Jesus took occasion to speak about John's character and mission. A reed shaken (saleuomenon) by the wind (Matt. 11:7; Lk. 7:24) may be a collective singular, referring to the cane-grass growing on the banks of the Jordan. If so, there is no suggestion of frailty or instability. People went to the wilderness, not to gaze at the beauty of the cane-grass being waved about in the wind, but to look for a man with a message (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, 1972, 199). saleuō is also used metaph. (a) to express abundant giving, as full volume is obtained by shaking together the contents of a grain measure (Lk. 5:38); (b) to be thoroughly unsettled in mind (2 Thess. 2:2); (c) to incite a mob (Acts 17:13); (d) to shake out of a sense of security and happiness (Acts 2:25, quoting Ps. 16:8 LXX).

After the tribulation, the return of the Son of man will be accompanied by unmistakable cosmic portents. These are described by the Synoptists in the traditional terminology of Jewish apocalyptic, commonly used to symbolize political upheaval and the end of the world (Isa. 13:10; 34:4; Ezek. 32:7; Amos 8:9; 4 Esd. 13:30 ff.; 1QH 3:29–39). According to Matt. 24:29; Mk. 13:25; Lk. 21:26, the powers of the heavens – either the heavenly bodies or the forces which control them – will be shaken, saleuthēsetai. The wording alludes to Isa. 34:4, but the LXX has the much less violent verb takēsontai, from tékō, dissolve, and MT nāmaqqu, from māqaq, melt or rot away. The disruption of nature involves “a tumult of the elements, reason of which the most important parts of the universe lose their equilibrium, a their mechanism seems to become unhinged. That is the immediate introduction the reappearance of the Son of man” (T. Zahn, Das Evangelium des Lucas, 1913

The noun salos occurs only at Lk. 21:25, where the rolling swell of the sea is o of the eschatological signs distressing the nations (Hag. 2:6). This item is omitt from the parallel passages in Matt. 24 and Mk. 13. The image of the roaring wav often symbolizes turbulent conditions in the life of the nations (Ps. 65:7).

Luke tells how, when the crew of Paul’s storm-tossed ship ran the vessel asho: the bow stuck fast in the mud and remained immovable, asaleutos (Acts 27:41). T only other occurrence of asaleutos is in Heb. 12:28, where the divine kingdom described as unshakable and therefore eternal, in contrast to the fate of the mater creation, however solid that has appeared in the past (Heb. 12:26, quoting Hag. 2:1
N. Hillyer

ἐκτινάσσω

ἐκτινάσσω (ektinassō), shake out, shake off; ἀποτινάσσω (apotinassō), shake off.

CL ektinassō, shake out, as in cleaning clothes; search thoroughly, make a distu bance, kick out (of animals). The derived noun ektinaktron means a winnowin shovel. apotinassō, shake off (Eur.)

OT ektinassō occurs 21 times in the LXX, usually to render nā’ar, though six oth

Heb. words are once or twice each translated by the same verb. The Lord sho off (nā’ar) the Egyptians in the midst of the sea, i.e., out of their chariots as they tu ned to flee (Exod. 14:27; Ps. 135:15). Nehemiah sealed an oath taken by the pries by shaking out (nā’ar) his lap, symbolizing that anyone breaking the promise wou be cursed by a life of homeless wandering, emptied of all his possessions, an outca (Ps. 126:4 LXX). Metaph. nā’ar is used to express weakness: shaken off as easily : a locust (Ps. 109:23). Captive Jerusalem is bidden to stand up and shake herself fr from the dust of despair in captivity and from the Gentiles (Isa. 52:2). In 1 Sam 10 apotinassō once translates nāṭaš (leave, forsake), when Saul’s father is said to hav ceased to be concerned (apotetinaktai) about the lost asses. In Lam. 2:7 apotinas: is used for the piel of nā’ar, abhor, reject: the Lord has disowned, cast off, t sanctuary.

NT In commissioning the Twelve, Jesus tells them that where their message is not a cepted, they are to shake off (ektinassō, Matt. 10:14; Mk. 6:11; apotinassō, L 9:5) the dust from their feet, a gesture of total abandonment. No trace of associati with the house or city is to remain. Mark and Luke add, “for a testimony again them”, i.e., branding the inhabitants as no better than the heathen outside the cov nant. Jewish travellers shook off the dust of Gentile territory from their sandals ar clothes before re-entering the Holy Land (SB I 571). Once the apostles have di charged their responsibilities to preach, those rejecting the gospel will suffer judg ment, heavier even than that inflicted upon Sodom and Gomorrah. The fate of tho cities is often an OT type of fearful retribution for aggravated sin (Deut. 29:23; Is. 13:19; Jer. 49:18; 50:40; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9). Paul follows Jesus’ advice an takes use of the same dramatic symbolism when the Jews stir up opposition to his preaching in Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:51) and when he makes his final break from the synagogue in Corinth (Acts 18:6).

The verb apotinassō is used in its literal sense to describe Paul's action in shaking off the snake from his hand after the shipwreck on Malta (Acts 28:5). N. Hillyer † Bertram, saleuō, salos, TDNT VII 65–70; G. Bornkamm, seiō, seismos, TDNT VII 196–200.

Shame, Respect

αἰδώς

αἰδώς (aidōs), modesty, reverence, respect; αἰδέομαι (aideomai), have respect for, have regard for.

Ⓐ aideomai (Homer onwards), to have respect for, stand in awe of, have regard for, remains a common word in Gk. language; but the related noun aidōs (likewise from Homer), (a) awe, reverence (Pindar, Plato), (b) modesty (Hdt. 1, 8), is seldom used. Originally the terms refer to awe in face of the deinon, signifying for the Greeks power which commands respect, in the shape of gods, fate, justice, or laws (Hesiod, Works 197 ff.). In contrast to hybris, → pride, which is a wanton transgression of the ideal of the golden mean (metron), aidōs signifies a respect for the established sacred institutions (e.g. home, marriage, laws of hospitality), or for the privileges of certain people (e.g. king, priest, orator, etc.), in the sense of piety, eusebeia (→ Godliness; Plato, Prt. 322 ff.). It also connotes anxious avoidance, in the sense of phobos, → fear of any damage or change to existing circumstances (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. IV 15p 128b 10 ff.).

At a later period aidōs, originally a foundation concept for the self-understanding of the Greeks, was freed from the ties that bound it and became an independent concept in individual ethics, signifying the Greeks' sense of self-esteem, honour or shame (Stoics, Epictetus etc.). aidōs in this sense can be associated with sōphrosynē, prudence, → discipline, and eleutheria, → freedom, as the "attitude of the worthy man" (R. Bultmann, TDNT I 170). Connected with this is the fact that the word, unlike → aischynē, is limited in use to the language of the élite, and the ethics of the aristocracy, in a society divided by a class-system.

Ⓜ Heb. possesses no equivalent for aidōs. Significantly the word is found in the LXX only at 3 Macc. 1:19 in the sense of modesty (cf. Lat. pudor), and 3 Macc. 5:5 for reverence for age. At Ezek. 23:20 the Heb. zirmâh, the semen of a stallion, is rendered by aidoion. aideomai occurs occasionally in Macc. with the meaning, to stand in awe (2 Macc. 4:34), or regard, show respect (4 Macc. 5:6).

Ⓜ In the NT aideomai does not occur at all, and aidōs only in some textual variants to Heb. 12:28, and in 1 Tim. 2:9. The Koine variants of Heb. 12:28 use aidōs in its original sense of awe of God, parallel to eulabeia, fear of God: "Through gratitude we serve God acceptably with reverence and awe." 1 Tim. 2:9 describes the proper conduct of women as being meta aidous kai sōphrosynēs, with marked reserve and sober modesty. The background of Greek and Stoic ethics is unmistakable, and the context (v. 10) makes it clear that it is not so much moderation in dress that is stressed here, as the “good works” which are reckoned to be the adornment of a woman (cf. M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, The Pastoral Epistle Hermeneia, 1972, 45 ff.).

aidōs and sōphrosynē do not play a significant rôle in the NT. This is due in part their independent character as Stoic → virtues, calling for respect and restraint relation to one’s fellow men. “The essence of the believer, however, is not relationship to himself, a hexis or aretē, but a being before God and towards his neighbour” (R. Bultmann, TDNT I 171). Christian behaviour is not determined by individual standards of virtue, but by the need of others. The Gk. aidōs has been replaced in the NT by agapē (→ Love).
H.-G. Link, E. Tiedtke

αἰσχύνη

αἰσχύνω (aischynō), be ashamed, be put to shame, be disgraced, be confounded; ἐπαισχύνομαι (epaischynomai), ashamed; καταισχύνω (kataischynō), to dishonour, disgrace, put to shame; pass. be dishonoured, be disappointed; αἰσχύνη (aischynē), modesty, shame, disgrace, ignominy; αἰσχρός (aischros), ugly, shameful, base, disgraceful; αἰσχρότης (aischrotēs), ugliness, wickedness.

CL 1. The root aisch- refers originally to that which is ugly and disgraceful. aischy

(Homer onwards) thus meant originally to disfigure, make ugly. It is found in C literature almost exclusively in the mid. or pass. with the meaning to feel shame, ashamed, or to be confounded, be disconcerted. epaischynomai (Aesch. onwards) a strengthened form of the mid., and kataischynō (Homer onwards) of the act. a pass. meanings of aischynō. The noun aischynē (Aesch.) is derived from aischynesthai, and originally carried the meaning of to aischynesthai, the fact of being ashamed, or of being confounded. aischynē has the subjective sense of modesty understood as fear of what is aischron, ugly (Aristoxenus, Fragment 42a); and the objective sense of shame, that which results from an aischron, shameful deed (Dic Sic. 2, 23, 2). In contrast to → aidōs with its religious reference to the gods, aischy is primarily a sociological concept: shame exposes one to the ridicule of society which one tries to escape by being ashamed.

2. aischros (Homer onwards) is used lit. and fig. in the sense of base (e.g. βασιλῆα, gain, cf. Polyb., 6, 46, 3). aischrotēs means ugliness (Plato, Gorgias 525a).

OT 1. The LXX uses aischynō in by far the majority of cases for the Heb. bōš, to put to shame (65 times), and aischynē for the nouns bōš, būšâh or bōšet, shame (65 times). Only in 8 cases does aischynē render ‘erwâh, pudenda. The mid. meaning to be ashamed, or modesty, is found only rarely in comparison with the Gk. usage. This group of words is found most frequently in Isa., Jer., and Pss.; and the emphasis is not on the sociological, but on the theological, aspect of aischynō. Common to Yahweh is the implied or stated subject of aischynō, as may be seen from the passive construction (generally the future second pass.) used as a circumlocution for God (cf. Isa. 1:29; 20:5; Jer. 2:26). The psalmists pray for (cf. Pss. 6:10; 35:26; 40:15) and the prophets foretell (Isa. 1:29; 41:11; Jer. 2:26) Yahweh’s → judgment, which will put their enemies and the ungodly to shame. Thus in the OT aischynō refers primarily to the objective ruin of the evildoer, or of the whole nation (cf. Ps. 69:4–562

19 f.). Yahweh's acts of judgment will force his enemies to be ashamed (Pss. 40:14; 33:16–18). That an objective sense is intended is corroborated by the use, parallel to aischynō, of vbs. like tarachthēnai, to be struck with terror (Pss. 6:10; 83:17); enrapēnai, to be confounded (Pss. 35:26; 70:2; 71:24); katagelaō, to mock (Ps. 25:2).

2. In the sexual sense aischynō is found frequently in Ezek. (16:36 f.; 23:10, 18, etc.), and in the normative statement of Gen. 2:25, "They were naked and were not ashamed." Here shame in the body is the most primitive expression of the feeling of guilt, the sign of a lesion going through man's bodily nature and casting doubt upon the unity of body and spirit. This disturbance results from an act of disobedience against Yahweh, and man reacts to the objective loss of innocence, and the innermost disturbance of his relationship with God, by the feeling of shame (Gen. 3:7; cf. G. von Rad, Genesis, 1961, 88, 95–9).

¶ In the NT the group of words is found much less often than in the LXX: the noun and vb. together only 11 times, aischros 4 times, compound forms 11 times (ep-), and 13 times (kat-). In the Gospels they occur only in Lk. and Mk. Of relative importance is the Pauline use of kataischynō. Usage is closer to that of the LXX than that of cl. Gk.

1. (a) Mk. 8:38 par. Lk. 9:26 use epaischynomai in the sense of to be ashamed. The point of reference is not, however, a virtue or vice, but → confession of Christ. Being ashamed, i.e. fear of human ridicule, is rejected, as conduct denying the eschatological and universal authority of the → Son of man (cf. 1 Pet. 4:16; 2 Tim. 1:8, 16).

(b) In a similar way to the prophets (cf. Jer. 8:9), Paul speaks in 1 Cor. 1:27 of God as actively putting to shame, i.e. to nought, the wise and the powerful, while he chooses what is foolish and weak in the world, i.e. gives it standing and worth. Through the cross of Christ glory and shame have undergone an exchange of values. Similarly in Rom. 5:5, Paul makes the affirmation: "Hope does not put to shame", i.e. it does not rest on something that does not exist, but on God's future plans (cf. Rom. 8:24 f.). At Rom. 1:16 epaischynomai is used as part of a primitive Christian confession. The negative phrase, "I am not ashamed", means positively, "I confess . . ." (cf. P. Stuhlmacher, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus, FRLANT 87, 1966²; and Das paulinische Evangelium, I, Vorgeschichte, FRLANT 95, 1968). The statement is not psychological in character, but rather forensic: With the gospel I shall not be put to shame. Paul takes up the same thought in a pass. form at Rom. 9:33, a quotation from Isa. 28:16: the believer will not be put to shame, i.e. his existence is secured (cf. also 1 Pet. 2:6). It is the apostle's continual concern that he should not be put to shame in his missionary work (2 Cor. 7:14; 9:4), i.e. that he should not work in vain (cf. the parallel phrase mē eis kenon, "not in vain", Gal. 2:2; Phil. 2:16; 1 Thess. 3:5). As in the OT, so in Paul's use of kataischynō the primary meaning is objective, to be put to shame; human feelings of shame are only the other, subjective side of the coin.

(c) The author of Heb. uses epaischynomai with reference to God's saving activity: Christ is not ashamed to call men his brothers (Heb. 2:11), and God is not ashamed to be called their God (11:16); Christ even takes the public shame (aischynē) of death on the cross upon himself (12:2).

2. With aischynomai and kataischynō, the meaning to put or be put to shan predominates; with epaischynomai, to be ashamed. aischynē in the NT means shan suffered or self-inflicted (Jude 13; 2 Cor. 4:2). Phil. 3:19 and Rev. 3:18 use aischy in a sexual sense. aischros, disgraceful, is found in the NT chiefly in the phrase aischron estin, it is a disgrace (1 Cor. 11:6; 14:35; Eph. 5:12). aischrologia, foul talk (Col. 3:8), and aischrokerdēs, greedy for base gain (1 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 1:7), are fou listed in catalogues of sins. H.-G. Link

- (a). C. K. Barrett, "I am not ashamed of the gospel", Foi et Salut selon S. Paul = AnBib 42, 19 19–50; R. Bultmann, aidōs, TDNT I 169 ff.; and aischynō etc., TDNT I 189 ff.
 (b). K. E. Løgstrup, "Scham", *RGG*³ V 1383 ff.; R. Schultz, AIDOS, (Dissertation, Rostock), 1910

Shepherd

ποιμήν	ποιμήν (poimēn), shepherd; ποιμνη (poimnē), flock; ποίμνιον (poimnion), flock; ποιμαίνω (poimainō), to herd; αρχιποιμήν (archipoimēn), chief shepherd, over-shepherd.
--------	--

CL poimēn, herdsman, shepherd, is an Indo-European word (cf. Lithuanian piemu which is frequently used in metaphorical senses: leader, ruler, commander (Homer, Plato). It is also used as an alternative for nomeus, law-giver. poimai means to be a shepherd, tend (act. and mid.); metaphorically, care for. poimnē poimnion is the herd, particularly the flock of sheep.

1. Plato reminds us of the religious use of the word when he compares the ruler of the city-state to shepherds, who care for their flock (hōsper poimenōn poleōs, R. 4, 440d). For the human shepherd is a copy of the divine shepherd and law-giver (schēma tou theiou nomeus, Politics 271e).

2. In the ancient East, shepherd at an early date became a title of honour applied to divinities and rulers alike. This usage is found in a stereotyped form in 1 Sumerian king-lists, in Babylonian courtly style and in the pyramid texts (the books of the dead). The custom was followed throughout antiquity. So far characteristic parallels are lacking for pagan Canaan. Another aspect of the use of the image of the shepherd appears in poetry, as typified by Theocritus' Idylls (3rd cent. B.C.). Pastoral terminology was very much in vogue throughout the Hellenistic world.

OT The Heb. equivalent of poimēn and poimainō is rā'âh; that of poimnion is qān. poimnē occurs only at Gen. 32:17(16) and Zech. 13:7 (both times for ēder).

1. Before Israel settled in Canaan, the individual tribes depended on constant wandering with their herds and flocks. The patriarchs (cf. also Job), who owned sheep and goats along with their cattle, were nomads. The shepherd's task was undertaken preferably by members of the family; by the daughters only in the immediate vicinity of the dwelling (Exod. 2:16). It was expected that the shepherds, and the servants who worked with them, would show caution, patient care and honesty. In the dry summer on poor soil it was not easy to find new pasture at the right time as the flocks passed through lonely regions, or to balance properly grazing, watering and travel. The shepherd had to care tirelessly for the helpless beasts (cf. Ez

4:1 ff.). Devotion to duty was proved in the nightly guarding of the flock against wild animals and thieves. In this respect hired shepherds frequently disappointed their employers.

By poimnion the LXX means a herd of small cattle, especially a flock of sheep (cf. Gen. 29:2 ff.; 30:30). In NT times such a herd would consist of from 20 to 500 animals (Lk. 15:4 refers to 100 sheep). Sheep and goats were grazed together but separated in the evening, for the goats spent the night in the centre of the pen or of the walled enclosure (aulē), where it was warmer (this practice is referred to in Matt. 15:32).

Even after the occupation of Canaan the raising of cattle played a dominant rôle, alongside cultivation, as a means of earning a living. The memory of the classical nomadic days of ancient Israel before the occupation, when the people lived as aliens in tents, must have remained constantly alive, because God's activities in salvation history were bound up with it. For this reason the → Levites did not receive any arable land at the occupation, but remained herdsmen (Jos. 21). The Rechabites who formed a radical sect held fast in prophetic times to the pastoral way of life as an example (Jer. 35). Even the NT contains echoes of the memory of Israel's pastoral period (Heb. 11:9, 13).

2. Yahweh is the only shepherd of his people, Israel. This title is used discretely only in Gen. 48:15; 49:24. Elsewhere in the historical books of the OT we feel a definite reticence, evidently the result of an aversion to the formal, stiff eastern titles of divinities (cf. J. Jeremias, TDNT VI 487 f.). At all events, the passages are very irregularly distributed over the OT. But in the Psalter and in the exilic prophets of comfort, the idea of the shepherd comes into greater prominence (Pss. 23; 28:9; 58:8 f.; 74:1; 77:20; 78:52 f.; 79:13; 80:1; 95:7; 110:3; 121:4; Jer. 23:2; 31:10; 50:19; Ezek. 34:11 f.; Isa. 40:10 f.; 49:9; Mic. 4:6 f.; 7:14). The acknowledgment that Yahweh was the shepherd of Israel grew out of the living religious experience of the people and is thus to be distinguished from the cold courtly style of the ancient East. In invocation, in praise, in prayer for forgiveness, but also in temptation and despair (Ps. 73), the worshippers know that they are still safe in the care of God the faithful shepherd (the most beautiful expression of this is Ps. 23). At the same time is the thought of God's unlimited sovereignty over his flock is not absent. In these contexts it co-exists in creative tension with the overwhelming consciousness of God's spontaneous love.

The people is Yahweh's flock (cf. Jer. 13:17; Isa. 40:11; Ezek. 34:31; Mic. 7:14; Zech. 10:3; Pss. 79:13; 95:7; 100:3). As the chosen people of God, Israel applied the metaphor of Yahweh's flock only to himself. Sir. 18:13 is the sole instance of the metaphor being applied universally to all men, who at the end of time will be gathered together into one flock.

This made it impossible to employ the official title of shepherd for the reigning monarchs of Israel as an expression of honour, even though they exercised the functions of the shepherd. Rather, in the light of God's faithfulness, their failure as shepherds was felt to be fundamental. David certainly shepherded the people. They were his flock, but the kingly title, shepherd, was avoided (cf. 2 Sam. 5:2; 1 Chr. 11:2; Ps. 78:71 f.; 2 Sam. 24:17; 1 Chr. 21:17). The prophets in their denunciations spoke of the political and military shepherds in unquestionably negative terms; these had all failed because of their arrogance and disobedience to God (Jer. 2:8; 3:15;

10:21; 22:22; 23:1–5; 25:34; 50:6; 50:6; Ezek. 34:2–10; Isa. 56:11; Zech. 10:11:5 f.; 16 f.). In Isa. 44:28 God called Cyrus, king of Persia, “my shepherd”. Like a good shepherd, in accordance with God’s will, he was concerned for the well-being of the returning exiles and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and of the → temple. In a totally different manner Jer. 25:34 ff. threatened the shepherds, the rulers, of the foreign nations with judgment and destruction (cf. Nah. 3:18).

3. The messiah was also spoken of as a shepherd sent from God. At the time when disaster was breaking loose, the title of shepherd suddenly appeared as a designation of the future Davidic messiah. At first the references were to “shepherds”, in the plur. Nevertheless, these prophecies pointed to the figure of a single shepherd (Jer. 3:15; 23:4; Ezek. 34:23; 37:22, 24). One-sided expectation of political salvation was avoided, particularly in the case of Ezek. This figure of a future messianic ruler remained mysterious. The shepherd, described as messiah of David, was particularly emphasized in post-exilic times in Zech. 13:7. The majority of commentaries link this passage, which announces a representative death as the preliminary to a dawning time of salvation, with Zech. 12:10. “Thus at the end of the OT shepherd sayings there stands an intimation of the shepherd who suffers death according to God’s will and who thereby brings about the decisive turn” (J. Jeremia TDNT VI 488).

4. Late Judaism drew distinctions between shepherds. After the exile the Pharisaic rabbis brought about a striking devaluation of the occupation of shepherd in Palestinian Judaism. In a time of poor pay, shepherds were suspected, perhaps often rightly, of dishonesty. The pious were forbidden to buy wool, milk or meat from shepherd. Civic privileges (the functions of judge and witness) were withdrawn from them as from the tax collectors. “No position in the world is as despised as that of the shepherd” (Midrash on Ps. 23). In legalistic Judaism → Moses and → David were praised as true shepherds (as leaders and teachers of the law). Philo and Hellenistic Judaism do not add anything which would cause this general picture to be altered. In the Qumran sect it was demanded of the Mebaqqer, the Guardian of the Camp, that he receive the members of the community as a shepherd his sheep (CD 13:9; cf. A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966, 72 ff., 189, 228 ff.). It is clear from Ps. Sol. 17:45 that late Judaism was capable of transferring the metaphor of the shepherd to the messiah, but, out of opposition to Christianity, made no use of it.

NT poimēn occurs 9 times in the Synoptic Gospels; 6 in Jn.; once each in Heb., 1 Pe and Eph. poimnē or poimnion occur 3 times in the Synoptics; once in Jn.; twice each in Acts, 1 Cor. and 1 Pet. poimainō occurs twice in the Synoptics; once each in Jn., Acts, 1 Cor., 1 Pet., Jude, and 4 times in Rev.

1. It is striking that the contemporary negative view of shepherds was not taken over into the NT. On the contrary, the shepherd’s devotion to duty is painted in glowing colours (cf. Jn. 10:3 f.; Lk. 15:4 f.; cf. Matt. 18:12 ff.). His contemporaries despised the shepherd, but this was the metaphor which Jesus used to glorify God’s love for sinners and to reveal his opposition to Pharisaic condemnation of them (cf. Lk. 15:4–6). It is, of course, only in Lk. 2:8 f. that shepherds play an active rôle in the NT; elsewhere they appear only in parables and figures of speech. Jeremias see he story of the shepherds as a solid part of the local tradition in Bethlehem that a tall was the birthplace of Jesus (TDNT VI 491).

2. According to the witness of the Synoptics in particular, Jesus is the messianic shepherd promised in the OT. There is only one reference, in the language of variable, to God the shepherd (Lk. 15:4–7 par. Matt. 18:12–14). The shepherd's joy at finding his lost sheep after an anxious search is compared to God's joy at one repentant sinner over against ninety-nine righteous. However, the Synoptics claim or Jesus the promise of the coming messianic shepherd in three ways:

(a) Jesus begins to fulfil the messianic shepherd's function by gathering the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matt. 9:36; 10:6; 15:24; cf. Lk. 19:10 with Ezek. 34:15). This marks the dawning of the era of salvation announced by the prophets. He is the ruler of Israel, promised in Mic. 5:3(4), who gathers the shepherdless flock (Matt. 2:6; 9:36; Mk. 6:34; cf. Ezek. 34:5). But this does not mean any abandonment of the gatherings of the nations, for he is also the universal shepherd (see below, 3(b)).

(b) But Jesus must first die for his flock and rise again (cf. Matt. 26:31 f.; Mk. 14:27 f.). Here Jesus took up the words of Zech. 13:7 and claims to be the promised shepherd to which the OT looked forward, the shepherd whose representative death shepherds in the time of salvation (cf. also Isa. 53).

(c) The era of salvation during which the flock, the people of God, is gathered under the Good Shepherd, reaches its climax in the day of → judgment. When all the nations are gathered around his glorious throne, Jesus will separate the sheep from the goats (or perhaps the white sheep from the black goats; cf. OT 1). He will sit in judgment. This will bring to an end the era of world mission, in which, since Jesus' death and resurrection, his flock has been called together from out of every nation (panta ta ethnē, Matt. 25:32).

3. (a) The good shepherd of Jn. 10:1–30 is contrasted here, on the one hand, with the thief and, on the other, with the stranger. The shepherd enters through the door, his sheep know him and follow him willingly. In typically Johannine fashion the unique relationship between this shepherd and his flock is expounded. It is a relationship which is elsewhere expressed in other metaphors (cf. the vine and the branches in Jn. 15; → I Am).

This unique relationship is made possible by the shepherd's voluntary laying down of his life, something that the hireling is unable to do. He flees in the hour of danger. The hireling (misthōtos), like thief and stranger, is introduced for the sake of the contrast. The special contribution of Jn. 10, compared to the Synoptics, lies in this striking emphasis on the willing laying down of the shepherd's life (cf. Jn. 10:18). The links with the OT are obvious (cf. Ezek. 34 and the Synoptic witness; see above 2). Most scholars see Jesus' statements in the light of the OT background. However, R. Bultmann holds that the figure of the shepherd was drawn from gnostic tradition (The Gospel of John, 1971, 367–71). But these passages are mostly more recent than Jn. 10.

(b) As the shepherd stands for their → Lord (kyrios), so the flock (poimnē, Jn. 10:16), the sum total of his sheep (probata), stands for his people. This image replaces that of the ekklesia (→ church), which is absent from Jn. The theme of the Synoptics is taken further. The risen Christ gathers his flock like a good shepherd. They know their shepherd as he knows them, and no one can snatch them out of his hand (Jn. 10:27 f.). Jesus leads them out of the aulē of Judaism and unites them in a great flock with those who are following him from among the Gentiles (Jn. 10:4).

4. In Acts 20:28 poimnē and ekklēsia are juxtaposed. Paul, on the other hand, only uses the latter. In 1 Cor. 9:7 the apostle compares his claim on the church's hospitality with the shepherd's claim on the produce of his flock. 1 Pet. 2:25, however, looks back once again to the image of the shepherd and his flock; Jesus is the shepherd and → bishop of souls. Christian elders were exhorted not to be seeking masters over the community, but examples of service to it, so that they might pass the test when Jesus, the chief shepherd (archipoimēn), appears (1 Pet. 5:3 f.). Heb. 12:20 Christ is the great shepherd (poimēn megas) who, in accordance with the theme of the letter, has, once and for all, surpassed all prototypes, including Moses himself. Rev. 7:17, on the other hand, says that the → lamb (arnion) will be the shepherd of his flock and that they will gladly follow him (cf. Rev. 14:4).

5. In the list of offices in Eph. 4:11 we find poimenes kai didaskoloi, pastors and teachers. But pastor is by no means yet an official title. For in 1 Pet. 5:1 and in Acts 20:17 the leaders of local Christian communities are called presbyteroi, and in Acts 20:28 episkopoi (→ Bishop). Their function can be deduced from 1 Pet. 5:2–4; Acts 20:28; Jn. 21:15–17 (care for spiritual welfare of the flock). Matt. 18:12–14 and Lk. 12:30 par. Lk. 11:23 (seeking the lost) are also relevant. In these cases the leaders have to prove themselves worthy examples to the flock.

This is the background of Peter's appointment to pastoral office by the risen Christ: poimaine ta probata mou ("tend my sheep", Jn. 21:16). This strengthens and confirms Peter's special position as an apostle, to which the Gospels bear witness (position, however, by no means absolute or capable of being handed on). Peter's special responsibility is to the whole flock, to the whole church (→ Open; → Rock).

6. The proclamation of Christ as the good shepherd, who laid down his life and rose again to tend his flock, the new people of God, became a living experience for the NT church and was made use of pastorally. In missionary preaching, in the context of a distinctive, ancient city culture with no OT background, the title of honor kyrios, naturally took the centre of the stage in place of the image of the messianic shepherd. In worship and in personal piety there are also echoes of the shepherd image. So the christological witness of the NT retains, against the background of the message of the OT, the picture of the historical Jesus drawn in the Gospels, including Jesus' witness to himself.

Just as, in the missionary preaching outside Palestine, the image of the shepherd was withdrawn into the background, so it was with the image of the flock. The kyrios and his community (his ekklēsia) become the increasingly prominent concepts for the expression of these ideas (→ Lord; → Church).

E. Beyreuther

→ Animal, → Feast, → I Am, → Lamb, Sheep, → Lord's Supper

(a). J. B. Bauer, "Shepherd", EBT III 844 ff.; J. N. Birdsall, "John x. 29", JTS New Series 11, 1934, 342–44; E. F. F. Bishop, "The Door of the Sheep – John x. 7–9", ExpT 71, 1959–60, 307 ff.; J. Bruns, "The Discourse on the Good Shepherd and the Rite of Ordination", American Ecclesiastical Review 149, 1963, 386–91; R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John, Anchor Bible, I, 383–412; F. Bruce, "The Shepherd King", in This is That: The New Testament Development of Some Old Testament Themes, 1968, 100–114; R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 358–91; J. D. M. Derrett, "Good Shepherd: St. John's Use of Jewish Halakhah and Haggadah", StTh 27, 1973, 25–50; Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, I, 1961, 59, 67 ff., 235 ff., 287, 347; II, 1967, 330, 46

75; J. Jeremias, poimēn etc., TDNT VI 485–502; P. W. Meyer, “A Note on John 10, 1–18”, JBL 75, 956, 232–35; L. Morris, The Gospel according to John, NLC, 1971, 498–531; J. Quasten, “The arable of the Good Shepherd: John 10:1–21”, CBQ 10, 1948, 1–12, 151–69; J. A. T. Robinson, “The arable of the Shepherd (John 10:1–5)”, ZNW 46, 1955, 233–40 (reprinted in Twelve New Testament Studies, SBT 34, 1962, 67–75); J. G. S. Thomson, “The Shepherd-Ruler Concept in the OT and its application in the NT”, SJT 8, 1955, 406–18; W. Tooley, “The Shepherd and Sheep Image in the teaching of Jesus”, NovT 7, 1964, 15 ff.

ο). J. Botterweck, “Hirt und Herde im Alten Testament und im alten Orient”, in Festschrift J. Frings, 960, 339–52; N. Castavassi, “De Munere ‘pastoris’ in NT”, Verbum Domini 29, 1951, 215–27, 75–85; G. Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte in Palästina, VI, BFChTh II, 41, 1939, 146–287; V. Hamp, “Das Hirtenmotiv im Alten Testament”, Episcopus. Festschrift für Kardinal Faulhaber, 1949, 7–20; H. W. Lertzberg, “Hirten- und Beduinenleben in Israel”, *RGG*³ III 365 ff.; T. Kempf, Christus der Hirte, 942; D. Mollat, “Le bon Pasteur (Jean 10, 1–18, 26–30)”, Bible et Vie Chrétienne 52, 1963, 25–35; ι). Müller, “Der gute Hirte”, Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache 86, 1961, 127–44; M. Rehm, “Die Hirtenallegorie”, BZ 4, 1960, 186–208; J. J. O’Rourke, “Jo. 10, 1–18: Series Parabolorum?”, Verbum Domini 42, 22–25; R. Schnackenburg, “Episkopos und Hirtenamt”, Episcopus, 1949, 66–88; W. Schmidt, “Der gute Hirte. Biblische Besinnung über Lk. 15, 1–7”, EvTh 24, 1964, 173 ff.; J. Schneider, Zur Komposition von Joh. 10”, Coniectanea Neotestamentica 11, Fridrichsen Festschrift, 1947, 20–25; A. J. Simmouis, Die Hirtenworte im Johannesevangelium, 1967; J. A. Soggin, rā’âh, THAT II 91–94.

show, Proof, Demonstrate

δείκνυμι

δείκνυμι (deiknymi), show, explain, prove.

NT & OT deiknymi occurs in cl. Gk. from Homer onwards. It is also found in inscriptions and papyri. In the LXX it is found for 12 different Heb. vbs., but most frequently for rā’âh, see, in the hiphil, i.e. cause to see, show: e.g. Gen. 12:1, “Now the LORD said to Abram, ‘Go from your country and your kindred and your father’s house to that land that I will show you’” (cf. Gen. 41:28; Exod. 25:9[8], 40[39]; Num. 8:4; 13:26[28]; Deut. 1:33; 3:24; Jos. 7:14; Jdg. 1:24; Pss. 4:6; 50[49]:23; 59[58]:10; 60[59]:3; 71[70]:20; 78[77]:11; 85[84]:7; 91[90]:16; Amos 7:1, 4, 7; sa. 9:2). Although it has a normal secular sense, it acquires a theological significance, when Yahweh is showing something.

NT 1. deiknymi is found in the NT in the following senses:

(a) point out, make known something or someone to someone: kingdoms in the temptations of Jesus (Matt. 4:8; Lk. 4:5; → Tempt); showing oneself to the priest (Matt. 8:4; Mk. 1:44; Lk. 5:14; cf. Lev. 13:49; → Leper); a hall (Mk. 14:15; Lk. 22:12); a pattern (Heb. 8:5; cf. Exod. 25:40; → Tent); the → hands of the risen Christ (Jn. 20:20); signs (Jn. 2:18; → Miracle); visions (Rev. 1:1; 4:1; 21:9 f.; 22:1, 6, 8; cf. Zech. 3:1); the → Father (Jn. 14:8 f.); revelation (Jn. 5:20); the parousia (1 Tim. 5:15); a way, i.e. the more excellent way of love (1 Cor. 12:31); (b) explain, prove (Jas. 2:18; cf. 3:13; → Righteousness); Jesus’ way of suffering (Matt. 16:21); the vision of Peter which showed that the Gentiles were to be admitted to the church (Acts 10:28).

2. The following compounds also occur:

(a) anadeiknymi means to show clearly, reveal (Acts 1:24, the choice of a successor to Judas); appoint (Lk. 10:1, the Seventy). anadeixis means commissioning, installation, but in the NT manifestation (Lk. 1:80, of John the Baptist, “he was the wilderness till the day of his manifestation to Israel”).

SHOW

(b) deigmatizō, expose, make an example of, e.g. an adulteress (Matt. 1:19 mock, expose (Col. 2:15); cf. deigma, example (Jude 7); from which con hypodeigma and paradeigmatizō (→ Image).

(c) apodeixis is discussed separately below.

C. Brown

ἀπόδειξις

ἀπόδειξις (apodeixis), proof, demonstration; ἀποδείκνυμι (apodeiknymi), prove, appoint, demonstrate, exhibit.

CL & OT apodeixis is found in secular Gk. from the pre-Socratics and Herodotus to the 2nd cent. inscriptions in a number of related senses: (a) setting out or exposition, of an enquiry or argument; (b) proof, in rhetorical demonstration, in exhibiting a specimen or documentary evidence, in deductive argument, or in impressive achievements. It is found in the LXX only at 3 Macc. 4:20; 4 Macc. 3:19; 13:10. apodeixis is also found in Aristeas 102; Josephus, Ap. 1, 155; Ant. 17, 99; Test. Jos. 14:5. In Philo it occurs in the sense of “proof by means of signs and wonders” (Vi Mos. 1, 95). The cognate vb. apodeiknymi is also found chiefly in the non-canonical books: Tob. 3:8; Est. 2:9 A B (for rā’āh, see); 3:13; Job 33:21; Dan. Sus. 5; 2:4 (for the Aram. šlet haph., make ruler); Dan. Theodotion Sus. 5; Bel. 9 A; 1 Mac 10:34; 14:23; 2 Macc. 14:26; 3 Macc. 5:31; 4 Macc. 1:8; 16:2. In secular Gk. it likewise appears from Herodotus to the 2nd cent. A.D., meaning to make known, appoint, exhibit, or prove an item as an instance of something else. It also occurs in Philo, Aet. Mund. 112, 116; Josephus, Ant. 11, 3; Test. Jos. 2:7; inscriptions and the papyri.

NT In the NT apodeixis appears only at 1 Cor. 2:4, and apodeiknymi at Acts 2:22 25:7; 1 Cor. 4:9; 2 Thess. 2:4.

The noun appears in the following contrast: “My speech and my message were not in plausible words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and power” (RSV). The predominant sense of “proof” suggests that Paul believed his message was proved by whatever “the Spirit and power” refers to. H. Conzelmann favours the notion of rhetorical proof (First Corinthians, Hermeneia, 1975, 55). A. Robertson and A. Plummer see a logical analogy: “St Paul is not dealing with scientific certainty: but he claims that the certitude of religious truth to the believer in the Gospel is as complete and as ‘objective’ – equal in degree, though different in kind – as the certitude of scientific truth to the scientific mind” (The First Epistle of St Paul to the Corinthians ICC, 1911, 33). They cite Aristotle’s contention that to demand rigid demonstration from a rhetorician is as unreasonable as to allow a mathematician to deal in mere plausibilities (Eth. Nic. 1, 3, 4; cf. Plato, Phd. 77c; Theaet. 162e; P. Tib. 2, 291, 41). Exegetes differ over the meaning of “Spirit and power”. Some take it to be the convicting force of the Holy Spirit in the apostolic preaching (cf. C. K. Barrett, The First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1968, 65 f.; F. F. Bruce, 1 and 2 Corinthians New Century Bible, 1971, 39). Others see it as a reference to the signs and wonders which accompanied the preaching and could be seen in the growing Corinthian church (cf. J. Ruef, Paul’s First Letter to Corinth, Pelican, 1971, 16 f.). Conzelmann strikes a balance: “Paul . . . holds the ecstatic phenomena and the miracles that take place in the community to be workings of the Spirit. But in his eyes these phenomena are subject to the eschatological proviso. They are provisional/transitory (see chap. 13). They do not prove the truth of the word of the cross, but are for their own part subject to the criterion of the cross. When Paul presents himself as a pneumatic, then he points to his ‘weakness’ (2 Cor. 12:6 ff.)” (op. cit., 55). But Paul does acknowledge, without emphasis, such phenomena in his own ministry (2 Cor. 12:12).

apodeiknymi at Acts 25:7 means simply to prove (charges), and at 2 Thess. 2:4 to proclaim or exhibit oneself as something. The man of lawlessness seeks to ‘proclaim’ himself to be God, as Nero in A.D. 54 publicly proclaimed himself emperor (P. Oxy, 7, 1021, 5 ff.; cf. Moulton-Milligan, 60). At 1 Cor. 4:9 Paul claims that God exhibits the apostles in the rôle of condemned men. The amphitheatre is the context, implying not only that God appoints death for the apostles but that he also displays them in public in this rôle. The Stoics used this context to picture the philosopher heroically standing out in the midst of troubles, but Paul seems rather to stress the humiliation involved in suffering for others (H. Conzelmann, op. cit., 88 f.). At Acts 2:22 the vb. implies proof of worth, similar to the use of the noun at 1 Cor. 2:4. The powerful deeds demonstrate the favour of God upon Jesus of Nazareth. “Jesus is vouched for to the Jews [i.e. accredited or legitimated] by God through wonders of all kinds which God has done by him in their midst” (E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 180; cf. F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, NLC, 69 ff.).

G. T. D. Angel

τεκμήριον

τεκμήριον (tekmērion), proof.

CL & OT tekmērion is found in secular Gk. from Herodotus to the 2nd cent. A.D., almost entirely meaning strict proof. In Aristotelian logic it means a “compelling sign” (Aristot. Rhet. 1, 2, 16). This sense is suggested in the LXX (Wis. 5:11; 19:13; 3 Macc. 3:24), Philo and Josephus (cf. Ant. 5:39). (See also Moulton-Milligan, 628).

NT tekmērion occurs only at Acts 2:3, where the common secular use suggests that Luke intends the events following the appearance of the risen Christ to be treated as infallible evidence (cf. J. Munck, The Acts of the Apostles, Anchor Bible, 1967, 4), despite reservations expressed, for example, by R. Bultmann (cf. “New Testament and Mythology”, in H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth, I, 1953, 1 ff.). E. Haenchen stresses that Luke could not have intended these appearances to be thought of as visions (op. cit., 140 f.).

G. T. D. Angel

→ Image, → Miracle, → Revelation, → Spirit

Arndt, 89, 815; Liddell-Scott, 195 f., 1768; Moulton-Milligan, 60 f.; 628; H. Schlier, deiknymi etc., TDNT II 25–33.

simplicity, Sincerity, Uprightness

ἀπλότης

ἀπλότης (haplotēs), simplicity, sincerity, uprightness; ἀπλοῦς (haplous), single, simple, sincere.

CL haplotēs (from Plato onwards) and haplous (from Pindar onwards) are composed from ha-, together, and pel-, to fold. They mean (a) singleness, single; the opposite being diplos, double. Beside this numerical meaning there grew up a positive ethical connotation for the word-groups. Hence, haplotēs came to mean (c) straightness, openness, speaking without a hidden meaning. haplōs euchomai means to ask straight out. This meaning grew with the passage of time, but the one based on intellectual outlook diminished in importance; viz. (c) haplous came to mean simply silly; it is used by Isoc. (2,46) as the opposite of nous (→ Reason).

OT In Judaism and in the LXX we can find the basic meaning of (a) single (Josephus War 2, 151; Wis. 16:27). haplous then means (b) unambiguous, clear (Josephus Ap. 2, 190). The wise man, who accepts the commandments whole-heartedly, walks haplōs (Prov. 10:8 f.), i.e. his walk has a clear direction, for, being bound to the law he is freed from inner divisions. David gave God his silver and gold in singleness of heart, en haplotēti kardias, Heb. b'yošer l'ḥāḇô (1 Chr. 29:17; cf. Lev. 1:3). It also means (c) with undivided heart; a synonym being en kardia plērei, with a full whole heart (1 Chr. 29:9), Heb. b'leb šālēm. When haplotēs is used in the context of human relationships of giving it implies (d) goodness, kindness (e.g. Josephus, Ant. 332). Here too it is understood as a quality of the heart (Test. Iss. 3:8), and occasionally of (e) the soul (Prov. 11:25).

NT The word-group is not often found in the NT. The basic meaning of CL (a) and (a) is not used, though diplos is found in 1 Tim. 5:17 and Rev. 18:6. haplotēs in the NT is to be understood as personal wholeness, undividedness, and hence uncomplicated simplicity. haplous is used in Jas. 1:5 for the way in which God gives (RS NEB "generous"), to show the undividedness and honesty of God's giving contrasted with the inner division of the one who doubts. God gives without any hidden motivations but the doubter is "a double-minded man [dipsychos]" (Jas. 1:8; cf. Marshall, "Dipsychos: A local term?", Stud Ev VI = TU 112, 1973, 348–51; cf. (d) (e)). Hence the doubters are called upon to purify their hearts (Jas. 4:8; cf. OT (d)

Christ has taken the place of the law (cf. OT (b)). Paul, using the picture of devotion of the bride to one man only (2 Cor. 11:2 f.) shows the completeness of human surrender to Christ (haplotēs eis Christon). The basis of such a demand is his complete self-surrender for us (2 Cor. 5:14–20). Hence, a similar personal integrity is a mark of the Christian in his dealings with others.

Paul saw the collection made by one church for another as a true expression of unity transcending the local church (→ Fellowship, art. koinōnia; → Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4 (a)). So haplotēs receives a universal connotation (2 Cor. 8:2; 9:11, 13) and means a oneness of heart (OT d). The whole-hearted giving within the local church (Rom. 12:8) is also an expression of the unity of the body of Christ (Rom. 12:4).

Eph. 5:6 and Col. 2:22 demand that a slave should obey his master "in singleness of heart". In Matt. 6:22 and Lk. 11:34 eye-service and the jealous look (poneros, Evil; cf. Matt. 20, 15) are outward signs of inner division, of only half devotion to Christ.

B. Gärtner

→ Heart, → See

(a). O. Bauernfeind, haplous etc., TDNT I 386 f. 572

o). H. Bacht, "Einfalt des Herzens", Geist und Leben 29, 1956, 416 ff.; C. Edlund, Das Auge der Einfalt, 1952.

in

The concept of sin embraces the gamut of human failure from the transgression of a single commandment to the ruin of one's whole existence. The most general word for sin is hamartia, which with its cognates designates offences against morals, laws, men or gods. adikia and its cognates cover a more specialized area, drawn from the legal world; as the opposite to → righteousness (dikaïosynē; cf. dikē → punishment), it denotes unrighteousness, injustice and unjust deeds. parabasis and its cognates throw light on a further aspect: in particular they refer to transgression of the law. On the other hand, paraptōma, which is derived from parapiptō, fall down beside, lose one's way, fail, means more generally a moral lapse and an offence for which one is responsible. Other concepts belong to the wider context of the whole phenomenon of sin: anomia, lawlessness (→ Law, art. nomos); asebeia, godlessness (→ Godliness, art. sebomai); ptaiō, stumble, come to grief; hētīēma, defeat; ysterēma, lack, fault; planaomai, go astray, deceive oneself; agnoeō, not know, not understand (→ Knowledge, art. agnoia); opheilō, be under obligation (→ Necessity); arakoē, disobedience (→ Hear, art. akouō); and also the concepts dealt with under the heading of → Guilt; aitia, cause, accusation; elenchō, convict; also enochos, guilty.

ἀδικία

ἀδικέω (adikeō), do wrong, commit injustice, deal unjustly, injure; ἀδικήμα (adikēma), unjust deed, a wrong; δικία (adikia), wrongdoing, unrighteousness, injustice; ἀδικος (adikos), unjust; δίκως (adikōs), unjustly.

L 1. adikeō and its derivatives often occur in Gk. literature. As the very form of the words (with the alpha privative) shows, they denote the opposite of the positive concepts dikē, dikaïosynē and dikaïos (→ Righteousness). The unjust man is the opposite of the just. The vb. adikeō means to commit an injustice (Aristotle, Rhet. 1, 1, 3, 1368b 6 f.); with an obj., deal unjustly with someone, injure, harm (Dem., 21, 29); in the pass., suffer injustice (Plato, Gorgias 509c). The noun adikēma denotes above all the individual unjust deed, and also the possession that was unjustly obtained (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5, 7, 1138a 24; Xen., Mem. 2, 2, 3). Unjust deeds can also be described as adikia, but the noun is used particularly for injustice (Plato, Rep. 10, 79c; Phaedo 82A). adikia is the least clearly defined description of an activity or being of man that is described in negative terms. Consequently it can take on various senses (→ Righteousness, art. dikaïos; → Law, art. nomos). adikos is the adj. of both nouns, but it has a more general meaning. It can mean wrong, useless, not of a good nature (Hdt., 6, 137; Xen., Mem. 4, 4, 13).

2. (a) The definition of the content of the concept is usually dependent on the form of justice that obtains at any particular time and to which it is related. Hence adikos covers all that offends against morals, custom or decency (dikē), all things that are unseemly, unspeakable or fraudulent. What is “unjust” is here not measured by definite laws laid down in writing, as is the case with anomos, lawless. Rather, it designates that which harms the order of the world (kosmos; → Earth) and the city (→ People, art. polis) (cf. the nomoi agraphoi, unwritten laws). The adikos is frequently depicted siding with bia, sheer force.

(b) But above all, the concept of adikia is rooted in legal thinking. Here it is used as a synonym of parabasis, etc., and can refer also to particular crimes like the fraud, incest, etc. In lists of vices adikia is used as a general description of a wide range of things.

(c) These words are also used in a religious context. adikeō can mean the neglect of one’s duties towards the gods (Xen., Mem. 1, 1, 1). The adikos does not match up to the claims of the deity and therefore is guilty before him. He offends against eusebeia, reverence for God (→ Godliness), and thus becomes an asebēs, godless person.

OT 1. The LXX uses these words to translate a variety of Heb. equivalents; the Hebrew vocabulary is here far more complex and varied than the Gk. The most important are these: adikeō translates 24 Heb. words; proportionately the most frequent (10 times) is the qal of ʿāšaḳ, act unjustly, oppress, extort, which is chiefly used in a context of human relations or politics (e.g. Lev. 19:13; Deut. 28:29; Ps. 119:121). The adv. adikos, which is frequently used as a noun, and the adv. adikōs usually represent šeqer, deceit, fraud, lie, and are often combined with laleō, speak: lying speech, i.e. (e.g. Ps. 63[62]:11; Prov. 6:17; Jer. 5:31). At a later period adikos and asebēs are sometimes used as parallels (Job 16:11 LXX). We do not often come across adikēma, which means an unjust act committed against the law (Heb. pešaʿ) or an offence against God (ʿāwôn) (e.g. Lev. 16:16; Jer. 16:17). By far the commonest of these words in the LXX is adikia (c. 250 times). It represents 36 different Heb. words; most often it translates ʿāwôn, offence, guilt, punishment (c. 80 times), but occasionally also ʿawlâh, perversity, wickedness (e.g. Hos. 10:13), ḥāmās, violent and unjust (e.g. Ps. 7:16(17)), and šeqer, lie (e.g. Ps. 119:104).

2. The fact that adikia mostly occurs in the sing. shows that it is not on the individual act but on the whole phenomenon of transgression that attention is focused. Sin was felt in ancient Israel as above all an offence against the sacred order of divine justice (1 Sam. 3:13 f.). Thus it affects the community, whose existence is most intimately connected with the preservation of divine justice. Hence, sin is regarded as a phenomenon of theological and social import, as something that destroys the community. For that reason it is demanded of the covenant people that they purge it from their midst (cf. Lev. 16:21 f.; 17:4, 9). It is significant that the word ʿāwôn means not only the conscious, responsible act, but also its consequence, punishment (Lev. 26:39). As the OT sees it, an offence that incurs guilt sets in motion a process of destruction whose effects recoil upon the offender and his community unless the fateful connexion of deed and consequence is broken (Gen. 4:13; Num. 32:23). The offence is, in the first place, regarded objectively as a harmful event even when it is committed in error (Gen. 20:3 ff.; 1 Sam. 14:24 ff.). These harmful effects of the deed can only be checked by the → punishment of the offender or by the vicarious slaying of a beast or the offering of an atonement offering. “Expiation was thus not penalty, but a saving event" (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 271; → Reconciliation; → Redemption; → Sacrifice).

3. In the later writings of the OT and in late Judaism adikia was on the one hand limited to the concrete individual act, but on the other hand was extended to apply to all men. In this context it is significant that occasionally the LXX translates šeqer, i.e. by adikia (e.g. Pss. 52:3[5]; 119:29, 69, 104, 163; 144:8, 11). Philo (Spec. Leg. 1, 209) and Josephus (Ant. 8, 10, 2[251]) mention adikos and asebēs in the same breath. Just as dikaios is prominent in Philo's teaching on → virtue, so adikos is in that on wickedness (Abr. 103; Sobr. 42; cf. TDNT I 150). The apocalyptic thinking of late Judaism regarded the whole period preceding the coming of the messiah as the 'world of unrighteousness' (Eth. Enoch 48:7) which the messiah will destroy (2 Esd. 1:51 ff.; Eth. Enoch 91:5 ff.; Pss. Sol. 17:29, 36). Similar views are found in the rabbinic literature (e.g. San. 97a; Midr. Ps. 92:10; cf. SB IV 977 ff.).

NT 1. (a) There are only 27 occurrences of adikeō in the NT, chiefly in Acts, 1–2

Cor. and Rev. It occurs 10 times in Rev., 5 times in Acts, 3 times in 2 Cor., twice each in 1 Cor. and Col. and once each in Matt., Lk., Gal., Phlm. and 2 Pet. It means to act unjustly, harm in relation to other men (e.g. Matt. 20:13; Acts 7:24, 26, 27; Gal. 4:12). In Rev. it has things as its objects (Rev. 6:6; 9:4). The pass. used with the meaning suffer injustice is always found in the context of relations between man and man (Acts 7:24; 1 Cor. 6:7 f.; 2 Cor. 7:12). The other instances are Lk. 10:19; Acts 15:10 f.; 2 Cor. 7:2; Col. 3:25; Phlm. 18; 2 Pet. 2:13; Rev. 2:11; 7:2 f.; 9:10, 19; 11:5; 22:11.

adikēma occurs 3 times. In Acts 18:14 and 24:20 the adikēma is a criminal act, and in Rev. 18:5 it is parallel to hamartia and used in relation to God.

The noun adikia occurs almost entirely in Lucan and Pauline texts and in 2 Pet., 1 Jn. and 2 OT quotations in Hebrews; it and the adj. adikos are occasionally used absolutely (Matt. 5:45; Lk. 18:11; Jn. 7:18; 2 Thess. 2:12). Their meaning in these passages follows that of general usage and means behaviour that does not conform to the moral norm. In quotations it follows the OT usage (Lk. 13:27; Acts 8:23; Heb. 1:9 = Ps. 45:7[8]; 8:12 = Jer. 31:34).

(b) These concepts become more important theologically in contexts where they are contrasted with dikaios, just, and dikaiosynē, righteousness, justice (Rom. 3:5; Acts 24:15; 1 Pet. 3:18) or with alētheia, → truth (e.g. Jn. 7:18; Rom. 1:18; 2:8). The gen. of the noun adikia can be used in the Semitic fashion as a substitute for the adj. (e.g. Lk. 13:27; 16:8 f.; 18:6). The adv. adikōs occurs only in 1 Pet. 2:19.

(c) The NT's use of these words shows that we are dealing with commonly accepted and used categories of injustice whose particular meaning in each case we only discover through a close examination. Hence we must seek to learn the meaning of each individual passage from its context, or from what qualifies it or is contrasted with it.

2. In the NT doctrine of sin adikia and → hamartia are the most important concepts. Of these adikia is, as in the LXX, the less specific and more varied in its nuances of meaning. The definition in 1 Jn. 5:17 juxtaposes the two. hamartia is the main idea. adikia probably means here unjust deeds and injustice amongst men, which are not to be regarded as mortal sins but are to be forgiven.

In comparison with hamartia, adikia describes more forcibly the outwardly visible characteristics of that which stands under the power of sin. Hence, in the parable of the unjust steward, mention is made of unjust mammon (Lk. 16:1 ff.; Possessions, art. mamōnas), in Jas. 3:6 of the injustice perpetrated by the tongue (Word, art. glōssa), and in Lk. 18:1 ff. of the unjust judge.

3. (a) Paul never uses hamartia in Rom. 1:18 ff., where he is talking about the sins of the Gentiles, but only adikia and asebeia. God's wrath manifestly rests upon those who as his creatures should have known him and honoured him (Rom. 1:21, 25; 2:8; → God, art. theos NT 4 (b)). In Rom. 1:29 adikia is used as a comprehensive term at the start of a list of vices. Correspondingly, 1 Cor. 6:1 contrasts the unrighteous with the saints. This refers to Gentiles who do not yet recognize righteousness through faith and as a result have fallen victims to their adikia and God's wrath. They do not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9).

(b) The criterion for unrighteousness is the → righteousness of God (Rom. 3:5; 9:14), which discloses man's unrighteousness (Rom. 3:5). The gulf that is opened by the contrast of God's righteousness and man's unrighteousness is bridged by Christ who as the righteous One stands in our place (Rom. 3:24; 2 Cor. 5:21; cf. that very Pauline-sounding passage, 1 Pet. 3:18, which makes use of the words now under consideration). A new division of righteous and unrighteous has appeared because the truth has been received (Rom. 1:18; 2:8).

Just as adikia was often used in the OT to translate šeqer, lie, falsehood, so Paul and John use adikia in contrast to alētheia (Jn. 7:18). The consequence of faith in Christ is not only the elimination of sin as a power, but also conversion to a life of righteousness (2 Thess. 2:9–12). Within the community there is no longer any place for litigation, and so Paul in 1 Cor. 6:1–11 warns the Corinthians to cease from litigation and to prefer suffering unjustly to standing on their rights. The basis of this is that Christians are controlled by → love (1 Cor. 13:6). Man's preoccupation with rights, which leads to his suing his neighbour and hating him and fighting him instead of being shattered by a love of his neighbour and his enemy. This idea, which is a continuation of the OT command to love one's neighbour (Lev. 19:13 ff.), goes right back to Jesus himself (Matt. 5:43–48). It is in keeping with this that one is prepared to suffer injustice, as 1 Pet. 2:19 points out.

4. (a) In later writings this fundamental vision of the Christian life again shines through. 2 Tim. 2:19 warns the community that unrighteousness is not compatible with calling on God's → name. Heb. 8:12 picks up the message of Jer. 31 concerning God's forgiving love in the new → covenant and gives it a christological interpretation. Christ makes → forgiveness for unrighteousness possible (1 Jn. 1:9), but the basic principle of the possibility of forgiveness seems to have been limited later to sins which do not bring death (1 Jn. 5:17; for the history of interpretation of this passage see B. F. Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, 1902⁴, 209–14).

(b) The apocalyptic vision of 2 Peter emphasizes the final judgment and the condemnation of the adikoi (2 Pet. 2:9, 13, 15).

In the apocalyptic final judgment of Revelation the ungodly world is judged. Revelation frequently uses adikeō here for judicial actions performed against men and things. The vb. is found more frequently here than anywhere else in the NT (Rev. 2:11; 6:7:2 f.; 9:4, 10, 19; 11:5 [twice]; 22:11).

W. Günther

ἁμαρτία

ἁμαρτάνω (hamartanō), to sin; ἁμαρτία (hamartia), sin; ἁμαρτήμα (hamartēma), a sin, transgression; ἁμαρτωλός (amartōlos), adj., sinful; noun, a sinner.

ἁμαρτάνω (Homer onwards) originally meant to miss, miss the mark, lose, not share in something, be mistaken. The Gk. view of a mistake is intellectually oriented. hamartanō is the result of some agnoia, ignorance. The cognate noun is amartia (Aesch. onwards), mistake, failure to reach a goal (chiefly a spiritual one). The result of such action is hamartēma, failure, mistake, offence, committed against oneself, against one's own body, etc. From these was derived (in the 5th cent. B.C.) the adj. and noun hamartōlos, that thing or person that fails; in Aristoph. it occurs as a barbarism used with a deprecatory and ironic ring. hamartētikos (the better form) is also uncommon and late. The root hamart-, with its meaning of fail, produced many popular compounds, e.g. hamartinoos, madman.

1. In the Gk.-speaking world the noun hamartēma prevailed over the vb. amartanō. Aristotle placed it between adikēma, injustice, and atychemā, misfortune, as an offence against the prevailing order, but one without an evil intention, i.e. without kakia, evil, wickedness (Eth. Nic. 5, 8, 1135b 18). Thus it was also used in the legal language of deliberate offences. hamartia becomes a collective term with a relatively indefinite sense: offending against right feeling. It can mean anything from stupidity to law-breaking, anything that offends against the orthon, the right, that does not conform to the dominant ethic, to the respect due to social order and to the polis.

2. The Gk. view of guilt finds its deepest expression in conjunction with the fateful retribution of man as classical tragedy depicts it (e.g. Soph., Antigone 1261). Guilt is no longer here just an action, but a reality that is rooted in man's innermost being. Man knows that he is in jeopardy and is encircled by the destructive powers of ineluctable retribution and fate. Guilt is the cause of suffering (as in the case of Oedipus). Guilt and fate are inextricably interwoven. Perhaps it is too strong to speak of "sin" here, since a firm godward orientation of guilt and fate is missing in the Gk. world.

3. Hellenism severed the connexion of guilt and fate in its search to escape the determinism of fate by rites and gnosis in the mystery religions. On the other hand, the concept of guilt was intellectualized in the Stoa and rationalized (cf. Epictetus, Dissertationes I, 26, 6). Guilt can be surmounted through better understanding and correct behaviour. Both views work from the presupposition that man is basically good.

Ⲫ In the LXX two words, hamartia and → adikia, represent between them almost the whole range of Heb. words for guilt and sin. hamartia and its cognates particularly represent the Heb. word ḥaṭṭā'ūt, lapse, sin, and also 'āwôn, guilt, sin as a conscious deviation from the right way, peša', rebellion, etc. adikia above all represents 'āwôn and 35 other Heb. words besides (cf. Hatch-Redpath, I–II, 25 ff.).

The noun hamartēma must be distinguished from hamartia. The use of the vb. corresponds to that of the nouns. hamartōlos usually translates rāšā', evil-doer, lawless man (cf. asebēs; → Godliness, art. sebomai).

1. The OT has no main general word for sin like the NT. Its theological reflection on sin is not so fully developed as, for example, in Paul. Yet sin, over and above the guilt of the individual, was clearly recognized as a reality separating man and nation from God.

Yahweh himself is the yardstick for right and wrong. His → covenant with the people, his → commandments and → law, his → word spoken by chosen men all express his normative will. The fate of both individual and people depended upon Yahweh. Sin, guilt and punishment were frequently not separated because sin is an estrangement from him, and thus brings harm and punishment upon itself.

2. The OT's view of sin is the negative reverse side of the idea of the → covenant and hence is often expressed in legal terms. The nation's history is often depicted as history of apostasy, of punishment, and of Yahweh's gracious intervention and returning.

(a) Gen. 3–11 (seen by many scholars mainly as the work of the Yahwist) provides a clear and typical example of this, depicting in masterly fashion man's independent and self-sufficient behaviour. Sin mounts up in a series of fresh outbreaks starting with the → fall of → Adam into sin in Gen. 3 and leading on to fratricide (Gen. 4), the song of Lamech (Gen. 4:23 f.), and finally to the building of the tower Babel (Gen. 11). This is not so much a reflection about sin as a confession of it (cf. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 154 ff.). The tendency to depart from the order given by God and to establish oneself in one's own position and to go one's own way is seated in the → heart (Gen. 6:5; 8:21). The Priestly Code lays more stress on the theological side and on the cultic ordinances, but in Gen. 6:11 f. it comes to the same conclusion: "Now the earth was corrupt in God's sight, and the earth was filled with violence. And God saw the earth, and behold it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted their way upon the earth."

(b) Sin is both a falling away from a relationship of faithfulness towards God and also disobedience to the commandments and the → law. The former is described as unfaithfulness to God's covenant (Hos. 2; Jer. 3:10), the latter is a violation of God's word and command (1 Sam. 15:23 ff.; Ps. 78). In both cases man shuts himself out from fellowship with God and becomes God-less (cf. Jer. 2:29).

(c) The sin of the individual cannot be separated from that of the nation. The earlier writings concentrate on the nation's history of recurrent apostasy and salvation (Jdg. 2:6–3:6), but later traditions put more emphasis on the fate of the individual (Pss.; Job).

3. (a) Sin is universal. No man can exist in the presence of God's holiness (Isa. 1:4 ff.). His accusation is against the people as a whole (Hos. 12). The universality of sin is especially emphasized in Gen. 6:5; 8:21; Isa. 64:6 f. This certainly forms the starting-point for a doctrine of original sin, but nowhere is it given any systematic formulation. The consequence of sin is → death (Gen. 2:17). If that does not happen at once, it is wholly due to God's sovereign grace in which he constantly delays the consequence of destruction and does not allow punishment and judgment to be his last word. Rather, he makes them the basis of renewal as in the cases of → Noah (Gen. 6–9), and the new → covenant (Jer. 31; Ezek. 37). Both the sinner and the apostate nation alike can only hope for God's mercy till at last they hear the message of the Servant of God who, though he is himself without sin, bears the sins of others (Is. 53; for interpretation of the Servant see H. H. Rowley, "The Servant of the Lord in the Light of Three Decades of Criticism", and "The Suffering Servant and the Davidic Messiah", in The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament, 1965³, 1–60, 63–93).

(b) In the cultus various → sacrifices were designed to cover sin including the great day of atonement ritual described in Lev. 16 (→ Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT). But → forgiveness of sins is linked with confession of → guilt (cf. Gen. 50:17; 2 Sam. 2:13; Ps. 51[50]).

4. In late Judaism the concept of sin is more strongly orientated towards the law and becomes more superficial under the influence of speculative and casuistic thinking. The Gentiles do not know God's commandments and are therefore all sinners. For the religious Jew the essence of sin is above all the transgression of the laws and commandments. Idolatry, unchastity and bloodshed were regarded as unforgivable sins. The possibility of atonement for sins committed unintentionally was provided by sacrifice, purificatory rites, good works, suffering and martyrdom. To the question as to the origin of sin Judaism found the answer in Adam and Eve or the fallen angels (Gen. 6:1 ff.). The consequences of sin are sickness, death and eternal damnation (SB I 495). Sin is universal and was centred in the evil inclination in particular (SB III 155 ff.). But the main stress is on the → law, on the individual's responsibility and efforts to keep himself from transgressions (SB III 38 ff.). The religious man had his sights fixed on the possibility of sinlessness. His examples were → Abraham, → Moses, → Elijah and Enoch, and particularly the last two because death did not overtake them (→ Resurrection, art. anastasis OT 5). The complete removal of sin was expected in the messianic kingdom.

17 Following the prominent use of hamartanō and its cognates in the LXX, the NT uses them as the comprehensive expression of everything opposed to God. The Christian concept of sin finds its fullest expression and its deepest theological development in Paul and John. Even the statistical evidence underlines the relative insignificance of the rest of the NT writings. All the other concepts and synonyms are overshadowed by hamartia and are to be understood in the light of this concept. hamartia occurs 173 times of which 64 instances are in Paul (including 48 in Rom.), 15 in Heb. and 17 each in Jn. and the Johannine epistles. hamartanō occurs 42 times including 7 each in Rom. and 1 Cor., 10 times in the Johannine epistles and 3 times in Jn.).

hamartia is always used in the NT of man's sin which is ultimately directed against God. hamartēma occurs less frequently (5 times) and refers to the individual act (e.g. 1 Cor. 6:18); it is used in the context of forgiveness (Mk. 3:28; Rom. 3:25) and in Mk. 3:29 is used of the eternal, i.e. unforgivable, sin (→ Satan art. Satanas NT 3). The adj. anhamartētos occurs only in Jn. 8:7 and means without actual sin. hamartōlos, sinful, is the usual adj. (47 times, notably 18 times in Lk.); it is occasionally used as a synonym with ponēros, depraved, evil (cf. Mk. 8:38 with Matt. 12:39, 45). When used as a noun, its nuances of meaning follow those of hamartia, from those taken over from Judaism to the full Christian understanding.

1. (a) Jesus used the OT and Jewish concept of sin that was familiar in the world around him. This becomes clear from the fact that in the Synoptic Gospels the nouns hamartia and hamartēma are found almost exclusively in the context of the → forgiveness of sins. The vb. is often used absolutely, i.e. in its usual and familiar sense (cf. Matt. 18:15; Lk. 17:3 f.). The use of the nouns chiefly in the plur. shows that the dominant idea is that of individual faults committed against the law or one's brother. The sinner, the hamartōlos, is, according to the traditional Jewish view, the man who does not abide by the law and the Pharisaic interpretation of it. Thus he was put on the same level as the tax-collector (Matt. 9:10 par. Mk. 2:15 f.) and likened to the Gentile, ethnikos, or the godless, asebēs (Matt. 26:45; Mk. 14:41; Lk. 6:32 ff.; Matt. 5:46 f.). The combination "sinful and adulterous generation" in Mk. 8:38 implies that sin separates from God. Hence repentance and forgiveness are necessary.

(b) Jesus' preaching went beyond the Jewish concept of sin when, as in the Sermon on the Mount, he radicalized the law and set up his coming and his person as a new standard and thus brought about a new state of affairs (Matt. 7:21 ff.; 12 par. Mk. 3:28 ff.; Lk. 12:10).

This is true even though these passages do not often explicitly mention sin. The new situation is disclosed by Jesus' mixing with sinners. It is to sinners that Jesus comes and not to the righteous (Matt. 9:13 par. Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:32). He pronounces the → poor blessed (Matt. 5:2 ff.) and calls the burdened to him (Matt. 11:28). It is in connexion with this mission of his that Jesus is called the "friend of sinners" (Matt. 9:10 f.; 11:19). His fellowship with sinners is particularly prominent in Lukan narratives (Lk. 7:36 ff.; 15:1 ff.; 18:9 ff.; 19:1 ff.). The story of the lost son in Lk. 15:11–32 shows that the sinful son, as well as the righteous one, needs the father's possessions. Jesus' address to the → Pharisees in Matt. 23:1–36 par. Mk. 12:37–Lk. 20:45 ff., makes it particularly clear that with Jesus' coming the criterion for distinguishing righteous from sinful is completely altered, so far as Judaism is concerned. Those who according to Jewish legal standards were reckoned righteous and religious are shown up as particularly sinful before God in view of their sinfulness and their rejection of Jesus.

(c) In the passion-narrative, especially in the account of the → Last Supper, Jesus' whole life and preaching is seen clearly from the perspective of the cross (Matt. 26:28). Jesus replaces ritual means of atonement with the sacrifice of his own life. Here righteous and unrighteous alike are seen to be sinners. This insight is anticipated in Peter's cry in Lk. 5:8 ("Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord") and is summed up in the evangelists' overall interpretation of Jesus' mission (Matt. 1:21; Lk. 1:77). Thus → baptism which was interpreted by John the Baptist in terms of repentance (Mk. 1:4 par. Matt. 3:2, Lk. 3:3), takes on a new meaning. Both baptism and forgiveness of sins are grounded by the apostles in the death and resurrection of Jesus (Jn. 20:23; Acts 2:38; 5:31; 10:43).

2. (a) Paul's main statements about sin are to be found in Rom. 1–8. But it is striking that in Rom. 1:18–3:20 hamartia and its cognates scarcely occur. Here Paul is speaking about Gentiles and Jews who both alike come to grief when confronted with God's righteousness. As a result of their unbelief and their resultant unrighteous actions, they have fallen under the wrath of God, orgē theou (→ Anger). Paul mentions asebeia, godlessness, and adikia, unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18). The → law (nomos), produces knowledge of sin (Rom. 3:20; 5:20; 7:7 ff.; Gal. 3:22). It is thereby invalidated (Rom. 3:31, etc.), but rather serves as a paidagōgos, "custodian to lead men to faith in Christ (Gal. 3:23 ff.; → Teach). The law watches over men and keeps them for that purpose, but is not itself the way of salvation. God's righteousness cannot be attained by the way of the law. Law – sin – death, that is the fateful road that man treads without Christ and without faith. Rom. 5:12–21 shows ow → Adam is an example of this. Through his sin Adam brought death into being; from then on this succession was the rule for all men (cf. Rom. 1:32; 6:16; 7:5 ff.; 13; 1 Cor. 15:56).

It is only when one comes to know Christ that the full power of sin is disclosed. The man that struggles against the Spirit of God is imprisoned in the → flesh (sarx), which as God's enemy produces sin and whose end is death. Spirit and flesh fight against one another in man under the law (Rom. 7:13–25; cf. Gal. 5:16–26). Paul most always uses the word hamartia in the sing. Sin is almost a personal power which acts in and through man (Rom. 5:12, 21; 6:6, 17; 7:9 ff.). The same is also true of sarx, flesh (Gal. 5:19, 24), and thanatos, death (Rom. 6:9b). This vivid way of stating things contributed, along with Paul's statements on the universality of sin since Adam (Rom. 5), to the church's doctrine of original sin.

(b) Jesus Christ, as the counterpart of Adam, has by his coming broken this rule. He has taken upon himself the → curse of the law in place of all men (Gal. 3:10–14). He has endured death (Rom. 5:8; 6:3 ff.; 1 Cor. 15:3), and has dealt with sin by bearing it (Rom. 8:1 ff.). He himself has become sin (2 Cor. 5:21) in order to establish God's righteousness (katallagē; Rom. 5:11; 11:15; 2 Cor. 5:18 f.; → reconciliation, art. katallassō NT 4). Throughout all this, however, Paul gives us no systematic teaching on sin; he describes the victory of Jesus Christ over the powers of the law, sin and death, which are replaced by righteousness and life. The way of the law, which Paul himself had earlier trod, does not lead to life, but to death. Paul saw in his persecution of Christ and the Christians the sin of his life (1 Cor. 15:9; cf. Tim. 1:15). It is God's → grace that has opened up a new way (Rom. 5:15; 1 Cor. 5:10 f.). And it is the way of → faith (pistis, Rom. 3:21 ff.). → Abraham, who became → righteous through faith (Rom. 4), serves as a type of it (cf. A. T. Hanson, "Abraham the Justified Sinner", in Studies in Paul's Technique and Theology, 1974, 2–66).

Christ's reconciling death has taken place for us once for all (Rom. 3:25 f.; 5:8). Peace is bestowed upon the believer (Rom. 5:1 ff.). Baptism symbolizes the taking up of the believer into the Christ-event. By dying and rising with Christ, he is torn from the dominion of death and participates in Christ's new life (Rom. 6:1–11). This indicative is immediately followed by an imperative telling the Christian now to free himself from the bondage of sin in order to enter the service of righteousness (Rom. 6:12 ff.). The freedom to put oneself at the disposal of the Spirit is realized in love (Gal. 5:13 ff.; cf. Rom. 8:9–17). As a result, all self-righteousness, and also all confidence in the self, is excluded (Rom. 10:3; 1 Cor. 1:18–31; → Boast). Thereafter all which does not arise from faith and so from union with the living Christ is sin (Rom. 4:23).

(c) Thus we have two strands in Paul's teaching on sin. (i) On the one hand, there is the subjection of all men to the power of sin from which they can be redeemed only through God's once-and-for-all act of reconciliation in Jesus Christ. (ii) On the other hand, there is the call to all Christians to turn to this new righteousness in faith, to be servants of Christ instead of servants of sin, and then to walk in the Spirit or in Christ.

It is the juxtaposition and interweaving of these two strands that is the reason for the depth and seriousness of sin as a ruling power and for the greatness of God's act of grace, and at the same time the reason for man's responsibility for his faith and tions.

3. (a) In the Johannine literature the concept of hamartia is set in the context the Christ-event which holds together earth and heaven. Jesus comes into the world (kosmos, Jn. 1:1–14) and bears its sin as the → Lamb of God (Jn. 1:29; 1 Jn. 3: Jesus himself is without sin; but he sheds his blood for the sin of the world, i.e. the man imprisoned in his alienation from God (1 Jn. 1:7; 2:2; 4:10; Rev. 1:5). That v and that power which oppose Jesus are sin. This is clear in the case of Judas Iscariot (Jn. 6:70 f.; 19:11), but also in the way that the Jews react to Jesus (Jn. 8:44 ff). They suppose Jesus to be a sinful man, but it is they who are sinful, because they have not recognized him as the redeemer (Jn. 9:16–41). Here sin is unbelief. Jesus faces men with a decision (krisis) for or against himself (Jn. 15:22–24). By his belief or unbelief a man decides either for life or for death (Jn. 8:24; 9:41; 16:8 f.). Thus with his coming Jesus exposed sin as such (Jn. 15:22–24) and, in so far as he brought himself he stripped the prince of this world of his power (Jn. 12:31; 16:11).

(b) In 1 Jn. sin is seen as the opposite of love (agapē) (1 Jn. 3:1–10). It is true that purification from sin has taken place through Christ (1 Jn. 1:7) and sin is an impossibility for him who is born of God (1 Jn. 3:8 f.), but no man can reckon himself sinless or dispense with forgiveness (1 Jn. 1:8). Thus 1 Jn. too preserves the tension between Christ's redemptive act, ethics and man's actions. The test lies in one's love of one's brother (1 Jn. 1:9; 4:7; cf. 1:4; 2:7; 3:10). Sins have been forgiven (1 Jn. 2:12), but the Christian can always call upon Christ if he confesses his sin (1 Jn. 1:9). However, 1 Jn. also knows of the mortal sin; by this he probably means apostasy and idolatry (5:16–21; → below 4 (a)).

4. Hebrews seeks to show that Jesus has become a man in every sense, even to the point of being tempted (Heb. 5:7 f.), and how he yet remained free from sin (Heb. 4:15). Heb. deals with sin in the context of → sacrifice (art. thyō NT 3). Christ as the true high priest (Heb. 7:25–27; → Priest, art. hiereus NT 2 (b) and (c)), who has offered himself once and for all for our sin, replaces the continually repeated sacrifices. He is the unique sacrifice which makes the offering of further sacrifices superfluous (Heb. 10:4–10, 18); it is replaced by the possibility of forgiveness through faith (Heb. 11). The unique sacrifice of Jesus liberates us once and for all from sin. The example of Jesus helps us in our struggle against the peril of fresh sinning (Heb. 12:1–4). But for Heb. all that awaits a falling away from the faith is eternal judgment. This is the sin that excludes further repentance (Heb. 6:4 ff.; 10:26 ff.; 12:16 f.; → Conversion; cf. I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God: A Study in Perseverance and Falling Away, 1969, 132–54).

5. The Epistle of James warns of lust which produces sin and death (Jas. 1:14) and of the danger of failing to act on the knowledge provided by faith (Jas. 4:17). At the same time James exhorts his readers to confess their sin in the certainty of the promise of God's forgiveness (Jas. 5:15 ff.).

6. 1 Peter cites Isa. 53. The disciple stands firm in the midst of suffering by taking as his example him who once suffered for us and thereby redeemed us from our sin (1 Pet. 2:21–25; 3:18; 4:1). E. Best compares this with other NT passages dealing with → slaves (Eph. 6:5–8; Col. 3:22–5; 1 Tim. 6:1 f.; Tit. 2:9 f.; 1 Cor. 7:21 ff., Peter, New Century Bible, 1971, 116 ff.). Most slaves were owned by pagan masters. Best thinks that the reason why 1 Pet. does not deal with the duties of masters (c 3ph. 6:9; Col. 4:1; Phlm. 16) was not due to the fact that there were no Christian masters. Slaves are given a new dignity. “The social code in 1 Peter is unique among those in the NT because it bases its instructions to slaves on the example of Christ who took the form of a slave (Phil. 2:7) and bore the punishments, reviling, beating, crucifixion of a slave” (op. cit., 117).

W. Günther

παράβασις	παραβαίνω (parabainō), go aside, turn aside, transgress; παράβασις (parabasis), overstepping, transgression; παραβάτης (parabatēs), transgressor; ἀπαράβατος (aparabatos), unchangeable; ὑπερβαίνω (hyperbainō), overstep, transgress.
-----------	--

1. The vb. parabainō (attested from Homer onwards) lit. means to walk beside, go beside, pass by (Homer, Il. 11, 522) and refers both in its spatial and fig. senses to a deviation from an original and true direction.

Besides this intrans. sense there is a trans. one: transgress, neglect. It takes as its objects those words that the Greeks used to indicate the standard and norm by which they regulated their lives: e.g. dikē, → righteousness; nomos, law; horkos, oath; ethē, morals (e.g. Plato, Crito 53E; Eur., Ion 230). From the time of Aesch. onwards parabainō could be used absolutely to mean sin (Agamemnon 59). Mostly it refers to some obligation that is not kept. It is also used in a religious context in the sense of ceasing to reverence the gods (Hdt., 6, 12, 3).

2. (a) parabasis is found with the same objects as the vb. (Porphyry, On Abstinence 2, 61); it is seldom used absolutely. It is used either spatially or fig. of deviation, trespassing, transgressing. The word is used as a technical term for a choral part found in comedies, the parabasis.

(b) Almost nowhere does parabatēs occur in a fig. sense (Pythagoras, Ep. 3,7). It means the bystander, comrade, companion. Thus it became a technical term for the warrior standing beside the charioteer (Homer, Il. 23, 132; cf. Arndt, 617). The participle of the vb. is generally used for the transgressor of some norm.

(c) aparabatos, a late and rare word, means that which cannot be superseded, thus unchangeable, inviolable, eternal (Epictetus, Dissertationes 2, 15, 1). Fate and also the stars are bound thereby.

(d) hyperbainō follows the many senses of its prefix. Lit. it means to step over, go over the bank (Hdt., 2, 99, 3), thence injure, transgress, err (Plato, Rep. 2, 366A, 373D), but also presume, pass over someone in silence (Plato, Rep. 7, 528D).

3. This group of words is not at all common in the LXX; the fig. sense predominates. Only in Ps. 101(100):3 does parabasis have a Heb. equivalent šetīm. parabatēs, transgressor, evil-doer, occurs only in Symmachus' translation Ps. 17:4; 139:19). The vb. occurs c. 80 times and translates 7 different Heb. words: the most frequent are āḇar, pass on, cross over; sūr, turn aside, pārar (hiph.), break; and sātāh, deviate. It is not often that parabainō is used in matters of private rights, e.g. that of → marriage (Num. 5:12, 19 f., 29). It is interesting to note the objects associated with parabainō: God's words (Num. 14:41; Deut. 1:43), the word of the Lord (1 Sam. 15:24), legal demands (1 Esd. 1:48(46)) and especially often the → covenant (Jos. 7:11; Hos. 6:7; 8:1; and often in Ezek. 16:59; 17:15 ff., etc.). The noun parabasis is associated with more general concepts rather than with concrete individual commandments: → way, → word and → covenant. Thence it derives basic meaning in the LXX to neglect God, to break the covenant, to fail to maintain the correct (obedient) relationship to God. parabasis occurs only at 2 Ki. 2:24; 101(100):3; Wis. 14:31; 2 Macc. 15:10.

NT The NT's use of these concepts follows on from that of the OT. While → adi and anomia are conceived of in more general terms and refer to injustice in sense of anti-social and unlawful actions, and on the other hand asebeia, irreverence (→ Godliness), and hamartia are directly orientated towards the person of God. parabasis is related to God's gracious ordinances, such as his → covenant (H 9:15) and → law (Rom. 2:23 ff.; 4:15; Jas. 2:9–11), his → commandment and tradition (Matt. 15:2 f.).

Because the OT ordinances of God, particularly the → law (art. nomos), appear in a completely new light on account of the Christ-event, → hamartia becomes the essential idea of sin, while parabasis decreases sharply in importance. aparabatos and hyperbainō occur only once each in the NT (Heb. 7:24 and 1 Thess. 4:6).

1. (a) In Matt. 15:1 ff. parabainō is associated with paradosis, tradition (Teach) and entolē, commandment (→ Command). Jesus is attacking the superficiality of the → Pharisees' observance of the law. He turns the charge of parabasis back on the Pharisees and shows that, when the basileia, the → kingdom arrives, it is the Pharisaic law that matters but the new dispensation, e.g. as it is described in the Sermon on the Mount. The OT law is not abandoned (cf. Matt. 5:17 f.); but in light of this new dispensation the paradosis, tradition, of the Pharisees is shown to be but a human ordinance.

(b) The original spatial meaning of these words is still recognizable in Acts 1:15: Judas' sin consisted in his abandoning the topos, the place or position of service: apostleship, in order to go his own way. (hodos, way, would be more in keeping with the OT and Jewish way of putting it; but the metaphor still has the same spatial perspective.) Judas has abandoned his discipleship.

2. Almost all the instances of the nouns parabasis and parabatēs are found in Pauline writings. Jas. 2:9 ff. is an exception, and there the influence of Jewish usage is clearly present. Sin is here understood as transgression of the law. As in Matt. 15:2 ff. also in Paul the → law is no longer central in the Christian faith. It has been displaced from its function as a way of salvation by pistis, faith, which is made possible through the coming, the death and the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Hence the concept chiefly appears in Paul where he is involved in argument with the Jewish theology of the law.

(a) The Jews are shown by their transgression of the law to stand before God as sinners like the Gentiles (Rom. 2:17–29). They are ostensibly striving to obtain God's righteousness, but their actions show that they fall far short of it. Yet God's claim on both Jew and Gentile is binding (Rom. 2:14 f.). God is still the judge who demands good works, even of Christians (Rom. 1:18–3:20; 2 Cor. 5:10; Judgment).

(b) Faith in Christ does not replace the law, but it provides a way to righteousness even for those who do not know the law and therefore cannot transgress it. By faith they can become children of → Abraham (Rom. 4:13–16) and receive a share in promise. Therefore parabasis can no longer be the main content of the concept of sin as it was for the Jews. Sin is measured by God himself and no longer by the law alone. Only in Rom. 4:14–20 is sin as a universal fact referred to as a transgression (parabasis is used here as a synonym of → paraptōma). This is because → Adam is a type of sin as the transgressing of God's commandment.

(c) Christ renders the way of the law as a way of salvation powerless. It is replaced by → the way of faith in Christ. From it comes → righteousness (Gal. 3:22 ff., etc.). Thus the question arises as to what part the law now plays. Paul's answer in Gal. 3:19 is that the law's purpose in the history of salvation lies in its function of showing man to be sin. It stirs man up to transgress and so leads him to sin and thus, it leads him to Christ (Rom. 7:7–12).

3. (a) 1 Tim. 2:14 amplifies Rom. 5:14 in the light of the narrative of Gen. 2 f. On the rôle of Eve → Adam, art. Heua. In all these passages the original fact of human sin is presented as a rebellion against God and his commandment.

(b) Heb. 2:2 and 9:15 speak of parabasis in the context of the OT dispensation. The allusion to the punishing of parabasis and parakoē, disobedience, in the OT serves to underline the warning in Heb. 2:2 against neglecting the salvation given in Christ. Heb. 9:15 stresses the significance of Jesus' death as redemption from the transgressions committed under the first covenant.

4. aparabatos only occurs in the NT in Heb. 7:24, where it retains a clear echo of the lit. meaning. The OT priesthood, which according to v. 11 was tied up with the law and thus was liable to be violated and transgressed, is contrasted with Jesus' priesthood which is an eternal one that is not exposed to any parabasis (→ Priest).

W. Günther

παράπτωμα

παράπιπτο (parapiptō), fall beside, go astray, err, sin; παράπτωμα (paraptōma), transgression, trespass, false ερ, sin.

⌊ parapiptō (from the time of Hdt. found with kata tychēn, accidental) means to fall beside, fall at the side; thence, accidentally bump into something, turn up somewhere or other; and then (Polyb. onwards), to turn out amiss, miss one's way or the truth, fail in one's duty. Used absolutely it means make a mistake, err, meaning an accidental and excusable oversight.

Correspondingly the noun paraptōma (Polyb. onwards) means oversight, error, mistake (unintentional). Here the originally fig. sense was that someone deviated to one side or the other.

⌋ In the LXX both the noun and the vb. are found most frequently in Ezek. paraptōma translates 6 different Heb. words and is found at Job 35:15; 36:9; ss. 19(18):12; 22(21):1; Wis. 3:13; 10:2; Zech. 9:5; Ezek. 3:20; 14:11, 13; 15:8; 16:22, 24, 26; 20:27; Dan. 4:24 (Theodotion); 6:5(4), 23(22). parapiptō translates 3 Heb. vbs. and is found at Est. 6:10; Wis. 6:9; 12:2; Ezek. 14:13; 15:8; 18:24; 20:27; 21:4; 2 Macc. 10:4. The vb. usually translates the Heb. mā'al, (deliberately) commit acts of unfaithfulness (used with the sub. paraptōma in Ezek. 14:13; 15:8; 18:24; 20:27; → Fall, art. aphistēmi). The noun too is used for words expressing conscious and deliberate sinning against God (peša', rebellion, Job 36:9; Ezek. 14:11; 18:2 ma'al, unfaithfulness; awel, injustice, Ezek. 3:20; 18:26). There are only isolated instances of its meaning unintentional sins committed in weakness (Ps. 19[18]:12) or negligence in official duties (Dan. 6:5). As an alternative word for sin, paraptōr always means the individual lapse.

NT 1. The vb. only occurs in the NT in Heb. 6:6, and its use there is probably to be understood as reflecting that of the Heb. mā'al. The readers were seemingly meant to take it as fall away, be unfaithful, similar to aphistēmi (→ Fall) in Heb. 3:1 and the expression used in Heb. 10:26. This is certainly not meant in the sense of a single lapse but rather expresses their whole position, as one of the abandonment of the Christian truth. This would, of course, show itself in specific behaviour in individual cases. The idea is one of man's self-rejection by his rejection of the grace continually offered to him (→ Fall, art. piptō; cf. I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God: A Study of Perseverance and Falling Away, 1969, 132–54).

2. Apart from the Pauline writings, the noun is only found in the NT in Matt. 6:14 f. par. Lk. 11:25 f. As in the OT, it is used as one of several words for sin, but emphasizes strongly the deliberate act (only in Rom. 5:20 is it used of a universal fact) with its fateful consequences. Hence, figuratively it means an action through which man falls and loses the position that God gave him. Thus trespasses committed by one man against another directly affect man's relation to God and in the final judgment provide the standard by which he is judged (Matt. 6:14 f. par. Lk. 11:25 f.). Thus a man must be helped to put any failure right (Gal. 6:1). The first sinful act at the beginning (Rom. 5:15 ff.; cf. Wis. 10:1) brought in its train a mass of sin and woe (Rom. 5:18, 20), and even → death (5:15, 17 f.), and that in such a way that even before his physical death man was in the power of death (Eph. 2:1, 5; Col. 2:1). Thus Christ was given up to death (Rom. 4:25) in order that we might receive forgiveness for our sins (2 Cor. 5:19; Eph. 1:7; Col. 2:13). According to Rom. 11:11 f., Israel's fall consists in its rejection of the gospel.

W. Bauder
→ Adam, → Anger, → Conversion, → Death, → Demon, → Evil, → Faith, → Fall, → Forgiveness, → Grace, → Guilt, → Hard, → Hell, → Judgment, → Law, → Lie, → Reconciliation, → Redemption, → Righteousness, → Sacrifice, → Satan, → Tem

(a). C. K. Barrett, "ho adikēsas (2 Cor. 7, 12)", in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Veri Festschrift für Gustav Stählin zum 70. Geburtstag, 1970, 149–58; K. Barth, "God and Nothingness", CD III, 3, 289–368; "The Pride and Fall of Man", CD IV, 1, 358–513; "The Sloth and Misery of Man", CD IV, 2, 378–498; "The Falsehood and Condemnation of Man", CD IV, 3, 368–480; "Christ and Adam: Man and Humanity in Romans 5", SJT Occasional Papers 5, 1956; M. Bauckham, "Speaking of Sin (Some Interpretative Notes on Romans 1.18–3.20)", SJT 8, 1955, 288–96; J. Bauer, "Sin", EBT III 849–62; G. C. Berkouwer, Sin, 1971; E. J. Bicknell, The Christian Idea of Sin and Original Sin in the Light of Modern Knowledge, 1923²; A. Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, 1928; F. Büchsel, thymos, TDNT III 167–72; Bornkamm, "Sin, Law and Death (Romans 7)", in Early Christian Experience, 1969, 87–104; E. Bruner, Man in Revolt, 1947, 114–211; and Dogmatics, II, The Christian Doctrine of Creation and Redemption, 1952, 89–132; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 239–53; "Adam and Christ according to Romans 5", in W. Klassen and G. F. Snyder, eds., Current Issues in New Testament Interpretation: Essays in Honor of Otto A. Piper, 1962, 143–65; E. La B. Chertoff, Hardness of Heart, 1955; C. E. B. Cranfield, "On Some of the Problems in the Interpretation of Romans 5.12", SJT 22, 1969, 324–41; and The Epistle to the Romans, I, ICC, 1975; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 1955², 17–35; D. Daube, Sin, Ignorance and Forgiveness in the B

961; F. Greeves, The Meaning of Sin, 1956; H. W. Heidland, oregomai, orexis, TDNT V 447 f.; J. Iick, Evil and the God of Love, 1966; K. G. Kuhn, "New Light on Temptation, Sin and Flesh in the New Testament", in K. Stendahl, ed., The Scrolls and the New Testament, 1957, 94–113; S. Lyonnet and L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption and Sacrifice: A Biblical and Patristic Study, Analecta Biblica 48, 1970; R. Mackintosh, Christianity and Sin, 1913; B. F. Malina, "Some Observations on the Origin of Sin in Judaism and St. Paul", CBQ 31, 1969, 18–34; W. Michaelis, piptō, TDNT V 161 ff.; G. F. Moore, Judaism, I, 460–96; R. S. Moxon, The Doctrine of Sin: A Critical and Historical Investigation into the Views of the Concept of Sin held in Early Christian, Mediaeval and Modern Times, 1922; J. Müller, The Christian Doctrine of Sin, I–II, 1885; J. Murray, The Imputation of Adam's Sin, 1959; R. Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, Gifford Lectures, I, 1943, 178–264; J. Orr, Sin as a Problem of Today, 1910; J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I–II, 1926, 411–37; S. Perubčan, Sin in the Old Testament, 1963; G. Quell, G. Bertram, G. Stählin, and W. Grundmann, hamartianō etc., TDNT I 67–316; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 157–64, 262–67; J. Schneider, parabainō etc., TDNT V 736–44; G. Schrenk, adikos etc., TDNT I 149–63; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Sin and of the Ways of God with Sinners, 1953; W. D. Stacey, The Pauline View of Man, 1956; F. R. Tennant, The Sources of the Doctrine of the Fall and Original Sin, 1903; and The Concept of Sin, 1912; G. Vandervelde, Original Sin: Two Major Trends in Contemporary Roman Catholic Reinterpretation, 1975; S. J. De Vries, "Sin, Sinners", IDB IV 361–76; J. G. Williams, "A Note on the 'Unforgivable Sin' Logion", NTS 12, 1965–66, 75 ff.; N. P. Williams, The Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin, Bampton Lectures, 1927; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974.

b). E. Beaucamp, Donnés bibliques pour une Réflexion sur le Péché, 1963; J. Becker, Das Heil Gottes. Feils- und Sündenbegriff in den Qumrantexten, 1964; F. Bennewitz, Die Sünde im alten Israel, 1907; Das Böse. Studien aus dem Carl Gustav Jung Institut, Zürich, 13, 1961; G. Braumann, "Die Schuldner und die Sünderin. Luk. vii. 36–50", NTS 10, 1963–64, 487–93; H. Dee, "Vergebung der Sünden", EvTh 26, 1966, 540 ff. (cf. H. Gollwitzer, "Zu H. Dee, 'Vergebung der Sünden'", EvTh 26, 1966, 652 f.); G. Fitzer, "Die Sünde wider den heiligen Geist", ThZ 13, 1957, 161 ff.; J. Freundorfer, Erbsünde und Erbtod beim Apostel Paulus, 1927; G. Friedrich, "hamartia ouk ellogēitai, Röm. 5, 13", TLZ 77, 1952, 523 ff.; J. Haas, Die Stellung Jesu zu Sünde und Sünder nach den vier Evangelien, 1953; E. Hirsch, Schöpfung und Sünde, 1931; W. Jetter, "Sünde", in Theologie für Nichttheologen, IV, 1965, 31; A. Kirchgässner, Erlösung und Sünde im Neuen Testament, 1950; M. A. Klopstein, šqr, THAT II 010–19; R. Knierim, Die Hauptbegriffe für Sünde im Alten Testament, 1965; hī', THAT I 541–49; ī'l, THAT I 920 f.; āwel, THAT II 224–28; and āwōn, THAT II 243–49; K. Koch, "Sühne und Sündenvergebung um die Wende von der exilischen zur nachexilischen Zeit", EvTh 26, 1966, 217 ff.; K. Koch, L. Goppelt and P. Jacobs, "Sünde und Schuld", EKL III 1217 ff.; J. Köberle, Sünde und Gnade in religiösen Leben des Volkes Israel, 1905; K. G. Kuhn, "peirasmos – hamartia – sarx im Neuen Testament und die damit zusammenhängenden Vorstellungen", ZTK 49, 1952, 200 ff.; E. Lövestam, Spiritus blasphemia. Eine Studie zu Mk. 3, 28 f. par. Mt. 12, 31 f.; Lk. 12, 10", Scripta Minora Societatis Humaniorum Lundensis, 1966–67, 1 ff.; S. Lyonnet, De Peccato et Redemptione, I, 1958; G. Mensching, T. C. Vriezen, E. Lohse, K. Stendahl, E. Kinder, W. Joest, K. E. Løgstrup, E. Engisch, and V. Rott, "Sünde und Schuld", *RGG*³ VI 476 ff.; R. Otto, Sünde und Urschuld, 1932; P. Palazzini, ed., Il Peccato, 1959; E. Schweizer, "Die Sünde in den Gliedern", in Abraham, unser Vater, Festschrift Otto Michel, 1963, 437 ff.; W. Staerk, Sünde und Gnade nach der Vorstellung des älteren Judentums, 1905; I. Thyen, Studien zur Sündenvergebung im Neuen Testament und seinen alttestamentlichen und jüdischen Voraussetzungen, FRLANT 96, 1970; H. Vogel, "Die Sünde im biblischen Verständnis", EvTh 19, 1959, 439 ff.; L. van den Wijngaert, "Die Sünde in der priesterlichen Urgeschichte", Theologie und Philosophie 43, 1969, 35–50.

šit

κάθημαι

κάθημαι (kathēmai), sit; καθέζομαι (kathezomai), sit; καθίζω (kathizō), sit, cause to sit; καθέδρα (kathedra), seat; πρωτοκαθεδρία (prōtokathedria) and πρωτοκλισία (prōtoklisia), best seat, place of honour.

⌚ While kathizō was originally a transitive verb, to cause someone to sit, it early acquired also an intransitive sense, and became a synonym of the other verbs list Sitting was often a mark of honour or authority in the ancient world: a king sat receive his subjects, a court to give judgment, and a teacher to teach. The gene practice at meals in the Graeco-Roman world was not to sit on chairs but to recl on couches placed round three sides of the table (hence the Lat. triclinium, “th couches”, i.e. dining-room).

OT In the LXX kathēmai and kathizō almost always translate Heb. yāšaḅ, which l a wider range of meaning than sit, including dwell and → remain.

Of the many different situations in which people sit in the OT, the following : significant. 1. The king sits on his throne (→ Might, art. thronos) as a mark authority. To sit at his right hand is a mark of the highest honour (e.g. 1 Ki. 2:19; Ps. 110[109]:1; → Hand, art. dexia); in 1 Sam. 2:8 to sit with princes is a picture the highest exaltation. God, as king, also sits enthroned in → heaven (1 Ki. 22: Pss. 2:4; 29:10; etc.). 2. The court, or judge, sits to give → judgment (Ex. 18:13–14; Dan. 7:9–10, 26). 3. A respected elder sits while others stand (J 29:7–8). 4. A teacher sits among his pupils (2 Ki. 6:32; Ezek. 8:1). 5. David “ before the LORD” (2 Sam. 7:18) – a privilege apparently reserved for the king, ad brating perhaps the privilege exercised by the royal priest of Ps. 110:1, 4 (cf. H 1:3, etc.) in contrast to the priests of Aaron’s line (Heb. 10:1 ff.).

In all the above, sitting is a mark of honour and authority. It is usually clear tha such cases a throne or seat was used. To sit on the ground, by contrast, is a mark abasement. It is the characteristic attitude of the sufferer (Job 2:8), the mourner (137[136]:1), the humiliated (Isa. 47:1), the penitent (Ezra 9:3–4; Jon. 3:6), and suppliant (Jdg. 20:26; 2 Sam. 7:18).

For most of the OT period it was normal to sit at table (1 Sam. 20:5, 18, 25; 1 13:20). The custom of reclining clearly appears first in the Persian period (Est. 1 7:8), and is common during the Hellenistic period.

NT The NT also mentions people sitting in a wide variety of situations, includ most of those listed under OT.

1. For sitting (on a throne) as the proper posture of the king see, e.g., Acts 12: Rev. 18:7. So God, as king, is constantly described in Rev. as “the one who sits the throne” (e.g. Rev. 4:2–10; 5:1–13; 6:16; 7:10–17; 21:5; cf. Matt. 23:22). It i mark of the glory of Christ that he has been given the seat at God’s right hand (14:62 and many other allusions to Ps. 110[109]:1; Eph. 1:20), or even shares very throne of God (Rev. 3:21). So, having completed his work of redemption, h now seated in the place of supreme authority, until all opposition is finally destroy (Heb. 1:3–4; 10:11–13).

2. It is a remarkable extension of this idea that the believer, who is “in Chri shares this exalted position. James and John asked for this place of honour as a p sonal right (Mk. 10:37–40), and it was refused. But the Christian’s union with Ch means that God has “raised us up with him and made us sit with him in the heave places” (Eph. 2:6). He even offers us a place on the throne which he himself sha with the Father (Rev. 3:21; cf. Matt. 19:28).

3. The seated position of the judge or court (Acts 6:15; 23:3; 26:30) leads to transitive use of kathizō as a term for the appointment of judges (1 Cor. 6:4). In

9:13 kathizō could be used either transitively, meaning that Pilate placed Jesus on the judgment seat as an act of mockery, or intransitively, that he sat on it himself; either would be grammatically possible, but God (Rev. 20:11) and Christ in glory (Matt. 25:31) are described as sitting on thrones to give judgment.

4. Jesus customarily sat down to teach, whether in the open air (e.g. Matt. 5:1; 3:1–2) or in the temple court (Matt. 26:55). In the synagogues it was customary for the preacher to stand to read the Scriptures and to sit to expound them (Lk. 4:16–21). The expression “Moses’ seat” (Matt. 23:2) may therefore be figurative, indicating the authority of the teacher who, like Moses, speaks in God’s name (cf. our professorial “chair”, and the “sophist’s seat” mentioned in a third-century Greek inscription). See, however, the next paragraph.

5. The worshippers in the synagogue apparently sat (Acts 13:14), and Christian worship followed the same pattern (Acts 2:2; 20:9; 1 Cor. 14:30). The most respected members of the synagogue congregation sat in the front seats (Mk. 12:39), a practice which led to unhealthy class distinction (Jas. 2:2–4). There is later evidence for a special chair (“Moses’ seat”) for the chief elder of the synagogue, which may be referred to in Matt. 23:2, though it is doubtful if the term was used in this literal sense so early.

6. As in the OT, sitting on the ground was a mark of humiliation (Jas. 2:3). Mary’s sitting by Jesus’ feet (Lk. 10:39) was a sign of humility. Sitting in sackcloth and ashes as a sign of penitence is still known (Lk. 10:13), and beggars sit on the ground to ask for gifts (Matt. 10:46; Jn. 9:8).

7. In the NT it was common to recline at meals, particularly on more formal or festive occasions; the words for “sit” are never used in this connexion. (anaklinomai, napiptō, anakeimai and other words for “recline” are translated “sit at table” in many English versions, which correctly conveys the sense, but not the cultural pattern.) As in the synagogue, the place assigned is a mark of the guest’s importance, the closest to the host being the most prestigious (Lk. 14:7–10; Mk. 12:39). Hence the significance of the “beloved disciple’s” position at the last supper, “lying close to the breast of Jesus” (Jn. 13:23, 25; 21:20); this was the position on the right of Jesus (his left elbow being used to support the body), the place of a trusted friend, and one which allowed confidential conversation.

R. T. France

. Schneider, kathēmai etc., TDNT III 440–444; W. S. McCullough, “Seat”, and N. Turner, “Seat, loses”, IDB IV, 259–260; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 1966², 48 f. (on reclining at meals).

Slave, Servant, Captive, Prisoner, Freedman

The various groups of words dealt with in this article each express in their own way the dependence and forcible subjection of men: aichmalōtos denotes a prisoner of war, desmios one who is in chains, and doulos, a slave. Naturally in their literal sense, these words take on a negative and depreciatory colouring (for the opposite → Lord). But when used figuratively, they can at least in part lose the sense of compulsion and have a more positive sense. Here paradoxically dependence can be seen, not as an enforced loss of one’s self, but also as an independent self-realization. Hence, desmos or syndesmos can also refer to a liberating union, douleia to service for the community, and zygos to the → yoke of wisdom. Thus it is possible to make use of the doulos group of words to designate man's relationship to God. The libertinos was one who had formerly been a slave, but who was now a free man. For servant → al Child art. pais and for the Servant of the Lord → Son. → also Freedom, → Serve, Yoke.

αἰχμάλωτος

αἰχμάλωτος (aichmalōtos), captive, prisoner of war; αἰχμαλωτίζω (aichmalōtizō), capture, take captive; αἰχμαλωτεύω (aichmalōteuō), capture, put in prison; αἰχμαλωσία (aichmalōsia), captivity.

CL aichmalōtos means lit. one caught by the spear (from aichmē, spear, lance, then also war, and haliskomai, take prisoner). It is used to denote a prisoner of war (Aesch. onwards). The later vb. aichmalōtizō (Diod. Sic. onwards) means take as prisoner of war, take prisoner; aichmalōteuō, lead away into captivity. Another noun aichmalōsia, captivity, also belongs to this group.

OT 1. aichmalōtos occurs 25 times in the LXX and usually translates various forms of the root šābāh, lead off as captive (Num. 21:29; Isa. 14:2), or gālāh, go into exile (Amos 6:7; Isa. 5:13, etc.). The noun aichmalōsia is far more frequent (11 times), translating šābāh, imprisonment, prisoners, or other derivatives of the root šābāh or gālāh/gālūt, leading away, banishment, exile. Usually it refers to the Babylonian exile or the exiles (e.g. Ezek. 1:1 f.; Isa. 45:13; Jer. 1:3). The same Hebrew roots were also translated by the vbs. aichmalōteuō (45 times) and aichmalōtizō (11 times), lead into captivity.

2. Originally Israel had no experience of prisoners of war. The holy war was waged under Yahweh's orders for the complete annihilation of the enemy (e.g. Jer. 6:17–21; 1 Sam. 15:3). Those taken in the war met the same fate (cf. Jdg. 7:2). Gradually, however, some pity for their enemies showed itself (Jos. 6:22 f.; 1 Sam. 15:8 f.) and the victors began to sell prisoners as slaves. Women were often regarded as part of the booty (Gen. 34:29; Num. 31:9; Deut. 21:10 ff.). The problem of prisoners first crops up in the history of Israel with the exile, i.e. when whole groups of the Israelite population were deported by Assyria and Babylon. For the Israeli the horror of captivity did not merely lie in their being given up into the hands of brutal men ill-disposed to them. Rather, banishment from their own land meant above all the loss of their claim to that well-being promised and given by Yahweh to Israel as a pledge of his → covenant. To live in a foreign and hostile land was tantamount to being cut off from fellowship with the creator and guarantor of one's own existence (cf. Ps. 137[136]:1 ff.). Hence the tradition of the people of Israel led them to regard both captivity and banishment as a punishment inflicted by an angry God (Jer. 15:2 juxtaposes aichmalōsia, death or plague, sword and famine; cf. Jer. 77[78]:61 f.).

NT In contrast to a mass of OT references this group of words occurs in only a few passages in the NT.

1. In representing deportation by the Gentiles as God's final punishment (Lk. 21:24) NT apocalyptic echoes the OT's horror at the idea of captivity. It is significant that Lk. 4:18 (quoting Isa. 61:1) explicitly includes among Jesus' saving acts the freeing of prisoners. The NT understood Jesus' freeing as both the facilitating and improving of human relations and the reconciling encounter of God with man. In two OT quotations aichmalōsia occurs in a modified sense. On Eph. 4:8 (= Ps. 68:18) → Heaven, art. anabainō NT 5). Rev. 13:10 adapts Jer. 15:2 and Matt. 26:52 (cf. G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974, 214 f.). The former was a message of judgment directed to Jerusalem; but in the case of the church the Christian may be called to suffer captivity for his faith. However, he must not resort to force of arms, as Peter did in Gethsemane. The truth of the verse was appallingly illustrated in the fate of many Jews during the Jewish war. In 2 Tim. 3:6 aichmalōtizō now simply means capture.

2. Reflecting on his Christian experience, Paul writes: "For I delight in the law of God, in my inmost self, but I see in my members another law at war with the law of my mind and making me captive to the law of sin which dwells in my members" Rom. 7:22f.; → doulos; → I Am, art. egō eimi, NT 2 (c)). On the other hand, his concept of the new life as an exclusive union with the Lord allows him to use aichmalōtizō of the service of Christ: "We lead every thought into captivity to make them subject to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5; cf. 2:11; 3:14; 4:4).

3. Paul refers to the imprisonment that he shared with them (→ desmios) when he calls various Christians who are particularly close to him synaichmalōtoi, fellow prisoners (Rom. 16:7; Col. 4:10; Phlm. 23).
H.-G. Link, R. Tuente

δέσμιος

δεσμεύω (desmeuō), bind (with bonds); δέσμη (desmē), bundle; δέσμιος (desmios), prisoner; δεσμός (desmos), bond, tether, imprisonment; δεσμωτήριον (desmōtērion), prison; δεσμώτης (desmōtēs), prisoner; δεσμοφύλαξ (desmophylax), prison warder; σύνδεσμος (syndesmos), that which binds together, bond, fetter.

⌊ The root desm- conveys the basic meaning of bind. desmeuō means to bind together, chain up (Eur. onwards). desmē is a bundle tied together (Dem. onwards). desmios means one who is in chains or in prison (tragedians onwards). desmos at first meant chain (Homer onwards), and later imprisonment, custody. desmōtērion is a prison (Hdt. onwards), desmōtēs a prisoner (Aesch. onwards) and desmophylax a prison warder (Lucian).

syndesmos (Eur. onwards) can mean either the chain that holds one or the means of fastening something, the binding that holds things together. All these words are used in a physical rather than a spiritual sense.

⌊ desmos is the most frequently used of these words in the LXX; it usually translates forms of 'āsar, to bind, and the cognate mōsēr, bonds.

1. In the OT the lit. sense is dominant: sheafs are bound together (Gen. 37:7, desmeuō), a donkey is tied to a vine (Gen. 49:11, desmeuō), Joseph is thrown into prison by Potiphar (Gen. 39:22, desmōtērion) and Samson is bound with cords (Jdg. 16:13 f., desmos). Because man in the OT suffers from the humiliation inflicted by chains and bondage, liberation from these is part of the salvation that he awaits. "Saying to the prisoners, 'Come forth,' and to those who are in darkness, 'Appear' (Isa. 49:9; cf. also 42:7). The hymn of praise sung by those that have been freed recalls their servitude in → Egypt: "He brought them out of darkness and gloom, a broke their bonds asunder. Let them thank the LORD for his steadfast love" (Isa. 107:14; cf. 116:16).

2. As with zygos, → yoke, desmos can refer to that true relationship with God, the bond and covenant between him and man. Hosea speaks of the cords of divine love with which Yahweh seeks to bind his people to himself (Hos. 11:4). Jeremiah complains of the godless nation that had torn off Yahweh's cords (Jer. 2:20; 5:5; cf. 13:1). A combination of desmos and diarrhēgnymi, tears, in Ps. 2:3; Nah. 1:13).

NT In the NT desmos (18 times) and desmios (16 times) chiefly occur in the Synoptic Gospels (particularly Lk. and Acts) and in the Pauline writings. Here too the sense is more conspicuous than the spiritualized.

1. Like Samson, the Gerasene demoniac tore his fetters apart (Lk. 8:29). Pilate was wont to release a prisoner at the festivals (Matt. 27:15 f.). The earthquake broke the shackles of the prisoners in the gaol at Philippi (Acts 16:25 ff.). But above all desmos is mentioned in connexion with Paul's path of suffering. In his farewell address to the Ephesian elders he speaks of the fetters and the tribulations that awaited him in → Jerusalem (Acts 20:23). Luke describes Paul's arrest in detail (Acts 21:18 ff.; cf. the designation ho desmios Paulos, the prisoner Paul, Acts 23:25:14, 27; 28:17). But Luke also stresses that Paul was unlawfully imprisoned (Acts 23:29; 26:31), showing the apostle as a prototype of the suffering of the innocent martyr.

2. In his captivity epistles Paul sometimes calls himself desmios Christou Iesou the prisoner of Christ Jesus (Phlm. 9; cf. Eph. 3:1; 4:1; the gen. denotes possession). In Phil. he connects his imprisonment with Christ and his gospel (Phil. 1:7, 13 f., 24). The significance that Paul here gives to it lies in the fact that it furthers the progress and spread of the gospel. On the one hand, it has got around in the prison; elsewhere that he wears his fetters for Christ's sake; on the other hand, because he is in prison, the rest of the brethren venture the more fearlessly to proclaim the gospel of Christ (Phil. 1:12 ff.).

3. Occasionally desmos also occurs in a figurative sense. The dumbness (1 Cor. 7:35) or paralysis (Lk. 13:16) of a person can be called a fetter with which they are bound. This bondage is not only physical; rather, the NT often saw its underlying cause in demonic powers. Eph. 4:3 speaks of → peace, and Col. 3:14 of → love as syndesmos, the divine bond that binds believers together (cf. Hos. 11:4) and sets them free.

H.-G. Link

δοῦλος

δοῦλος (doulos), slave; δουλεία (douleia), slavery; δουλεύω (douleuō), be subject, serve.

CL For the Attic Gk., personal freedom was his prized possession. To be independent of others and to manage his own life and to live as he chooses is of the essence of such freedom. The doulos belonged by nature not to himself, but to someone else

ζ. H. Rengstorf, TDNT II 261). Because douleuō involved the abrogation of one's own autonomy and the subordination of one's will to that of another, the Greek felt only revulsion and contempt for the position of a slave. The doulos could take part in the domestic worship. Nor was he always treated barbarously; he could be humanely treated (Menander). He had an equal status with free men in the Eleusinian mysteries. Yet on the whole, the life of the slave was one of unrelieved compulsory labour and service in the household and in public works. The ideal of freedom was limited by Plato (Laws 4, 715D) to counteract the arbitrary decisions of the sophists: he put forward the concept of the nomos (→ law) to guarantee the maintenance of the independent city-state. Only in the phrase douleuein tois nomois, "to serve the laws", is the doulos group of words shown in a favourable and honourable light. The idea of serving the gods appears first in the Cynic Stoics (Epictetus, Dissertationes 3, 22, 69; 3, 22, 82; 3, 22, 95). The concept doulos tou theou, "slave of God", is significantly absent in Epictetus; douloi for him are still a despised class. The object of the worship of the gods is in fact freedom from all internal and external ties (Epictetus, Dissertationes 3, 22, 49). Similarly the Stoic wise man so excused himself from all obligation to serve the community (cf. the Stoic concept of world-citizenship) that he made himself a free servant of his neighbour. It remained peculiar to Gk. thought that man found his true worth only in being conscious of himself and in the free development of his potential. Hence, douleuein in the sense of dependence and subordination in service is debasing and contemptible (Epictetus, Dissertationes 1, 1, 7 ff.).

OT 1. The doulos group of words, with few exceptions (e.g. Isa. 52:13, pais, servant [of God]; → Child; → Son), is used in the OT to translate the root 'bd and its derivatives. The memory of Israel's experiences in their captivity in → Egypt, "the house of slaves" (bêt 'abādîm; LXX oikos douleias, Exod. 13:3, 14) lingered on and was the main source of this root's essential meaning: it was distinguished from its synonyms (e.g. diakoneō) by its emphasis on the service being that of a slave, i.e. on a repressive or at least dependent form of service under the complete control of a superior. The recollection of their Egyptian bondage also determined (Deut. 15:12 ff.) the free Israelite's treatment of Hebrew slaves ('eḇeḏ 'ibrî, Exod. 21:2). Slave laws regulated the treatment and manumission of a slave who was a Jew by birth. His master alone had the right to his work; his person remained inviolable (cf. Exod. 21:2–11; Lev. 25:35 ff.; Deut. 15:12 ff.). On the other hand, the non-Jewish, Canaanite slave ('eḇeḏ k'na'ânî, cf. Lev. 25:44 ff.) was valued like the rest of his chattels and was treated as such.

Many slaves in the ancient Near East were captives taken in war (cf. Num. 31:7 ff.; Deut. 20:10 ff.; 1 Ki. 20:39; 2 Chr. 28:8 ff.). Some were presented to the tabernacle or temple (Num. 31:32–47; Jos. 9:23–27; Ezr. 8:20; Ezek. 44:7 ff.), and others to military leaders (Deut. 20:10–14; 21:10; Jdg. 5:30). But the majority belonged to the king, and slaves played an important part in Israelite economy under the monarchy (1 Ki. 9:21, 27; 2 Chr. 8:18; 9:12). Both the OT and the Code of Hammurabi (§§ 32, 133 ff.) sought to mitigate their lot by making certain provisions for the welfare of slaves, but they did not condemn the practice outright. Some foreign slaves appear to have been imported into Israel (cf. 1 Chr. 2:34 f.), but the kidnapping and selling of an Israelite was a capital offence (Exod. 21:16; Deut.

24:7). The extradition of fugitive slaves was forbidden (Deut. 23:15 f.). The nearest the OT comes to recognizing the sale of minors is Exod. 21:7–11 (cf. Neh. 5:1–5). But one could sell oneself in cases of debt and also refuse one's freedom which law provided for after the statutory period of six years, when the master was obliged to offer his slave his freedom (Exod. 21:5 f.; Lev. 23:39–55; Deut. 15:16 f.). Slavery could result from insolvency (Exod. 21:2 ff.; 22:2; Deut. 15:12; cf. 1 Sam. 2:2; 2 Ki. 4:1; Neh. 5:1–5). But the practice was condemned as inhumane by prophets (Isa. 50:1; Amos 2:6). In Egypt and Babylonia slaves could be branded and tattooed. The Israelite who chose to remain a slave after the six-year period had to have his ear pierced (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17), possibly in order to allow for a tag of ownership.

According to the Code of Hammurabi (§§ 146 f.), the female slave who had borne children to her mistress's husband could not be sold. Perhaps Hagar came under the same category (Gen. 16). The children of slaves remained the property of the master (Exod. 21:4). The promiscuous use of female slaves may be inferred from Job 31:15. The Laws of Eshnunna and the Code of Hammurabi never considered the slave as an injured party. In the OT, in the case of the slave who has been gored, it is the master who is compensated (Exod. 21:32). The penalty for violating a slave girl was comparatively slight "since she was not free" (Lev. 19:20). Slaves could be maltreated, but if the slave lost a limb he was to be given his freedom, and in the case of death the master was liable to punishment (Exod. 21:20–27). On the other hand, it was envisaged that the slave would work alongside his master and would participate in his religious observances including the → sabbath rest (Gen. 17:1–13, 27; Exod. 12:44; 20:10; 23:12; Lev. 22:11; Deut. 5:14; 12:12, 18; 16:11, 14). The prophecy of Joel 2:29 (3:2) extends to the slaves, implying their full participation in the output of the → Spirit. Job 31:15 questions the moral basis of slavery in its recognition that both the slave and the free man were fashioned in the womb, and thus have common humanity.

OT legislation provided for manumission after six years' service (Exod. 21:2–6; Deut. 15:12) and in the jubilee year (Lev. 25:39–43, 47–55). A girl sold as a bride was to be released if the master or his sons did not take her (Exod. 21:7–11). A slave permanently maimed by his master was to be freed, though without compensation (Exod. 21:26 f.). Asylum was to be granted to the fugitive (Deut. 23:15 f.). (For a fuller discussion of the conditions of slavery in Israel see R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 80–90, and the various specialist studies noted in the bibliography below.)

The concept of the doulos in the sense of a chattel gave expression to the relationship between a subject and his king under the despotic monarchies of the Near East. The ruler's absolute power is in contrast to the most abject subservience and slave dependence. He who calls himself a doulos acknowledges that another has power over him. Even the highest official, the vizier, is a servant in his relation to the king. Hence the title "servant" can be one of honour, which is borne by important figures in the OT like Moses, David or the prophets, who are called "servants of God" (Jos. 14:7A; 24:29; Jdg. 2:18; 2 Ki. 17:23; Pss. 89[88]:3; 105[104]:42; Isa. 48:13; Dan. 3:5; cf. Josephus, Ant. 5:39).

2. This courtly, ceremonial language is adopted in worship to describe the relationship of God and man (especially in 1–2 Ki.). douleuō is the most usual LXX word orship in this context (Jdg. 2:7; 2 Chr. 30:8; the Heb. noun 'bōdāh means the service of worship). Just as one humbly referred to oneself as “your servant” when addressing the king (e.g. in 2 Sam. 9:8), so does he who prays to God (frequently in the ss.: “your servant”, e.g. Pss. 19:11, 13; 67[66]:17; 86[85]:2, 4, 16; 119[118], 17, 3, 38, 49, 65, 76, 84, 122, 124 f., 135, 140, 176). In calling himself the doulos of this kyrios (Ps. 122[123]:2; cf. here the Gk. idea of the relation of God and man as one ata physin, by → nature), the Israelite was conscious of the infinite distance between him and his God and also of his complete dependence upon him. The worth of the oulos stood or fell with his knowledge of his kyrios, Lord, and so was based upon his relation to God. Yahweh encounters his people as a judging, saving Lord. Hence, although the concept of the doulos still retained the element of unconditional subjection to another, it yet lost the character of abject baseness. As a result of God’s special election, doulos became a title of honour (Ps. 88[89]:3). The concept of the oulos, thus expanded, in turn affected one’s relation to one’s fellow-countrymen. He who honoured Yahweh, the God who had chosen a people for himself, knew at the same time that he had been joined to his community to serve them.

3. In late Palestinian Judaism the OT usage lived on. Alongside the secular use of these words expressions like “service of worship”, “serving God”, “servant of God”, occur in Essene as well as in rabbinic texts. Philo, however, shows the influence of Hk. thought: the use of doulos and its cognates for one’s relation to God was found offensive by them and was toned down or avoided completely (Det. Pot. Ins. 56; cf. J. H. Rengstorf, TDNT II 269). At the same time doulos, etc., took on a new significance in the dualistic world-view of gnosticism. Man, alienated from his home in the light, found himself in douleia to cosmic powers, in the “bondage of corruption” (cf. Rom. 8:21). The dualistic system of contrasted spirit and matter represented man as fatefully bound to matter. Man’s self of sense, desire and will, bound up in his world, was to him something alien and a prison from which he, the prisoner, could not free himself. For the position of slaves in the NT era, see J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 312–16, cf. 110 ff., 303 ff.

T 1. doulos and its cognates appear very frequently in the Pauline writings in comparison to the rest of the NT. Apart from that, they occur often in Matt., less in Mk., Acts and Rev., rarely in Mk. and Jn. and hardly at all in the Pastorals and the Catholic Epistles. Out of the 124 instances of doulos, 30 are in Paul, 30 in Matt. and 6 in Lk. Out of the 25 instances of douleuō, 17 are in Paul.

2. (a) In order to appreciate the nuances of meaning in the NT we must first see what its attitude is to the position of the slave in society. This can be found out principally from the parables of Jesus. Occasionally, slaves are put in a position of responsibility and command (Matt. 24:45). But the slave owes his master exclusive and absolute obedience (Matt. 8:9). “No one can serve as slave to two masters” (Matt. 6:24; → Possessions, art. mamōnas). His work earned him neither profit nor rank; he was only doing what he owed as a bondsman (Lk. 17:7–10). The master could use his unlimited power over his slave – for good (Matt. 18:27) or for unmerciful punishment if he were guilty of some fault (Matt. 18:34; 25:30). The NT resists the contemporary verdict on slaves as a contemptible lower class by, in the first place, the use of doulos in the parables of Jesus to describe the relation of all men to God. Throughout its pages the NT finds nothing objectionable in the division of society into lord and servant, free and bond. Repeatedly slaves are called to be obedient to their masters in all things – even to unmerciful ones (1 Pet. 2:18; → See art. hamartia NT 4 (c)); we may compare the ethical instruction of Col. 3:22; Ep 6:5; 1 Tim. 6:1; Tit. 2:9. Paul recognizes Philemon’s right to Onesimus as his possession, even if Philemon’s position shows something of the tension existing between the status quo and faith in the one Lord, Jesus Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 7:20–24). It is not possible here to draw attention to two different ways of translating 1 Cor. 7:2. Many commentators render it: “If you actually [ei kai] have an opportunity becoming free, by all means [mallon] seize it.” But C. K. Barrett prefers: “Were you a slave when you were called? Let not that trouble you, but even though you may not be able to become free put up rather with your present status” (The First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1968, 170). However, for Paul the main point is freedom in Christ (vv. 22 ff.). For a more detailed discussion see S. Scott Bartchy, MALLO CHRĒSAI: First Century Slavery and the Interpretation of 1 Corinthians 7:2 Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 11, 1973.

(b) The sociological problems of this state of affairs which we have sketched out are mitigated by the fact that God’s revelation in Jesus Christ shows that all men are in the relentless grip of a completely different sort of slavery. Man outside the sphere of Christ’s rule is a doulos tēs hamartias, a slave of sin (Rom. 6:17). This douleia consists of a miserably meticulous observance of the “letter” in the hope of salvation (Rom. 7:6, 25; → See Law, art. nomos), or of a slavish adoration of the mediating cosmic powers (Gal. 4:3, 8 f.), or of a frenzied horror of death (Heb. 2:15), or of the service of the belly (Rom. 16:18) and one’s lusts (Tit. 3:3). This means in general that “whoever commits sin is a slave of sin” (Jn. 8:34). Similarly Paul asks: “Do you not know that if you yield to anyone as obedient slaves, you are slaves of the one who you obey, either of sin, which leads to death, or of obedience, which leads to righteousness?” (Rom. 6:16). One cannot free oneself from this servitude of sin by one’s own efforts nor change masters by one’s own decision. Only he whom the Spirit sets free is really free (Jn. 8:36). Christ’s redemption frees one for obedient service under the command of the Kyrios (Rom. 12:11; 14:18; Col. 3:24) and leads one into the service of righteousness in the new Spirit-given nature (Rom. 6:18; 7:6). Paul sees himself, called to his office as an apostle, as in a special way a doulos Christou Iēsou “servant of Christ Jesus” (Rom. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Gal. 1:10). This title is also used to refer to the office of one of his colleagues like Epaphras (Col. 4:12). In this titular sense doulos is closest in sense to diakonos, servant, which is frequently used in Paul’s writings of the apostolic service of witness (Col. 4:7, diakonos kai syndoulos “servant and fellow slave”; → See Serve, art. diakoneō). But here, as elsewhere, the distinctive thing about the concept of the doulos is the subordinate, obligatory and irresponsible nature of his service in his exclusive relation to his Lord. At the same time, all who are called to freedom are set to serve one another in love (Gal. 5:13). Paul made himself a slave of all (1 Cor. 9:19); in the service of the gospel (Phil. 2:2) he is the servant of the community for Christ’s sake (2 Cor. 4:5). He who would be first in Christ’s community must be its slave (Matt. 20:27).

3. This last evaluation of slavery is only excelled by the dignity given to it by the bestowal upon the kyrios of the title of doulos. Christ divested himself and took the form of a servant (Phil. 2:7, morphēn doulou labōn). Above all, the statement Phil. 2:7 shows the theological significance of this group of words. In becoming m he pre-existent One takes on the morphē of a doulos. The point of this expression does not lie in a statement about the obedience of the incarnate Christ (this follows in Phil. 2:8b), i.e. in its picking up the OT concept of the Servant of God (Isa. 53, MT ʿebed YHWH; LXX pais theou, → Son). For discussion → Form, art. morphē; → Empty, art. kenōō. Hence, when Christ takes on the form of a slave, he enters into full solidarity with mankind in its subjection to sin, law and death. As servant, he is subject to the nomos (Gal. 4:4) and bears its curse (Gal. 3:13). He takes on a form “that was like that of sinful flesh” (Rom. 8:3), and thus made himself a brother of men “who through fear of death must serve in bondage all their lives long” (Heb. 2:15). It is the form of the servant that exactly describes Jesus Christ’s incarnation as the deepest self-abasement.

4. Thus the Lord’s form as a servant unmasks the nature of unredeemed man as douleia. This slavery is that of sin, i.e. man’s obsession with the illusion that he can make or maintain his own life and freedom with reference only to himself and in his own power. That which the Greeks regarded as the highest form of freedom (cf. CL 1) becomes in the NT the source of man’s most abject bondage. Man, bent in upon himself, obstinately waves God’s help aside and busies himself in running his own life in his own strength, trusting in his own resources, and falls into the grip of → fear (Rom. 8:15; Heb. 2:15). He trusts in the tangible and is subject to the “bondage of morality” (Rom. 8:21). He makes use of the law and the powers of this world to create “his own righteousness”, and is enslaved under the “curse of the law” (Gal. 3:13), standing in the service of “the gods who are not really such” (Gal. 4:8). Since every attempt of man to liberate himself must thus ensnare him yet further, his douleia is complete and is not restricted, as in gnostic dualism, to the level of matter and the body. The comprehensive and remorseless phrase, douleia tēs hamartias, gives the lie to just this sort of idea of an inalienable residue of inner, spiritual freedom (cf. Rom. 7:23.; → aichmalōtos).

5. Jesus Christ alone redeems man from the slavery of sin with the price of his death. The metaphor of sacral manumission is here united with the idea of a change of masters. Believers “having been set free from sin, have become slaves of righteousness” (Rom. 6:18; cf. v. 22). This manumission from the bondage of a supposed independence into eleutheria (→ freedom) does not lead to a new independence. Rather, the one manumitted is set free for the “obedience of faith” which he presents to his Lord, Jesus Christ, as his servant (Rom. 12:11; 14:18; Col. 3:24; cf. 1 Thess. 1:9; Rom. 7:6). Yet this new relationship of master and servant is dominated, not by “the spirit of slavery [pneuma douleias] to fall back into fear”; believers “have received the spirit of sonship [pneuma hyiothesias]” (Rom. 8:15; → Child, art. hyios NT 2). However, the freedom of God’s sons is not to become “an opportunity for the flesh”. Hence, the redeemed are called upon to “serve one another in love” (Gal. 5:13). This sort of service of love to one’s neighbours is rooted in Christ’s love in taking the form of a servant (cf. the exhortations of Phil. 2:1–4, which are causally related to Phil. 2:5 ff.). As a doulos, Jesus showed his love to his disciples by washing their feet (the duty of a slave), “that you also should do what I have done to you” (Jn. 13:15). The nature of Christ’s loving work thus prevents anything like the orthodox, pharisaic separation of God’s service from that of one’s neighbour. The freedom that is found in the obedience of faith expresses itself in loving service of one’s neighbour.

6. Hence, he who would be first in Jesus Christ's community must be its slave (Matt. 20:27). It is understandable that in the light of this dialectical concept of Christian freedom as a douleia after the pattern of the redeemer, the sociological question of the freedom of slaves did not appear a pressing one. Christians were aware of the indelible distinction between master and slave. However, the liberating knowledge of the common service that both had to one heavenly master (Eph. 6) was normative; through it "we experience a joyous liberation from the godless bondage of this world to serve God's creatures in freedom and thankfulness" (Barmen Declaration, Thesis 2). Master and servant are told to subject themselves to the Lord, because it is in their mutual treatment of one another that they join themselves to that community whose rule is love. However, it is not left to the choice of individual members of the community (particularly the choice of masters and servants) to decide whether or not thus to subject themselves and join this community. It is precisely the concept of douleuō, in contrast to that of diakoneō (→ Serve), that emphasizes the obligatory character of the service for God and to one's neighbor that is the duty of the community of those who have been set free by Jesus Christ.

R. Tuente

Λιβερτίνος

Λιβερτίνος (Libertinos), Libertine, Freedman.

CL & OT Libertinos is a Gk. borrowing of the Lat. libertinus, found in secular Greek only on an inscription (IG XIV 1781). The normal Greek translation of libertinus or libertus is apeleutheros (cf. 1 Cor. 7:22) or exeleutheros. The libertinus was a freed slave, who after either buying or having been given his freedom underwent manumission, a process whereby his freedom was secured publicly. But this freedom did not amount to full citizen rights, for example, he could not petition for legal action without permission nor gain high military office. However, some freedmen, during the Empire, as employees of the state or of wealthy patrons, amassed considerable wealth and wielded political power.

NT At the sole New Testament reference, the text reads: "Some of those out of the so-called synagogue of the Libertines and of the Cyrenians and Alexandrians and of people from Asia and Cilicia opposed, debating with Stephen" (Acts 6:9). Egebert agrees that the Libertines were Jewish freedmen, but they debate (a) whether the freedmen were from Cyrene, Alexandria, Asia and Cilicia (so J. Munck, The Acts of the Apostles, Anchor Bible, 1967, 58), or were separate from the Cyrenians and the others, such as descendants of Jews brought to Rome by Pompey in 63 B.C. and later freed who are described in Philo, Leg. Gai. 155 (Schürer, II, i, 49; II, ii, 56-276), and (b) whether the one synagogue served all these ethnic groups (F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, NLC, 1954, 133; E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 271), two synagogues (H. Strathmann, TDNT IV 267 f.), or five (Schürer, loc. cit.). Large towns had more than one synagogue (Philo, Leg. Gai. 137 f., 156 f.). Jerusalem at one stage had a synagogue of Alexandrians (SB II 663 f.). Because the Libertines are a social group while the others are ethnic, Dibelius, for example, welcomes a variant reading in an Armenian version Libyorum, of Libyans (Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, 1956, 91). A natural reading of Acts 6:9 suggests one synagogue only, but whether the Jewish freedmen served by the one synagogue Jerusalem were from Cyrene and the other places is an open question. Libertines, in this context, have no relationship with the English word “libertine”, a person unbound in mores.

G. T. D. Angel

Freedom, → Serve, → Yoke

A. El-M. Bakir, Slavery in Pharaonic Egypt, Supplément aux Annales du Service des Antiquités de l'Égypte 18, 1952; R. H. Barrow, Slavery in the Roman Empire, 1928; S. Benko and J. O'Rourke, eds., Catacombs and the Colosseum, 1971; A. C. Bouquet, Everyday Life in New Testament Times, 1953, 151–55; S. Scott Bartchy, MALLON CHRĒSAI: First Century Slavery and the Interpretation of 1 Corinthians 7:21, Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 11, 1973; W. W. Buckland, The Law of Slavery, 1908; J. Carcopino, Daily Life in Ancient Rome, 1941, 52–75; J. A. Crook, Life and Life of Rome, 1967, 179–205; M. David, “The Manumission of Slaves under Zedekiah”, OTS 1948, 63–79; A. M. Duff, Freedmen in the Early Roman Empire, 1928; H. L. Ellison, “The Hebrew Slave: A Study in Early Israelite History”, EQ 45, 1973, 30–35; M. I. Finley, ed., Slavery in Classical Antiquity, 1960, with supplement 1968; “Between Slavery and Freedom”, Comparative Studies in Society and History, 6, 1964, 233 ff.; and “Slavery”, OCD 994 ff.; R. Flacelière, Daily Life in Ancient Rome, 1959, 45–54; M. Grant, The World of Rome, 1960, 100–125; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions in the New Testament Period, 1969; G. Kittel, aichmalōtos etc., TDNT I 195 ff.; and desmos, desmios, TDNT II 43; N. P. Lemcke, “‘Hebrew Slave’: Comments on the Slave Law, Ex. xxi. 2–11”, VT 25, 1975, 129–44; F. Lyall, “Roman Law in the Writings of Paul: The Slave and the Freedman”, NTS 17, 1970–71, 73–9; and “Roman Law in the Writings of Paul: Adoption” JBL 88, 1969, 458–66; I. Mendelsohn, “The Condoned Sale into Slavery of Free-born Daughters in Nuzi and the Law of Ex. 21:7–11”, Journal of the American Oriental Society 55, 1935, 190–95; “Guilds in Ancient Palestine”, BASOR 80, 1940, 17–21; “Free Artisans and Slaves in Mesopotamia”, BASOR 89, 1943, 25–29; Slavery in the Ancient Near East, 1949; “On Slavery in Alalakh”, Israel Exploration Journal 5, 1955, 65–72; and “Slavery in the Bible”, IDB IV 383–91; G. R. Morrow, Plato's Law of Slavery in its Relation to Greek Laws, 1939; K. Rengstorff, doulos etc., TDNT II 261–80; W. G. Rollins, “Slavery in the NT”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 830 ff.; K. C. Russell, Slavery as Reality and Metaphor in the Pauline Letters, (Dissertation, Pontifical University) 1968; A. Rupprecht, “Slave, Slavery”, ZPEB V 453–60; B. J. Siegel, Slavery during the Third Dynasty of Ur, Memoir Series of the American Anthropological Association 1947; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 80–90; J. Vogt, Ancient Slavery and the Ideal of Man, 1972; J. Weiss, Earliest Christianity: A History of the Period A.D. 30–150, II, 9, 458–63; W. L. Westermann, The Slave Systems of Greek and Roman Antiquity, 1955, H. W. Hoffmann, “Masters and Slaves”, Interpretation 27, 1973, 259–72; W. Zimmerli, “Slavery in the OT”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 829 f.

W. Brandt, Dienst und Dienen im Neuen Testament, 1931; E. Häusler, Sklaven und Personen im Neuen Testamente Rechts im Alten Testament, 1956; G. Kehnscherper, Die Stellung der Bibel und der alttestamentlichen Kirche zur Sklaverei, 1957; S. Lauffer, “Die Sklaverei in der griechisch-römischen Welt”, BZNT, 1961, 370 ff.; G. Locher, “Sklaverei”, EKL III 975 ff.; G. von Rad, Das Gottesvolk im Alten Testament, BWANT, 1929; G. Sass, “Zur Bedeutung von doulos bei Paulus”, ZNW 40, 1941, 1–5; SB IV 698 ff.; H. Wallon, Histoire de l'Esclavage dans l'Antiquité, I–III, 1879; H. D. Wendland, “Sklaverei und Christentum”, *RGK*³ VI 101 ff.

σμέλη

ὄσμῃ

ὄσμῃ (osmē), smell, scent; εὐωδία (euōdia), fragrance, aroma.

osmē, Ion. odmē, means smell, scent. Antiquity conceived smell in such strongly material terms that the trunk of a tree was said to receive new life and vitality from the scent of water (cf. Job 14:9). Aristotle mentions the view of the Pythagoreans “that some living creatures live on scents” (De Sensu 5). Smell was therefore considered to contain, quite literally, a life-giving force. This materialistic view of smell as something charged with energy also appears in the sphere of religion.

In the revelation of deity the smell proceeding from it is important as “the bearer a producer of divine life” (E. Lohmeyer, Vom göttlichen Wohlgeruch, 1919, 13).

OT Some passages of the OT may reflect the idea of a life-force received through smell: the bridegroom in the Song of Solomon sings of the ravishing fragrance of his beloved (e.g. Cant. 4:10; 4:16 and passim); the power of Moab is compared with that of mature wine and its “bouquet” (Jer. 48:11); and the smell of fresh h indicates to Isaac the presence of his first-born son, a strong, virile hunter (G 27:27). In particular, passages attributed to the Priestly source use the word from Gen. to Num.: the offering is made to the Lord “for a pleasing odour” (Gen. 8: Lev. 2:12; cf. Lev. 1:9; 13, 17; Num. 28:1 f. etc.). Some scholars have seen in this idea that as the smell of the sacrifice ascends to heaven, God feeds upon it. But L 26:31 and Amos 5:21 show the limits of this materialistic concept. God is not dependent on the bringing of offerings, nor upon their smell. In a metaphorical, spiritual sense wisdom is said to diffuse fragrance (Sir. 24:15), while Sir. 39:14 calls the presence of God by his people a sweet smell. But even in this metaphorical usage a materialistic background can still be seen, in that the fragrance diffused by wisdom and godliness contains a life-giving power.

NT osmē is found only 6 times in the NT, 2 of which are in the combination osmē euōdias, which stems from the OT; euōdia occurs in only one other place (2 Cor. 2:15), between two verses each containing osmē.

In the story of the anointing at Bethany (Jn. 12:3), the house is said to have been filled with the fragrance of the ointment. In addition to the literal sense, there is doubtless symbolism here: as the fragrance of the ointment filled the house, so the fragrance of the gospel will shortly fill the whole earth (cf. R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 415). In Eph. 5:2 osmē euōdias is used to describe the death of Christ as a → sacrifice which is “for a sweet-smelling fragrance to God”. This figurative usage is particularly apparent in Phil. 4:18, where Paul calls the financial aid sent him by the Philippians “a fragrant offering”. The idea here is not simply that of a sacrifice in the strict sense of the word; the Philippians’ gift is “a symbol of any and every gift which a man brings to God” (E. Lohmeyer, Die Briefe an die Philipper, Kolosser und an Philemon, KEK 9, 1964¹³, ad loc.).

The concept of osmē as a life-giving or death-giving force re-emerges, however, in 2 Cor. 2:14 ff. The fragrance of the knowledge of God is being diffused by the work of the apostle; indeed, Paul himself is the bearer of the fragrance of Christ. But the fragrance spread abroad through his preaching has a twofold effect: to those who obey the gospel it brings divine life, while to those who refuse the message it brings eternal death. Paul adopts this naturalistic approach in order to show vividly how the gospel divides men and calls for their individual decision, but also to emphasize divine power inherent in the gospel. O. Flender

C. K. Barrett, on the other hand, thinks that the imagery of v. 14 is probably drawn from the use of → incense in the pagan, royal and religious triumphal processions: “But thanks be to God, who in Christ always leads us in triumph, and through us spreads the fragrance [osmēn] of the knowledge of him everywhere” (cf. Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973, 98; cf. also 1 Cor. 4:9). Although

Paul thought of himself as the slave of Christ (Rom. 1:1 etc.) and as a prisoner of war (Rom. 16:7; Col. 4:10; Phlm. 23), Barrett considers that Paul is here thinking of himself as one who collaborates with God and not as someone exposed to defeat and disgrace. He, therefore, suggests that Paul is seeing himself here as one of the triumphant generals. However, there is much in the letter which indicates that outwardly the apostle was subject to calamity, and apparent defeat and shame (2 Cor. 7:12; 11:21–12:10). And this may underlie v. 14 and the next two vv.: “For we are the aroma [euōdia] of Christ to God among those who are being saved and among those who are perishing, to the one a fragrance [osmē] from death to death, to the other a fragrance [osmē] from life to life. Who is sufficient for these things?” (2 Cor. 2:15 f.). The imagery thus appears to change. On the one hand, the apostle in all his weakness, lack of acclaim and with his message of the cross, is like the stench of death to those who only see defeat and a morbid message. On the other hand, his sacrificial service for the gospel of Christ’s sacrifice recalls the sweet savour of the OT sacrifices (cf. Gen. 8:21; Exod. 29:18; Lev. 1:9; Num. 15:3; Ezek. 7:13; Dan. 3:4; Eph. 5:2; Phil. 4:18; and the “odour of wisdom” in Sir. 24:15; 39:14; Syr. Bar. 7:6). “It seems inevitable that one should fill out the picture by taking Paul’s sense to be that the apostles are the smoke that arises out of the sacrifice of Christ to God, diffusing as it ascends the knowledge of God that is communicated in the cross” (C. L. Barrett, op. cit., 99; cf. SB III 497 for rabbinic analogies). C. Brown
 ✦ Fight, → Incense, → Sacrifice

- i). H. F. Beck, “Odor”, IDB III 589 f.; G. Delling, osmē TDNT V 493 ff.; A. Stumpf, euōdia, TDNT 808 ff. j). E. Lohmeyer, Vom göttlichen Wohlgeruch, Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften 10, 9, 1919; E. Nestle, “Der süsse Geruch als Erweis des Geistes”, ZNW 4, 1903, 272; and ibid. 7, 1906, 95 f.

Snatch, Take Away, Rapture

ἀρπάζω	ἀρπάζω (harpazō), snatch, seize; ἀρπαγμός (harpagmos), robbery, that of which someone is robbed, prize, booty; ἀρπαγή (harpagē), robbery, plunder, greediness, rapacity; ἄρπαξ (harpax), rapacious,avenous, a robber, swindler; μετατίθημι (metatithēmi), to transfer, change the position of, change, turn away.
---------------	---

Lat. harpazō (from Homer on) is related to Lat. rapio, seize, snatch, and means to snatch, seize, carry off, rob, plunder, ravish. harpagmos means both robbery, rapture, and the thing of which a person is robbed, a prize to be grasped.

NT harpazō in the LXX represents mostly Heb. gāzal, take away, rob (e.g. Lev. 6:4 [MT 5:23]; 19:13; Jdg. 21:23; Isa. 10:2; and metaphorically Mic. 3:2), and āraḇ, tear, e.g. of beasts of prey, tear in pieces (e.g. Gen. 37:33; Pss. 22:13 [MT 22:14]; 104[103]:21; Amos 3:4; and also Hos. 5:14; Ps. 50[49]:22, where Yahweh himself, facing an apostate people, is compared to a lion rending in pieces; cf. Hos. 11:1).

Only once does the LXX have the meaning rapture, being caught up. Wis. 4:11 says that Enoch “was caught up”: the word used elsewhere in the LXX and secular Gk. (from Homer, Od., on) is metatithēmi (Gen. 5:24; Wis. 4:10; Sir. 44:49:14, etc.). But since the translation of Enoch (Gen. 5:24) frequently appears in later Jewish literature and has left traces even in the NT (cf. 2 Cor. 12:2 f.; 1 Th. 4:17), it is important to discuss what is meant by the rapture in Gen. 5:24. This can be understood as in the Gilgamesh epic, where the hero is translated directly from earthly life into the fellowship of the gods. If that is so, Enoch, because of his pleasing to God, was taken directly into God’s presence without first going to Sheol (→ Hell). The manner in which this happened is not mentioned (cf. Heb. 11:5, where metatithēmi is used; Jude 14). Similarly, → Elijah was taken directly into God’s fellowship (2 Ki. 2:11 f.). For further discussion of the translations of Enoch and Elijah → Resurrection, art. anastasis NT 5.

NT 1. harpazō is found 14 times in the NT.

(a) As in secular Gk. and the LXX, it has the meaning to steal, carry off, and carry away (Matt. 12:29; Jn. 10:12; cf. Gen. 37:33; Pss. 7:3[2]; 50[49]:22).

(b) It also means to lead away forcibly (Jn. 6:15; 10:28, 29; Acts 23:10; Jude 24).

(c) It is used of the Spirit carrying someone away – also metatithēmi – (Acts 8:39; 2 Cor. 12:2, 4; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 12:5). “Rapture is a change of location which is granted men through more than human power” (G. Strecker, “Entrückung”, RAT 461). We must distinguish in the NT between a movement from one place on earth to another (Acts 8:39) and being caught up into a supernatural world (e.g. 2 Cor. 12:2, 4).

Following the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch “the Spirit of the Lord caught Philip; and the eunuch saw him no more” (Acts 8:39). This should be taken spatially and really. It has close links with 2 Ki. 2, even in verbal details (cf. especially v. 11). But it may also be compared with the Spirit driving Jesus into the wilderness after baptism (Matt. 4:1 par. Mk. 1:12, Lk. 4:1). 2 Cor. 12:2 ff. is based on an entirely different concept. Paul, with a certain reluctance, saw himself forced by his opponents to tell of an experience, which really concerned only God and himself. In the “spiritual” rapture the gnostic left even the prison of his body so as to immerse himself temporarily in the cosmic body of Christ. Paul contrasts the rapture given him with this high degree of ecstatic experience. It was not a journey of the soul to heaven – he did not know whether the rapture had been in his body or out of it – nor a physical ascension. His description is very reserved and betrays nothing of the way in which it occurred. “It is precisely the essential feature of the process that remains veiled” (Schlatter, Paulus der Bote Jesu, 1962³ ad loc.). The stress lies solely on the fact that Paul temporarily moved from faith into sight, that he experienced for a moment what he was to be. In contrast to his opponents, Paul knew that he had not reached final perfection in his rapture, which would have made faith unnecessary. For further discussion → Paradise, art. paradeisos NT 1 (b).

In 1 Thess. 4:17 Paul deals with the final rapture into the fellowship of the redeemed at the last day. It was not the sufferings of the church that caused Paul to make the statement, but the concern of some of its members about the fate of Christians who had already died. This concern is removed by the certainty of → resurrection. Those Christians who were still alive would not die but would be taken directly into the fellowship of those who had already been raised, “as they leave ites of the world to meet in the air the Christ acclaimed as Lord” (E. Petersen, Heis heos, 1926, 380). eis apantēsīn, to meet, is the technical term for the solemn meeting of important persons. The language is that of contemporary Jewish apocalyptic. Rapture has a similar meaning in Gen. 5:24, where death has been eliminated. For further discussion of Paul’s eschatology → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (c).

In Rev. 12:5 the child (Jesus) is caught up to God to escape the persecution of the dragon; this is the expression in the picture language of Rev. of incidents like that recorded in Matt. 2:13 ff. E. Tiedtke

(d) The meaning of harpazō in Matt. 11:12 is debatable: “From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence [biazetai; cf. RSV mg., “has been coming violently”], and men of violence take it by force [kai biastai harpazousin autēn]” (RSV). The par. in Lk. 16:16 omits the vb.: “The law and the prophets were until John; since then the good news of the kingdom of God is preached, and every one enters it violently [kai pas eis autēn biazetai].” In Lk. this comes as an isolated saying, but in Matt. it stands in the context of a discussion of the significance of John the Baptist. Arndt (108) suggests that the juxtaposition with biazetai probably means something like seize or claim for oneself. This would imply that the kingdom of God forces its way through with violence (cf. RSV mg.), if the v. biazetai is taken in the middle voice. If the vb. is passive, it would mean that the kingdom is striven after with violence. The emphasis would thus fall on the renunciation and effort required to enter the kingdom, and the idea would be comparable with entering by the narrow → gate (Matt. 7:13 ff.). However, biazō generally expresses violent and hostile action in a bad sense, and the parallelism in Matt. reinforces this. D. Hill suggests that the v. means “that from the Baptist’s time till the present the Kingdom is being violently assaulted, and violent men try to grab or rob it. The allusion may be to the opposition of Satan and evil spirits to the Kingdom, or to the violence of Herod Antipas to John; but a more likely explanation is that the reference is either to Zealots who try to bring in the Kingdom by employing force against the Romans, or to Jewish antagonists who continued to persecute Christians” (The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1971, 200 f.). The context suggests that the role of John the Baptist is uppermost in Jesus’ mind. But his warning would not exclude the other suggestions, the main thrust of which is to make it clear “that Jesus considers his ministry to be a time when the Kingdom can be attacked as being absent” (D. Hill, op. cit., 201; cf. W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfilment, SBT 23, 1961², 121 ff.).

Hill considers the Matthean form of the saying to be the more original, and the Lukan version to be a simplification. As it stands, Lk.’s saying could mean that the enthusiastic (i.e. tax collectors and sinners) are grasping the opportunity to enter the kingdom, whereas the complacent self-righteous do not (cf. Lk. 16:14 f.). But the allusion to the opposition of the Pharisees in the preceding vv. could also mean that they too are part of the opposition which is doing violence to the kingdom which is absent in the ministry of Jesus.

2. The noun harpagmos is found only in Phil. 2:6: “who, though he was in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped [harpagmon].” In the Christ-hymn in Phil. 2:5–11 see R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii.

5–11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 4, 1967; and Philippian New Century Bible, 1976, 90–102, 109–116; → Empty, art. kenos NT 3; → Form, a morphē NT 1, art. schēma NT 1). The majority of exegetes have taken harpagmos mean a thing plundered or seized (cf. RSV), and so spoil, booty or a prize of war. However, C. F. D. Moule has suggested that it means the act of snatching (“Further Reflexions on Philippians 2:5–11”, in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, ed. Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. Bruce, 1970, 264–76). Thus Moule takes the v. to mean: “he did not regard equality with God as consisting in snatching” (op. cit., 266); “instead of imagining that equality with God meant getting, Jesus, on the contrary, gave – gave until he was ‘empty’.” Whilst granting that this accords with Paul’s train of thought in v. 7, R. P. Martin thinks that it does not give sufficient weight to the contrast between v. 6 and v. 7. This is introduced by “but [alla]”. V. 6b states what Christ might have done, i.e. seized equality with God; v. 7 states what he chose to do, i.e. give himself. Martin thinks, therefore that Moule’s interpretation loses the tension between the two verses and thus harpagmos denotes that which Christ refused to seize (Philippians, 96). In particular, it denotes “the enjoyment and use of ‘equality with God’ in its characteristic expression, namely, the title of lordship as a springboard from which Christ might, had he so decided, have aspired to be the universe’s ruler. He had the opportunity to grasp what lay within his reach – since he shared God’s throne as his ‘forerunner’ (so T. F. Glasson, ‘Two Notes on the Philippians Hymn (II. 6–11)’, NTS (1974–75), pp. 133–9 . . .) – and by an act of self-assertiveness and pride he might have striven to be Lord in his own right. But ‘equality with God’ in this way was intolerable thought, since in Jewish tradition (cf. Jn. 5:17, 18 . . .) to claim such equality is tantamount to a false independence and to setting up a rebellion against the divine government” (op. cit., 97). He chose, therefore, to empty himself and take the form of a servant which in turn provides the ground and pattern for Christ’s conduct.

3. The noun harpagē means robbery, plunder (of the forcible confiscation of Christian property, Heb. 10:34; → Possessions, art. chrēma NT 2), what is plundered (Matt. 23:25). The latter passage refers to the inside of the cup and dish which were ceremonially cleansed on the outside by the → Pharisees. The par. in Lk. 11:39 refers to the Pharisees themselves and means greediness, rapacity. The saying points to the hypocrisy of maintaining professed concern for righteousness and purity which belies self-seeking inner motivation. harpax means rapacious, ravenous, of wolves (Matt. 7:15; cf. Gen. 49:27; → Animal), and as a noun a robber (Lk. 18:11; cf. 1 Cor. 5:10 f.; 6:10; Tit. 1:9 v.l.).

4. The vb. used in the sayings about the two men in the field and the two women grinding at the mill, and one being taken and the other left, is paralambanō (Matt. 24:40 f.; Lk. 17:34 f.). The vb. is used generally for taking someone along (e.g. Gen. 47:2; 2 Macc. 5:5; Matt. 2:13 f., 20 f.; 17:1 f.; Lk. 9:28), and is used of the spirit that takes seven other spirits to help him (Lk. 11:26; cf. Arndt, 624 f. for other examples). The sayings in Matt. and Lk. have sometimes been taken to imply a rapture of believers prior to the judgment. But this teaching is not paralleled elsewhere, and appears to read too much into the vb. The point of the passage is to encourage the hearers to watch and be ready for the coming of the Son of man (cf. Matt. 24:39, 42).

k. 17:22 ff.). No one knows the hour. When the flood came only → Noah and his family were prepared. So the coming of the Son of man will find people engaged in identical activities, but some will be ready and others not. This was in fact the case when → judgment fell on Jerusalem in A.D. 70. For discussion of the eschatological teaching of Jesus → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (a).

C. Brown

→ Rob, → Take

- a). W. Foerster, harpazō, harpagmos, TDNT I 472 ff.; T. F. Glasson, "Two Notes on the Philippians Hymn (II. 6–11)", NTS 21, 1974–75, 133–39; L. L. Hammerich, An Ancient Misunderstanding (Phil. 2:6 'robbery'), 1966; D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1971; R. W. Hoover, HTR 4, 1971, 95–119; R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii. 5–11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series, 4, 1967; and Philippians, New Century Bible, 1976; C. F. D. Moule, "Further Reflexions on Philippians 2:5–11", in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, 1970, 246–76; D. W. B. Robinson, "harpagmos: The Deliverance Jesus Refused?", ExpT 80, 1968–69, 253 f.; W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971; J. P. Trudinger, "harpagmos and the Christological Significance of the Ascension", ExpT 79, 1967–68, 79.
- b). E. Peterson, Heis Theos. Epigraphisch-formgeschichtliche und religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, 1926; A. Schlatter, Johannes der Täufer, ed. W. Michaelis, 1956; and Paulus der Bote Jesu, 1962³; G. Strecker, "Entrückung", RAC V 461 ff.

Solomon

Σολομών

Σολομών (Solomōn), Heb. שְׁלֹמֹה, LXX Σαλωμών (Salōmōn) and variants, Solomon.

→ Solomon was the son (by Bathsheba) and successor of David, and the last king of a united Israel. His reign (c. 961–c. 922 B.C.) was peaceful and prosperous, except for some economic difficulties and abortive revolts towards the end of it, and was without doubt the most splendid era in Israel's history. Building on the foundations laid by David, Solomon organized an efficient administration, developed industry and commerce, and established harmonious relationships with neighbouring states. His most lasting achievement was the building of the → temple in Jerusalem.

At birth, he was named both Solomon and also Jedidiah (2 Sam. 12:24 f.). The meaning of the name Solomon is not certain; "his [i.e. Yahweh's] peace, well-being" is a possibility, but most probable is "his compensation", i.e. God's compensation to David for the death of Bathsheba's firstborn. He was by no means David's eldest son, and it was not without rivalry and intrigue that he came to the throne, first as co-regent with his father (1 Ki. 1). He quickly and ruthlessly consolidated his personal position (1 Ki. 2), and went on to take all appropriate steps to strengthen his kingdom and empire. Against external foes, Jerusalem and other strategic cities were thoroughly fortified, and garrisoned with a powerful chariot force (1 Ki. 9:15–19; 10:26). The internal structures of Israel Solomon endeavoured to strengthen by breaking down the old tribal pattern and replacing it with a completely new system of administrative districts (1 Ki. 4:7–19).

Good relations were established with neighbouring states, notably Tyre and Egypt (1 Ki. 3:1; 5:12). The alliances not only provided military security but also encouraged the development of commerce, both overland and maritime (cf. 1 Ki. 10:22, 25). The trade was no doubt boosted by the exploitation of Israel's resources, notably the copper mines in the Negeb.

The fortress cities were only one element in a large-scale building program which was in part essential, and partly due to a natural desire to beautify and enhance the kingdom. The building of the temple was an act of notable piety (1 Ki. 6).

In all these respects Solomon displayed vision, statesmanship and skill; the divine promise of → wisdom, made at the start of his reign, was thus amply fulfilled (1 Ki. 3:12). The wisdom for which his name has become a byword lay chiefly in two specific directions. Primarily it was a practical wisdom; statecraft and the administration of justice were above all the areas in which it was needed and demonstrated (1 Ki. 3:9, 16–28). Secondly, it was an academic and didactic wisdom in a world already famed for its wise men, Solomon showed himself outstanding by making major contributions to the collection of proverbial and related material (1 Ki. 4:29–34). His name is linked with the books of Proverbs (1:1), Song of Solomon (1:1), and by implication Ecclesiastes (1:1), and we may see him as the founder and patron of a great deal of literary activity in Israel. (The precise extent of his original literary work remains disputed; it is at least certain that apocryphal and pseudepigraphal works bearing his name are pseudonymous.) He may well have established wisdom “schools” in Israel.

His shrewdness and sagacity were not however unalloyed. Many of his ventures were excessive and proved too expensive, so that he gradually impoverished his country, with the result that heavy taxation and forced service caused deep resentments which were to break up his kingdom (cf. 1 Ki. 12:1–20). His diplomatic marriages were but the beginning of a vast – and expensive – harem. His personal piety also lapsed into a measure of apostasy and idolatry (1 Ki. 11:1–10). The account of Solomon's reign in Chronicles (2 Chr. 1–9) concentrates on his building the temple, and is little concerned with the defects in his character; the narrative 1 Ki. 1–11, on the other hand, depicts Solomon as a king who, though blessed with abnormal wisdom and material resources, set the kingdom on its first steps towards decline and fall; the man who built the temple was the first man to adulterate worship.

In later literature, beginning with Josephus, many legends and legendary features became attached to the Old Testament's more realistic information. In particular, the story of the Queen of Sheba's visit (1 Ki. 10:1–13), which was no doubt connected with Solomon's commercial and diplomatic enterprises, attracted many such accretions. His wisdom, magnificence and pious attachment to the law of Moses were heightened and extolled, while his faults were glossed over. Strangely enough, the weight of later Jewish criticisms of Solomon centred on something of which he was not historically guilty, namely, the development of magical practices.

NT Solomon figures little in the NT; he is neither exalted nor denigrated. In Matt.

1:6 f. he appears in his appropriate place in the genealogy of Christ. Matt. 6 (= Lk. 12:27) mentions his “glory”, and Matt. 12:42 (= Lk. 11:31) his wisdom. Finally Acts 7:47 recognizes him as the builder of the temple. These widely separated references both acknowledge his achievements and also emphasize their lack ality in God's purposes. Solomon was great David's great son, but he was not the promised king and messiah; he was but his progenitor (Matt. 1:6 f.). Solomon had indeed built a majestic temple in God's honour; but the whole burden of Stephen's speech in Acts 7 is to depreciate any temple "made with hands": Solomon's temple and the second temple after it were the very centres of apostasy and unbelief. Both Acts 7:50 and Matt. 6:29 turn the listener's and reader's attention from human achievement such as Solomon's to the glories of the Creator. Finally, Matt. 12:42 expressly states that Solomon in all his wisdom was eclipsed by Christ. This passage, which is primarily attacking Jewish unbelief, seems to imply that Solomon is depicted as a → type of Christ. The common testimony of the NT references to Solomon suggests that the early church not infrequently compared and contrasted the literal Son of David with his eschatological successor.

D. F. Payne

David, → Son

J. Bright, History of Israel, 1972², 206–24; F. F. Bruce, "Son of David", in This is That: The New Testament Development of Some Old Testament Themes, 1968, 68–82; R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament: His Application of Old Testament Passages to Himself and His Mission, 1971, 78 f.; S. Mann, History of Israel in Old Testament Times, 1975, 174–86; E. Lohse, Solomōn, TDNT VII 65; J. M. Myers, "Solomon", IDB IV 399–408; R. B. Y. Scott, "Solomon and the Beginnings of Monarchy in Israel", H. H. Rowley Festschrift, VT Supplements 3, 1955, 262–79.
G. Gerleman, šlm, THAT II 932; G. Salzberger, Die Salomo-Sage in der semitischen Literatur, VT; J. J. Stamm, "Der Name des Königs Salomo", Festgabe W. Eichrodt, TZ 16, 1960, 285–97.

, Son of God, Son of Man, Servant of God, Son of David

The following article was originally written for the German edition of this work by Professor Otto Michel. It has been brought up to date for this English edition by Dr. David Marshall, whose insertions are indicated by [I.H.M.]. Dr. Marshall also prepared the bibliography for general works, Servant, Son of Man, Son of God, Son of David.

The articles that are collected here deal with the concepts that are centred on the titles pais and hyios only in so far as they relate to the person of Jesus, i.e. only with their functions as christological titles. Because pais not only means child, but also slave, Isa. 52:13 LXX uses it to translate the term "Servant of God" (Heb. 'eḇed h) and hence the NT uses pais theou to designate Jesus as God's Servant. For the NT uses → Child. Similarly hyios expresses not only a physical relationship, but also a spiritual. Hence, Jesus' relation to men is expressed by ho hyios tou anthrōpou, Son of man, and his close relationship with God by hyios tou theou, Son of God; his ancestry in the Davidic line is recalled in the title hyios David, Son of David. The theological import of the concept "son" is dealt with in the article on Child under patēr, pais, teknon and hyios.

παῖς Θεοῦ

παῖς Θεοῦ (pais Theou), Servant of God.

OT The phrase pais theou as such has no antecedents in Gk. and first occurs in the LXX. On pais and its associations → Child; on theos → God.

1. (a) From earliest times right up to the revolt of A.D. 70 Hebrews possessed Hebrew → slaves (Gen. 24; 29:15, 18; Exod. 22:2; Jer. 34:8 ff.; Joseph War 4, 9, 3 [508]). A Hebrew was forcibly sold as a slave by a court if he could not make good the value of stolen goods (Exod. 22:2), or he sold himself because of poverty (2 Ki. 4:1). In both cases the slavery was normally limited to 6 years (but Exod. 21:5 f.; Deut. 15:16 f.). Slaves played a full part in cultic life (→ circumcision, Gen. 17:12 f.; → sabbath, Exod. 20:10; → sacrifice, Deut. 12:18; Passover, Exod. 12:44; → Feast). The mark of the 'ebed, → slave (art. doulos), is that he belongs to another; he is mentioned as a chattel along with gold and cattle (Gen. 24:35; Exod. 21:21). The Essenes had no slaves (Euseb., Praep. Ev. 8, 11, 4).

(b) From as early as Saul's time – in common with the world of the Ancient East (cf. J. A. Knudtzon, Die el-Amarna Tafeln, 1915, 60:3; 61:2; etc.) – soldiers in a king's service were referred to by themselves and others, but not by the king, as 'a hammelek, servants of the King (LXX paidēs tou basileōs) (2 Sam. 11:24; 15:18). However, these 'abādīm, servants, were not in an explicitly servile relationship to the king, but were employed by him (1 Sam. 8:11 f.). This usage in court circles led to the frequent everyday use of 'ebed, servant, as a humble self-designation (Gen. 32:15). An especially strong version of such self-abasement is the phrase "Your servant, dog" (2 Ki. 8:13; 2 Sam. 9:8). But kings too could be called 'abādīm, if they were vassals of another ruler (2 Sam. 10:19; Jos. 9:11; Knudtzon, op. cit., 158:1 f.). A vassal king had then to pay tribute, as 2 Ki. 16:7 f. shows, and had to do military service (→ Slave, art. doulos or 1, 2).

2. (a) The religious use of this idea is probably also influenced by the court practice. As in the rest of the world of the Ancient East, but in complete contrast to the ancient Gk. ideas, the worshipper of God in the OT styles himself as his 'ebed, servant. He thus gives expression to his awe and his duty to serve his God and even to belong to him, with a view to placing himself under his protection. In contrast to other Sem. cultures, however, only rarely is the bestowal of a name used to designate this belonging to God; cf. the case of Obadiah (1 Ki. 18:3 ff.). More often the worshipper who prays calls himself "your servant", or Yahweh speaks and ascribes to himself the title "My servant" or another person refers to him as "His servant".

The designation 'ebed occurs relatively seldom in the pre-exilic period in a religious sense and is almost completely absent from the pre-exilic prophets; this is because the religious idea of the 'ebed had spread from the language of the cult into that of the cult and of prayer and was therefore regarded as alien. Thus the "servant" is used of Jacob (Gen. 32:10[11]), Isaac (Gen. 24:14), Moses (Exod. 12:7 f.), David (2 Sam. 3:18), the prophets (2 Ki. 9:7) and the remnant faithful to Yahweh (2 Ki. 9:7; 10:23).

But from the time of the Deuteronomist and Deutero-Isaiah onwards, the 'ebed became far more frequent; it was particularly used of Moses, but also of Joshua (Jos. 24:29), the patriarchs (Deut. 9:27, Exod. 32:13) and David (1 Sam. 13:8:24 ff.; 14:8). Even Nebuchadnezzar is called a servant of Yahweh in the tractate of the kingly 'abādīm (Jer. 25:9). Job, too, who has even less connexion with the people of Israel, receives the title of an 'ebed in the prologue and epilogue of the Book of Job (Job 1:8; 2:3; 42:7 f.). From Ezekiel's time onwards the singular 'ebed is used of the people of Israel (Ezek. 28:25; 37:25), and from Deutero-Isaiah onwards the bādīm, servants, is used of the whole body of Israelites (Isa. 54:17). In Isa. 56:6 proselytes too are called “servants of God”.

At a very early date the “servant of God” sayings in the OT can be divided into two traditions: on the one hand, in 2 Sam. 3:18 the especial function of the king David) is seen to lie in the saving of the people from all its enemies. This tradition continued in Ezek. 34:23 f.; 37:24 f.; and beyond that to Hag. 2:23; Zech. 3:8. On the other hand, there is the prophetic tradition: the prophet is the authoritative messenger of the word of God (1 Ki. 18:36) who imposes God’s will upon the people and by his word sets historical processes in motion.

(b) B. Duhm (Das Buch Jesaja, 1892, 1922^a) was the first to recognize in Isa. four songs which are known as the “Servant Songs” and must be interpreted on their own: Isa. 42:1–4 (or 9); 49:1–6 (or 11); 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12. C. R. North’s survey of attempts at their interpretation (The Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah, 1950², 156–160) shows that the Ethiopian official’s question to Philip about Isa. 53:7 f. has received various answers: “Of whom does the prophet speak? Of himself or of another?” (Acts 8:34). From the LXX to the present day there have been interpreters who tried on the basis of Isa. 49:3 to identify the Servant with the whole people of Israel collectively or with a part of it (so O. Kaiser, who takes the ‘ebed to refer to the exiles as opposed to the whole people), ([I.H.M.] or who find some kind of movement within the Songs from a collective to an individual identification of the servant [so, with stress on the collective aspect, M. D. Hooker, Jesus and the servant, 1959, 25–52; with stress on the individual aspect, H. H. Rowley, The Servant of the Lord, 1965², and C. R. North, The Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah, 156²). Yet it may be suspected that the “Israel” of Isa. 49:3 is a very early interpretative gloss (cf. Isa. 42:1 LXX with the Heb.), ([Tr.] although it is dangerous to bend the text simply to support a theory). An individual interpretation of the Songs supported by Isa. 49:5 f. which sets the Servant over against the people. Some suppose him to be a prophet because of his peculiarly prophetic traits (ear, 50:4 f., and mouth, 49:1 f.) and have identified him with Moses, Isaiah, Deutero-Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. But on the other hand, because he establishes justice (42:1, 3 f.), releases prisoners (42:7; 49:9) and wields a sword (49:2), others see him as a king and think of Uzziah, Hezekiah, Jehoiachin or Zerubbabel. But G. von Rad’s view is to be referred to all these attempts to identify the Servant-figure with a historical person: Such extreme language can never have been applied to a living person – or even to one recently dead. . . . This transcendence of all familiar human categories is characteristic of discourse which foretells the future” (or, in M. Buber’s words, “of the secret”) (Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 258).

3. The LXX equivalents of the 870 occurrences of ‘ebed in the MT are: pais, servant, menial, 340 times; doulos, → slave, 327 times; therapōn, servant, attendant, 46 times; oiketēs, household slave, 36 times; also once each hyios, son, and hypēretēs, servant, helper. The other occurrences have no exact equivalent. The choice of Gk. equivalents varies from book to book. In the Hexateuch therapōn interchanges with uis and doulos; the last is reserved almost completely for the “house of bondage in Egypt” and other harsh servitude. In Jdg. – 2 Ki. pais is used of the free servant of the king and doulos for enforced bondage. doulos is used throughout in religious contexts to designate oneself or others, in order to express the great difference between man and God. In the other books of the OT too the religious idea of the doulos is prominent, but in Job it can be replaced by therapōn and in Isa. by pais. Although the "Servant" passages of Isaiah are mostly rendered with pais and may be collectively interpreted, a messianic figure seems to have been discerned behind Isa 52:13–53:12.

4. The phrase pais theou occurs only seldom in the literature of Gk.-speaking late Judaism since it was very much overshadowed by the concept of the doulos (the Israelites are douloi of God: 2 Macc. 7:33; Jub. 23:30; Josephus, Ant., 11, 4, 4 and (90, 101)). But where it was used it usually meant servant of God and referred to Moses (Bar. 1:20; 2:28), the prophets (Bar. 2:20) or the righteous (Wis. 9:4 f.). Late often pais means child of God (Wis. 2:13; 12, 7; 20; 19:6). The prominence of the doulos motif in late Judaism reveals an increased awareness of the distance between God and man. Gk. thought was not very conscious of this distance before the advent of the oriental cults (K. H. Rengstorff, TDNT II 264 f.).

In 2 Esd. 7:28 f. (v.l.); 13:32, 37, 52; 14:9 and Syr. Bar. 70:9 we find an apocalyptic tradition which refers to the messiah as son, child, youth or servant. Behind the variant translations lies the older 'ebed tradition which is transmitted through the Coptic phrase pais theou. Older prophecies involving the destiny of Israel and the nation are used here, but the revelation of God's elect is the central idea. Apocalyptic accentuates the element of transcendence in the 'ebed tradition.

Hellenistic Judaism always took the 'ebed passages in Isa. collectively of the people of Israel (LXX Isa. 42:1) or of the righteous (Wis. 2:13 in its context). No agreement has been reached as to whether the "Servant" passages in Isa. were messianically interpreted in Palestinian Judaism in pre-Christian times. J. Jeremiás (TDNT V 684–700) thought that they were ([I.H.M.] on the basis of his interpretation of the Similitudes of Enoch (37–71), the Peshitta; Aquila; Theodotion; the Targum; rabbinic material; and Justin. Cf. W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 1955², 274–284. Some of the evidence is slender, and its weaknesses have been pointed out by M. Rese, ZTK 60, 1963, 21–41, but there is perhaps sufficient evidence to show that Judaism applied some of the traits of the Servant to an expected future figure, whether the messiah or the Son of man). The references to Isa. are not always obvious. The passages could also be derived from the concept of the atoning death of the righteous which was widespread in late Judaism (cf. SB 274–299; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht, 1955).

Qumran continued the OT tradition in referring to the prophets as "God's servants" (1QS 1:3; 1QpHab 2:9). It is striking how the Teacher of Righteousness adopts the title of "God's servant" in the hymns (1QH 13:18 f.; 14:25; 16:10, 11, 18), and one can in some passages detect the influence of Isa. (cf. 1QH 7:10; 8:11; 18:14 f.; cf. A. Dupont-Sommer, The Essene Writings from Qumran, 1953, 360–367). The "servant's" anonymity is here preserved intact (M. Buber).

At all events up to A.D. 200 official Judaism, as represented by the Targumim had not interpreted Isa. 53 of the suffering messiah, but, perhaps influenced by early Christian polemic, had eradicated or drastically reinterpreted any statements that about his suffering. The idea of a suffering messiah only appears late in official Judaism and then in connexion with Isa. and particularly ch. 52 (so San. 98ab, Joshua b. Levi [A.D. 250], the school of "Rabbi" [A.D. 200]; cf. SB II 286).

NT 1. (a) The NT uses the title pais theou 5 times of Jesus (Matt. 12:18; Acts 3:13; 4:10; 13:26; 17:3).

5; 4:27, 30). It is noteworthy how it is used in a quotation and in the old traditions of Acts (chs. 3 f.; cf. 3:13 with Exod. 3:16; Isa. 52:13; and 4:27 with Ps. 2:2 f.). In Acts 4:27, 30 the meaning "Servant" is confirmed by 4:25, where, as in late Judaism, David is called God's "servant" and not his "child". (For the interchange of doulos and pais cf. Lk. 7:2 f., 7 f.) A similar sense is to be given to it in Acts 3:13, 26.

But the influence of the title pais theou in its application to Jesus is not to be limited to the occurrences of this phrase. The doulos-concept in the logion of Mk. 10:44 has certainly been moulded by Isa. 53:10; i.e. behind it stands the 'ebed of the Servant Songs, who was interpreted as a servant by ancient tradition and thus related to Jesus (→ Redemption, art. lytron NT 1). On the other hand, we must also ask whether the 'ebed of Isa. 42:1 does not lie behind the hyios, son, of Matt. 3:17 par. Mk. 1:11, Lk. 3:22 (Jesus' → baptism) and Matt. 17:5 par. Mk. 9:7; Lk. 9:35 (the → transfiguration). Originally it would have been translated by pais, but then because of the ambivalence of pais it could have been glossed by hyios in a later Hellenistic tradition and so understood as meaning "God's child". ([Tr.] But this hypothesis meets several objections, cf. I. H. Marshall, "'Son of God' or 'Servant of Yahweh' – Reconsideration of Mark 1:11", NTS 15, 1968–69, 326–336.)

The idea of the pais theou, the Servant of God, as a title of Jesus is found occasionally in the liturgical formulae of prayers and confessions (Did. 9 f.; 1 Clem. 1:2–4; Mart. Poly. 14:1 ff.). The meaning of pais here is uncertain, but may be in transition from "servant" to "child". In Jn. the title of pais or doulos for Jesus is wholly lacking, apparently through assimilation to Hellenistic ideas, or because John preferred other titles. hyios tou theou replaces it (cf. Jn. 1:34; 10:36), but in fact the motif of the Servant is still there (cf. Jn. 13:4 ff.: the washing of feet was one of the most menial jobs of a slave). Finally in the Johannine literature (Jn. 1:29, 36) the Servant of Isa. 53 lies behind the form of the amnos tou theou, the → Lamb of God; this transition to amnos was made possible by the ambiguity of the Aram. ʔalyā' (servant, y, or lamb, but this remains uncertain; cf. I. H. Marshall, op. cit., 323 n. 3).

(b) We must also consider whether the figure of the 'ebed of Isa. 53 has influenced any of the christological formulae. This is true of the hyper-formula, especially the phrase hyper pollōn, "for many" (Mk. 14:24; Jn. 6:51). But this would scarcely apply to Jn. 11:50 f.; 18:14 which limit the hyper to the people of Israel; these texts are better to be explained in terms of the late Jewish ideas connected with the atoning death of the righteous (4 Macc. 1:11; 6:28 f.; 17:20 f. and rabbinic references in SB 273 ff.; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT 3 (c), NT 4 (b)). Here too we must consider the formulae anti pollōn, "for many" (Mk. 10:45; Matt. 20:28) and peri pollōn or "many" (Matt. 26:28). The title pais perhaps lies behind the formula dia tou theou, "through Jesus" (Rom. 1:8; 2:16), if it is to be seen as a shortened form of the fuller dia tou paidos sou Iēsou, "through your Servant Jesus" (Acts 4:30), which was best preserved in the language of prayer (Mart. Poly. 14:1, 3; 1 Clem. 59:2 ff.). We may also add the formulaic use of paradidonai in the pass. as a substitute for the use of the divine name (Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 11:23) and the formula didonai heauton, "give oneself" (Gal. 1:4; 1 Tim. 2:6), and tithenai ten psychēn, "to lay down one's life" (Lk. 10:11, 15, 17 f.); all these may be variant translations of the Heb. text of Isa. 53:12.

(c) [I.H.M.] It is clear from the references cited above that the Servant concept exercised a considerable influence on the developing theology of the early church, even if it is not found very often in Paul when he is writing freely and not basing himself on traditional formulations. As the most obvious statement of the death and vindication of God's Servant in the OT, it is highly probable that the vague reference to Christ's death "according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. 15:3-5) conceal allusions to Isa. 53. It is possible that the Servant figure in the old hymn, Phil. 2:6-11, has been influenced to some extent by the same concept, although a direct influence of Isa. 53 on the hymn is difficult to prove (cf. R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii 5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 4, 1967, 182-196). Further allusions may be present in Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25 and 9:28 (Isa. 53:12).

The pervasiveness of these allusions to the Servant-figure prompts the question whether Jesus himself gave the impulse to the church to interpret his person and work in this way. Whether or not hyios has replaced an original pais in Mk. 1:11, the baptismal narrative certainly contains an allusion to Isa. 42:1-4 ("with thee I will be pleased"; reception of the → Spirit). In Lk. 22:37 Jesus himself quotes Isa. 53:12, and there is good reason to accept the authenticity of the saying. Jesus also quotes Isa. 61:1-3 with reference to himself in Lk. 4:18 f., and there is some reason to believe that the quotation was regarded as referring to the Servant (cf. the association of Isa. 52:7 and 61:1 f. in 11QMelchizedek). There are two fairly clear allusions to Isa. 53 in Mk. 10:45 and 14:24. These references strongly suggest that Jesus understood his vocation as the Son of man in terms of the suffering and humiliation of the Servant of Yahweh.

The case that Jesus did not make use of the Servant concept has been impressively presented by M. D. Hooker who claims that the allusions do not refer unequivocally to Isa. 53 and that the note of vicarious suffering is absent. An alternative source for the thought of the "ransom for many" has been sought by C. K. Barrett in I Cor. 15:3 ("The Background of Mark 10:45", in A. J. B. Higgins ed., New Testament Essays in Memory of T. W. Manson, 1959, 1-18; cf. C. K. Barrett, New Testament Essays, 1972, 20-26). The view that Jesus did use the concept is developed by Jeremias, TDNT V 712-717, and R. T. France, "The Servant of the Lord in the Teaching of Jesus", TB 19, 1968, 26-52; for a more cautious defence of Mk. 10:45 and 14:24 as allusions to Isa. 53 see F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969, 54-63. There can be little doubt that the case against Jesus' use of the concept has been overstated; while M. D. Hooker has demonstrated that a number of allusions to the Servant concept should be dropped from consideration, there remains sufficient cogent evidence to support the view that the concept was used by Jesus to express the necessity for his suffering and death followed by divine vindication.

2. (a) However the NT does not restrict the title pais theou to Jesus. It is used of Israel in the Magnificat (Lk. 1:54), an old hymn built up of quotations, and of David in the equally old Benedictus (Lk. 1:69) and in Acts 4:25. The use of the title for people and for David is in line with the usage that had been current since the time of the Deuteronomist and Isa. Here we are dealing with a stratum of old Palestinian tradition.

(b) pais theou is not used of Christians in the NT, but such a differentiation is only significant in Gk.-speaking areas. Paul is conscious of being God's servant in a particularly notable way in accordance with Isa. 49:1 (Gal. 1:15); this shows variety of ways in which the NT uses this concept. Paul also uses it with a wider sense when he calls himself (Rom. 1:1), his fellow-workers (Phil. 1:1; Col. 4:12) and all Christians (1 Cor. 7:22) douloi of Christ.

Here too then the effects of the older biblical concept of faith as service are to be seen, but now this service is concentrated especially in the relation of Christians to Christ. A fundamental distinction can be drawn between the new filial relationship and the old servile one (Gal. 4:1–7; Rom. 8:14 ff.). This attachment to Christ does not alter this biblical perspective of faith as service, but it does lift it clear of the servile nature of the pre-Christian existence. ([Tr.] The Servant's task is seen to be reflected in the mission of the church in Acts 15:47 [Isa. 49:6]; Rom. 10:6 [Isa. 53:1] and 15:21 [Isa. 52:15].)

The motif of the "servant of God" is used explicitly in the prefaces of Jas. 1:1; Tit. 1; Rev. 1:1. It is particularly prominent in Rev. and is used repeatedly (e.g. Rev. 3; 10:7; 11:18; 19:2; 22:3). The Gospel of Jn. follows the Hellenistic pattern and avoids applying the doulos-concept to Christians (cf. Jn. 15:15) and seeks other ways of preserving the character of faith as obedience and service. O. Michel ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ho hyios tou anthrōpou, the Son of man.

& OT 1. The Philological Problem in the OT and Judaism. The antecedents of the idea ho hyios tou anthrōpou are found exclusively in the OT and Judaism and especially in apocalyptic; in the LXX the words go back to the Heb. and Aram. words for → child (art. hyios) and → man (art. anthrōpos).

(a) In biblical Hebrew 'ādām or 'nōš is a collective term for man(kind); hence the individual man is called ben 'ādām, son of a man, and a number of men are called nē 'ādām, sons of men, or, with the art., b'nē hā'ādām (Koehler-Baumgartner, s. f.; → Adam). The use of "son of man" as an address in Ezek. is striking (c. 90 times). The prophet is not addressed by his own name, but as an individual creature drawn from the genus man and contrasted with God. God himself condescends to consort with his servant (cf. also Dan. 8:17). We are dealing here with a "thoroughly Hebraic idiom" (W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, BKAT XIII/1, 1959, 70). There is no need to posit Babylonian influence (Gilgamesh 9, 2, 16; ANET 88). The way in which "son of man" (i.e. a member of the genus man) appears in elevated speech is therefore important, particularly in parallelismus membrorum: "God is not [like] man, that he should lie, nor a son of man [ben 'ādām], that he should repent of anything" (Num. 23:19); "What is man ['nōš], that you are mindful of him, and the son of man [ben 'ādām], that you consider him?" (Ps. 8:4[5]). The contrast between the God who offers reassurance and the people whom he addresses, who fear mortal men and the sons of men, who perish like grass, is plain in Isa. 51:12 (here too is the interchange of 'nōš and ben 'ādām). Jud. 8:16 seems to go back to Num. 23:19: man has not control over God's decisions, for God cannot be threatened like a man and does not vacillate like a son of man. The contrast between God and man (or in parallelismus membrorum "son of man") is a definite Heb. idiom.

(b) In biblical Aramaic we must note Dan. 7:13, which has become the fundamental problem in apocalyptic: "And behold, with the clouds of heaven there came one like a son of man [k^ebar 'nāš].” Note the allusive way in which apocalyptic makes its comparisons (Heb. k^e, as). In contrast to the beasts which have been described previously there comes on to the stage one who is like a son of man (i.e. member of the genus man). The wisdom tradition too loves to speak of the gen man.

(c) In Mishnaic Hebrew ben 'ādām does not occur. Here too it is possible to speak generically of men or mankind (b^{nē} 'ādām) or of creatures (b^{ri}ōt), thus expressing the idea of man's common experience in life (cf. Aboth 2: 1, 3).

(d) Ps. 80: 8–15(9–16), with its picture of the vine and the vineyard, which refers to God's dealings with → Israel, is particularly important. It leads on to a prayer for the king, the “man at your right hand” (cf. Ps. 110:1) and the “son of man, whom you have reared” (vv. 17 f.). Here the son of man (ben 'ādām) is used of that special elect man, the king.

In addition a periphrastic description of the person who is speaking often occurs in Judaism. This idiom makes use of the demonstrative: this man (hahū' gabrā') or that woman (hahī' gabrā'). Cf. Gen. R. 68:12: “A certain man came to R. Jose b. Hala and said to him: ‘It was revealed to this man [hahū' gabrā'] in a dream’” (further material in Gen. R. 7:2; cf. Num. R. 19:3; Geniza fragments of the Pal. Tg. of Gen. 4:14; cf. G. Vermes, Appendix in M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospel and Acts, 1967³, 320–328; C. Colpe, TDNT VIII 406 ff.). It may be granted that in certain circumstances not only hahū' gabrā', but also bar nāšā', son of man, could be thus used in Palestinian Galilean (Vermes, loc. cit. 327; Colpe, loc. cit. 406). This periphrasis had no messianic sense (→ Jesus Christ, art. Christos στ).

[I.H.M.] According to J. A. Fitzmyer (NTS 20, 1973–74, 396 f.) the form attested by Qumran evidence always has initial Aleph, so that the possible phrases are b^{nē} 'nāš and bar 'nāšā'. The view of G. Vermes (repeated in Jesus the Jew, 1971, 162–168) that the phrase could be used as a substitute for “I” in contexts where humiliation or death are mentioned, or out of reserve and modesty, has been challenged by Fitzmyer and by J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, I, 1971, 261 f., who hold that it means “the (or a) man, and therefore also I”.

2. The Development of the Tradition within Apocalyptic. (a) The starting point for the apocalyptic tradition is the vision of Dan. 7:13 f.; 18:26 f. This is couched in rhythmic language. While the beasts are being rendered powerless or destroyed, there comes one like a son of man ascends with the clouds of heaven to the Ancient of Days. Apparently this vision of the one like a son of man refers to the theocracy of Israel which is conscious of being fundamentally different from other kingdoms and nations. Dan. 7:18 mentions the “saints of the Most High” who will reign for ever (vv. 22a, 25, 27); the expression is a striking one and has been variously interpreted. But in its present context it refers to the imminent crisis of history and the transference of power to the hitherto humbled people of Israel; hence the traits of the one like a son of man are transferred to Israel itself. It is tempting to link this up with the convictions of the later Qumran community in 1QS 11:7 f.: “He has given them a share in the inheritance of the saints and he has united their fellowship with the saints of heaven”. The Qumran community did not merely regard itself as the eschatological Israel, but also as a fellowship between saints on earth and powers in heaven.

(b) (i) In the Similitudes of Eth. Enoch (chs. 37–71) the Son of man appears again as an eschatological figure, the object of the expectation of a corresponding community. We must take as our starting point this eschatological community's self-understanding, if we are to evaluate this relatively late stratum in the Enoch literature. The concepts expressed in Eth. Enoch 46:8; 53:6; 62:8 ("houses of his congregation", "the house of his congregation", "the community of the elect and holy") show that we are dealing here with an independent hasidic group, comparable to that of Qumran in its apocalyptic expectation. But its messianic expectation, in particular the position of the Son of man in the Similitudes, is completely different from that of Qumran. The Elect One, the Righteous One, is in Eth. Enoch the representative of God's righteousness and wisdom; he mediates this blessing to his community. He is "hidden before him" and exists before the creation of the world. However, he also takes on the messianic struggle with kings and powers and emerges victorious. The features of this delineation (46:3 ff.; 48:2 ff.; 62:7 ff.) are gleaned from an exegesis of the Pss. and the prophets (above all Isa. and the vision of Dan. 9 f. which is paralleled by Eth. Enoch 46).

"Man" in Eth. Enoch is not really a messianic title, but describes the appearance of this heavenly being (cf. the use of demonstrative pronouns with the expressions for Son of man"). The appearances of different phrases in the Ethiopic (e.g. 46:3 walda ab'e; Aram. bar nāšā') suggests that particular Gk. and Aram. expressions lie behind them and that these were not titular either. There is no end to the discussion of the question whether Christian influence has produced this distinctive Son of man tradition. But caution is necessary. It can be dated somewhere between the Parthian invasion mentioned in 56:5 (40–38 B.C.) and the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70). On all this cf. Colpe, TDNT VIII 423–427.)

[I.H.M.] It may be necessary to date the Similitudes even later. Although fragments of Eth. Enoch have been discovered at Qumran, it is remarkable that none have been found of the Similitudes. On this and other grounds J. T. Milik (HTR 64, 971, 333–378) has argued that the Similitudes were not part of the original book but are a post-Christian insertion. If this argument is valid, it need not necessarily exclude use of the Similitudes in establishing the background of thought to the NT usage of "Son of man", since the traditions used may well be earlier than the date of writing. Nevertheless, caution in the use of Eth. Enoch is clearly called for.

(ii) The exaltation of Enoch to be Son of man and his translation to be with the Lord of Spirits (70 f.) is especially important. These last two chs. of the Similitudes are remarkable for the problems that they present as to their relation both to one another and to the book as a whole. Ch. 71 explicitly refers to the manifestation of the Ancient of Days in Dan. 7:13. Enoch is greeted as the "Son of man", who is born of righteousness: righteousness abides over him (v. 14). We should not see here an incarnation of the Son of man or a descent to earth, but rather Enoch's investiture with the eschatological function of the Son of man. This still leaves a whole mass of controversial questions unanswered (e.g. whether originally only a translation of Enoch was intended and not his installation as "Son of man"). But at any rate we may see here an exegetical development of the Enoch tradition of Gen. 5:22–24 and the "Son of man" references in Dan. 7:13.

(iii) Perhaps we can assume that one particular Jewish sect joined the "Son of man" tradition with some quite definite messianic ideas, but that Eth. Enoch 70 f.

describes an apocalyptic exaltation of the teacher and preacher of repentance. T has many points of contact with NT motifs.

(iv) Two things must be said in conclusion. In the Similitudes the vision of the Son of man of Dan. 7 is interpreted of a messianic figure without the phrase "Son man" becoming a messianic title. In Eth. Enoch 70 ff. the Enoch tradition is united with Dan. 7 to describe a representative of righteousness who bestows peace and salvation upon his community.

(c) The Apc. of Ezra's connexion with the vision to Daniel is fundamentally different from that of the Enoch tradition: the destiny of the nation as a whole is more emphasized both in the tradition used and in the author's reflection upon it. Again it upholds a form of religion that is based more on the Torah (13:54). The real problem is posed by the discrepancy between the tradition and the motifs used: Son of man and messiah, apocalyptic vision and messianic expectation are joined in an unequal union, to the detriment of both elements. 2 Esd. 13:26 describes (in apocalyptic terms) the "man from the depths of the sea" as "he whom the Most High has held in readiness for a long time and through whom he intends to redeem creation; he himself gives a new order for those that remain" (→ Remnant). Messianic motifs however, are added: mankind gathers to fight against the man who has risen from the sea, but unarmed he wages war with the stream of fire that issues from his lips. He descends from the mountain to gather a peaceable host out of the midst of the scattering or the great affliction (13:1-13). It is important to note too that this "man" is at the same time the "son" or the "servant" through whom the Most High reveals himself (13:32, 37, 52). Till now he has been hidden but when his day comes he has made himself manifest (13:52). This passage differs from Dan. 7 in its more fantastic imagery and the more active rôle given to the messianic man; haggadic ornamentation is on the increase.

(d) (i) It is also important to note how the "one like a son of man" and "heavenly one" assume concrete historical features: Abel, Enoch and → Melchizedek appear in apocalyptic as God's elect who represent his righteousness and wield authority to judge in the eschatological assize. OT exegesis reveals their particular qualifications for this, but only Melchizedek is endowed with messianic traits.

(ii) It is said of Melchizedek in 11QMelchizedek 10 ff. that "[as it written] concerning him in the psalms of David, who says, 'The heavenly one stands in God's congregation; in the midst of the heavenly ones he holds court'; and concerning him it says, 'Return over them to the heavenly heights; God will judge the nations'. And what he says is 'How long will you judge unjustly and take side with transgressors?'" Cf. ibid. 16: "[through Isaiah the prophet who says, 'How lovely are the feet of the messenger of joy upon the mountains, who proclaims peace, and who brings the message of good, who proclaims salvation and says to Zion, 'Yahweh, your heavenly one is king!'" Melchizedek is here thought of as a heavenly being; he may execute judgment on the godless. The inauguration of the time of salvation is connected with this judgment and this is portrayed in the language of Isa. This comes close to identifying Melchizedek with the archangel Michael. The motif of the Son of man does not explicitly appear in this text, but we can see how certain decisive functions which are ascribed to the Son of man can similarly be applied to angels or heavenly beings.

(e) Test. Abr. 11 contains an unusual Son of man tradition of Jewish origins. A who at the first gave witness appears as judge and Enoch as the scribe of righteousness. A clear distinction is made between the questions as to who pronounces sentence and who records the sins. Here we can see a significant development: if attention has passed from the transference of the kingdom to the saints to the eschatological judgment which exposes and punishes sins, then it follows that every man will be judged by a man. Hence Abel takes on the rôle of the eschatological judge because he is the “son of the first man” (longer text of Test. Abr. 13). The shorter text of Test. Abr. 12, which is perhaps the superior text, is also important because it there criticizes Abraham’s relation to sinners. In any case we must distinguish the original Jewish tradition here and a Christian editing of it (longer text).

(f) [I.H.M.] Attempts to shed light on the meaning of the Son of man concept by study of its origins have not so far produced any generally accepted conclusions. Three main contributions may be mentioned: (1) C. Colpe (TDNT VIII 406–430) surveys the possibilities of a background for Dan. 7 in the OT itself and then in a series of non-biblical figures – Gayomart in the Avestas, Adapa in Babylonian literature, the sun god in Egyptian mythology, Adam in rabbinic speculation and the primal man in gnosticism. Each of these possibilities is rejected, and Colpe himself suggests a background in Canaanite mythology, where the young god Baal rides on the clouds and the supreme god, El, the father of years, is replaced as ruler by him. Colpe admits that there are difficulties about regarding this myth as the basis of Dan. 7, but claims that it stands closest of all the claimants to kinship with Dan. 7. (2) F. H. Borsch claims to have unearthed a widespread myth about the First Man, the king and Primordial Man, which is reflected in various legends attested in ancient myth and ritual. (3) M. D. Hooker argues that the background of the concept is to be found in the OT. The Son of man is to be understood collectively of Israel as the heir of Adam. Although destined to rule, the Son of man undergoes loss of dominion and suffering, but will finally be vindicated by God.

One difficulty with the views of Colpe and Borsch is that each of them must presuppose the existence of bearers of Son of man traditions in the period between Dan. and Jesus, but there is little evidence for these. The problem of transmission is solved by N. Perrin (A Modern Pilgrimage in New Testament Christology, 1974, 23–40) who argues that all that we have is a series of independent exegetical uses of Dan. 7 by the authors of 2 Esd. and Eth. Enoch rather than a continuing “Son of man” tradition. Perrin has at least demonstrated the influence of Dan. 7 on subsequent writings; it is not so clear that he has got rid of a continuing “Son of man” concept.

NT 1. The Designation of Jesus as the Son of Man and the Oldest Tradition. In Jesus’ message there confront us statements in which he speaks of himself as the Son of man and as thereby possessing a certain authority (→ Might, art. exousia NT 2) or having to tread a path of suffering that is appointed for him. But we also find statements about the coming Son of man and these obviously reflect an apocalyptic tradition (→ Come; → Goal; → Present). The Gk. words ho hyios tou anthrōpou are a lit., though misleading, translation of the Aram. bar nāšā’. The Heb. equivalent would be ben ’ādām (cf. the statement directed against Christians in T. J. Ta’an. 2:65b:50; SB I 486). It is striking that this use of the definite article is usually retained (until we come to Jn. 5:27); this shows that the evangelists attached a messianic significance to the Gk. translation. So that we can better understand this significance, let us consider a selection of the views of NT scholars.

(a) R. Bultmann (Theology of the New Testament, 1952, § 5, 33–37) holds that the earliest community regarded Jesus as teacher and prophet. But that was not all; they also saw in him the messiah and they proclaimed him as such. He was proclaimed “as the coming Messiah, in other words as Son of Man” (op. cit., 33); that is, they did not look for “his return as Messiah, but his coming” (as Son of man). “His then past activity on earth was not yet considered Messianic by the earliest Church” (ibid.). They carried on this proclamation of Jesus as the future Messiah or as the Son of man “quite within the frame of Jewish eschatological expectation” (op. cit., 34). Hence the late Jewish myth of the Son of man was transferred to a real man.

Bultmann holds that the different groups of Son of man sayings exist independently of one another. At any rate the oldest tradition is that of the sayings about the coming Son of man; these include Mk. 8:38 or Lk. 12:8 f.; 17:23 f. (“These sayings could come from Jesus”, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, 1963², 152), Matt. 24:37–39, 43 f. (“yet these sayings could also have been taken from Jewish tradition”, ibid.). The Hellenistic community was the first to project the title “Son of man” back into Jesus’ earthly life.

(b) O. Cullmann (The Christology of the New Testament, 1963², II 2:2: “Jesus and the Son-of-Man”) renounces all critical analysis, but, in accordance with the overall structure of his work, he makes a distinction between a future work of Jesus as judge (an apocalyptic idea) and a present one as a man among men. Hence, statements about Jesus’ exaltation run parallel to ones about his humiliation. The ‘ebed (servant) of God recurs in both sets of statements: Jesus is the ‘ebed both in his authority to forgive sins and in his readiness to submit to suffering. The ‘ebed tradition is thus correlated with the statements about the Son of man. “This is the unheard-of new act of Jesus, that he united these two apparently contradictory tasks in his self-consciousness, and that he expressed that union in his life and teaching” (op. cit., 161).

(c) E. Schweizer (“Der Menschensohn – zur eschatologischen Erwartung Jesu”, ZNW 50, 1959, 185–209; cf. JBL 79, 160, 119–129; NTS 9, 1962–63, 256–261) raises the question whether the motif of the Son of man – if it must be separated from that of the kingdom of God (P. Vielhauer) – had any other place of origin than the preaching of Jesus. He maintains that an analysis of the futuristic sayings shows that there is no good evidence in the sources for the expectation of an imminent Parousia. References to the coming humiliation of the Son of man cannot simply be discarded, but can after all be traced back to Jesus himself, at least as regards basic ingredients. But statements about Jesus’ earthly work as the Son of man are the surest.

Schweizer holds that this picture fits into the concept of the servant of God as it is found in Wis. 2–5: the righteous man is rejected by men but exalted by God. The motif of the Son of man has points of contact with Dan. 7, Eth. Enoch 70 f. and Ezek. 1. The new element in Jesus’ message is that Jesus, like Ezek., takes up the concept of the Son of man in a new way and reapplies it to the righteous One here on earth. This idea points to Jesus’ having been sent without making it explicit. Hence, the two sets of statements about the kingdom of God and about the Son of man certainly appear to be separate, yet both have their basis in the preaching of Jesus himself.

(d) Like Schweizer, R. Leivestad (ASTI 6, 1967–8, 49–105; cf. NTS 18, 1971–72, 243–267) declines to make general use of the title or Jewish apocalyptic his starting point for showing the origins of the Synoptic idea of the Son of man. He states that (1) there is no such title in Jewish literature; (2) we know of no Christian confessional formula in which “Son of man” is used as a messianic predicate; (3) in Jesus’ lifetime the expression is found only on Jesus’ own lips; and (4) in many cases the phrase “Son of man” can be construed as only a self-designation. In those cases where another interpretation is formally possible the evangelists have taken no pains at all to avoid such a misunderstanding. Moreover, this formal ambiguity is found in late, secondary formulations. It occurred to no one that “the Son of man” could be anything other than a self-designation of Jesus. (5) None of the “Son of man” sayings are intelligible only on the basis of a pre-Christian use of the phrase as a title. (6) There are a number of sayings which are intelligible only if no messianic ideas are attached to the phrase. (7) This phrase is irrelevant for the question of the messiah. No one ever suggested that Jesus’ naming of himself as the “Son of man” was an answer to the question as to who he was. The “messianic secret” has not been influenced by the use of the name “Son of man”. (8) The apocalyptic figure to which we ascribe the title of “Son of man” is a heavenly supernatural being. Many of the NT sayings speak of the earthly life, sufferings and death of the Son of man. The point is never made that in thus speaking they were saying something paradoxical or alien to the traditional concept of the Son of man (op. cit., 96 f.). Attempts have been made to regard the Aram. equivalent bar nāšā’ as a mere periphrasis without any particular significance; that is implausible. Implausible too is the suggestion that the Aram. phrase had a demonstrative pronoun attached to it. Rather, Jesus saw himself as in a particular way the representative of mankind; he wanted to be, not the messiah ben Dawīd, but the messiah ben ‘ādām.

(e) P. Vielhauer’s essay “Gottesreich und Menschensohn in der Verkündigung Jesu”, 1957, also in Gesammelte Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament, 1965, 55–91; cf. 92–140) resumes the analysis of the “Son of man” sayings. He starts with the apocalyptic texts of Dan., Eth. Enoch and the Apc. of Ezra. “When the Son of man is an individual figure and plays an active rôle there is no mention of the kingdom of God. The Son of man is not an integral part of the expectation of the eschatological kingdom of God” (op. cit. 86). “Originally the kingdom of God and the Son of man had nothing to do with one another and were not connected in late Jewish eschatology. To combine them was not something . . . which would suggest itself to Jesus from his religio-historical background” (op. cit., 87). Since the message about the kingdom of God is the central point in the tradition about Jesus, and since Jesus himself is inseparably connected with the kingdom of God, it is impossible that Jesus expected a coming Son of man or identified himself with him (op. cit., 88). The apocalyptic idea of the Son of man was introduced by the Christian community, who thereby transformed the message of the kingdom into an expectation of the apocalyptic Son of man.

(f) E. Käsemann (“The Problem of the Historical Jesus”, in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964, 43 f.) lends his weight to Vielhauer’s radical position. He starts by describing the historical problem as a whole, but then he also analyses the evidence of the Synoptic material. On form-critical grounds, he regards Mk. 8:38 as a formation of the community, since it preserves the peculiar character of the utterances of Palestinian prophets who proclaimed a holy law for the community and prescribed earthly terms for the promise of heaven or the curse of God. We may conclude from this that Jesus did not look for a Son of man distinct from himself. How could such a person be fitted into his scheme of things, if the Baptist had already ushered in the change of the ages? The problem of the Son of man belongs to the christology and apocalyptic theology of Near Eastern Christianity and it is from there that it has spread into the already-formed tradition about Jesus. Unfortunately, Käsemann here seems to err in presupposing the identity of the Son of Man and the messiah.

(g) All these studies have distinguished between logia about the Son of man who is to come and about him who is present and about him who suffers; they all begin with the final stage of the Synoptic tradition. But now J. Jeremias attempts, by analysing the sources (ZNW 58, 1967, 159–172; New Testament Theology I, 1973, 257–276), to penetrate a step further back into the tradition. He notes that a large number of “Son of man” sayings have parallels in the tradition which lack this title. Hence, the idea of the Son of man is in many cases secondary and this points to a revising of an older tradition. There is no sign of the suppression of this idea; rather, given a foothold, it establishes itself. To the oldest parts of the tradition belong Matt. 8:20; 10:23; 24:27; 37; 25:31; Mk. 13:26; 14:62; Lk. 17:22, 30; 18:8; 21:36; Jn. 1:51.

(h) C. Colpe (TDNT VIII 400–477) carries on in his own way the analysis mapped out by Jeremias. The prophecies of Jesus in which he brings the eschatological future into the present, depict the dawning end-time in three traditionally distinct and conceptually unintegrated schemes. We thus find sayings about his own perfecting, then proclamation of the kingdom of God, and finally the announcing of the Son of man. These three views of the last time cannot be identified with one another, but they do not mutually exclude one another. We have here parallel symbols. The kingdom of God and Son of man ideas have a common origin, as Dan. 7 shows.

(i) Summary and evaluation of the current position. (i) The Fathers, from Ignatius to Augustine, saw in the phrase the Son of man (ho hyios tou anthrōpou) a reference to the human aspect of Jesus’ origins. In this the Greeks thought of someone whose will it is to be the son of a man (G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, I, 1902, 238 ff.). But if one goes back to the Heb. or Aram. equivalents of the Synoptic phrase, one can see the prominence and the distinctiveness of “this man” as opposed to all others (Colpe, TDNT VIII 433: “but a man such as I”), but perhaps also his eschatological position: “the eschatological Man” (Leivestad, loc. cit., 102: “the representative of humanity”). It is advisable neither to discard completely any connexion with apocalyptic (Colpe, TDNT VIII 439–441: eschatological patterns) nor to concentrate exclusively on Dan. 7 or the Enoch tradition as its religio-historical provenance. Jesus seems to have left behind his own historical contribution. It refers neither to human descent nor to human nature, but to a unique historical course leading from humiliation to exaltation. Undoubtedly the idea contains both the present lowliness of his being man and his striving after his vindication and authorization by God.

(ii) At any rate one should never separate the series of “kingdom of God” sayings (including their messianic potential) from that of the “Son of man” sayings (Colpe, TDNT VIII 440). Neither set of sayings excludes the other; they stand together and no attempt is made to harmonize them. Nor should we confuse the messianic motif with the idea of the Son of man. Messianic elements concern Israel, as the OT shows, but the idea of the Son of man concerns the fulfilment of mankind's goal. It is no coincidence that the concept of the Son of man is not only associated with a particular, historical vocation, but also at times involves a separation from other men and indeed an apologia and a polemic. It is possible that the messianic context is the earlier one and the Son of man sayings are later. The statements about the Son of man presuppose an insuperable resistance on Israel's part. The christological scheme of Mk.'s Gospel has a definite purpose: in Mk. 1:11 and 9:7 the voice from heaven (Son, Elect One) heralds the christological struggle around the messiah and the Son of man: the Son bears messianic features and takes his stand in the struggle and sufferings as the Son of man. Only as the Son can Jesus live out the content of the Son of man sayings.

(iii) It is not a sound historical method to deny Jesus the use of the expression "the Son of man" and to relegate this problem to later stages of the Christian community (so Dalman, op. cit., 239). In the Synoptic tradition the expression is used solely of Jesus by himself; it is neither a mode of address to him nor a confession of him. We must also say that it was neither a name nor a title, but the mark of a particular eschatological rôle. Hence, it is advisable not to start, as has long been the practice, with the explicitly apocalyptic prophecies of Jesus, but with those concerning the present (Schweizer, Leivestad). However, it becomes clear that the connexion between the present and the future sayings is still a slender one, yet it is there (Mk. 8:38; Lk. 12:8 par. Matt. 10:32; see below 4 (a)). It is important to note that Jesus' path through suffering to exaltation has its religio-historical parallels in the apocalyptic tradition: Abel's authority to judge (Test. Abr. 11; 13), the exaltation of Enoch, and the translation of Elijah and of the Servant of God in Isa. 53 all provide abundant fuel for the hope of being exalted by God on one's way through suffering (Lk. 22:69). The Melchizedek fragment points to the same connexion of ideas. It is important to see that Jesus thus follows the path of the Son of man up to the Ancient of Days (Dan. 7:13), and does not come down from heaven to earth.

(iv) The concept "the Son of man" occurs outside the Gospels only in Acts 7:56 (Stephen), the Gospel of the Hebrews (Henn.-Schn., I, 165: Christ's appearance to James), and the Jewish Christian tradition about James in Hegesippus; here the title "messiah" is not used. In Eusebius' account (Hist. Eccl. 2, 23, 8-18). James replies to the scribes' question: "What do you want to know about the Son of man? He sits in heaven at the right hand of the great Power and will come on the clouds of heaven." Jesus' great-nephews, James and Zoker, Judas' grandsons, are arrested as descendants of David and Christians, brought before the emperor Domitian and are asked where and when Christ and his kingdom will appear. They reply that his kingdom is not worldly or earthly, but heavenly and angelic, and that it will be established at the end of time when he, i.e. the Christ, comes in his glory to judge the living and the dead and to requite each one according to his deeds (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3, 20, 4).

This shows contacts with the Melchizedek fragment and other early Christian traditions which describe a partnership with angels or a close connexion between Christ, the Son of man and an angelic figure. It is of course possible that in Ebionite circles the exalted Christ was worshipped as an angelic being (Epiph. Haer. 30, 16, 4, hōs hena tōn archangelōn, “like one of the archangels”), but this feature does not at all demand a gnostic explanation.

Jewish polemics also recall Jésus’ “Son of man” sayings. R. Abbahu (c. A.D. 286) warns: “If any one should say to you, ‘I am God’, then he is lying; or ‘I am the Son of man’, then he will eventually regret it; or ‘I am going to heaven’, then he may say it, but he will not manage it” (T. J. Ta’an. 2:65b:59). “Son of man” here represents the Heb. ben ’ādām, which recalls Num. 23:19. R. Abbahu is certainly contending against the tradition about Jesus when he likens it to the wanton pride of the king of Babylon (Isa. 14:13 f.). However, his statements may be aimed at an old tradition about Jesus which describes the ben ’ādām in similar terms to those used in John’s Gospel (Jn. 3:13; 10:34–38).

(j) [I.H.M.] The flow of discussion on the Son of man in the Gospels since 1971 has shown little sign of abating. (1) The view of Vielhauer and Käsemann, that none of the Son of man sayings can be traced back to Jesus, has been supported by N. Perrin who finds the beginning of the process in Mk. 13:26 as an expression of the early church’s hope of the return of Jesus; thereafter the title was applied to other aspects of Jesus’ work. (2) Cullmann’s view, that at least some of the sayings referring to Jesus’ present ministry, his suffering and the apocalyptic hope of his future activity are authentic, is upheld by the author of the present article (O. Michel) and has been defended by M. D. Hooker, F. H. Borsch and L. Goppelt (Theologie des Neuen Testaments, I, 1975, 226–253). (3) The view of Bultmann, that the sayings about the coming Son of man could have come from Jesus, has been taken up by numerous writers who claim, on the basis of Lk. 12:8 f., that Jesus was referring to a figure other than himself. H. E. Tödt argues that Jesus implicitly asserted his own authority by his insistence that the decisions of men for or against him would be ratified by the heavenly Son of man. Essentially the same position is taken by F. Hahn, A. J. B. Higgins and R. H. Fuller. Working from different premises, J. Jeremias and C. Colpe have come to roughly similar conclusions (see above), although the former (clearly) and the latter (somewhat obscurely) allow that Jesus identified himself in his future rôle with the Son of man. (4) G. Vermes (Jesus the Jew, 1973, 177–186) holds that Jesus used the Aramaic phrase as a circumlocution for “I”, and accepts the authenticity of sayings which show no trace of the influence of Dan. 7, i.e. sayings about the present ministry and suffering of Jesus. He thus reaches a position not too dissimilar from that of E. Schweizer.

The continuing fluidity of opinion is apparent from these and other contributions to the debate. Nevertheless, the view espoused in this article has continued to attract strong support from various quarters and offers the least difficulties. See further C. F. D. Moule, “Neglected Features in the Problem of ‘The Son of Man’”, in J. Gnilka, ed., Neues Testament und Kirche, 1974, 413–428.

2. Present Statements in the Synoptic Gospels. (a) In Mk. 2:10 Jesus makes the claim that as “the Son of man” he has power to forgive sins on earth (→ Forgiveness). He emphasizes that it is of himself that he speaks, and not of men in general. He can act with a unique authority in this eschatological hour. The phrase “the Son of man” not only points to him, but it serves to bring the conflict with the hostile scribes to a head. According to Matt. 9:8, Jesus grants a share in this power to “men”, i.e. to his community. Hence this material also has a place in the discussions between the Christian community and Judaism; it raises the issue whether Jesus approaches too close to the divine prerogatives.

(b) In Matt. 11:18 f. Jesus contrasts the coming of the Baptist with the coming of the "Son of man"; these two eschatological witnesses appear in very different ways. The Q tradition dwells more on the appearance of the "Son of man" (Aram. bar nāšā') while the context speaks of the man who eats bread and drinks wine (Matt. 11:19; Lk. 7:33). Here too bar nāšā' is not just any man who eats and drinks (R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, 1968², 155), but that eschatological Man who is sent from God; hence there can be no substitute for the phrase "the Son of man" as a polemic designation of him. bar nāšā' here was neither title nor periphrasis but a reference to the hidden eschatological activity of God which evolves in conflict with the present generation.

(c) The position is rather complicated in Matt. 8:20, a saying that also belongs to the Q tradition. Some want to interpret it in terms of Jewish wisdom (man's destiny over against the beasts), but it is more likely that the homeless "Son of man" means Jesus himself as he steels his disciples for → discipleship and homelessness. This also reflects a polemical context. It is a question here, not of man's existence, but of the eschatological fate that characterizes the existence of the "Son of man".

Apparently the original "Son of man" sayings belong above all to Jesus' later activity in the period when the hopelessness of his course had become all too clear. On the authenticity of these texts see I. H. Marshall, NTS 12, 1965–66, 339–343.

(d) We find ourselves on an unusual path if we trace Mk. 2:27 f. back to a Heb. ben 'ādām tradition. For then this text is understood as a reference to the creation story: "The sabbath was made for Adam and not Adam for the sabbath, hence the Son of Adam [ben 'ādām] is Lord even over the sabbath." If so, we would have before us a rabbinic argument apparently directed against the Essenes (cf. Jub. 2:18: the → sabbath was first established in heaven). Such an interpretation would presuppose that the evangelist no longer understood this apparently oral tradition (cf. R. Leivestad, op. cit., 76 f.). Usually this saying is set in the context of later discussions about the sabbath in the early community. ([Tr.] C. E. B. Cranfield, The Gospel according to St. Mark, 1963², 118, and W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 120, regard the saying as a comment by Mk. addressed to the reader. More probably Jesus here expresses his own authority as the leader of God's people to whom the sabbath has been given (cf. Mek. Exod. 31:14[1096])).

(e) Matt. 16:13 gives a striking rendering of the simpler question of Jesus recorded by Mk.: "Who do men say that the Son of man is?" This passage has often been discussed in the course of scholarship; the explanation partly depends on a reference to the general theology of the evangelist (on this whole passage → Open, art. NT 3; → Rock, art. petra NT 3). This presupposes that Matt. could not be careless. It is possible that the phrase "the Son of Man" is here a pure self-designation and has lost its eschatological reference. At any rate, it comes remarkably close to being a periphrasis for "I" (cf. R. Leivestad, op. cit., 67–70).

3. Announcements of the "Son of man's" Path of Suffering. It is striking how firmly rooted the idea of "the Son of man" is in the general predictions of suffering (Mk. 8:31; 9:31; 10:33) and in the apocalyptic sayings of Mk. 9:12 and Lk. 17:25. The firm roots of the concept of "the Son of man" here must owe something to exegetical motifs in Isa. (the "ransom for Israel", Isa. 43:3 ff.; the "life given as a sacrifice for sin", Isa. 53:10). It must be presupposed that "the Son of man" must contend with the opposition of his people. It cannot be a coincidence that this tradition is attached to the designation bar nāšā' (on the development of the "I" – sayings cf. Colpe, TDNT VIII 444, n. 309).

We have to distinguish shorter two-fold forms and longer four-fold ones. The problems as to whether these passages betray the community's reflection as it recollected the passion story and sought to impart that reflection and whether it read the apocalyptic-sounding title "Son of man" into an original "I"-saying can only be determined by a literary analysis of each individual instance. However, Jesus' suffering also presents especial problems: did it come as a surprise when Jesus found himself caught up without warning in conflict and suffering in Jerusalem? Or did he deliberately enter upon a course of suffering laid upon him by his Father himself? If the second is the case, then the conflict that awaited him and the suffering enjoined upon him must be exegetically substantiated and must find their place in their own eschatological pattern. If one chooses this second path, then one is involved in questions about the pre-literary tradition and the rabbinic or apocalyptic tradition.

([I.H.M.] This second path is fully justified exegetically. For the case that Jesus anticipated his own death see J. Jeremias, TDNT V 713 f.; New Testament Theology I, 1973, 278–280; H. Schürmann, "Wie hat Jesus seinen Tod bestanden und verstanden?", in P. Hoffman, ed., Orientierung an Jesus, 1973, 325–363. It would then not be surprising if Jesus had spoken of this to his disciples. Against the wholesale dismissal of the passion predictions by R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 29–31, see the defence of at least the kernel of the predictions as coming from Jesus in M. D. Hooker, The Son of Man in Mark, 1967, 103–116; and H. Patsch, Abendmahl und historischer Jesus, 1972, 185–197.)

(a) Mk. 9:31 betrays an Aram. or Heb. play on words ("Son of man . . . men") which can certainly be traced back to Jesus himself. The old tradition is that God himself consigned him (bar nāšā') into the hands of men (cf. the version of the same logion in Lk. 9:44). It is true that the short text which only mentions his being given up to men (without his being killed) is a very remarkable one, but it is more probable that we have to do with a twofold utterance: God gave him up – men put him to death.

(b) Mk. 8:31; 9:12 and Lk. 17:25 record another "Son of man" saying which, on the one hand, speaks of the divine decree (dei, must, Mk. 8:31; Lk. 17:25; Mk. 9:11) and, on the other, emphasizes the combination of "undergo many punishments and be rejected" (here alluding to the "builders" of Ps. 118:22). Lk.'s shorter version is remarkable (17:25, "suffer much and be rejected by this generation"). A parallel to this "be rejected" is the "set at naught", which goes back to an older tradition (Mk. 9:12). This logion in all its different forms has been expanded by a later tradition which enumerates Jesus' opponents.

The OT conceived of the life of the "righteous" (→ Righteousness OT 2) or of the "Servant of God" (Isr. 53:8, 10; Wis. 2:17, 20; Acts 3:13, 26) as terminating not in sufferings but in an eschatological answer from God. The righteous will be raised up (anastēnai, Deut. 18:15) or exalted (hypsōthēnai, Isa. 52:13). In order to understand Jesus we must, as far as possible, look for the Heb. or Aram. equivalents. The texts in their present form have passed through further stages of interpretation.

(c) Lk. 22:21–23 and 48 stand out amongst the prophetic announcements of suffering. Behind both passages we must assume an old Aram. or Heb. version which emphasized the betrayal by the table-companion or the "friend". The periphrasis "the Son of man" gives these words a solemn and emphatic ring; yet it is possible that an original "I" has been replaced here (but cf. the play on words: "the Son of man" – men). These remarkable words point to the most abject humiliation possible in the area of human trust and friendship.

(d) In interpreting the isolated saying of Mk. 10:45, we must bear in mind its close relationship to Lk. 22:27; Bultmann (The History of the Synoptic Tradition, 144) considers Mk. 10:45 secondary ("... from the redemption theories of Hellenistic Christianity"). The service of Jesus (→ Serve, art. diakoneō NT 2) is at any rate emphasized and it should be normative for discipleship. Mk.'s addition of the idea of the surrender of a righteous life to redeem a life that is gripped by guilt may well come from an early Palestinian tradition and refer back to the "Son of man's" way of suffering, while the combination of the two elements of service and the surrender of one's life would come from the tradition concerning discipleship (cf. Colpe, TDNT VIII 455). God is the pattern, for he himself serves his people instead of making them serve him (Isa. 43:22–24); we must not discount the reference here to the Servant of God who surrendered up his life in death (Isa. 53:12).

(e) It is generally assumed that the idea of the "Son of man" is a secondary addition to Jesus' announcements of his sufferings; in that case the idea of the messianic significance of suffering would be a later interpolation into the earlier material about Jesus (so too Colpe, TDNT VIII 444). Yet it is an open question whether the word-play "Son of man – men" does not go back to an original Aram. tradition (Colpe, TDNT VIII 444, n. 309). If Jesus' announcements of his suffering can have had a specifically eschatological character then we cannot rule out the possibility that in them Jesus also alluded to the "Son of man".

4. The Resumption of the Apocalyptic "Son of Man" Tradition. (a) In some ways it could be said that the distinction between the self-authenticating "I" and the corresponding apocalyptic "Son of man" in Lk. 12:8 f., Matt. 10:32 f. (Q) and Mk. 8:38 spans the present and future statements. This presupposes the creation of a community which is subject to the prophetic law of discipleship. The earthly event is determinative for the eschatological future of those who confess and those who deny. The "Son of man" is a future entity which is taken for granted as an object of confession. If one grants the authenticity of this logion, then the disciples are faced with eschatological afflictions which call for uncompromising resolution. Jesus himself takes part in this affliction and faces each individual disciple with a decision. It could be argued that this saying was not authentic because it reflected the community's post-Easter position. E. Käsemann sees here a "sentence of holy law" which could have been formulated by early Christian prophets in connexion with the establishment of the eschatological ius talionis (New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 66–81).

The structure as well as the style of the Q-logion (its antithetical parallelism) points to an Aram. or Heb. original. Jeremias's and Colpe's analyses show that Matt. 10:32 f. omits the reference to the confessing by the "Son of man"; this is surprising because Matt. does not usually omit the "Son of man" title but tends rather to add it. So an old tradition is suggested here which reads: "Every one who confesses me before men will himself be confessed But whoever denies me before men will himself likewise be denied." We can no longer ascertain the term originally used for the divine assize (Colpe, TDNT VIII 442, n. 299). The fact that, apart from Matt.'s text, the tradition makes so sharp a distinction between Jesus and the "Son of man" without offering an explanation rather tells against Jeremias's and Colpe's attempts at a solution here. The text certainly means that, when the eschatological crisis takes place, Jesus himself will be transformed into the Son of man. In the Q-version, Jesus appears as the eschatological guarantor and witness (not so in Mk.'s version). It may be that the future "Son of man" is the eschatological guarantor and witness and not the judge. Bultmann's attempt to distinguish between Jesus and the future "Son of man" as another eschatological figure is doomed to failure (op. cit., 112). A decisive question posed by the attempts to interpret Matt. 10:32 f. and Lk. 12:8 f. is whether literary-critical analysis (so Jeremias, Colpe) is appropriate in all cases. R. Leivestad considers Lk. 12:8 f. nearest to the original (op. cit., 83).

(b) A logion of Jesus contained in the material peculiar to Matt. is also disputed: "If they throw you out of one city then flee to another; for in truth, I tell you, you will not be done with the cities of Israel before the Son of man comes" (Matt. 10:23).

This logion, which goes closely with Matt. 10:5 f., concerns a persecution of Jesus' followers within Palestine. Here is a situation, no longer of hospitable welcome and joy in the message, but of slander and persecution. Nevertheless, the mission must be confined to the cities of Israel and no mission to Hellenistic settlements is anticipated. J. Jeremias (Jesus' Promise to the Nations, SBT 24, 1958, 20) stresses the early features of this remarkable saying: an old amen-saying, its contrast to Matt.'s own universalism, its unfulfilled promise. The saying anticipates that the proclamation in Israel will not have been completed before the parousia (→ Present). On the other hand, P. Vielhauer attributes the saying to early Christian prophets who spoke in the name of the exalted Jesus; it offers consolation in a time of eschatological persecution (op. cit., 64 f.).

(c) The logion Lk. 18:8 (pre-Lucan material) forms the conclusion to a parable and asks the question: "But will the Son of man find faithfulness on earth when he comes?" This speaks of the coming of the "Son of man" and asks whether the covenant that he has made with his own will be preserved in faithfulness, harmony and humility (cf. 1QS 5:3). We may perhaps recall that, according to one tradition, Abraham sees the sins on earth and has power to execute judgment; however he cannot exercise it, lest he destroy the creation (cf. Test. Abr. 12). So it seems that, according to one Jewish view, each generation had one "righteous one" to whose lot it fell to decide about their fate.

This may also be compared with Gen. R. 44:5 on Gen. 15:1: "Then God spoke to him: I raised up no righteous protectors from Noah, but I will raise up such ones from you. And not only that; even if your children fall into sin and evil deeds, yet will I single out a righteous one from them, to give a verdict on them, for he will say to strictest righteousness: 'Enough!' I am taking him out of the world and he will make atonement for them [by his death]!" Hence, there was a tradition that there was a particular righteous man assigned to pass judicial verdicts. He limits the rigours of righteousness. God takes him from the world and so by his death he makes atonement for men.

We should note perhaps how close this is to the parable of Lk. 12:36: if the master comes and knocks, he wants to find his servants keeping watch. It is a fact that in Lk.'s futuristic sayings the "Son of man" has certain distinct features. R. Leivestad

(loc. cit., 89) states that “the problem in Lk. 18:8b is, however, not the use of the name of the ‘Son of Man’ but the peculiar pessimism, which seems hard to reconcile with either Jesus’ message or Lk.’s own view point. It is perhaps the most puzzling saying in the whole tradition” (op. cit., 89).

(d) The paraenetic warning of Lk. 21:36 reveals an old Sem. tradition behind it: “But be watchful at all times and pray that you may have strength to escape and come into the presence of the Son of man.” In this exhortation, the “Son of man” is an eschatological figure possessing full authority to judge. To be sure, the material of Lk. 18:8 and 21:36 could derive from Jesus, but the texts stand in a tradition of the community that is also like that of Enoch in form.

In Lk. 21:36 katsichysēte, “that you may obtain the power”, is nearer to Sem. ways of thinking than the well-attested but secondary reading kataxiōthēte, “that you may be found worthy”. katsichyein, to have power, has a long tradition in the process of translation from the Heb. (unlike kataxioun, to hold worthy or of value; cf. Hatch-Redpath, II–III, 740, 751).

(e) Jesus’ saying during his trial (“From now on the Son of man will be seated on the right hand of power”, Lk. 22:69) belongs to this older “Son of man” tradition preserved by Lk. which has no recourse to Dan. Here once again the old bar nāšā’ usage of Jesus could have a pregnant sense: “this man” who is placed in an apocalyptic context is, like the righteous of the old covenant (Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Melchizedek), exalted to be with God. He is the righteous One of the end-time and ends the series of witnesses (cf. Gen. R. 44; Test. Abr.). It is significant that the allusion to Dan. (Mk. 14:62, quoting Dan. 7:13) is lacking. Here Lk. preserves the more original text.

The movement in Mk. (the seating and coming of the “Son of man”) should be noted. Lk. 22:69, on the other hand, emphasizes that he is seated as a result of his coming and being brought to the Ancient of Days. Colpe rightly concludes that “the genuineness of Lk. 22:69 can only be doubted by calling in question the historicity of the whole trial-scene” (op. cit., 436).

(f) The argument concerning the historical setting of the material peculiar to Lk. has not yet been settled (Jeremias, Vielhauer). Two things are, however, clear in the light of the Synoptic material: (a) we must not interpret the idea of the “Son of man” in too narrow a christological sense; rather it serves to establish the eschatological righteousness (cf. the Jewish parallels in Gen. R. 44 and Test. Abr.). (2) Early Christian teachers and prophets have worked out various patterns in which the “Son of man” plays a rôle. Hence, Dan. 7 is by no means the only decisive factor; the material peculiar to Lk. has another context too.

(g) [I.H.M.] There remain a considerable number of occurrences of the phrase “Son of man” in the Synoptic Gospels. In a few cases the usage is probably due to the work of the evangelists. Matt. 13:37–43 is generally thought to be Matthew’s own interpretation of the parable of the tares (cf. I. H. Marshall, Eschatology and the Parables, 1973², 10). In Matt. 16:28 the evangelist has evidently given us a rephrasing of the difficult saying Mk. 9:1 in order to clarify it for his readers. Matt. 26:2 looks like a literary reminiscence of the earlier predictions of the passion. In Lk. 6:22, where Jesus speaks of the possibility of persecution “for the sake of the Son of man”, the Matthean parallel has “for my sake” (Matt. 5:11); it is not clear which evangelist has made the alteration, but there are some grounds for thinking that Luke has retained the original form of a statement in which Jesus referred to himself as a figure of rejection and called his disciples to be ready to face the same fate (cf. Lk. 9:58; I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke, 1978, ad loc.).

The saying about blasphemy and the Son of man (Matt. 12:31 f.; Lk. 12:10) is particularly difficult to understand (→ Satan, art. diabolos NT 9). Matthew's form runs together the saying as it is found in Lk. and another saying, found in Mk. 3:28 f., which speaks of blasphemy committed by the sons of men. The Marcan and Lucan sayings could represent different understandings of a common Aramaic original. In its Marcan form, the saying is to the effect that men ("sons of men" in the collective sense of "mankind") can be forgiven every sin except blasphemy against the Spirit whose power is displayed in the gracious acts of Jesus. In the Lucan form, the saying states that blasphemy against the Son of man (i.e. Jesus) is excusable, but not deliberate blasphemy against the manifest activity of the Spirit. The Son of man is here the lowly, rejected figure of Lk. 7:34; 9:58. In its present situation in Lk. the saying stands in tension with Lk. 12:8 f., where the Son of man is a glorious figure who could hardly be blasphemed with impunity; probably the sayings were spoken on different occasions. Attempts to account for the saying as a church creation contrasting sin before and after the resurrection of Jesus or before and after conversion are not convincing (cf. I. H. Marshall, op. cit., ad loc.).

Lk. 19:10 adds to the picture of the present authority of the Son of man by assigning to him the task of a → shepherd who seeks out and rescues the lost sheep (J. Jeremias, TDNT VI 492). The saying appealed to scribes, variants of it being found in the textual tradition of Matt. 18:11 and Lk. 9:56.

Other sayings refer to the activity of the Son of man in the future (i.e. from the temporal standpoint of Jesus). The saying comparing the Son of man with → Jonah (Matt. 12:39 f.; Lk. 11:29 f.) should probably be taken as a comparison between Jonah's miraculous deliverance from death and God's vindication of Jesus by raising him from the dead (as Matt. makes explicit); a reference to the parousia, favoured by many scholars, is much less probable, since such a sign comes too late to confirm belief in the message of Jesus. The whole saying is sufficiently enigmatic to be authentic, although many scholars deny the authenticity of most or all of the saying in Lk. 11:29b–30 (see C. Colpe, TDNT VIII, 449 f.; R. A. Edwards, The Sign of Jonah in the Theology of the Evangelists and Q, SBT Second Series 18, 1971; R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament, 1971, 43–45, 80–82).

In Matt. 24:37–44 and Lk. 17:22–37 we have a series of references to the days, day or coming of the Son of man. Here the future coming of the Son of man is compared to the flood and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah which came unawares upon men who failed to prepare themselves for what lay ahead. Yet the disciples of Jesus should not be unprepared. They will be longing for the consummation (Lk. 17:22), and it should be clearly recognizable when it comes. Nevertheless, there is the danger of being misled by false prophets or of growing weary in waiting, and therefore the disciples must be vigilant and not be diverted by worldly concerns from being ready for the Son of man. These sayings fall into a group whose authenticity is not usually denied (pace P. Vielhauer, op. cit., 75, 108–110), although some scholars consider that Jesus was thinking of a figure other than himself.

The expectation of the coming of the Son of man, presupposed in these sayings, finds expression in the apocalyptic tradition, particularly in Dan. 7:13. Clear references to this text are to be found in Mk. 13:26 and 14:62. In the latter text we have a combination of Ps. 110:1 and Dan. 7:13 used to depict the vindication of the Son of man by God and his coming to judgment. There may also be some influence from Zech. 12:10 (cf. Rev. 1:7; N. Perrin, op. cit., 10–22). Opinion is divided as to whether Luke's form of the saying at the trial, with its omission of any reference to the "coming" of the Son of man, represents a more primitive form (see above 4 (e)) or is due to Lucan editing of Mk. 14:62 to stress more the present exaltation of Jesus. In any case Luke retains the citation from Dan 7:13 in Lk. 21:27 and the reference to the Son of man in Lk. 22:69 can be derived only from Dan. 7:13. One possibility is that the original form of the saying at the trial was very much the same as in Lk. 22:69, and that the reference to the "coming" of the Son of man in Mk. 14:62 is a reminiscence of Mk. 13:26. In any case, Dan. 7:13 underlies Jesus' use of the title. In Mk. 14:62 the point of the saying is to show how Jesus re-interprets messiahship in terms of the Son of man of Dan. 7:13 (cf. Mk. 8:29–31). In Mk. 13:26 the coming of the Son of man is associated with the gathering of God's people and their deliverance from earthly tribulation.

The reference to the Son of man sitting on his glorious throne in Matt. 19:38 is missing from the similar saying in Lk. 22:30, and may be an addition by Matt. (cf. the wording in Matt. 25:31) to explain the meaning of the difficult term palingenesia. It is clear from the Lucan form of the saying that Jesus looked forward to heavenly rule accompanied by his disciples. Many scholars, however, regard Matthew's wording as more primitive.

5. The Johannine Tradition (Fourth Gospel). (a) The later period is characterized by the fact that the new patterns created by teachers and prophets have as their point of departure the obvious assumptions that Jesus is the "Son of man" referred to in the old tradition (Rev. 1:13: the one like a "son of man"; cf. Dan. 7:13; 10:5 f.) and that it is justifiable to give Jesus' statements about himself a new interpretation on the basis of this conviction (as in the Gospel of Jn.). This development should not only be regarded as the expression of an ideology but is also the result of the church's serious internal and external struggles. Hence, it remains an open question, whether Jewish-Christian circles have preserved the tradition better than, say, Gentile-Christian ones or those where Jewish-Christian material was given a Gentile-Christian interpretation. This question is posed above all by the Fourth Gospel, which presents the old Jewish-Christian material in a kerygma comprehensible in the Hellenistic world. Its point of departure is the One who is "sent" and comes from heaven, and who represents God both as the "Son" and as the "Son of man".

As far as tradition is concerned, Jn. 13:16, 20 uses Jewish and Synoptic material (Matt. 10:24, 40). It speaks of the execution of a commission that comes from God. Even the predicate granted to Jesus, "Son of God", is guarded from blasphemous claims by the reference to the OT tradition about such commissions (Ps. 82:1 ff.: "Execute justice for the lowly and the orphans, help vindicate the afflicted and poor"; v. 6: "Indeed I spoke: 'Gods you are and sons of the Most High, all of you, but you must die like ordinary men'"; cf. also 11QMelchizedek and Jn. 10:33–36).

(b) The concept of the "Son of man" contains apocalyptic elements, but it itself is given a kerygmatic revaluation. God's commission determines his "descent" and "ascent" (Jn. 3:13, 31; 6:62). This sending determines his "way" and forms the destiny of him who, at the commission of the One who sent him, goes along this way and takes other men with him along it. The apocalyptists speak of a journey to heaven and the gnostics of an ascent into the heavenly world; for John, however, the decisive question is who gives the true testimony, who is really authorized to bring his message, who has the right to be exalted to be with God (→ Height, art. hypsōō NT). Certain questions that are posed recall the world of apocalyptic and gnosticism (→ Knowledge, art. ginōskō CL), yet the Johannine kērygma steers its own course. The “ascent” corresponds to being exalted, the “descent” to the incarnation (cf. Jn. 3:13 with 3:14 and 1:14). These patterns have different origins. The statement of Jn. 3:14 is older: in Isa. 52:13 the Servant of God is brought out of a condition of humiliation into one of exaltation. That Jesus is incarnate, that he has come into the flesh (1 Jn. 4:1–3, 2 Jn. 7), these are anti-gnostic confession statements, which emphasize the unique nature of Jesus’ sending.

The Johannine concept of the “Son of man” is thus seen to be a theological testimony of Jesus to himself. This is the language and the way of thinking of myth as we find it in apocalyptic and gnosticism, but now the language embraces the cosmic significance of the confession, i.e. the cosmological and soteriological aspects of the confession are what matter now (cf. R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 25).

The promise of Jn. 1:51 has an early Jewish-Christian sound; it recalls the story of Jacob (Gen. 28:10–17). Rabbinic tradition took the words “the angels of God ascend and descend upon it” to refer either to the ladder or to Jacob himself. Now the “Son of man” replaces the ladder of Jacob. Gen. R. 68:12 mentions the connexion between earthly Jacob-Israel and his heavenly archetype. We can therefore surmise that here John sees the “Son of man” as replacing Jacob: either Jacob becomes an eschatological symbol for the “Son of man” or the “Son of man” is identified with the true Israel. Apparently, in the history of salvation, the “Son of man” embraces the earthly Israel and now represents it (cf. on this question Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 105 f.). Gnostic motifs like that of communication with a heavenly archetype are far from the intention of this pre-Johannine material.

(c) Jn. 5:27 tells us that the Father gave the Son authority to execute judgment because he is “man” or “Son of man” (bar nāšāʾ) (hyios anthrōpou, here without the article). It is an open question whether this passage refers to the unique human existence of Jesus or to the rank referred to in Dan. 7:10, 14.

Probably Test. Abr. (Recension A, ch. 13) is connected with this material. Here it is explicitly denied that God himself judges, on the grounds that man should be judged by man. This is to be understood in the light of the idea that certain righteous men are chosen to judge men (here Abel).

We must reject both the suggestion that this passage originally spoke of the “Son” and the reverse, that Test. Abr. has been influenced by Jn. 5 (so Bultmann, op. cit., 261 n. 5.). The tradition concerning the “Son” which is part of the message of salvation is manifestly hard to reconcile with Jn. 5:27. No gnostic motifs appear here. Certainly the longer Recension A of Test. Abr. is of Jewish-Christian origin, yet it contains older material than Jn.

(d) The heavenly messenger of Jn. does not come from gnosticism, although gnosticism knows of a messenger-figure, but from the confession of Jesus as the eschatological counterpart of Moses (Num. 16:28, Jn. 17:3; cf. Bultmann, op. cit., 50, n. 2, 494 f.). The Gospel is interested primarily in his commission and the idea of his authority and not in the idea of revelation (pace Bultmann, op. cit., 494 f.). As the One who comes from heaven, he surpasses Moses (Jn. 1:17; 5:45). It was → Moses who ascended and descended when he came from Sinai (Exod. 24:12: “Come up”; Exod. 34:29: “When Moses came down from the mountain. . .”). Jesus ascended and descended in another way, and so bore another glory than that of Moses. The antithesis of Moses and Jesus contains a polemic against the rab. concept of salvation.

This is particularly clear in the passage on the bread from heaven in Jn. 6. This contains three “Son of man” sayings, which reveal the structural division of the passage (vv. 27, 53, 62); on the other hand, the authority of the “Son of man” is made explicit in v. 27b. The dualistic predicates, “heavenly-earthly” or “imperishable-destined to perish”, mould the figure of the messenger and his gifts. Bultmann (op. cit., 182) holds that the Johannine dualism derives from gnosticism: only that which divine revelation bestows possesses the character of reality, genuineness and truth. At this point there is a radical change in the eschatological way of thinking: the temporal contrast of Moses and Christ takes on a new aspect, and the idea of the “Son of man” is also introduced here: he imparts the abiding food which brings eternal life. Probably Jn. regards that food as abiding and leading to life which is in accordance with Jesus’ commission. That which corresponds to his message is true. Here too we are dealing outwardly with a Hellenistic tradition that reflects Jewish ideas. That remains true whose nature and content is trustworthiness and faithfulness.

(e) With the words → “I am”, the heavenly messenger announces himself according to the manner of the OT God (cf. Isa. 43:25: “I, I am he, who blots out your transgressions for my own sake and who will not hold your sins in remembrance any longer”). As God’s representative, the Son of man assumes the attributes of ’elōhîm (→ God OT). His path is a unique part of the course of salvation history: gradually we will recognize the truth (Jn. 3:14; 8:28; 12:23; 13:31). This process, which is rooted in history yet moulds history anew, depends on the idea of the “Son of man”. As far as unbelief is concerned, a continuing claim to messianic status and the raising up of the Son of man seem to be mutually exclusive (12:34). The original Aram. of hypsōthēnai, to be lifted up, ’istallaq, includes the idea of progress in the being lifted up (C. C. Torrey, JBL 51, 1932, 320 ff.; Bultmann, op. cit., 354 f.). Jn., however, knows that that which “abides” and the process of salvation history are not mutually exclusive, but rather presuppose each other.

(f) [I.H.M.] The Son of man sayings in Jn. pose various problems when they are considered in relation to the synoptic tradition. At several points the title is used in the same way as in the other Gospels with reference to the death and exaltation of Jesus (Jn. 3:14; 8:28; 12:23, 34; 13:31 f.) and to his activity as judge (Jn. 5:27; cf. 9:35–39). But the vocabulary with which these statements are expressed differs somewhat from that used in the other Gospels. Jesus is to be “lifted up” on the cross, a word which refers both to his being physically lifted up to die and to his being “exalted” by God in his death itself and not simply by means of the resurrection: Jesus glorifies God and is glorified by him precisely in his death on the cross. As the Son of man who died on the cross, Jesus is the source of eternal life (Jn. 6:27, 53).

In other places, however, there is an emphasis on the fact that the Son of man came down from heaven (Jn. 3:13; 6:62); this thought of pre-existence is absent from the synoptic sayings, and raises the question whether Johannine thought has been influenced from other directions. Several writers accordingly have related the Johannine Son of Man to the Primal or First Man found in oriental and gnostic speculation (R. Bultmann; C. H. Dodd). Jesus is thus to be seen as the heavenly Man who is in continual communion with God during his earthly life and thus is the mediator between God and man (cf. Jn. 1:51). It is difficult to come to a clear verdict on this type of theory. Certainly R. Schnackenburg has shown convincingly that the Son of man in Jn. has nothing to do with the figure of the Son of man in gnosticism (The Gospel of John, I, 1968, 529–542), but this does not exclude the possibility of a pre-gnostic type of outlook influencing Jn. It is more important to note, however, that the materials for the Johannine picture of the Son of man can largely be found in the OT and Christian tradition: (1) “Son of man” is a title of majesty in Dan. 7 and the Synoptic Gospels; (2) The descent of the Son of man is probably implicit in Dan. 7 and behind Dan. in Ezek.; (3) John’s description of the exaltation of the Son of man is presented in terms of the Servant of Yahweh (Is. 52:13) and in the light of the resurrection; (4) John characteristically emphasizes the present anticipatory fulfilment of eschatological expectations. These four elements largely account for the distinctive Johannine use of the title which combines motifs from the tradition of the sayings of Jesus and elements of Johannine interpretation which bring out the significance of Jesus’ teaching in the light of his resurrection and exaltation (S. S. Smalley, NTS, 15, 1968–69, 278–301; B. Lindars, in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament. In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973, 43–60).

6. The Concept of the “Son of Man” in the Rest of the NT. (a) In the Pauline tradition we find the concept of the “heavenly man” standing as the express antitype of the “earthly” (1 Cor. 15:47 f.) or, exegetically, that of the “last Adam” as opposed to the “first man” (1 Cor. 15:45). Perhaps here too, as was the case with the “Son of man”, an originally apocalyptic and temporal concept has been adapted to the form of a doctrine of salvation based on the figure of the Anthrōpos. We can detect traces of the older apocalyptic “Son of man” tradition in the use of Ps. 8:7(6) in 1 Cor. 15:27. Yet we should note how Paul avoids this apocalyptic idea amidst his Hellenistic surroundings. He is concerned rather to set the new mankind in their setting within the saving event rather than under sin and death (cf. also Rom. 5:12–21). His view of history here takes on metaphysical and ontic features.

(b) Hebrews 2:6 ff. uses Ps. 8:5–7(4–6) to prove that “man” and “son of man” must undergo a process in the history of salvation before they can reign over the world to come. The connexion of “man” and “son of man” is a necessary presupposition for the exegesis of this passage; it points to the various stages of Jesus’ life and thus emphasizes that his final goal has not yet been reached (v. 8). “Son of man” here, as in Jn. 1:51, embraces the community of believers. The contrast with the angelic powers may be directed against an Ebionite Jewish Christianity, in which a doctrine about angels played an important part (cf. 1 (i) (iv)).

Heb. provides the first evidence of the dissolution of the connexion between Jesus Christ and the angelic powers, which had been developed earlier in apocalyptic; the “Son of man” and mankind are, in salvation history, on a different level to the angels. Heb. 2:5 ff. is of great importance for a study of the development of this problem. But new light is also shed on Ps. 8:6–8(5–7). A statement in the OT which delimited the dignity of creaturely man by reference to God’s creative power is here made to refer to the glory that is paradoxically ascribed to the One who is humiliated (Colpe, TDNT VIII 464).

(c) Although the “Son of man” is firmly entrenched in Lk.’s Gospel in sayings about judgment and the parousia, yet the same is not true of the corresponding sayings in Acts (Leivestad, op. cit. 88). Hence, Stephen’s testimony in Acts 7:56, that the “Son of man” stands (not sits) at God’s right hand is all the more notable. It reveals a pre-Lucan tradition and clearly shows that in Hellenistic circles the idea of the “Son of man” was also interpreted in apocalyptic terms.

There are four possible ways of interpreting Acts 7:56: (1) Jesus stood to receive Stephen into heavenly glory ([Tr.] possibly an anticipation of the parousia for the individual Christian: C. K. Barrett, “Stephen and the Son of Man”, in W. Eltester, ed., Apophoreta, 1964, 32–38); (2) Jesus stood up as Stephen’s advocate or witness in the heavenly court in the spirit of Lk. 12:8 (cf. C. F. D. Moule, “From Defendant to Judge – and Deliverer”, Studiorum Novi Testamenti Societas Bulletin 3, 1952, 46 f. = The Phenomenon of the New Testament, 1967, 90 f.); (3) Jesus stood up to take possession of his messianic inheritance; (4) Jesus was originally thought of as standing (just like the angels) before God; or (5) Jesus stood up, as God stands up, to face his enemies (Isa. 14:22, Pss. 3:8[7]; 7:7[6]). In the last case, this would be a further clear sign of the old polemical tradition (on this whole passage cf. Colpe, TDNT VIII 461–463 ff.; he also refers to the → Samaritan predicate of God as “standing”; on the Samaritan liturgy cf. M. Heidenheim, Die samaritanische Liturgie, Bibliotheca Samaritana II, 1888, XXXVII: 7, and A. E. Cowley, The Samaritan Liturgy I, 1909, 54:15). As long as the Samaritan influence on the NT is not defined we cannot speak of a further possible way to interpret Acts 7:56 (on this question cf. E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 292).

(d) The linguistic usage of Revelation 1:13 and 14:14 reveals affinities to Dan. 7:13. Both passages speak of “one like a son of man” as walking (“amidst the lampstands”) or “sitting” on the clouds of heaven. Note too how Rev. differs from the Gospels in leaving out the article; this is apparently an imitation of the text of Dan. 7:13: the apocalyptic “Son of man” is the figure found already in Dan. 7:13, but now as a glorified ruler and judge. He is in all respects like an angel (Dan. 10:5; cf. Rev. 1:13; 14:15 – “another angel” besides that of 14:14). Perhaps we may detect here an old Aram. or Heb. tradition which the seer retains. The essential christology of Rev. is rather built around the figure of the → “Lamb” or the → “Word of God”; yet this is a different, later stratum of tradition.

E. Lohmeyer (Die Offenbarung des Johannes, HNT 16², 1953, 127) thinks otherwise: “This description [Son of man] is therefore unsuited to the ultimate and innermost nature of its bearer.” This underestimates the significance of this idea for Rev.

7. The formulae, “the days of the Son of man” (Lk. 17:22) and “the sign of the Son of man” (Matt. 24:30), are apocalyptic features.

(a) The phrase “the days of the Son of man” occurs in Lk. 17:22 (and the sing. in 17:24). This refers to the time of salvation, which ushers in the eschatological redeemed community (Lk. 21:28; cf. Eth. Enoch. 51:2). The time of salvation, however, introduces the day of judgment for the nations, corresponding to the catastrophe of “the days of Noah” and the “days of Lot” (Lk. 17:26 ff.). The Son of man stands on the side of the righteous and as messiah brings deliverance to the redeemed community. This old text has a parallel in Gos. Thom., logion 38: "Many times you desire to hear these words which I say to you and you have no one else from whom you may hear them. There will come days when you seek me and will not find me." R. Leivestad sees here a shift of sense: "Can one not conceive of Jesus' having compared his own lifetime with the days before the Flood? The days of the Son of Man were the days when Jesus called on men to repent before the last judgment, but with little success. It is really a mistake that the days of the Son of Man have been identified with his day" (op. cit., 87).

(b) In Matt. 24:30 the shining of light symbolizes or heralds proleptically the coming of the Son of man: "And then the sign of the Son of man will appear in heaven." The apocalyptic shining of lights was originally connected with the prophecy of Isa. 60:1; this was interpreted in Pes. R. 36:2(162a) of the King Messiah who would stand on the roof of the sanctuary. Correspondingly, Matt. 24:30 interprets the sign of the Son of man as an event in the heavenly sanctuary. Traces of the same tradition may be detected in Josephus, War 6, 5, 3(290). We can even try to pin down the development of this tradition: Matt. 24:30 is alluded to in Did. 16:6 ("sign of the spreading out in heaven") and Gos. Pet. 10:39 (cf. SB I 954). The idea in the Heb. original was probably that of God's Shekinah, which according to Isa. 60:1 prepared for the Messiah's appearance. Several stages of development must have intervened between this original and our text of Matt. (for a different exegesis cf. Colpe, op. cit., 460, n. 412: "Coming before v. 30b the saying about the sign of the Son of Man is designed to bring out Christ's judicial office, which was not clearly enough implied for the Chr. reader by the coming in glory").

O. Michel

υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ

υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ (hyios tou theou), Son of God.

CL 1. In cl. Gk. hyios from the first means son, like pais, in the sense of an heir and descendant; pais, child, is the wider concept, but it can also come to mean slave (→ pais theou). It can be used with the gen. (as early as Homer, Il. 5, 683; Od. 11, 568) in references to "sons of Zeus" and of other gods. Sometimes too those belonging to a particular nation (Achaeans or Trojans) are designated by a similar genitive phrase (Il. 1, 162). Ancient Gk. mythology portrayed the world of the gods as one great family. Zeus is the "father of men and gods" (Il. 1, 544). It was thought obvious that gods should cohabit with mortal women and beget children. Heracles' fate was especially influential since he had to bear the labours of men before he could, as a son of Zeus, be accepted into the world of the gods. Later, Epictetus reflected on this peculiar father-son relationship between Zeus and Heracles; not only did Heracles consider Zeus his father whom he addressed as such and whom he imitated in his actions, but he was also aware that he was the father of men (Dissertationes 2, 16, 44; 3, 24, 14 ff.).

2. In Hellenism, the Egyptian ruler-cult which so influenced Alexander the Great is of outstanding importance. Alexander was hailed in the Libyan desert as "Son of Ammon", or, in Gk. terms, "son of Zeus" (Callisthenes, Frag. 14a in F. Jacoby, Fragmente der griechischen Historiker, 1923 ff., IIB 645). Hence, the year 331 B.C. was critical in the development of the remarkable character of Alexander's dominion. His successors remained mindful of Alexander's deification. The Ptolemies in partical adopted the Gk. version of the ruler's title (cf. the Rosetta Stone in OGI 90: a decree of the priests in honour of Ptolemy Epiphanes). Under the Roman Empire, the idea of the son of God spread all over the world of that day, but it now had its foundation in Roman political theory. After Caesar had been murdered in 44 B.C. and had been declared to be divine, Octavian let it be known that, on the basis of his adoption in 45 B.C., he was divi filius, son of the divine. This nomenclature slowly established itself and became that part of the name which indicated the genealogical succession. That remained true of all the emperors; e.g. it was the official name of Septimius Severus in A.D. 195, when the phrase divi filius occurs 6 times (cf. Pauly-Wissowa II, 1923², 1943). The Gk. world translated divi filius with the formula theou hyios. However, the Hellenistic formula which expressed a mythical descent from the deity did not make the Roman emperors divine – since this formula was based on Roman ideas. Rather, it merely made them intelligible and acceptable to the Gk. East. The acceptance of this Roman ideology must thus obviously be part of the NT world (A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 1927², 346).

3. Particular guilds boasted of their attachment to “their god” and could thus call themselves hyioi, sons, or paides tou theou, children of the god (e.g. doctors as “sons of the god”, Asclepius: *SIG*⁴ III 1169, 12). It was particularly easy for the Stoa to think of men as children of gods, in the sense of the kinship existing between gods and men, because they upheld the ultimate unity of God and man or the unity of the human race. The centre of the Stoic religion lay not only in the symbol of the Father but also in the motif of providence, caring and help. “Not only the whole race of men, but also the individual members of it, are constantly cared for and guided by the immortal gods” (Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods 2, 65, 164). Epictetus gives this its classical expression: “We all come directly from God and God is the father of gods and men” (Dissertationes 1, 3, 1). A characteristic expression of Stoic thinking is the possibility of realizing the freedom and bliss offered by Zeus. Man has to hold fast that which is “his own” (Epictetus, Dissertationes 3, 24, 2 f.). It spoke of a world-order and its destruction; the Christian message spoke of the woe that had come upon man and the world, and of redemption from it.

4. A separate problem is the use of theios or theos to describe men whose acts or endowment surpass those of normal men. This is especially true of poets or seers, but also of commanders like Lysander, whose divine charisma or divine qualities were celebrated. Empedocles was regarded as a god (Frag. 112 in Diels-Kranz I 354, 17). Legends thus came to surround the births of famous men (Pythagoras, Plato). These legends took a particularly firm hold in Neopythagorean and Neoplatonic circles. Apollonius of Tyana in particular was furnished with all the characteristics of a divine endowment, and divine sonship also seems to have been part of this endowment (Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1, 6; 4, 31; 5, 24). The prophets whom Celsus saw in Palestine and Syria and who claimed to be sons of God (Origen, Contra Celsum 7, 9) present a particular problem. Origen also associates with these the Samaritan sons of God, Simon Magus and Dositheus, whose claims as revealers he himself did not recognize (Contra Celsum 1, 57).

[I.H.M.] The significance of the Gk. and Hellenistic material for the usage of the NT should not be over-estimated. The influential “history of religions” school attempted to account for much of the development of christology in terms of Hellenization (W. Bousset; R. Bultmann). It is now clear that this explanation was a complete misrepresentation of what actually happened. Naturally early Christian thinkers could not help being influenced by their Hellenistic environment, but it was primarily their OT and Jewish environment which provided them with the concepts and vocabulary with which to develop their understanding of the person of Jesus. See especially M. Hengel, The Son of God, 1976, for a powerful statement of this point of view; but in fact his thesis is simply a restatement, with additional evidence, of what has long been believed by scholars who were not captivated by the “history of religions” school.

In particular, the use of theios with reference to men endowed with superhuman qualities appears to have no essential relationship to the concept of Son of God (W. von Martitz, TDNT VIII 339 f.). Even the concept of the theios anēr (a modern rather than an ancient title) should be used in discussions of the superhuman qualities of Jesus only with considerable caution (O. Betz, “The Concept of the so-called ‘Divine Man’ in Mark’s Christology”, in D. E. Aune, ed., Studies in New Testament and Early Christian Literature, 1972, 229–240; see, on the other side, H. D. Betz, “Jesus as Divine Man”, in F. T. Trotter, ed., Jesus and the Historian, 1968, 114–133).

OT 1. Israel and Sonship. It is a fundamental part of the OT tradition that Israel has been chosen (→ Elect, art. eklegomai οτ) and so is in a position of sonship. On the one hand, this gives expression to the subordination of the son and the legal claim of God as → Father (art. patēr) (Mal. 1:6), and on the other to the care and → love extended to Israel as the “first-born son” (Exod. 4:22 f.; Jer. 31:9). Only in this context do the prophets’ message of judgment and the recognition of God’s chastisements become intelligible. Israel provides a historical pattern for election and for a concept of sonship that is not interpreted in purely natural categories. Yet we must not forget that Gen. 6:2, 4 speaks of “sons of God” who took to themselves daughters of men and begot the “mighty ones”. There is later evidence too of the old tradition of heavenly “sons of God” (Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; Pss. 29:1; 82:6; 89:7). Here in the OT is evidence of the pictorial idea of a heavenly court; the same idea recurs in e.g. a fragment of 4Q on Deut. 32:8. However, the idea of “sons of God” does not often appear subsequently, but rather is replaced by other phrases, “sons of heaven”, “holy ones of heaven”. Man’s instruction in all art and science is traced back to the → angels (Eth. Enoch 6 ff.). Their fall is the real disaster of history.

2. The King as God’s Son. Decisive for the messianic hope (→ Jesus Christ, art. Christos) is Nathan’s prophecy in 2 Sam. 7:12–16: God will establish a house and a kingdom for David for ever. He will be a father to David’s son, and this son of David is to be a son to him. The dynastic changes within the house of David were henceforth authorized by the divine legitimation of the succession. The original covenant between the people and their king was replaced by one which God himself gave which was between him and the royal house (cf. the Egyptian examples of such divine legitimation). Ps. 89:3(4) ff. takes up this divine legitimation given in 2 Sam. 7:12–16: the psalmist appeals to it in interceding for the king, the first-born, the highest among those born on earth (vv. 27[28] f.). There was also a coronation ritual based on 2 Sam. 7:12–16. “Only when Yahweh had acknowledged the new king as His son and, established his full royal name (2 S. 7:9; 1 Ki. 1:47), granted him a first request (Pss. 2:8; 20:5; 21:2, 4) and invested him with his crown (2 Ki. 11:12; Ps. 21:3) and sceptre (Ps. 110:2) could he begin his rule” (G. Fohrer, TDNT VIII 350).

The words, "He said to me, 'You are my son; I myself have begotten you today'" (Ps. 2:7), therefore belong to an original coronation ritual, as the "today" clearly shows. This may recall the legal act of adoption and yet there is another interpretation: God himself acknowledges the child born of a slave-woman – and so takes the place of his father (cf. Fohrer, TDNT VIII 351). The shout of joy in Isa. 9:6(5) perhaps arose out of this divine formula of acknowledgement: "To us a child is born, a son is given." Isa. 9:2–7(1–6); 11:1–9 describe later the enthronement of the king of salvation and the equipment of the new shoot of David's line with the gifts of the → Spirit of God. At his exaltation to sonship, his father confers upon him names that promise salvation and describe its constituents. The king is none other than God's representative on earth. With his coming, man's history of woe is at an end; he will bring salvation to the whole world.

3. The Special Effects of these OT Beginnings in later Judaism. (a) The description of the eschatological event put on God's lips in Jubilees (1:22–25) presupposes Israel's apostasy, its rebellion and obstinacy; Israel returns in all sincerity, with its whole heart and soul. God himself then circumcises them and bestows upon them a holy spirit. "I will then be your father and you will be my children. And they are all called children of the living God, and all angels and spirits know that they are my children and I am their father in truth and in righteousness, and that I love them" (cf. 2:20; 19:29).

In Qumran this eschatological process is given a distinctive form: men's attachment to the community of the elect is described as sonship (sons of light: 1QS 1:9; 2:16; of favour 1QH 4:32 f.; of grace: 1QH 7:20). In Israel itself the returning and transformation of God's people takes place in a community which claims for itself the fulfilment of the OT promises. The Qumran community fitted Ps. 2:7 and 2 Sam. 7:14 into their messianic expectation and interpreted them thus (4QFlor). 1QSa 2:11 f. may perhaps be translated: "if God causes the messiah to be born among them" (cf. Isa. 66:9).

([I.H.M.] The Qumran evidence shows that attention was being paid in Judaism to the significance of God's fatherly relationship to the messiah as his son, as expressed in 2 Sam. 7:14. In addition J. A. Fitzmyer ("The Contribution of Qumran Aramaic to the Study of the New Testament", NTS 20, 1973–74, 382–407, especially 391–394) has drawn attention to the possible significance of 4QpsDan A for christology; he renders 1:7–2:1: "[But your son] shall be great upon the earth, [O King! All (men) shall] make [peace], and all shall serve [him. He shall be called the son of] the [G]reat [God], and by his name shall he be named. He shall be hailed [as] the Son of God, and they shall call him Son of the Most High." Whatever be the precise interpretation of this text (Fitzmyer's rendering is a tentative one), it obviously has some relevance for NT usage, especially for Lk. 1:32–35).

The apocalypse of Eth. Enoch (105:1–2) speaks of the eschatological wisdom. God will unite himself "for ever", together with his son, with men in the ways of truth.

In 2 Esd. (7:28 f.; 13:32, 37, 52; 14:9) we find the phrase "my son, filius meus", which can be traced back to a Gk. pais or Heb. 'ēbēd tradition. The content of these references would fit in with Ps. 2:7; Isa. 11; their main emphasis is on the apocalyptic struggle with the nations and not on their enlightenment.

(b) The Jewish wisdom tradition places great value on the life of the individual righteous man. The paraenetic material of Sir. 4:1–10 concludes, according to the Heb. text, with the promise, “and God will call you his son, and he will be gracious to you and rescue you from the pit”; however the Gk. text has something quite different. The picture of the righteous man also lies behind Wis. 2:13–18: he claims a special knowledge of God and calls himself God’s child and calls God himself his father. His way of life is different from that of other men, and he can be regarded as God’s servant in the sense of Isa. 53. The ideas of Wis. 5:5 are eschatological: the righteous man is reckoned among God’s children and receives a portion among the saints (cf. Isa. 53:12; Dan. 7:18). The problem of Israel is also taken up in Wis. 12:19–21. God has taught his people that the righteous man must be a “friend of men”, but that he can count on repentance. If even enemies and evil-doers are treated with forbearance and clemency, how great a clemency can the “sons” anticipate, whose fathers were granted oaths and covenants. This prepares the way for an important strand of thought in later Judaism which should not be overlooked.

(c) Important too is the influence of prayer with its address to “Our Father” on the tradition and the liturgy (Isa. 64:8[7]; Eighteen Benedictions, Petitions 4 and 6; → Prayer, proseuchomai OT 6; → Father, art. patēr OT 2). The origin and content of the tradition of divine sonship goes right back to Israel and the tradition of its election. Midr. Ps. on Ps. 2 takes as its starting-point Exod. 4:22 (“Israel is my first-born son”), then quotes from the tradition of the Servant of God in Isa. 53:12 and 42:1 and concludes with testimonies from the Hagiographa (Ps. 110:1; Dan. 7:13). According to Ps. 2:8 (“Ask of me and I will give you nations as your own possession”), messianic status is also part of the tradition concerning Israel.

To guard against any false ideas it was often carefully said, “You will be like a son” (cf. Gk. text of Sir. 4:10).

The equipping of individual charismatics with the gift of performing miracles is conspicuous in the rabbinic miracle-stories (Naqdimon b. Gurion, Ta’an. 19b–20a; Haninah b. Dosa, Ber. 34b; Honi the Circle-drawer, Ta’an. 19a). The Hellenistic period, which tended above all to attribute sonship to individuals, also saw a particular differentiation within the concept of a son: he had a special relation to God (like the righteous of Wis. 2:13–18) in contrast to other men and also now even within Israel. Honi the Circle-drawer can say “for I am like the son of your house in your eyes”, and Shimon b. Shetach can say of him “what should I do, for you sin against God and yet he does what you want.” Indeed, it even seems that we can see different views of the Torah. But this exalting of individual charismatics is also based on the fact that sonship is a special gift of God in Israel itself. The “children of God” (Deut. 14:1) gaze upon these “beloved ones” of God because their own fate (e.g. rain) depends on their prayer (cf. G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 1973, 206–211).

(d) Hellenistic Judaism held fast to this faith in God as Creator and Father, and saw in history the evidence of his providence, goodness and righteousness. For Josephus believed (Ant. 2, 6, 8[152]) that he was “Father of all” (cf. 1, 1, 4[20]); according to Ant. 5, 1, 25(93), he is “Father and Lord of the Hebrews”. Josephus thus gives evidence of a fixed terminology that is conscious of the figurative nature of its statements. “Father” is not found as a mode of address in the prayers in his works. The patriarchs arose “from God himself” (Ant. 1, 3, 9[106]); they are examples of his special working. Josephus does not recognize any men as being God’s sons in a special way.

Philo was very definitely interested in particular philosophical and exegetical problems to which he gave a speculative interpretation. In Conf. Ling. 63, the Logos is the eldest son of God and the cosmos the youngest. In Sobr. 56, Abraham is not only God's friend, from whom nothing is hidden, but also God's child (hyios). He is of noble birth because he has chosen God as his Father and is the only one to have been adopted by him as son. Philo takes pains to remain faithful to the text of the LXX of Gen. 18:17 (cf. also Leg. All. 3, 27; Quaest. in Gen. 4, 21; for other Jewish material, see M. Hengel, op. cit., 41–56).

NT 1. (a) The early Christian confession of Jesus as Son of God is in fundamental agreement with Jesus' manner of addressing God (Aram. 'abbā', → Father; Mk. 14:36; Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15; → Prayer, art. proseuchomai NT 1 (a)). It is something new when Jesus addresses God as "My Father"; this mode of address in prayer derives from the language of the family circle; it does not occur in the charismatic circles in Judaism (contrast Ta'an. 23b: "a Father who can give rain"). Jesus bestows a share in this eschatologically determined relation to God. Hence it is understandable, when Jesus speaks of himself as the "Son" and claims for himself a special → knowledge (art. ginōskō NT) of the Father (Matt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22; see 2, below). This statement about the Son is apocalyptic in origin and, as in Qumran (e.g. 1QS 4:21 f.; CD 3:13 f.), it involves → election, knowledge and → revelation. It is a problem how this fundamental statement is related to the references to Ps. 2:7 in Mk. 1:11; 9:7 (cf. Lk. 3:22). This could originally have been speaking of the "Servant of God" in the sense of Isa. 42:1 (Heb. 'abdī, my Servant); yet this question remains open (see 3, below).

(b) The concept "Son of God", which is not used in this form by Jesus himself, is the essential confessional term of early Christianity (→ Confess). It is firmly rooted in → baptism, in preaching and in confessions (Acts 8:37 v.l.; 9:20; 13:33; Rom. 1:3 f.) and points back to the founding of the community and the event of Easter. Its close connexion with the confession of Jesus as messiah suggests that this sonship refers back to 2 Sam. 7:12, 14 (a royal title; cf. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 50). This traces the messianic element in Jesus' preaching back to the Davidic tradition. On the other hand, Lk. 4:18 f. (cf. Isa. 61:1–2) shows that the messianic element in Jesus' message is related to a particular endowment with the Spirit.

This problem was taken up by M. A. Chevalier (L'Esprit et le Messie dans le Bas-Judaïsme et le Nouveau Testament, 1958). He is anxious to show an original association of Ps. 2 and Isa. 11:1–10. This cannot, indeed, be detected in rabbinic Judaism, but is presupposed in apocalyptic texts and in the NT. This original messianic tradition which brought Ps. 2 and Isa. 11:1–10 together has also left its mark on the preaching of the Baptist. The gifts of the Spirit have an immediate point of contact with Isa. 11:2: the messiah is fully endowed with God's Spirit. Then the tradition breaks up: (a) the messiah will judge by the breath of his mouth or by fire (Isa. 11:4); (b) Jesus himself conceived of himself as God's Servant, upon whom the Spirit of the Lord rests, in the sense of Isa. 42:1; 61:1 f.

The question whether the messianic and adoptionist element of Ps. 2:7 or the tradition in Isa. 42:1; 61:1 f. concerning the 'eḥed and the Spirit is primary in christology must surely be answered in favour of the latter. The heavenly voice of Mk. 1:11 probably said: "Behold my servant whom I uphold, my chosen, in whom my soul delights; I have put My Spirit upon him, he will bring forth justice to the nations" (Isa. 42:1). It was a confirmation of the gift of the Spirit (but see further 3, below, and pais theou NT 1). We can thus draw a definite conclusion: Jesus is "Son" in his unique relation to God and his unique life of prayer, and he is 'ebed, Servant of God, as the bearer of the message of the heavenly voice that called him. Both concepts designate a function and a task, a being in the presence of God.

2. The Concept of Sonship in the Tradition of Lk. 10:21 f. par. Matt. 11:25 f. In Lk. 10:21 f., Matt. 11:25 ff. we have a thanksgiving prayer of Jesus which consists of praise and a word of revelation; Matt. 11:28 f. adds an invitation in the style of Sir. 24:18 ff. (cf. here Gos. Thom. logion 90, 96:16–20). Opinions are particularly divided on the genuineness and the point of the middle section (Matt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22). Here we have four skilfully constructed clauses. The meaning is that the Father has handed over to the Son the full → revelation; "just as only a father really knows his son, so only a son really knows his father". The son alone is in the position to mediate this knowledge to others. The logion has its parallels in apocalyptic (Dan. 2:20–23; Eth. Enoch 37:4; 1QS 11:15–20; Heb. Enoch 48C, 7). One can compare Jn. 10:15 (on the whole subject cf. J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, SBT Second Series, 6, 1967, 48–52). Jeremias takes the article before "son" and "father" in Matt. 11:27 as a generic one (a statement of general experience: "just as only a father really knows his son"). But it is more likely that the first clause is normative for the following: in the transmission of the revelation the special understanding of the Father and the Son is fulfilled.

Irenaeus, Haer. 1, 13, 2 (ed. Harvey) records a unique old Aram. tradition preserved amongst the gnostic sect of the Marcosians: "O My Father, how your gracious favour rests on me." Jesus knew himself to be the "simple One of God" who separated himself from those learned in the law and in so doing experienced God's favour. It remains undecided whether or not the shorter text attested by Irenaeus is secondary. W. Grundmann suggests that "it is understandable that this saying which is opposed to any rigid supernatural christological ideas could not long be tolerated and was speedily altered, while, on the other hand, the quotation in Irenaeus is hard to explain as a rephrasing" (Die Gotteskindschaft in der Geschichte Jesu, 1938, 140).

Ever since the works of E. Norden (Agnostos Theos, 1913), T. Arvedson (Das Mysterium Christi, 1937) and A. J. Festugière ("Cadre de la mystique hellénistique", in Aux Sources de la Tradition Chrétienne, 1950, 74 ff.), this group of ideas has been deliberately assigned a place in Hellenistic style and language about revelation. Here too we can then speak of a gnōsis which is directed towards God and sees him as the One who bestows salvation; we can speak of a self-knowledge of man, who comes from God and returns to him, and of the disclosure of a way, of the means and the intermediaries, who will help one in ascending. But even if we cannot disentangle the thought-forms of Qumran (e.g. 1QS 9:18; CD 2:3) and Matt. 11:25–27 from Hellenistic presuppositions, yet the real content of the logion is Semitic. The da'at, knowledge, that it presupposes is neither speculative nor mystic (cf. Jeremias, op. cit., 45 ff.).

[I.H.M.] The Semitic character of the saying is further evident from its use of parallel clauses to express a reciprocal relationship, since the Semitic languages lack a reciprocal pronoun for "one another". The conceptual background is to be found in Jewish wisdom teaching, which in turn is based on the OT (cf. Exod. 33:12 f.; Job 28:25–28; Pr. 8:22–30; Sir. 1:1–10; Bar. 3:27–28; Wis. 8:3 f.). The saying grounds Jesus' right to be the mediator of knowledge of God to men in the exclusive relationship which a son has with his father, and thus implicitly he claims a unique filial status. It fits in well with Jesus' other references to God as his Father, and should be regarded as authentic.

3. The Voice at the Baptism according to Mk. 1:11 par. Lk. 3:22. Perhaps the words of God recorded in all the Gospels in their accounts of the → baptism (Mk. 1:11 par.) form the real source of all the statements about the Son, the Servant, the Beloved or the elect One. Here Jesus had an experience of being called (→ Call), chosen and selected for a special task. It is important that the heavenly voice is associated with the gift of the Spirit. "Echoing voices were not an uncommon phenomenon among the Jews of those days, and frequently these voices were heard to utter verses from scripture" (D. Flusser, Jesus, 1969, 29). Hence we must examine the Sem. basis of this text which, as it stands, has been influenced by Hellenistic ideas. If the 'ebed tradition is the original one, then 'ebed is represented by hyios and the Heb. bāhîr of Isa. 42:1 by agapētos, beloved (LXX eklektos, elect One; → Elect., art. eklegomai OT 2). This would mean that the 'ebed tradition was normative for Jesus' life. His baptism was a token of his death (→ Cross, art. stauros) which he undertook for the → sins of the whole nation.

This leaves as yet unsolved the critical problem of the value of the reading of Lk. 3:22 D and Justin, where Ps. 2:7 is quoted verbatim ("You are my son, today have I begotten you") (on Ps. 2:7 cf. Acts 13:33; Heb. 1:5). This reading favours the Son-tradition. Gos. Heb. 2 has a variant: "My son, in all the prophets I was waiting for you to come that I might rest in you" (cf. Henn.-Schn., I, 161–164).

[I.H.M.] While it is possible that behind the baptismal saying there lies a use of 'ebed, which was later understood in terms of divine sonship, it is more probable that the secondary text in Lk. 3:22 D Justin has correctly recognized the presence of an allusion to Ps. 2:7 which goes back to the earliest form of the saying. From the beginning the text confirmed God's recognition of Jesus as his Son (E. Schweizer, TDNT VIII 367 f.) but also as his Servant.

4. The Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mk. 12:1–12 par.). Mk. too knows of the appearance of the Son as contrasted with the sending of servants prior to the eschatological age. In Mk. 12:1–12 par. Matt. 21:33–46, Lk. 20:9–19 the sending of the servants is followed by the sending of his son as the final, despairing expedient of the owner. But the tenants' resistance is not broken, but rather stiffened; they seize the son, kill him and throw him out of the vineyard. Since the servants' commission is indistinguishable from that of the "beloved son", the parable's meaning lies in the extreme crisis of the contemporary historical situation. The original parable was not allegorical.

J. Jeremias (The Parables of Jesus, 1963², 74 ff.) alludes to the revolutionary temper of the Galilean peasants towards their foreign landlords and to the zealotism indigenous in Galilee that had roused them. It is important to note that the owner apparently lived abroad and is perhaps even regarded as a foreigner. The tenants had in mind the legal enactment that under certain conditions the estate of a deceased man was regarded as property without an owner which anyone might appropriate: hence he who first seized possession had the prior claim. Jesus was contending against the tenants of the vineyard and the leaders of the nation, saying that they had again and again acted rebelliously against God and they were even rejecting the final messenger of God.

The parable has been allegorized in the course of time. For its hearers the idea of the "Son of God" need not have been messianic ([Tr.] although this does not mean that Jesus was unaware of the deeper significance of his words). Jeremias assumes that the concept "Son of God" is not attested in pre-Christian Palestinian Jud. (interpolations in Eth. Enoch 105:2; 2 Esd. 7:28 f.; 13:32, 37, 52; 14:9). "A few infrequent occurrences of the designation of the Messiah as Son of God are first found in later rabbinical literature in agreement with Ps. 2:7" (Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus 73, n. 1; SB III 19 f.; see, however OT 3 (a) above). Note too the text of Gos. Thom.: "Then the master sent his son. He said: 'Perhaps they will fear my son!' Since those peasants knew that he was the heir of the vineyard, they seized him and killed him. Whoever has ears let him hear" (logion 65). We have to distinguish between the original parable of Jesus and the early church's interpretation.

5. The Logion concerning the Father's Private Knowledge of the Eschaton (Mk. 13:32). A hard problem is posed by Mk. 13:32. An old Sem. tradition lies behind it, which perhaps read "not even the angels know it". Some scholars hold that the words, "nor the Son, but only the Father", were added later (cf. G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, 1902, 194; Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, 37; on the argument, which remains unsettled, see B. M. F. van Iersel, 'Der Sohn' in den synoptischen Jesusworten, Supplements to NovT 3, 1961, 117–123, who upholds the authenticity of the whole saying). On the parousia see Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (a).

6. The Midrash concerning Jesus' Early Life (Matt. 1:18 ff.; Lk. 2:1 ff.). An older story about Jesus' birth has been elaborated in the manner of a midrash (cf. the use of scriptural quotations). Lk. 1:32 ff. contains a concept of sonship that is based primarily on 2 Sam. 7:12–16 and makes use of the idea of the Davidic sonship, but gives it a prophetic form. Matt.'s view is different: he calls the messianic child the "Son of God", quoting the scriptures of Hos. 11:1 (Matt. 2:15). In his eyes, the way to mankind led to Jesus as Israel's messiah. The Redeemer (→ Redemption, art. sōzō), as a second → Moses, must come out of → Egypt (→ Fullness, art. plēroō NT 1 (b)).

These stories usher in a new way of looking at Jesus' divine sonship. The OT traditions are still there, but are given a Hellenistic interpretation and are developed to include a begetting (→ Birth, art. gennaō) by God without any earthly father (but see below the art. on The Virgin Birth). This idea is also at home in certain Jewish circles (cf. Philo, Cher. 40–47: "the men to whose virtue the lawgiver has testified, such as Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Moses, . . . are not represented by him as knowing their wives"). The idea of an eschatological new creation by God (→ Creation, art. ktisis) recalls → Noah's birth; he was not like a man, but like the heavenly sons of God; he is not as we are (Eth. Enoch 106, 1QGenAp column 2; cf. on all this C. K. Barrett, The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition, 1947, 18–24; D. Flusser, "Jesus in the Context of History", in A. Toynbee, ed., The Crucible of Christianity, 1969, 228 ff.).

[I.H.M.] The evidence for Jesus' own use of the term "Son" is thus comparatively small, and the main weight falls on Matt. 11:27 par. At the same time, however, the use of the title is found in statements addressed by others to Jesus. He is so designated by the heavenly voice (Mk. 1:11; 9:7) and by evil powers (Matt. 4:3, 6; Mk. 3:11; 5:7). The temptation story is clearly meant to take up the ascription of sonship found in the baptismal narrative. Jesus refuses to misuse his relationship with God for his own ends. The words of the demons may reflect popular belief that miracle workers and exorcisers had a special relationship with God.

7. Pre-Pauline Traditions and the Pauline Message. W. Kramer (Christ, Lord, Son of God, SBT 50, 1966, 183) rightly distinguishes “Son of God” formulae which Paul quotes or adopts (6 passages: Rom. 1:4; 8:3, 32; Gal. 2:20; 4:4 f.; 1 Thess. 1:10) and his own formulations (9 passages: 1 Cor. 1:9; 15:28; 2 Cor. 1:19; Gal. 1:16; 4:6; Rom. 1:3, 9; 5:10; 8:29). Statements involving “Christ” or → “Lord” (kyrios) predominate. It is striking how much Paul has made use of existing material. But it is still an open question how much importance attaches to these “Son” statements. Obviously they imply Jesus’ legitimation, his relation to God and his representation of God as his envoy. But it is doubtful whether Kramer (op. cit., 189) is right in claiming that the title and the concept of the Son of God are only of secondary importance for Paul (cf. M. Hengel, op. cit., 7–15). The confession of Jesus as messiah and the acclamation of him as kyrios are christologically independent themes, but the concept of him as “son of God” presupposes, not particular formulae, but complete statements.

(a) The twofold statement of Rom. 1:3–4 speaks of an enthronement and presupposes Pss. 2:7 and 110:1 ff. Resurrection and enthronement thus coincide in history. Both forms of existence, sonship of David and sonship of God, describe life on earth and in heaven; the second form of existence transcends the first but is not opposed to it. The addition “in power” perhaps applies to the divine sonship and could have a doxological purpose. This twofold statement uses Jewish material and can be assigned to the Aram.-speaking early church. They wanted thereby to show Jesus’ importance rather than to describe the saving event.

(b) The appearance of statements about the sending of Jesus in Gal. 4:4 f. and Rom. 8:3 also seems to be pre-Pauline. One can discern here a formal scheme which can also be detected in the Johannine literature, though in a modified form (Jn. 3:17; 1 Jn. 4:9, 10, 14). The following final clauses (hina, so that) are characteristic: they give the main purpose of the sending. Behind this originally lay the scheme of the eschatological messenger who surpasses Moses (Deut. 18:15; Jn. 17:3).

E. Schweizer (TDNT VIII 374–6) assumes that statements in Hellenistic Judaism about → Wisdom (a power sent from God, Wisdom, Logos) are to be regarded as the basis of the Pauline and Johannine idea of pre-existence. The NT sending-formulae in any case are firmly rooted in time and history. That a gnostic redeemer myth can hardly be presupposed is shown by the fact that the “Son” title in the formulae of sending is not combined with exaltation or ascension (loc. cit., 375, n. 299).

(c) The giving or giving up of the Son (→ Judgment, art. paradidōmi; → Suffer; Rom. 4:25; 8:32; Jn. 3:16) probably also belongs to pre-Pauline material. The verb paradidonai that appears here could just as well be interpreted on the basis of the Passion-story as on the analogy of the sending-formula (“give” meaning “send”). The example of → Abraham, the patriarch who did not withhold his son (Gen. 22:12, 16), may also have played a part here. We have here a kērygma which is still influenced by old Sem. ideas of the rights of a messenger. It is concerned with God’s decisive action as he commissions and authorizes his Son; he takes upon himself the → suffering of his Son and gives this suffering an ultimate significance as the expression of his Fatherly love.

It is not enough to ask where these statements of pre-existence originated; we must also ask in what circles these statements were current. Probably they belong to the missionary preaching and instruction of the Hellenistic Diaspora, since the problem of Israel is side-stepped in this material and the mission to mankind is in the foreground. Yet the main thing is the OT and Jewish background of this material. The "Son" is the One who carried out the divine purpose and not a Hellenistic hero or the mediator of divine powers.

(d) The summary of the old Gentile-Christian missionary kērygma in 1 Thess. 1:9 f. also seems to be pre-Pauline. It is probably built on a call to repentance (→ Conversion) and an expectation of salvation: it recalls elements of the Baptist's preaching of impending wrath (Matt. 3:7; Rom. 5:9). The resurrection serves as a pledge of future salvation. Probably the idea of Jesus' sonship appears as part of the kērygma in place of the tradition about the Son of man.

Kramer (op. cit., 123 ff.) suggests that we have here Aram. Jewish-Christian material which has been adapted into the Hellenistic kērygma. He points out that statements about the Son of God were not at first connected with the parousia.

(e) Earlier material is likewise found in the apocalyptic passage, 1 Cor. 15:23–28. Passages in the Pss. like 8:6(7) and 110:1 show the biblical material that is the basis of the christological affirmations here. In particular the absolute use of "the Son" characterizes this apocalyptic passage (v. 28). He takes on features which elsewhere indicate the designation "Son of man" (cf. Ps. 8). What is important here is his obedience towards the → "Father" and Creator.

(f) These pre-Pauline statements concerning the "Son of God" lead us not only to the heart of old credal formulations but also to the kērygma of the mission in the Diaspora. Paul himself not only handed down the statements that he found, but also gave them a soteriological interpretation and subordinated them to his preaching of the cross. The close connexion between the "Son" and the "sons", the superiority of the image of Christ and his form, and the son's right of succession are important elements in the doctrine of salvation; yet when they are adopted for preaching in Hellenistic circles they are thereby given ontological implications which could displace the emphasis on the functional purpose of the concept (cf. Phil. 2:5–11; Rom. 8:3).

(g) [I.H.M.] It is interesting that the only two references to the "Son" in Acts (9:20; 13:33 [Ps. 2:7 LXX]) both associate the term with the preaching of Paul. Clearly Luke regarded it as distinctive of Paul's christology. Although the term is infrequently compared with other christological titles, M. Hengel (op. cit., 7–15) has demonstrated that Paul kept it for use at the climax of theological statements and that he used it to demonstrate the close bond between Jesus and God in virtue of which Jesus is the mediator of salvation. Thus it is the Son who is the theme of the gospel (Rom. 1:3, 9), and it is by means of this title that Paul emphasizes the supreme value of the death of the One who stood closest to God as the means of reconciling men with God (Rom. 5:10; 8:32; Gal. 2:20; Col. 1:13 f.). The same idea is used to express the closeness of Jesus to God and appears when Jesus is described as being in the form or image of God and as his Firstborn. It should be noted that for Paul Jesus was God's Son during his earthly life, and that it was as God's Son that he died. Consequently, he did not cease to be divine in his earthly existence, and his self-emptying cannot mean that he gave up his divine nature to assume human nature. The statements in → Empty, art. kenos NT 3, and → Form, art. morphē NT 1, are open to misinterpretation in this respect. It is better to say, "He emptied Himself in that He took the servant's form. . . ; and this necessarily involved an eclipsing of His glory as the divine Image in order that He might come, in human flesh, as the Image of God incarnate" (R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi, 1967, 194).

It is, then, all the more remarkable that Paul can speak of Christians as the sons of God (Rom. 8:14, 19; 9:26; 2 Cor. 6:18; Gal. 3:26; 4:6 f.) and claim that their destiny is conformity to the image of God's Son (Rom. 8:29); they are to share the glory of the exalted Son and must pattern their lives on his holy, sinless life.

8. The Son of God in the Johannine Literature. The tension between ontological overtones and functional purpose is clearly visible in the Johannine literature where, especially in the letters, the statements about the Son of God are of especial importance. In the Fourth Gospel, the sending of Jesus is a firm foundation for the doctrine of salvation. One believes and recognizes God and him whom he has sent (Jn. 17:3; cf. Num. 16:28). This statement about his being sent has its explicit purpose in showing Jesus' status as Son (K. H. Rengstorf, TDNT I 445). It is a matter of God's decisive act in commissioning and authorizing his Son – but the Son therefore makes the same claims and has the same rights as the Father (Jn. 5:23: the Father who has sent him). Here we are confronted with a particular interpretation of an older kērygma.

(a) Jn. 3:35 describes the Son's authority to teach and to act. The Father loves him (i.e. chooses him) and has placed all in his hands. The structure of the logion points to an Aram. original (cf. Matt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22). The Fourth Evangelist interprets this authority (Jn. 5:22: judgment over all flesh; 5:26: to have life in himself; 12:49: the command as to what he should say; 17:11 f.: the name which God has given him). It is the authority (→ Might, art. exousia) of One who is commissioned and executes justice. Hence the Son can do nothing by himself but always looks at what the Father is doing (5:19; 7:18). His work is the execution of a commission from which he does not deviate in the least. The authority of the Father is, on the one hand, a once-for-all act in the past and, on the other hand, a continuous activity in the present; it is on the latter that the main emphasis lies. 6:40 expressly says that God's purpose is to draw men into an encounter with the Son and so to faith. Only thus is eschatological (i.e. blessed, perfect) life achieved.

Hence, it is inadvisable to interpret Jn. on the basis of the ideas of gnostic mythology (R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 42 ff.). Christ is not for the evangelist an intermediate being who is at the same time both a cosmological and a soteriological figure. Nevertheless, the evangelist does think in terms typical of the Hellenistic kērygma. Bultmann also holds that God himself is present in the Son as in his copy (op. cit., 165 n. 1; derivation of the Father-Son relationship from Platonic, Hermetic and gnostic elements). "Nevertheless this interpretation remains in the sphere of mythology, which John reinterprets in accordance with his idea of revelation: that is, that in Jesus we encounter God himself, his words are God's words" (165 ff. n. 3). On his existential interpretation, "whoever is directed to the Son can be sure of having for himself the Father who loves the Son, and can be sure of encountering in him the omnipotence of God himself" (165 f.). It is the work of the exalted

One that creates certainty and not the faith of man that is directed towards the exalted One.

Yet we must assume that Jn. was speaking in a Hellenistic world, where the consciousness of philosophers (Epictetus Dissertationes 1, 24, 6) and gnostics (Iren., Haer. 1, 17, 1 (ed. Harvey)) of having been sent played a significant part.

(b) In contrast, Jn. developed the early church's baptismal confession; he takes over the confession (Jn. 20:31; cf. Acts 8:37), "Jesus is the messiah, the Son of God" (cf. the addition in Jn. 11:27: "who comes into the world"). This baptismal confession is also in view, when Jn. speaks of "faith" in the name of the Son of God" (Jn. 1:12; 3:18). Part of faith is the deliberate saying of Jesus' name as a confession and a testimony. 1 Jn. 4:15 and 5:5 portray the same thing. The absolute use of "the Son" is typical of John; but he also uses it with the gen. (1 Jn. 1:3, 7: "his Son"), when speaking of God the Father and Jesus.

The old Sem. functional ideas (commissioning and obedience) are supplemented and supplanted in Jn. by a different structure of thought which we must call oriental (as opposed to western). This oriental way of thought is not theoretical and does not speak in terms of possession, but it is practical and direct and speaks in terms of a participation in being. The commissioning and obedience are still Jn.'s starting-point, but their fulfilment leads to sharing in → truth and → light. Can we say that already in Jn. the terminology is used "formally" and has "become a cipher" (E. Schweizer, TDNT VIII 387)?

(c) [I.H.M.] The title "Son of God" is clearly fundamental in John's christology, and is used to express a number of basic convictions about Jesus. (1) It expresses the metaphysical or essential relationship between Jesus and his Father. So close is the link between them that to deny the Son is to deny the Father (1 Jn. 2:22 f.). Father and Son belong inseparably to each other (Jn. 1:18; 5:23; 1 Jn. 1:3; 5:20). The Son is pre-existent (Jn. 3:17; 11:27; 1 Jn. 3:8; 4:9–14). He is God's "only" Son, a term which expresses the special love between the Father and Jesus. (2) The NT in general does not speculate on the origin of the Son, and the use of the terminology of Sonship is not meant to encourage such speculation, but to draw out the nature of the relationship between Jesus and God; this relationship is one of mutual love (Jn. 3:35; 5:20) and of filial obedience (Jn. 5:19). (3) The Son shares the functions of the Father, especially as the judge and the bringer of life (Jn. 5:17–30). (4) The Son mediates between God and men. He was given by the Father in order that men might be saved (Jn. 3:16). While in the world, he remains in constant communion with the Father (Jn. 1:18; 3:13; 8:29; 16:32) and is thus able to reveal the Father to men. The title "Son" expresses above all the fact that Jesus is the Saviour. It had "messianic" associations, and in 1 Jn. it is close in meaning to "messiah", but for John, Jesus is the Saviour particularly because of his metaphysical relationship with God (Jn. 11:41; 12:27 f.; 17:1). This is why he is so concerned to emphasize the real and lasting nature of the incarnation (2 Jn. 7–11). See C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, 1953, 250–262; R. Schnackenburg, Das Johannesevangelium, II, 1971, 150–163.

(d) The problem of the idea of "sons of God" in Sem. thought is identical with that of "children of God" (→ Child); it is only in the Hellenistic tradition that the distinction arises between the "Son" of doctrinal statements and the children who become such through → faith and → baptism (Jn. 1:12; 1 Jn. 3:1, 10). Apart from this the Qumran antithesis between the “sons of light” and the “sons of darkness” also has a part to play in Johannine thought.

(i) Jn. 1:12 speaks of the “authority” to become God’s children (tekna theou) and 1 Jn. 3:1 of the gift of the name of “child” (“we are called”). From this gift proceeds our “being” (“and such we are”).

(ii) The authority or gift of childhood is understood as a “begetting of God” (Jn. 1:13; 3:3; 1 Jn. 2:29; 3:9 f.; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18). This process is the product of the “Spirit” or the receiving of baptism (“water and Spirit”, Jn. 3:5). Here we have a pre-Johannine tradition which is didactically developed in a certain way (1 Jn. 2:29: “who does righteousness”).

(iii) This new “being” is meant to include a “being determined by . . .” and hence a process of separation from evil, a recognition of the obedience required by God in the face of the eschatological → righteousness (“who does righteousness”).

R. Schnackenburg (Die Johannesbriefe, 1963², Excursus 8, 175–183) gives us the material concerning being a child of God and begetting by God and decides that “being a child of God is, however, nothing natural, but belongs to the supernatural, divine realm” (175). There may be some contact with the mysteries’ idea of renewal and with gnostic texts. The gnostic is by nature a spiritual man (phusei pneumatikos, of spiritual nature) and he is transformed by gnōsis, even if he dresses this up in a sacramental ritual. He recalls his spiritual nature that has been there all along (R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, 1927³, 53 ff.). On the other hand, Jn. does not think in terms of natural processes but starts from the uniqueness of the Spirit of God and God’s power. The new being must be conceived eschatologically and not analogically (pace Schnackenburg).

R. Bultmann (The Johannine Epistles, Hermeneia, 1973, 45–47) compares 1 Jn. with Corp. Herm. XIII 14 and the process of the coming into being of essence (ousiōdēs genesis). We should not overlook its kinship with gnostic religion, but Jn. thinks of renewal as an eschatological event.

Probably the correlation of Jn. with Jewish thought goes a stage further (cf. F. Nötscher, Zur theologischen Terminologie der Qumran-Texte, 1956, 148: “Eternal life is a sort of participation in the divine life, since God or Christ are alone fully possessed of life and are thereby the sole bestowers of life”; Jn. 5:21; cf. 11:25; 14:6). But we should not think of this in the categories of “spiritualizing” and “internalizing”, but in terms of a continuation of the eschatological perspective.

9. The Son of God in Hebrews. We meet the absolute use of the name “Son” in Hebrews (Heb. 1:2, 8; 3:6; 5:8; 7:28); this has been influenced by the old Palestinian and Jewish-Christian usage (the emphasis on the son’s position in God’s house, the son as heir). We also meet “Son of God” as an official rank where the early Christian baptismal confession has left its mark (4:14; 6:6; 7:3; 10:29). It is very reticent about God’s position as Father (1:5; 12:7, 9); this rests on an old tradition. Older traditional material is discernible in Heb. 1:2 f. (cf. Col. 1:15–17), which belongs to the world of the Hellenistic community.

It is striking how the two statements are juxtaposed in Heb. 1:2: He is heir (→ Inheritance, art. kleros NT 2) of all and he is the mediator of creation. In Hellenistic Christianity, the “Son” of the Palestinian Jewish tradition was regarded as the “copy” of the invisible God (Col. 1:15 f.) and the features of Wisdom were attributed to him (cf. Wis. 7:25 f.). This juxtaposition of historical and metaphysical elements is expressed in the fact that the historical process is described in the aorist (1:1 f., 3 f.) and the metaphysical in the present (1:3). Hence we have here deliberate statements about being.

10. The Son of God in Revelation. In Revelation the concept “Son of God” appears in Rev. 2:18. It is there Christ’s name for himself; according to 2:23 he shares in God’s activity of → judgment (art. krima) (cf. Jer. 17:10); he grants the believer a share in his dominion over the nations (with Rev. 2:26 f.; cf. Ps. 27:8 f.). It is significant that the authority of the “Son of God” is described in OT terms. This is the only instance of the title in Rev.

11. The Trinitarian Formula. The triadic confessional formula “Father, Son and Holy Spirit” in Matthew 28:19 recalls the absolute use of the name “Son”. The formula is a brief summary of the saving event, of catechesis and of the authorization for the baptism of the nations. That it is an old one is shown by Did. 7:3 and Justin, Apol. I 61, 3. Matt. is associated with a practice of baptism that is concerned to show that it has the highest and completest authority for its activities.

Some scholars think that the shorter form in Eusebius, which omits the command to baptize with its triadic formula, is original: “Go and make all nations disciples in my name, teach them to hold fast all that I have commanded you” (Hist. Eccl. 3, 5, 2). The command to baptize in the triune name occurs, however, in Did. 7:1–3. Perhaps we should not overlook the influence of Isa. 42:1 on the original form of this text: “Behold my servant, whom I uphold, my chosen, in whom my soul delights; I have put my spirit upon him, he will bring forth justice to the nations” (on this whole passage see F. C. Conybeare, “The Eusebian Form of the Text Matt. 28:19”, ZNW 2, 1901, 275–288; H. Kosmala, “The Conclusion of Matthew”, ASTI 4, 1965, 132–147; G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament, 1962, 77–92).

The self-designation “the Son” is especially important amongst the christological statements because it traces back the call, the election and the claims of Jesus to God himself and thus authenticates them.

O. Michel

υἱὸς Δαυὶδ

υἱὸς Δαυὶδ (hyios David), Son of David.

OT 1. “Son of David” is a NT predicate of Jesus that has a long tradition behind it in the OT and in the traditions of Judaism. This tradition is not derived from a late theological reflection, but points back to a historical event that is connected with the person of → David.

(a) Nathan’s promise in 2 Sam. 7:12–16 is fundamental: (1) the raising up of a successor to David from his offspring; (2) the confirmation of his “house” and kingdom for ever. It is the basis for Pss. 2:7; 89:4; 132:11 (covenant-making and oath). Yet we see here (cf. Pss. 110:1 f.; 45:7) how the promise to David, which is the one decisive point in the Israelite monarchy, is associated with all the characteristic features of that view of kingship that was common to the East; the king is a “child of God” and as his assistant shares in the divine dominion over the world. 2 Sam. 7:14 may have been inserted later.

(b) Some prophets also presuppose this promise made to David and give it a future interpretation in terms of eschatology and the messianic hope: Isa. 9:6(5) f. (peace, justice and righteousness are seen as the characteristic conditions brought by the messianic salvation); 11:1 ff. (shoot from the stock of Jesse, bestowal of the Spirit of the Lord, judgment with the “rod of his mouth”, righteousness and faithfulness as signs of his dominion). Just as God’s Spirit once rested upon David, so the new ruler, a second David, will be equipped with the Spirit of Yahweh. His wisdom and understanding are stressed, and justice and righteousness are the consequences of the appearance of this king. The Israelite recollection of David and Solomon is not lost sight of, but the influence of oriental kingship ideology now shows itself. The emphasis is upon this eschatological hope of salvation which transcends all human standards. Jer. 23:5 expressly mentions the “righteous branch” of David who will act in wisdom, justice and righteousness (30:9; 33:15).

Ezek. 34:23 and 37:24 make use of the image of the shepherd for their prophetic description: “I will set over them only one shepherd, who will tend them, my servant David.” Isa. 55:3 explicitly refers to the “eternal covenant” and the realization of the “inalienable gifts of grace” promised to David; thus it gives an answer full of promise to the nation’s complaint that its history is no longer favoured by God’s gracious care (Ps. 89). This “eternal covenant” is also the beginning of salvation for the nation. Zech. 3:8 and 6:12 promise the “Servant” and “Branch”: “for under him it will shoot up, and he will build the temple of the Lord.” Obviously the blessing of the “house of David” and the inhabitants of Jerusalem are joined together in this messianic material (Zech. 12:8, 10; 13:1).

(c) A messianic sense is clear in Gen. 49:9 f. (“lion of Judah”) and Num. 24:17 (“star of Jacob”), yet there seems to be no connexion with the promise of the “kingdom of the son of David”. It is important that Isa. 11:1–10 and Mic. 5 presuppose that Yahweh once more starts his messianic work anew; both prophets look to the family whence David came and expect a completely new start in place of the ruling descendants of David. “The fact that they so expressly look for salvation in the anointed one of the future is tantamount to saying that the contemporary descendants of David have lost their saving function so emphatically attributed to them in the royal psalms” (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 171).

2. Later Judaism also took up the promise of a son of David with modifications of it in all sorts of ways in order to enable it to put up with its political oppression and its distress through its relationship to God.

(a) In the Wisdom literature, Sir. 47:11 and 1 Macc. 2:57 allude to the permanency of the throne or the throne fixed for eternity. Pss. Sol. 17 uses “Son of David” as a fixed messianic term. In a period when the Hasmonaeans were making messianic claims for themselves and were appropriating the glory of the priesthood, the old Davidic promises were revived. This Pharisaic psalm goes back to the old messianic tradition (2 Sam. 7:14; Isa. 9:6; 11:1, 10; Ps. 2:9). It is a time of affliction: the one who offers this prayer directs his prayer to God and holds him to his promise. He expects a change in which the dominion of the Gentiles will be broken and the pollution of sinners will be done away with. The messiah’s appearance marks the beginning of the gathering of a holy nation, a dominion over the Gentiles and the establishment of righteousness. This (political) psalm fits into the period in Jerusalem’s history prior to 63 B.C. and discloses the viewpoint of the Pharisees at that time. Thus the “Son of David” is to renew the dominion of David but in the way in which the Pharisaic party think of the coming of the messianic age. What a → Pharisee expects is clear from v. 35 f. (32): “But he rules over them as a righteous king, instructed by God, and in his days no injustice shall be done amongst them for they are all holy and their king is the Lord's Anointed."

(b) Although messianic claims could be made for men of non-Davidic origin, the rabbis not only emphasized the "king, the messiah", but also the "Son of David" (cf. the discussion in T. J. Ta'an. 4:68d:44; SB I 13).

(c) The Qumran sect expected three future persons who would bring salvation: a prophet (→ Elijah or → Moses), and, in addition to the Davidic messiah, a priestly one who seems to have had the first place in this trio. 4Qflor 1:7 ff. finds in the key words "house" and "sanctuary" and "rest" of 2 Sam. 7:11–14 a messianic connexion: it involves the promise of the "establishment" of the seed of David and of the "throne of his kingdom". God will be a father to him and he will be a son to God. "That is the shoot of David who will appear with the Interpreter of the Law" (1:11). Just afterwards the text of 4Qflor 1:12 refers to Amos 9:11 ("I will establish again the fallen booth of David"; cf. Acts 15:16). This is treated allegorically in CD 7:15: "the books of the Law are the booth". 4Qpatr 1–4 confirms the connexion (2 Sam. 7:14 is interpreted with the aid of Gen. 49:10): as long as Israel has dominion none will be cut off who is enthroned over it, who belongs to the house of David. "For the staff of the king is the covenant of the king's rule"; "until the Anointed One of righteousness comes, the shoot of David" (cf. Jer. 23:5; 33:15; 4Qflor 1:11). The style is reminiscent of the Psalms (e.g. Ps. 89: God's covenant and oath to David, his elect one). 4QpIsa^a quotes Isa. 11:1–4 and interprets this messianic passage of the Davidic ruler of the end-time. CD 7:18–20 refers to Num. 24:17 and interprets the sceptre of the "prince of the whole community" and the star of the "Interpreter of the Law". Likewise 1QM 11:6 and 4Qtest 12 refer back to Num. 24:17. The sceptre is again an allusion to the Davidic prince. 1QSb 5:20 ff. contains a series of benedictions that are based upon OT promises (Isa. 11:2 ff.; Mic. 4:13; 7:10; Gen. 49:9). Here the functions of the messiah are indicated with the help of the OT quotations; they include the "establishment of the nation's dominion". Hence, we can see in the Qumran literature a similar messianic tradition to that of the Psalms of Solomon (cf. 2 Sam. 7:12–16; Isa. 11:1–5).

This shows both the points of contact and the differences in relation to the NT: Qumran held different messianic expectations (and speaks of the anointed ones of Aaron and Israel), but early Christianity traced certain messianic features in the person of Jesus; these were, however, controversial and constantly took on new forms. Hence the messianic elements are formed into a christology. Test. Jud. 24:4–6 connects the shoot and the sceptre of the kingdom of Isa. 11:1 and Gen. 49:10; the promise here has a universal ring. 2 Esd. 12:31 mentions the "lion", which, it is pointed out in v. 22, is the "Anointed" (→ Jesus Christ, art. Christos οἱ) of the line of David (Gen. 49:9). He will call men to account and will redeem the survivors of the nation. It is particularly stressed that the Most High "keeps" the messiah till the end of days.

(d) The literature of prayers has an important place here. God is called upon to have mercy on the kingdom of the house of David (Eighteen Benedictions, Petition 14), or to intervene on behalf of the shoot of David (Petition 15, Bab. recension). The rabbinic tradition speaks of the "Son of man" as messiah (T. J. Ta'an. 4:68d:44; cf. SB I 13) and of the coming "David" or the coming "Servant of David" (Tg. Ezek. 34:23 f.; cf. SB II 337). These formulations are culled straight from the OT promises or the literature of prayers. They often presuppose the ruin of the nation and the world, the decline of religion and morality.

(e) [I.H.M.] It is possible that the title "Son of David" was understood particularly in terms of the character of Solomon who had a reputation for wisdom and even for power over evil spirits (Josephus, Ant. 8, 44–49; Testament of Solomon). The evidence is sparse, but it would certainly explain why the title "Son of David" is connected with exorcisms and healings in the Gospels (K. Berger, NTS 20, 1973–74, 3–9).

NT On a number of occasions, the NT presupposes that Jesus of Nazareth belongs genealogically to the line of David and that this descent from David was a messianic element in his history.

1. The credal formulae of Rom. 1:3–4 and 2 Tim. 2:8 presuppose that descent from David (a messianic element) and divine sonship, based on his resurrection from the dead (enthronement), are two stages in an old christology.

In Rom. 1:3–4, Paul quotes a confession handed down to him from the Palestinian community: the gospel concerns the "Son" (Mk. 1:11; 9:7) who was descended from the seed of David according to the flesh, but who has been installed as "Son of God" in power according to the Spirit of holiness through the resurrection from the dead. Here are described two consecutive episodes in Jesus' history according to God's plan of salvation: on earth he appears as the "Son of David" and so his destiny is indicated; by the resurrection, on the other hand, he is enthroned as the heavenly messiah in accordance with Ps. 110:1. Attention is centred on his messiahship and divine sonship and these are defined with reference to the resurrection. Sonship of David carries within itself a historical reference, but at the same time it points away to the expectation of the messianic hope (cf. hyios tou Theou NT 7 (c)).

2. The speeches in Acts distinguish between David who died and the "Holy One" who has been raised from the dead and who does not see corruption (Acts 2:27; 13:37, quoting Ps. 16:20). The quotation from Amos 9:11 f. in Acts 15:16 f. refers to the establishment of the booth of David and a new era of salvation for the → remnant of Israel (LXX or testimony tradition). The original promise (cf. CD 7:16; 4Qflor 1:12 f.) seems to have been refashioned in a Hellenistic way in conformity with Lk.'s concept of salvation. The promise of the "Son of David" is certainly presupposed, but it is not explicitly mentioned.

3. (a) The structure of Mark's Gospel corresponds to the confession of Rom. 1:3–4: the messiah (i.e. Son of David) is the "Son of God" to whom the evangelist bears witness. Mk. 12:35–37 (par. Matt. 22:41–46, Lk. 20:41–44) records a discussion which raises the question of the relation of the "Son of David" to "David's Lord" (according to Ps. 110:1; → Lord, art. kyrios NT 3 (b)). The answer is in accord with the later confession of Rom. 1:3–4: the "Son of David" must be exalted. That Mk. confirms that Jesus is a son of David is shown by the mode of address in Mk. 10:48 ([I.H.M.] cf. Test. Sol. 20:1).

[I.H.M.] The pericope is frequently regarded as a creation of the early church, even as a means of defending the claims of a Jesus who was not a lineal descendant of David to be the messiah. But there is no evidence that the Davidic descent of Jesus was ever doubted. The question is presented in a way which avoids explicitly identifying Jesus as the Son of David – which fits in with Jesus' careful avoidance of titles that might be misunderstood. It juxtaposes two apparently conflicting statements based on Scripture and asks how they are to be reconciled. The messiah can be both a descendant of David and David's lord by virtue of his exaltation; the messiah is not merely a descendant of David but also the Son of God (cf. 2 Sam. 7:12–16), or possibly the Son of man. The objections to the authenticity of the saying are unconvincing (cf. I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke, 1978, on 20:41–44).

(b) Matthew gives especial weight to Jesus' Davidic descent and heightens the way in which he is thus addressed and acclaimed (9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30; 21:9, 15; 22:42, 45). A comparison with the text of Mk. shows the particularly strong echoes of salvation history in this emphasis on the descent from David ([Tr.] which appears in the stories of healing and of the messianic entry into Jerusalem). In the preface Jesus is described as "messiah" (Christos), "son of David" and "son of Abraham" (1:1); this indicates that his origin, and also his position in salvation history, is a theme of the whole book.

In Matt. 1:20 Joseph too, the father of Jesus, "Mary's husband" (1:16), is called "son of David"; this shows that the genealogical sense of the phrase has not been relinquished. In Judaism it had above all a legal significance: recognition by the father determined the succession (SB I 35). The degree to which this genealogy set forth Jesus' claim to a place in salvation history is shown by the structure of the family tree with its 3 groups of 14 members; in 1 Chr. 2:1 ff. and Ruth 4:18 ff. fourteen names are listed between Abraham and David. Matt. deliberately fits Jesus' messianic status into Israel's history and thereby emphasizes his claims.

(c) It is significant that the Lucan birth-narrative presupposes our tradition of Jesus' Davidic sonship ("house of David", 1:27, 69; "city of David", 2:4, 11; "throne of David", 1:32), but only cautiously implies it (2:11). That Luke admits it genealogically is clear from the family tree (3:31). It is striking how Jesus is acclaimed as "King" by the lips of the Jewish people (19:38; 23:2): this draws out the full implications of the motif of Davidic sonship (cf. Jn. 12:13). It is easy to discern how Lk. wrestles with a particular body of Jewish material.

4. The Johannine tradition puts Jewish messianic questions to the tradition about Jesus: (a) when the messiah comes no one will know whence he comes (Jn. 7:27); (b) the messiah is of the line of David, from → Bethlehem, David's home (7:42). These objections levelled by Judaism can appeal to the OT (origins in Bethlehem) or given tradition (hiddenness of the messiah: 2 Esd. 7:28; 13:25, Syr. Bar. 29:3). It is not that the tradition is false, for it corresponds to statements which are also possible within the tradition about Jesus; but the evangelist is aware of a fact that is not within the scope of the tradition; the statements of the tradition cannot adequately accommodate the Christ whom he confesses. The title of honour "Son of David" does not occur in the Fourth Gospel in so many words; the confession of Jewish Christianity rather refers to the "king of Israel" (Jn. 1:49; 12:13; 19:19; cf. the interpretation in 18:37).

There is an archaic ring about Rev. 5:5 (cf. Gen. 49:9 f.; Isa. 11:1, 10) and Rev. 22:16 (cf. Isa. 11:1, 10; Num. 24:17), which is reminiscent of the messiah ben Dāwîd of the OT and the Qumran tradition. ([I.H.M.] Cf. Rev. 3:7 where Christ holds the key of David (Isa. 22:22) which controls entry to the heavenly banquet hall; → Open, art. kleis.) The Jewish-Christian tradition has here been worked into the Johannine Christology.

5. [I.H.M.] The title "Son of David" thus sums up the NT confession of Jesus as a descendant of David who fulfils the promise of the coming of an anointed king, and who is the glorious antitype of both David and his son, Solomon. This messianic hope is fulfilled in Jesus' birth as the adopted son of Joseph at Bethlehem, in his works of mercy and healing, and in his entry to Jerusalem. Although the title is inadequate to convey the high status of the One who is David's (and everyman's) Lord, nevertheless it remains a fitting title for the exalted Son of God in whose possession is the key to the heavenly banquet.

6. In the patristic tradition, things are complicated by the interplay of later christological controversies. Ignatius is fond of citing the confession of Jesus as being of the seed or race of David (Ign., Smy. 1:1; Rom. 7:3; Eph. 18:2; 20:2; Trall. 9:1). He is here interested in a real man as opposed to docetism. On the other hand, Barn. 12:10 understands the Synoptic question about the relation of "David's Son" and "David's Lord" (Matt. 22:42-44) in a negative way; the passage of scripture means to say expressly that Jesus is not David's son, but his Lord. The Epistle is not dispensing with Jesus' humanity, but is opposing a Jewish-Christian view that regarded him as a "man born of men" (Justin, Dial. 47 ff.). Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3, 19-20, 8; 3, 32, 3 ff., tells of the members of Jesus' family who, because of their membership of the house of David, are placed in serious jeopardy in the reign of Domitian. Hegesippus (quoted by Eusebius) says: "But there still survived of the family of the Lord the grandsons of Jude, his brother after the flesh, as he was called. They were informed against as being of the family of David." The old genealogical problem did not die out in the church; Hegesippus' account can hardly be doubted. O. Michel

The Genealogies of Jesus Christ

In the only comprehensive study of the subject of biblical genealogies, M. D. Johnson concludes that the genealogical form could be used as an alternative to narrative or poetic forms of expression as one of several methods of writing history and of conveying the theological and nationalistic concerns of a people (The Purpose of Biblical Genealogies, with Special Reference to the Setting of the Genealogies of Jesus, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 8, 1969).

Old Testament. In the OT the following functions are suggested (art. cit., 77-82):

1. To demonstrate existing relations between Israel and neighbouring tribes by tracing them back to common patronyms, thus establishing a degree of kinship and at the same time a degree of distinction between Israel and her neighbours.
2. To interrelate previously isolated elements concerning Israelite origins by the creation of a coherent and inclusive genealogical system.
3. To establish (by 2) continuity over those periods of time not covered by material in the tradition.
4. To serve as the vehicle for chronological speculation concerning the "Great Year" or world cycles; e.g. Gen. 5, to establish a date for the Flood; Gen. 11, the birth of Abraham; others, the date of the exodus.
5. To demonstrate the legitimacy of an individual in his office or to provide someone of rank with connexions to a worthy family or an individual of the past. This legitimacy principle appears to have been crucial with regard to cultic functions.

especially priesthood. Otherwise genealogies serve to identify and enhance the status of an individual.

6. In Ezra-Nehemiah (only) genealogies are important to establish and preserve the homogeneity of the race, a concern for the purity of “the holy seed” (Ezr. 9:2), taken up and strengthened in the rabbinic tradition.

7. To assert the importance of the principle of the continuity of the people of God through a period of national disruption; e.g. that the post-exilic Israel of the restoration is identical with the Israel of the monarchy, sharing its promises and its cultus.

8. To divide history into epochs, and demonstrate the meaningful outworking of the predetermined plan of God for history – the most frequent use of the genealogical form in the priestly writings.

Later Judaism. Old Testament interest in genealogical speculation continued on two levels. First, the concern expressed within rabbinic writings for individual legitimacy by a genealogical stratification of society, a concern which appears in both the earliest halakoth and the later midrashim with the same character and intensity. But genealogical records were not readily available to individual families within Judaism, with the important exception of the priesthood. This led to the need to use oral traditions and also midrashic exegesis to carry on genealogical investigation and speculation.

Secondly, the rise of messianic expectation has, as one corollary, the debates on the ancestry of the messiah, debates which may reflect the views of different parties within Judaism. In first-century Judaism there is not only the more general expectation of a messiah from the line of David. There is also a well supported opinion that the messiah is to come from the line of Aaron. The two genealogies of Jesus, in different ways, reveal a knowledge of such rabbinic discussion on the ancestry of the messiah and are written on the basis of the same midrashic methodology.

New Testament. It has usually been assumed that, if the Matthean and Lucan genealogies of Jesus are to have a legitimate place in the Gospel tradition, they must be evaluated from the point of view of historical reliability (Johnson, 140 ff.). Consequently, since the early church, scholars have discussed the differences between Matt. 1:1–17 and Lk. 3:23–38. The assumption, that both lists are intended to preserve historically accurate information, necessitates complicated and creative attempts at harmonization involving a number of problems:

1. From David to the exile, Matthew traces the line of descent through the royalty of Judah, while in Luke the line passes through Nathan, son of David.

2. The two lists meet again in Zerubbabel and Shealtiel.

3. After Shealtiel, the two lists are composed of different and otherwise unknown names, until the two lines come together again in Joseph.

4. The number of names from Solomon to the exile is 14 in Matthew, and 20 in Luke (Nathan to Neri); from the exile to Jesus, Matthew has 13 names, Luke 21.

5. Four women are included in Matthew.

6. Matthew has a 3 x 14 scheme of names.

7. Matthew's order descends, but Luke's ascends.

8. Matthew omits names prior to Abraham.

9. Matthew uses the formula “A egennesen B”; Luke has tou + genitive.

10. Minor variations occur in orthography and form of names.

Harmonizing attempts have usually been made in one of three ways:

1. Both genealogies are Joseph's, but Matthew traces the biological ancestry, Luke the legal. Julius Africanus, c. A.D. 220 (Euseb., HE 1.7), is the first to have proposed levirate marriages to account for the differences. The theory runs: Matthan, grandfather of Joseph in Matthew's list, married Estha and begat Jacob. After the death of Matthan, Melchi (unrelated to Matthan), grandfather of Joseph in Luke's list, married Estha and begat Eli; hence Jacob and Eli were half-brothers. Eli died without children. Jacob married the widow in a levirate marriage and begat Joseph. Thus Matthew gives the physical ancestry of Joseph, Luke the legal. The artificiality of the reconstruction makes the hypothesis unconvincing.

2. Some modern scholars (including Westcott, Moffatt, Vincent Taylor) have reversed the first theory: Matthew gives the legal line of succession and Luke the natural descent. This at least recognizes the evident artificiality of Matthew's list. In its extreme form (P. Gaechter, Das Matthäus Evangelium, 1963, 30 f.), Matthew gives the legal line of throne succession, explicit prior to the exile, and becoming a "secret royal line" of descent between Zerubbabel and Joseph, while Luke provides the line of blood-relationship. At certain points in Matthew's list, egennēsen can mean adopted rather than begat. Thus Jeconiah, irrevocably condemned to childlessness in Jer. 22:24–30, adopted Shealtiel, actual son of Neri, descendant of David through Nathan. Matthew, after Zerubbabel, followed the supposed secret kings' line until it reached Jacob, who was without heir and did precisely what Jeconiah had done, viz. "appointed" Joseph, son of Eli from another Zerubbabel line, as his descendant, communicating to him the tradition of the continuation of the secret royal line from which the messiah would arise. But the whole suggestion is without the support of evidence and is no more satisfactory than the first theory. E. L. Abel points out some problems. 1. The same explanation of levirate marriage must be invoked to account for Shealtiel's two different fathers (Matt. 1:12; Lk. 3:27). 2. There is no reason why Estha should have been compelled to marry again since she already had a son. 3. It is questionable whether the levirate custom also applied to half-brothers (NTS 20, 1973–4, 203).

3. Annius of Viterbo (c. 1490) and Luther were the first to propose that Matthew gives Joseph's ancestry and Luke Mary's. This suggestion is based on a strained exegesis of Lk. 3:23, punctuating the verse to read "being the son, supposedly of Joseph (but actually) of Eli, son of Matthat, son of Levi". Eli is then assumed to be the grandfather of Mary and the whole list to be her pedigree (F. Godet, A Commentary on the Gospel of St Luke, 1878, I 127–30). It was not a Jewish custom to trace one's ancestry on the maternal side, so no such record would have been kept for Mary (Abel, 203).

Johnson (op. cit., 145) considers that none of these attempts is satisfactory. Each one is based on the assumption that the function of the genealogies was to preserve historical accuracy, whereas before and after the NT period that function was governed by midrashic speculation. The genealogy in Matthew finds its most natural setting in the genealogical and messianic speculation of Judaism, as preserved in the intertestamental and rabbinic literature. This is to be seen in both the details of the text of Matt. 1:1–17 and in its overall design. Moreover, the motifs and function of the genealogy find parallels in the narrative.

The opening words of Matt. 1, "The book of the genealogy (biblos genešēōs) of Jesus Christ", are usually interpreted as the title to the genealogical table which follows in vv. 2–16, but something more may be implied. On the only two occasions in the LXX where the phrase biblos genešēōs appears (Gen. 2:4, 5:1), it does not merely introduce a genealogy, but also mentions the process of the creation of the universe or of man. It is therefore possible that the use of this phrase at the beginning of Matthew's Gospel deliberately suggests that the advent of Jesus inaugurates a "new creation", or at least a new era for humanity and the world (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, 1972, 74 f.).

Abraham and David are singled out as pivotal points in the genealogical development of the ancestry of Jesus. The two names are in the mainstream of Jewish messianism in both intertestamental and rabbinic literature, as well as of Christian messianism. Son of David emphasizes the royal messiahship (Pss. Sol. 17:21), while son of Abraham, which is also a messianic title (Test. Lev. 8:15), stresses Jesus' origin within the Jewish nation and faith: he is the true seed of Abraham in whom the promises of God are fulfilled. Luke takes the ancestry of Jesus back to Adam, thus pointing to his descent from the universal father of mankind; Matthew goes back no further than to the father of the Israelites (Hill, op. cit., 75).

The inclusion of the four women in Matthew's genealogy reveals the writer's knowledge of rabbinic speculation on the ancestry of the messiah. Women rarely occur in Jewish genealogies, and only when an irregularity of descent is involved or when there is something noteworthy about the woman's name (SB I 15). In OT genealogies, women are usually mentioned in order to distinguish among different families or individuals who were traditionally traced to the same figure in the past. Matthew's choice is remarkable in that it includes two harlots (Tamar, Rahab), and an adulteress (Bathsheba); and probably all four women were, as contemporary tradition held, of Gentile stock. The OT itself is specific about Ruth (1:4) and Rahab (Jos. 4), while "wife of Uriah" (Matt. 1:6) serves as a reminder that Bathsheba's husband was a Hittite. No OT basis exists for Rahab as mother of Boaz. This identification appears to reflect Jewish midrash tradition, which drew parallels between Rahab and Ruth, Tamar and Ruth, and Tamar and Rahab (Sifre Num. 10:29; Ruth R. 2:1, 4; Megillah 10b, 14b). In focusing upon Tamar, Rahab, and Ruth, and stating that Rahab was the mother of Boaz, the author of Matthew's genealogy displays a familiarity with the midrash.

Johnson comments on the main suggestions put forward to explain the presence of the four women (op. cit., 154 ff.).

1. They foreshadow Jesus' concern in Matthew for sinners and Gentiles; but the reason for doing this through blemishes in the messianic genealogy is obscure.
2. The women demonstrate how God can use even the humble and despised and sinful to accomplish his purpose.
3. The women are in some sense types of Mary; e.g. their unexpected intrusion is in anticipation of Mary's sudden introduction in Matt. 1:18 ff. But it is difficult to understand how women associated with immorality and Gentile ancestry can serve as parallels to Mary.
4. Matthew is consciously refuting or mitigating attacks on the legitimacy of Jesus' birth by pointing to blemishes in the biblical pedigree of David and his line. But the so-called refutation is of such a nature as to encourage calumny, for an opponent of Christian messianism could claim the case of Mary as a parallel to the four women with their blemishes. More probably it was the genealogy and the birth narratives that prompted the calumnies. The conclusive argument against this approach is that Jewish tradition exonerated each of the four women, and pictured at least Rahab and Ruth as exemplars of conversion and faith. 5. Johnson himself concludes that Matthew's inclusion of the four women was to show that in every respect messianic categories fulfilled in Jesus were precisely those Pharisaic elements which were present in first-century Judaism (op. cit., 178, 209). The four women had come to occupy a place in rabbinic tradition to support the ancestry of a Davidic messiah, against those who maintained the expectation of a Levitical messiah. The genealogy is essentially midrashic in character. It is an interpretation of the structure and goal of history, tied to the details of Scripture, yet incorporating extra-biblical information – such as the inclusion of Rahab in the genealogy of David. To counter the Christian claim that Jesus was the Davidic messiah, the rabbis could not criticize the genealogy in Matthew, either in its structure or in its details, which were dependent on biblical data and Pharisaic tradition, but could only point to the irregularity of Jesus' birth and apply to him the scandal associated with an affair of a Jewish maiden with a Roman soldier who lived at a time far earlier than the birth of Jesus (M. Goguel, Jesus and the Origins of Christianity, ET 1960, I 74).

Johnson (op. cit., 210 ff.) supports the view of A. Vögtle (BZ 9, 1965, 48) that the Matthean genealogy is the product of a unified conception rather than a reworking of an existing list, and reveals similarities with the rest of the Gospel in matters of form, language, and theology. He draws attention to:

1. Numerical structure. Matthew's predilection for threes and sevens is frequently displayed, e.g. three temptations (4:1–11), three illustrations of righteousness (6:1–18), three miracles of healing (8:1–15), a threefold "fear not" (10:26, 28, 31), three questions (22:15–40), three prayers in Gethsemane (26:39–44). (An extensive list is in W. C. Allen, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to St Matthew, 1907, lxx.) An emphasis on the number seven occurs in 12:45 (demons), 15:34 (loaves), 15:37 (baskets), 18:21 f. (forgiveness), 22:35 (brothers), ch. 23 (woes). The arrangement of the genealogy into 3 x 14 or 3 x 7 x 2 seems entirely congruous. The evangelist emphasizes the form of the genealogy (1:17) because he intends it as a survey to underscore the predetermined character of the coming of Jesus as the Davidic messiah in three stages: the three groups of names show respectively the origin of David's house, its fall at the captivity, and its restoration in the Christ. It is possible that this artificial arrangement into three sections is to be connected with the name David, the three Heb. consonants of which (d, w, d) have a numerical value (by gematria) of 14 (d = 4, w = 6). As well as providing an aid to memory, this schematization would strengthen the already clear emphasis upon the Davidic character of Jesus (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, 1972, 74). E. J. Goodspeed (Matthew, Apostle and Evangelist, 1959, 25) suggests that Matthew's pattern of 3 x 14 is to exhibit Jesus as the beginning of the seventh seven since Abraham, thus representing the climax of history. This numerical interest may also mark the author as Matthew the tax collector, the man of figures.

2. Language. Both Matthew's genealogy and the rest of his Gospel reveal the influence of the Gk. OT, a definite Jewish element, and a knowledge of rabbinic theology. In common with other NT writers, the evangelist usually turns to the LXX for OT references (the fulfilment-formula quotations, such as 1:22; 2:15; 4:14, are an exception). Certainly Matthew uses the LXX for the genealogical names, e.g. Matt. 1:2 quotes 1 Chr. 1:34 as Jacob (LXX), not Israel (Heb.).

3. Theology. (a) Son of David. The opening verse of Matthew's Gospel introduces the genealogy with the claim that Jesus is hyios David, son of David. The phrase is repeated nine times in the rest of the Gospel, usually in material peculiar to Matthew, and not elsewhere in the Synoptics apart from Marcan and Lucan parallels to Matt. 20:30 f. and 22:42, 45. The application of the title son of David to Joseph (1:20) serves to connect the birth pericope to the genealogy: Jesus is son of David because Joseph is son of David. Of all four Gospels, it is Matthew's which most clearly interprets the significance of Jesus along the lines of the Pharisaic conception of the Davidic messiah (see J. M. Gibbs, "Purpose and Pattern in Matthew's Use of the title 'Son of David'", NTS 10, 1963–4, 446–64).

(b) Eschatology. The distinctive mark of the genealogy, in structuring history into three epochs culminating in the dawn of the messianic age in Jesus, is reflected in the Gospel as a whole. First, Elijah, the prophet of the end-times, has already come in the person of John the Baptist (Matt. 17:12 f.). John occupies a position at the beginning of the end-times, yet one distinct from the time of Jesus. Secondly, the ministry of Jesus is clearly seen to be a decisive event of eschatological history (e.g. 4:16, 12:6, 41 f.), though Matthew distinguishes between the dawn of the messianic age and the future age to come (12:32, a distinction not made in Mk. 3:29 or Lk. 12:10). Thirdly, Matthew stresses the future appearance of Jesus as the Son of man presiding over the final judgment (13:39 f., 49; 24:3). Johnson (op. cit., 222) quotes the suggestion of K. Stendahl (Peake's Commentary on the Bible, 1962, 770 f.) that Matthew counts the messiah (Christos, 1:16) as the fourteenth member, while Jesus is the thirteenth. "Christ" would then refer to Jesus in his risen state and/or at his coming (parousia) at the end of time, in the sense in which the futuristic eschatology of the early church could include a prayer that God would "send the Christ appointed for you, Jesus, whom heaven must receive until the time for establishing all that God spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets from of old" (Acts 3:20; cf. 2:36).

By comparison with Matthew, Luke in his genealogy has simply a continuous list of names, without grouping or elaboration (apart from 3:23). After the time of David a number of names are repeated: variations of Mattathias (five times), Jesus, Levi, and Melchi (twice each), Joseph (thrice), and Simeon/Simein. The general use of the names of the twelve patriarchs of Israel as personal names cannot be traced before post-exilic times, and was not common among the Jews until the Ptolemaic and Roman periods (Johnson, op. cit., 229 f.). This reflects the growing interest in family trees, particularly in post-exilic times when families of pure race proclaimed their membership of true Israel and their separation from those who had intermarried with Gentiles (Ezr. 9) by using tribal surnames (J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1967, 275).

The fact that Luke inserts his genealogy into a Marcan framework, i.e. between Jesus' baptism and temptation, suggests that he has a theological purpose in mind. The function of Luke's genealogy may be explained in several ways.

1. Apocalyptic. The 77 names are seen by K. Bornhäuser (Die Geburts- und Kindheitsgeschichte Jesu, 1930, 20–22) as eleven world-weeks, at the end of which the messianic week begins, a parallel with some apocalyptic reconstructions of history (SB IV 986 f.). This view would be contrary to H. Conzelmann's influential work on The Theology of St Luke, 1960 (Die Mitte der Zeit, 1954), in which he argues that in Luke the apocalyptic fulfilment in the parousia is separated from the time of Jesus' ministry by the (indeterminate) period of the church, and that in interpreting the significance of Jesus' ministry, Luke excluded apocalyptic categories (Johnson, op. cit., 233). But Conzelmann's thesis has not gone unchallenged. "Conzelmann's mistake is that he has made a distinction between the ministry of Jesus, which (in his view) Luke has de-eschatologized, and the future time of the End. It is more correct to say that Luke has broadened out the time of the End so that it begins with the ministry of Jesus, includes the time of the church, and is consummated at the parousia. Luke has not pushed the End into the distant future; he has lengthened it to include the whole era of salvation from the time of Jesus onwards" (I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian, 1970, 121).

2. Christ as the Second Adam. A typological relationship of Jesus to Adam is seen in the fact that Luke leads the genealogy back not to Abraham (as Matthew) but to Adam, son of God, thus illustrating Luke's general concern to portray the universal character of Jesus' ministry (W. Manson, The Gospel of Luke, 1930, 35). But a veiled allusion of this nature in Luke's genealogy seems unlikely since the (Pauline) motif of Christ as the second Adam is nowhere explicit in Luke/Acts. Luke's genealogy in fact ends not with Adam but with God, and any typological significance is more likely to be of Jesus as Son of God (Johnson, op. cit., 235).

3. Jesus as Son of God. The position of the genealogy between the baptism and the temptation finds significance in the linking motif of Jesus as Son of God (3:22, 38; 4:3, 9). Moreover, the Lucan genealogy runs backwards from Jesus to God, which is without parallel in OT or rabbinic texts for a genealogy. "Thus it is not impossible that Luke saw in the genealogy one way of understanding the ascription of the Son of God title to Jesus: Jesus is Son of God not through the categories of pre-existence or physical (or metaphysical) relationship between Father and Son, but through the line of OT patriarchs and post-biblical historical figures. In this way, Luke historicizes the title, emphasizing the continuity of the Son with the OT and with Judaism" (Johnson, op. cit., 237 f.).

4. Jesus as Prophet. Rather than listing the royal succession from David to the exile, as does Matthew, Luke proceeds from David to his third son born in Jerusalem, Nathan (2 Sam. 5:14), and from him through a series of unknown names up to Shealtiel and Zerubbabel, and thence through more unknown names to Joseph. In certain Jewish circles David's son Nathan was identified with the prophet of the same name (Tg. Zech. 12:12, Codex Reuchlinianus). If Luke was aware of the tradition, this may be the reason why he deviates from Matthew's genealogy: it was to bring out the prophetic element. Luke/Acts constantly emphasizes the rôle of prophecy in references to the OT, in Jesus' ministry, and in the mission of the church (Johnson, op. cit., 240–52). Not that Matthew is unaware of the prophetic strand. For "Abijah the father of Asa" (Matt. 1:7) the better reading is "Asaph", although king Asa is undoubtedly meant. In Matt. 1:10 "Amos" is read, where we should expect "Amon". J. Schniewind (Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, 1956, 10) thinks that the changes are deliberate and designed to recall the psalmist (Pss. 73:1; 75:1) and the prophet. If so, then Matthew's genealogy contains in a cryptic form the idea of the fulfilment of prophecy and the hopes of the Psalmist (Hill, op. cit., 75 f.).

5. The Beginning of Jesus' Ministry. In Luke 1:23 the person of Jesus is given prominence in the use of the pronoun autos, he, which opens the sentence, by the addition of the name Jesus, and by the verb ēn, was, which separates pronoun from substantive and sets both in relief: "and himself was, he, Jesus. . .". Luke indicates this as the moment when Jesus formally comes forward to commence his proper work. With the baptism, the obscurity in which he has so far lived passes. Jesus is now detached from those who have hitherto surrounded him, i.e. Mary, Joseph, the Baptist. The genealogy of Moses is similarly placed (Exod. 6:14 ff.), not at the opening of his biography but at the moment when he appears on the stage of history as he presents himself before Pharaoh (F. Godet, A Commentary on the Gospel of St Luke, 1878, I, 196).

N. Hillyer

The Virgin Birth

The term virgin birth is commonly used as the equivalent of virginal conception, but a strong tradition in the Roman Catholic Church holds that Jesus was not only conceived but actually born miraculously, leaving Mary still a virgo intacta. This idea first appears in the Protevangelium of James (probably late 2nd cent.), and thereafter emerges in various writers, e.g. John of Damascus (De Fide Orthodoxa 4, 15) and Bernard (Sermo de Virginis Nativitate 4). Aquinas writes, "Christ came out of the closed womb of his mother, and so there was no violence of the opening of passages" (Summa Theologiae III Q35, art. 6). This theory is accepted by E. C. Messenger as a proper doctrine of the church (The Mystery of Sex and Marriage II, 1948, 100 ff.). The doctrine honours the idea of the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, but it encounters difficulty in Luke's deliberate quotation of "every male that opens the womb . . ." (Lk. 2:23; cf. Exod. 13:2, 12).

This article is concerned with the virginal conception, which issued in the birth without any human intercourse (Matt. 1:25).

1. Survey of Sources. (a) There are two obviously independent records of the conception of Jesus Christ, and both say that he was conceived miraculously through the agency of the Holy Spirit without male parentage (Matt. 1:20; Lk. 1:35). In Matt.'s account Joseph finds that, although betrothed to him, Mary is already pregnant. He knows that he is not the father of the child and resolves to dissolve the relationship quietly (Matt. 1:19; cf. Deut. 24:1-14; → Divorce). "But as he considered this, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, saying 'Joseph, son of David, do not fear to take Mary your wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit'" (Matt. 1:20). In Lk.'s account the angel Gabriel tells Mary of the favour of the Lord in granting her a son who will be called Jesus. In reply to Mary's question, "How can this be, since I have no husband?" (Lk. 1:34), the angel says, "The Holy Spirit of the Most High will overshadow you; therefore the child to be born will be called holy, the Son of God" (Lk. 1:35; → Shadow, art. skia NT 2). There is no alternative story in the NT, but there are other passages which make most sense if the writers knew of the virgin birth.

(b) Mark begins his Gospel where early preaching normally began, namely with the witness of John the Baptist (cf. Acts 1:22; 10:36 ff; 13:24). When, however, he gives the comments of the people in Mk. 6:3, he quotes these as, "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary?" By contrast, Matthew (13:55) and Luke (4:22), who had already recorded the virgin birth, have respectively, “Is not this the carpenter’s son?” and “Is not this Joseph’s son?”

(c) John writes of Jesus Christ as the eternal Son. He also begins with John the Baptist, yet later indicates that there were discreditable rumours about the birth of Jesus, when in Jn. 8:41 the Jews attack him with the words, “We [emphatic] were not born of fornication”. There is also the unexpected alternative reading of John 1:13, which changes the plur. into sing.: “. . . who believe on the name of him who was born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God.” This reading rests on one Latin MS, the Verona Codex, but it was accepted by Tertullian (De Carne Christi, 19 and 24, where he treats the plur. reading as a forgery), Justin (Apol. I. 22, 2), and Irenaeus (Haer. 3, 16, 2). The Epistula Apostolorum (probably early 2nd cent.), says of Jesus Christ, “born, not by carnal lust, but by the will of God”, which, as B. H. Streeter says, “seems to imply the famous Western reading of Jn. i. 13” (The Four Gospels, 1924, 70), which “makes John assert the Virgin Birth” (op. cit., 268 n. 1). The reading is strongly defended by Douglas Edwards, The Virgin Birth in History and Faith, 1943, 130 ff.

(d) Whenever Paul speaks of the birth of Jesus Christ, he uses the verb ginomai, which has the broad meaning of “come to be” (→ Birth). This is particularly significant in Gal. 4:4, 23 f. Jesus Christ “comes to be” by a woman, whereas Isaac and Ishmael, born of two women, are begotten and born, since the vb. gennaō, used here, carries overtones of the father’s act. Paul uses the same general word in Rom. 1:3 (“came of the seed of David according to the flesh”) and Phil. 2:7 (“coming to be in the likeness of men”). On each occasion, Paul avoids the normal word for born, which is understandable if, as the travelling companion of Luke, he knew that Jesus was born miraculously. It may well be that he had the virgin birth in mind when he drew the balance and contrast between → Adam and Christ in 1 Cor. 15:45–48. Adam is from earth and Christ from heaven, but both came miraculously from the hand of God. This interpretation of Paul’s thought is not as forced as it might appear, since it is taken up and amplified by Irenaeus (Haer. 3, 21, 10) and the Nag Hammadi Gospel of Philip (ed. W. C. Till, Patristische Texte und Studien 2, 1963, 43 f.). There is thus little justification for speaking of the silence of the NT outside Matthew and Luke. Such reticence as there was in public preaching may well have been out of respect for Mary. We do not know how long she lived, but malicious tongues could easily have turned the virgin birth into scandal. Consider also how rarely any orthodox preacher today mentions the virgin birth in his normal run of sermons during the year, even though he often refers to the incarnation.

(e) After A.D. 100 the fact is alluded to by Ignatius (Smyr. 1:1, before A.D. 120), the Apology of Aristides (c. 140), Justin in his Dialogue with Trypho (e.g. 43 f., 68, 84), and Irenaeus frequently (e.g. Haer. 3, 21, 4f. and 9; 3, 22, 1–4). The Old Roman Creed (dated by F. Kattenbusch, soon after A.D. 100, Das Apostolische Symbol, II, 1900, 328) includes “Who was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary”. The fact that these early writers are protesting against those who deny the virgin birth shows that gnostics and others like the Ebionites knew it was an accepted part of Christian orthodoxy.

The virgin birth, according to the NT, is the channel by which the eternally pre-existing Second Person of the Trinity entered as a truly human being as part of the world of time and space. If Jesus were only a great prophet, without previous existence, his virgin birth would be of interest, but of no special significance.

2. Criticism of the Virgin Birth. Attacks on its historicity are partly on literary and partly on theological grounds, but no fresh facts have emerged that have not been discussed by such writers as James Orr and J. G. Machen.

(a) Literary. On the whole the tendency is to accept the early chapters as by Luke, although some allow for additions in revision. It is reasonable, then, to give weight to Luke's prologue, where he claims to have checked his facts from witnesses, whom he must often have met in his travels with Paul. We cannot exclude the virgin Mary herself. Indeed some think that Luke's story comes from Mary, while Matthew's comes from Joseph (e.g. M.-J. Lagrange, Évangile selon Saint Luc, 1927⁴, 116–26; J. G. Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1932², 194 ff.).

(b) Form criticism, however, regards the birth stories as the simple person's version of how Jesus was Son of God, in contrast to the more sophisticated idea that he became Son at his baptism, his resurrection, or eternally. One must then ask who evolved the two independent records, and why. Other religions have stories of virgins giving birth, but those stories are crudely polytheistic. Their very existence would militate against anything remotely similar emerging in Jewish-Christian circles, or among Gentile Christians who were constantly reacting against their religious environment.

(c) There is one often quoted literary criticism. The phrase in Lk. 1:34, "since I have no husband", is said by John of Damascus (8th cent.) to be missing from Greek codices. M. Dibelius regarded the story of the virgin birth as a legend based partly on Isa. 7:14 (From Tradition to Gospel, 1934, 124). H. D. A. Major regarded Lk. 1:34 f. as an interpolation, though made by the evangelist himself who could not restrain his love for the miraculous (in H. D. A. Major, T. W. Manson and C. J. Wright, The Mission and Message of Jesus, 1937, 262). The original story, Major held, was concerned with the Davidic descent of the messiah (cf. v. 33). Yet Lk. 1:34 is in all existing MSS.

A similar poorly supported objection is the reading of the Sinaitic Syriac text in Matt. 1:16, "Joseph begat Jesus, who is called Christ" (on the readings of this v. see Metzger, 2–7). Elsewhere this MS supports the virgin birth, but the reading is accepted by e.g. J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, 1925, 232, and C. Montefiore, The Synoptic Gospels, II, 1909, 452, as expressing the historical reality of the situation.

(d) Both genealogies are apparently Joseph's, although Lk. 3:23 has the cautionary "as was supposed" of Joseph's parentage of Jesus. Yet it is not too difficult to see Luke's list as being Mary's (and hence Christ's) descent from David. Mary's father (Heli?) had two daughters, Mary and the unnamed wife of Zebedee (John 19:25; Matt. 27:56). If there were no sons, Joseph would become son of Heli on his marriage, to preserve the family name and inheritance (cf. Num. 27:1–11; 36:1–12, especially v. 8, which accounts for Mary marrying a man of the family of David). For a critical study of the genealogies see M. D. Johnson, The Purpose of the Biblical Genealogies with Special Reference to the Genealogies of Jesus, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 8, 1969, and the discussion above on The Genealogies of Jesus Christ.

(e) Some find it impossible to reconcile what is said of the conception with the idea of the eternal Christ, as held by Paul and John (e.g. W. Pannenberg, Jesus – God and Man, 1968, 141–50; E. Brunner, The Mediator, 1934, 322–27; and Dog- matics, II, 1952, 350 ff.). If, however, the records in Matthew and Luke represent the angelic communications to Mary and Joseph, they could not at this stage have grasped the later unfolding revelation of the eternal Christ. To them it was a beginner's truth that Mary was to be the mother of the messianic Son of God. Our modern carol services at Christmas start at the same place, but go on to the profound expressions of the incarnation without consciousness of contradiction.
662

3. Physical Considerations. Although the physical facts are usually ignored, the modern knowledge of genetics throws some light on the necessity for the virginal conception. Since the man alone carries the Y chromosome which produces a male child, there is no question of Mary's producing a child spontaneously, since this would have been a girl. Like every mother, Mary provided the 23 chromosomes in her ovum, to be fertilized by a sex cell containing 23 chromosomes which unite to form the 46 which are in every cell in the human body (except the sex cells with 23). Thus the virgin birth involves the preparation through the Holy Spirit of the 23 chromosomes which would be taken by the Son of God. From the moment of conception there is a potential individual person. If, then, Joseph had been the father, there would have been an already existing "person" to which the person of Jesus Christ must have been added, thus producing a Nestorian Christ, with two persons existing in one body, or alternatively reducing Christ to a God-filled man, like one of the prophets. As it is, there was no moment of time from the moment of conception when the forming child in Mary's womb was not God incarnate and yet truly human.

4. The Virgin Birth and the Sinlessness and Divinity of Jesus. The theory that the virgin birth in itself secured Christ's freedom from original sin (possibly Heb. 4:15; 7:26) raises more problems than it solves (cf. Karl Barth, CD I, 2, 172–202). It would tie a physical transmission of original sin to the husband, and would be effective only if we postulate the equal sinlessness of Mary. This is held by the Roman Catholic Church, as expressed by E. C. Messenger: "She, as a child of Adam, incurred the debt of original sin, and was exempted from the actual stain of original sin only by a special privilege, granted her in virtue of the merits of her Divine Son" (The Mystery of Sex and Marriage, II, 84). This view reflects Pius IX's definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception: "that the most Blessed Virgin Mary in the first instant of her conception, by a unique grace and privilege of the omnipotent God and in consideration of the merits of Christ Jesus the Saviour of the human race, was preserved free from all stain of original sin, is a doctrine revealed by God and therefore must be firmly and constantly held by all the faithful" (extract from the Bull Ineffabilis Deus, 8th December 1854). Yet many see that the original sinlessness of Mary would necessarily involve the sinlessness of her parents and grandparents ad infinitum.

Karl Barth, on the other hand, regards the virgin birth and the empty tomb as constituting "a single sign, the special function of which compared with other signs and wonders of the New Testament witness, is to describe and mark out the existence of Jesus Christ, amid the many other existences in human history, as that human existence in which God is Himself, God is alone, God is directly the Subject, the temporal reality of which is not only called forth, created, conditioned and supported by the eternal reality of God, but is identical with it" (CD I, 2, 182). "The man Jesus of Nazareth is not the true Son of God because He was conceived by the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin Mary. On the contrary, because He is the true Son of God and because this is an inconceivable mystery intended to be acknowledged as such, therefore He is conceived by the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin Mary. . . . The mystery does not rest upon the miracle. The miracle rests upon the mystery. The miracle bears witness to the mystery, and the mystery is attested by the miracle” (CD I, 2, 202).

J. Stafford Wright

→ Bethlehem, → Genealogy, → God, art. Emmanouël, → Jesus Christ, → Spirit, → Woman

General works:

(a). J. M. Allegro, “Further Messianic References in Qumran Literature”, JBL 75, 1956, 174–187; M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 1967³; W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos: A History of the Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus, 1970; O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963²; G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus Considered in the Light of Post-Biblical Jewish Writings and the Aramaic Language, 1909; R. H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology, 1965; D. Flusser, Jesus, 1969; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969; F. J. Foakes Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, I, 1920; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, I The Proclamation of Jesus, 1971; B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic, 1961; I. H. Marshall, The Origins of New Testament Christology, 1977; W. Marxsen, The Beginnings of Christology, 1969; C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology, 1977; S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh, 1956; A. E. J. Rawlinson, The New Testament Doctrine of the Christ, (Bampton Lectures 1926) 1926; E. Stauffer, Jesus and his Story, 1960; V. Taylor, The Names of Jesus, 1953; and The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching, 1958.

(b). H. R. Balz, Methodische Probleme der neutestamentlichen Christologie, 1967; O. Betz, “Die Frage nach dem messianischen Bewusstsein Jesu”, NovT 6, 1963, 20–48; J. Blank, Paulus und Jesus, 1968; T. Boman, Die Jesusüberlieferung im Lichte der neueren Volkskunde, 1967; N. A. Dahl, “Die Messianität Jesu bei Paulus”, in Studia Paulina (Festschrift für J. de Zwaan), 1953, 83–95; A. Hilgenfeld, Die jüdische Apokalyptik in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 1857, 1966.

On Servant:

(a). C. K. Barrett, “The Background of Mark 10:45”, in A. J. B. Higgins ed., New Testament Essays (in memory of T. W. Manson), 1959, 1–18; and “Mark 10:45: A Ransom for Many”, in New Testament Essays, 1972, 20–26; S. R. Driver and A. Neubauer, The Fifty-Third Chapter of Isaiah according to the Jewish Interpreters, 1876–77; I. Engnell, “The ‘Ebed Yahweh Songs and the Suffering Messiah in ‘Deutero-Isaiah’”, BJRL 31, 1948; R. T. France, “The Servant of the Lord in the Teaching of Jesus”, TB 19, 1968, 26–52; and Jesus and the Old Testament: His Application of Old Testament Passages to Himself and His Mission, 1971, 110–135; M. D. Hooker, Jesus and the Servant, 1959; J. Jeremias and W. Zimmerli, pais theou, TDNT V 654–717; A. Kerrigan, “Echoes of Themes from the Servant Songs in Pauline Theology”, Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus, II, 1963, 217–228; T. W. Manson, The Servant-Messiah, 1961; J. E. Ménard, “Pais Theou as Messianic Title in the Book of Acts”, CBQ 23, 1961, 14–25; C. F. D. Moule, The Phenomenon of the New Testament, 1967, 82–99; C. R. North, The Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah, 1956²; D. M. Stanley, “The Theme of the Servant of Yahweh in Primitive Christian Soteriology and its Transposition by St Paul”, CBQ 16, 1954, 385–425; V. Taylor, Jesus and his Sacrifice, 1937.

(b). P. Benoit, “Jésus et le Serviteur de Dieu”, in J. Dupont, ed., Jésus aux Origines de la Christologie, 1975, 111–140; L. Cerfaux, “L’Hymne au Christ – Serviteur de Dieu”, in Recueil L. Cerfaux, I, 1954, 425–437; and “Saint Paul et le Serviteur de Dieu d’Isaïe”, in Recueil L. Cerfaux, I, 1954, 439–454; J. Giblet, “Jésus, Serviteur de Dieu”, Lumière et Vie 7, 1958, 5–34; A. von Harnack, “Die Bezeichnung Jesu als ‘Knecht Gottes’ und ihre Geschichte in der alten Kirche”, Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin (phil.–hist. Klasse), 28, 1926, 212–238; H. Hegermann, Jesaja 53 in Hexapla, Targum und Peschitta, 1954; O. Kaiser, Der königliche Knecht, 1962²; E. Kränkl, Jesus der Knecht Gottes, 1972; E. Lohmeyer, Gottesknecht und Davidssohn, 1953²; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht, 1963²; R. Mach, Der Zaddik in Talmud und Midrasch, 1957; C. Maurer, “Knecht Gottes und Sohn Gottes im Passionsbericht des Markus”, ZTK 50, 1953, 1–38; H. Patsch, Abendmahl und historischer Jesus, 1972; M. Rese, “Überprüfung einiger Thesen von J. Jeremias zum Thema des Gottesknechts im Judentum”, ZTK 60, 1963, 21–41; K. Romaniuk, “De Themate Ebed Yahwe in soteriologia sancti Pauli”, CBQ 23, 1961, 14–25; H. W. Wolff, Jesaja 53 im Urchristentum, 1950².

On Son of man:

- (a). C. K. Barrett, Jesus and the Gospel Tradition, 1967; J. N. Birdsall, "Who is this Son of Man?" EQ 42, 1970, 7–17; M. Black, "The Son of Man Problem in Recent Research and Debate", BJRL 45, 1962–63, 305–318; and "The 'Son of Man' Passion Sayings in the Gospel Tradition", ZNW 60, 1969, 1–8; F. H. Borsch, The Son of Man in Myth and History, 1967; and The Christian and Gnostic Son of Man, SBT Second Series 14, 1970; C. Colpe, ho hyios tou anthrōpou, TDNT VIII 400–477; O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963², 137–192; G. Dalman, op. cit., 234–67; R. E. C. Formesyn, "Was there a Pronominal Connection for the Bar Nasha Self-designation?", NovT 8, 1966, 1–35; R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament, 1971, 135–148; R. H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology, 1965; T. F. Glasson, "The Son of Man Imagery: Enoch xiv and Daniel vii", NTS 23, 1976–77, 82–90; A. Gelston, "A Sidelight on the 'Son of Man'", SJT 22, 1969, 189–196; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969, 15–53; R. G. Hamerton-Kelly, Pre-Existence, Wisdom and the Son of Man, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 21, 1973; A. J. B. Higgins, "Son of Man – Forschung since 'The Teaching of Jesus'", in A. J. B. Higgins ed., New Testament Essays (in memory of T. W. Manson), 1959, 119–135; and Jesus and the Son of Man, 1964; M. D. Hooker, The Son of Man in Mark, 1967; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology I, 1971, 257–276; C. H. Kraeling, Anthrōpos and Son of Man, 1927; R. Leivestad, "Exit the Apocalyptic Son of Man", NTS 18, 1971–72, 243–267; B. Lindars, "The Son of Man in the Johannine Christology", in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament – In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973, 43–60; and "Re-Enter the Apocalyptic Son of Man", NTS 22, 1975–76, 52–72; R. Maddox, "The Function of the Son of Man according to the Synoptic Gospels", NTS 15, 1968–69, 45–74; "The Quest for Valid Methods in 'Son of Man' Research", TSF Bulletin 61, Autumn 1971, 14–21; and "The Function of the Son of Man in the Gospel of John", in R. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 186–204; T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus, 1935²; I. H. Marshall, "The Synoptic Son of Man Sayings in Recent Discussion", NTS 12, 1965–66, 327–351; and "The Son of Man in Contemporary Debate", EQ 42, 1970, 67–87; C. F. D. Moule, "Neglected Features in the Problem of 'the Son of Man'", in J. Gnilka, ed., Neues Testament und Kirche, 1974, 413–28; R. Otto, The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man, 1953; N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, 1967; and A Modern Pilgrimage in New Testament Christology, 1974; E. Schweizer, "The Son of Man", JBL 79, 1960, 119–129; and "The Son of Man again", NTS 9, 1962–63, 256–261; S. S. Smalley, "The Johannine Son of Man Sayings", NTS 15, 1968–69, 278–301; G. N. Stanton, Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 27, 1974; H. M. Teeple, "The Origin of the Son of Man Christology", JBL 84, 1965, 213–250; H. E. Tödt, The Son of Man in the Synoptic Tradition, 1965; G. Vermes, "The Use of bar nash/bar nasha in Jewish Aramaic", Appendix E in M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 1967³, 310–328; and Jesus the Jew, 1973, 160–191.
- (b). L. Goppelt, "Zum Problem des Menschensohns", in Christologie und Ethik, 1968, 66–78; and Theologie des Neuen Testaments, I, 1975, 226–253; G. Haufe, "Das Menschensohn Problem in der gegenwärtigen wissenschaftlichen Diskussion", EvTh 26, 1966, 130–141; J. Jeremias, "Die älteste Schicht der Menschensohn-Logien", ZNW 58, 1967, 159–172; R. Leivestad, "Der apokalyptische Menschensohn ein theologisches Phantom", ASTI 6, 1968, 49–105; H. Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn, 1896; G. Lindeskog, "Das Rätsel des Menschensohns", StTh 22, 1968, 149–174; O. Moe, "Der Menschensohn und der Urmensch", StTh 14, 1960, 119–129; U. B. Müller, Messias und Menschensohn in jüdischen Apokalypsen und in der Offenbarung des Johannes, 1972; R. Pesch and R. Schnackenburg, eds., Jesus und der Menschensohn, 1975; E. Ruckstuhl, "Die johanneische Menschensohnforschung 1957–1969", in J. Pfammatter and F. Furger, Theologische Berichte I, 1972, 171–284; R. Schnackenburg, "Der Menschensohn im Johannesevangelium", NTS 11, 1964–65, 123–137; S. Schulz, Untersuchungen zur Menschensohn-Christologie im Johannesevangelium, 1957; E. Schweizer, "Der Menschensohn", ZNW 50, 1959, 185–209; E. Sjöberg, Der Menschensohn im äthiopischen Henoch, 1946; and Der verborgene Menschensohn in den Evangelien, 1955; P. Vielhauer, "Gottesreich und Menschensohn in der Verkündigung Jesu", in Festschrift für G. Dehn, 1957, 51–79; and "Jesus und der Menschensohn", ZTK 60, 1963, 133–177 (both reprinted in P. Vielhauer, Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament, 1965, 55–91, 92–140).

On Son of God:

- (a). G. Cooke "The Sons of (the) God(s)", ZAW 76, 1964, 22–47; O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963², 270–305; G. Dalman, op. cit., 268–88; R. H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology, 1965; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969, 279–333; M. Hengel, The Son of God, 1976; E. Huntress, “‘Son of God’ in Jewish Writings prior to the Christian Era”, JBL 54, 1935, 117–123; W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God, 1966; E. Lövestam, Son and Saviour, 1961; I. H. Marshall, “The Divine Sonship of Jesus”, Interpretation 21, 1967, 87–103; and “The Development of Christology in the Early Church”, TB 18, 1967, 77–93; E. Schweizer, P. Wülfing von Martitz, G. Fohrer, E. Lohse, W. Schneemelcher, hyios, hyiothesia, TDNT VIII 334–397; G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 1973, 192–222.

(b). K. Berger, “Zum traditionsgeschichtlichen Hintergrund Christologischer Hoheitstitel”, NTS 17, 1970–71, 391–426; J. Bieneck, Sohn Gottes als Christusbezeichnung der Synoptiker, 1951; W. Grundmann, Die Gotteskindschaft in der Geschichte Jesu und ihre religionsgeschichtlichen Voraussetzungen, 1938; and “Sohn Gottes. Ein Diskussionsbeitrag”, ZNW 47, 1956, 113–133; B. M. F. van Iersel, “Der Sohn” in den synoptischen Jesusworten, Supplements to NovT 3, 1964²; J. Kögel, Der Sohn und die Söhne, 1904; T. de Kruijf, Der Sohn des lebendigen Gottes. Ein Beitrag zur Christologie des Matthäus, 1962; O. Michel and O. Betz, “Von Gott gezeugt”, in W. Eltester, ed., Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche, Festschrift für J. Jeremias, BZNW 26, 1964, 3–23; P. Pokorny, Der Gottessohn, 1971; G. P. Wetter, Der Sohn Gottes, 1916.

On Son of David:

(a). G. Dalman, op. cit., 316–23; L. R. Fisher, “Can this be the Son of David?” in T. F. Trotter, ed., Jesus and the Historian: Written in Honor of Ernest Cadman Colwell, 1968, 82–97; J. M. Gibbs, “Purpose and Pattern in Matthew’s Use of the Title ‘Son of David’”, NTS 10, 1963–64, 446–464; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969, 240–278; E. Lohse, hyios David, TDNT VIII 478–488.

(b). K. Berger, “Die königlichen Messiastraditionen des Neuen Testaments”, NTS 20, 1973–74, 1–44; and “Zum Problem der Messianität Jesu”, ZTK 71, 1974, 1–30; C. Burger, Jesus als Davidssohn, 1970; J. A. Fitzmyer, “Die Davidssohn-Überlieferung und Mt 22, 14–16 (und Par.)”, Concilium 2, 1966, 780 ff. (Eng. tr. in The Dynamism of Biblical Tradition, 1966, 75–87); R. P. Gagg, “Jesus und die Davidssohnfrage. Zur Exegese von Markus 12:35–37”, TZ 7, 1951, 18–30; B. M. F. van Iersel, “Fils de David et Fils de Dieu”, Recherches bibliques 6, 1962, 113–132; E. Lövestam, “Die Davidssohnfrage”, Svensk Exeges. Årsbok, 1962, 72 ff.; E. Lohmeyer, Gottesknecht und Davidssohn, 1953²; W. Michaelis, “Die Davidssohnschaft Jesu als historisches und kerygmatisches Problem”, in H. Ristow and K. Matthiae, eds., Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, 1960, 317–330; F. Neugebauer, “Die Davidssohnfrage (Mark xii, 35–37 parr.) und der Menschensohn”, NTS 21, 1974–75, 81–108; G. Schneider, “Die Davidssohnfrage (Mk. 12, 35–37)”, Bib 53, 1972, 65–90; A. Suhl, “Der Davidssohn im Matthäus-Evangelium”, ZNW 58, 1967, 57–81; W. Wrede, “Jesus als Davidssohn”, Vorträge und Studien, 1907, 147–177.

On the genealogies of Jesus Christ:

(a). E. L. Abel, “The Genealogies of Jesus . . .”, NTS 20, 1973–4, 203–10; H. A. Blair, “Mt. 1:16 and the Matthean Genealogy”, TU 87, 1964, 149–54; R. E. Brown, Birth of the Messiah . . ., 1977; C. T. Davis, “The Fulfilment of Creation . . .”, Journal of the American Academy of Religion 41, 1973, 520–35; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969; A. D. Heffern, “The Four Women in St Matthew’s Genealogy of Christ”, JBL 31, 1912, 69–81; R. T. Hood, “The Genealogies of Jesus”, in Early Christian Origins, ed. A. Wikgren, 1961, 1–13; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, ET 1969; M. D. Johnson, The Purpose of the Biblical Genealogies; with Special Reference to the Setting of the Genealogies of Jesus, SNTS Monograph Series 8, 1969; C. Kaplan, “Some N.T. Problems in the Light of the Rabbinics and the Pseudepigrapha, the Generation Schemes in Mt. 1:17; Lk. 3:24 ff.”, Bibliotheca Sacra 87, 1930, 465–71; J. G. Machen, Virgin Birth of Christ, 1932, 173 ff., 203 ff.; I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke, 1978, 157–65; H. Milton, “The Structure of the Prologue to St Matthew’s Gospel”, JBL 81, 1962, 176 ff.; M. J. Moreton, “The Genealogy of Jesus”, TU 87, 1964, 223 ff.; B. M. Newman, “Matthew 1:1–18: Some Comments and a Suggested Restructuring”, Bible Translator 27, 1976, 209–12; D. E. Nineham, “The Genealogy in St Matthew’s Gospel and its significance for the Study of the Gospel” (Manson Memorial Lecture, 1975), BJRL 58, 1976, 205–30; H. H. Oliver, “The Lucan Birth Stories and the Purpose of Luke-Acts”, NTS 10, 1963–4, 202–6; H. A. Sanders, “The Genealogies of Jesus”, JBL 32, 1913, 184–93; W. B. Tatum, “The Epoch of Israel: Luke i–ii and the Theological Plan of Luke-Acts”, NTS 13, 1966–7, 184–95; B. H. Throckmorton, “Genealogy (Christ)", IDB II 365 f.; H. C. Waetjen, "The Genealogy as the Key to the Gospel according to Matthew", JBL 95, 1976, 205–30; R. T. Wilson, Genealogy and History in the Biblical World, 1977.

(b). R. Bloch, "Juda engendra Pharès et Zara, de Thamar (Matth. 1:3)", in Mélanges Bibliques rédigés en l'honneur de André Robert, 1957, 381–9; K. Bornhäuser, Die Geburts- und Kindheitsgeschichte Jesu, 1930; U. Holzmeister, "Genealogia S. Lucae (Lk. 3:23–38)", Verbum Domini 23, 1943, 9–18; M. Krämer, "Die Menschwerdung Jesu Christi nach Matthäus", Bib. 45, 1964, 47 ff.; G. Kuhn, "Die Geschlechtsregister Jesu bei Lukas und Matthäus, nach ihrer Herkunft untersucht", ZNW 22, 1923, 206–28; M. Lambertz, "Die Toledoth im Mt. 1:1–17 und Lc. 3:23b ff.", in Festschrift Franz Dornseiff, ed. H. Kusch, 1953, 211–25; E. Nestle, "Salomo und Nathan im Mt 1 und Lc 3", ZNW 8, 1907, 72; L. Ramlot, "Les généalogies bibliques. Un genre littéraire oriental", Bible et Vie Chrétienne 60, 1964, 35–70; F. Spitta, "Die Frauen in der Genealogie Jesu bei Matthäus", ZWT 54, 1912, 1–8; SB I 1–6, IV 792 ff.; A. Vögtle, "Die Genealogie Mt. 1:2–16 und die Matthäische Kindheitsgeschichte", BZ 8, 1964, 45–58, 239–62; 9, 1965, 32–49; Y. Zakowitch, "Rahab als Mutter des Boaz in der Jesus-Genealogie (Matth. 1:5)", NovT 17, 1975, 1–5.

On the virgin birth:

(a). K. Barth, "The Miracle of Christmas", CD I, 2, 172–202; J. Bligh, "The Virgin Birth", Heythrop Journal 6, 1965, 109–97; T. Boslooper, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1962; G. H. Box, The Virgin Birth of Jesus: A Critical Examination of the Gospel Narratives of the Nativity, and Other Early Christian Evidence, and the Alleged Influence of Heathen Ideas, 1916; R. E. Brown, The Virginal Conception & Bodily Resurrection of Jesus, 1973; "Genealogy (Christ)", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 354; and "Virgin Birth", ibid., 940 f.; H. von Campenhausen, The Virgin Birth in the Theology of the Ancient Church, Studies in Historical Theology 2, 1964; W. T. Dayton, "Virgin Birth", ZPEB V 886–89; G. Dellings, parthenos, TDNT V 826–37; D. Edwards, The Virgin Birth in History and Faith, 1943; H. Graef, Mary, I–II, 1963–65; J. Jeremias, "The Israelites of Pure Ancestry", in Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period, 1969, 275–302; M. D. Johnson, The Purpose of the Biblical Genealogies with Special Reference to the Genealogies of Jesus, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 8, 1969; J. Kürzinger, "Virgin Birth", BET III 939–45; R. Laurentin, Queen of Heaven, 1961³; J. G. Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1932²; H. L. MacNeill, "The Sitz im Leben of Luke 1:5–2:20", JBL 65, 1946, 123–30; E. C. Messenger, The Mystery of Sex and Marriage, II, 1948; E. L. Mascall and H. S. Box, eds., The Blessed Virgin Mary: Essays by Anglican Writers, 1963; G. Miegge, The Virgin Mary, 1955; P. S. Minear, "Luke's Use of the Birth Stories", in L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn, Studies in Luke-Acts: Essays Presented in Honor of Paul Schubert, 1968, 111–30; D. Moody, "Isaiah 7:14 in the RSV", Review and Expositor 50, 1953, 61–8; "On the Virgin Birth of Jesus Christ", ibid., 453–62; "The Miraculous Conception", ibid. 51, 1954, 495–507; ibid. 52, 1955, 44 f., 310–24; and "Virgin Birth", IDB IV 789 ff.; D. E. Nineham, The Genealogy in St. Matthew's Gospel and its Significance for the Study of the Gospels, Manson Memorial Lecture for 1975, reprinted from BJRL 58, 1976, 421–44; J. Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1907; W. Pannenberg, Jesus – God and Man, 1968, 141–50; K. Rahner, Mary, The Mother of the Lord, 1963; F. Ramsay, The Virgin Birth, 1926; W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem?, 1898; and "Luke's Narrative of the Birth of Christ", The Expositor, Eighth Series 4, 1912, 385–407, 481–507; J. de Satgé, Mary and the Christian Gospel, 1976; E. Schillebeeckx, Mary, Mother of the Redemption, 1964, 9–47; V. Taylor, The Historical Evidence for the Virgin Birth, 1920; H. E. W. Turner, "The Virgin Birth", ExpT 68, 1956–57, 12–17; J. Stafford Wright, "The Virgin Birth as a Biological Necessity", Faith and Thought: Journal of the Victoria Institute 95, 3, 1966, 19 ff.

(b). O. Bardenheuer, Maria Verkündigung, 1903; K. Bornhäuser, Die Geburts- und Kindheitsgeschichte Jesu, 1930; P. R. Botz, Die Jungfräuschafft Mariens im Neuen Testament und in der nachapostolischen Zeit, (Dissertation, Tübingen) 1935; H. Braun, "Der Sinn der neutestamentlichen Christologie", ZTK 54, 1957, 341–77; M. Dibelius, "Jungfrauensohn und Krippenkind", Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften 4, 1932 (reprinted in Botschaft und Geschichte, I, 1953, 1–78); K. Goldammer, W. Marxsen and P. Althaus, "Jungfrauengeburt", RGG ³ III 1068 f.; F. Kattenbusch, "Die Geburtsgeschichte Jesu als Haggada der Urchristologie", ThStKr 102, 1930, 454–74; R. Kilian, Die Verheissung Immanuel, 1969; R. Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I–II, 1964⁴; O. Michel and O. Betz, "Von Gott gezeugt", in W. Eltester, ed., Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche, BZNW 26, Festschrift für J. Jeremias, 3–23; J. Michl, "Die Jungfrauengeburt im Neuen Testament", Mariologische Studien, IV, 1969, 145–84; E. Norden, Die Geburt des Kindes, 1924; K. Prümmer, "Empfängen vom Heiligen Geiste, geboren aus Maria der Jungfrau", in Der christliche Glaube und die altheidnische Welt, I, 1935, 253–333; J. Riedl, Die Vorgeschichte Jesu, 1968; K. L. Schmidt, “Die jungfräuliche Geburt Jesu Christi”, ThBl 14, 1935, 289–97; A. Steinmann, Die jungfräuliche Geburt des Herrn, 1926; A. Strobel, “Der Gruss an Maria”, ZNW 53, 1962, 87–111; A. Vögtle, “Die Genealogie Mt. 1:2–16 and die Matthäistische Kindheitsgeschichte”, BZ 8, 1964, 45–58, 239–62; ibid. 9, 1965, 32–49.

Song, Hymn, Psalm

The precise terminological distinctions between the three words discussed here, hymnos, psalmos, and ōdē, are not closely defined. hymnos probably had a religious and cultic significance right from the beginning, as a technical term for festive psalms of praise, and for liturgical calls and recitations. ōdē had occasional secular reference, but, at least in the biblical Gk. period, it generally indicated a particular kind of song concerned with lamentation or joy (Deut. 31:30 is an exception). psalmos, equally used with occasional secular reference, denoted originally a variety of instrumental music, then also the vocal accompaniment. Following on from the LXX, psalmos in the NT probably refers to that aspect of early Christian worship which, both in form and content, was closely modelled on the temple hymns of the OT and late Judaistic periods. See ōdē NT for the varying theological emphasis of the words in the NT.

ὕμνος

ὕμνος (hymnos), song, song of praise, hymn, ode; ὑμνέω (hymneō), celebrate, praise, sing.

CL hymnos, of uncertain origin, is something sung, a song. The word appears from Homer onwards in secular Gk. There is no one particular metrical form. Rather, hymnos is a general word used to include the most varied poetical forms. All along, the word hymnos is used for recited as well as for sung poetry. The secular sense is not always clearly distinguished from cultic. The following meanings of hymneō may be mentioned: (1) to sing of, celebrate, in poetry or prose; (2) to discuss, tell repeatedly, recite; (3) (pass.) ring (in one’s ears).

Various formations occur, including the following after 300 B.C.: hymnēsis, lauding or praising, hymn or song-recital, or collection of songs; hymnagorēs, singer of hymns or songs; hymnologia, hymn-singing, songs. They are in part examples of late linguistic usages, which found hymneō too weak a word, and used it to mean to write or sing a song. In general, hymnos refers to songs to the gods, particularly a song in praise of the divinity, as distinct perhaps from epainos, → praise given to men.

OT 1. In the LXX the vb. is found 71 times and the noun 28 times. The vb. translates the Heb. hālal (in the piel form), to praise, at Jdg. 16:24; 2 Chr. 29:30 (twice); Neh. 12:24 v.l.; Ps. 22(21):22; zāmar (also piel), to sing or praise with instrumental accompaniment, at 1 Chr. 16:9; Isa. 12:5; yāḏāh (hiphil), confess, praise, at Neh. 12:24 v.l.; Isa. 12:4; 25:1; yāḏa’ (hiphil), cause to be known, at 2 Chr. 23:13; rānan, cry for joy, at Prov. 1:20; 8:3; and šār, sing, at Pss. 65(64):13; 137(136):3; Isa. 40:2.

It is without Heb. equivalent at 1 Esd. 5:60, 62; Tob. 12:6, 18 v.l., 22 v.l.; Jub. 15:13 v.l.; 16:13; Est. 4:17; Job 38:7 v.l.; Ps. 71(70):8; Wis. 10:20; 1 Macc. 4:24; 13:47; 4 Macc. 4:12; and Dan. 3 LXX passim where the majority of instances occur. It is found frequently in variant translations of the Pss. (Hatch-Redpath, II–III, 1405). The Heb. hal'lûyâh is often simply transliterated, including 17 times in Psalm headings (→ Amen, art. hallêlouia).

The noun hymnos also translates hālāl in the piel (2 Chr. 7:6; Neh. 12:24 v.l.) and the cognate t'hillâh, praise (Neh. 12:46; Pss. 40[39]:3; 65[64]:1; 100[99]:4; 119[118]:171; 148:14). It is used for n'gînâh, a musical term perhaps denoting a stringed instrument, in the titles of Pss. 6 v.l.; 54(53); 55(54); 61(60); 67(66); 76(75); šîr, song (Neh. 12:46; Isa. 42:10); and t'pillâh, → prayer (Ps. 72[71]:20). It is without Heb. equivalent at Jdg. 15:13; Ps. 137(136):3 v.l.; 1 Macc. 4:33; 13:51; 2 Macc. 1:30; 10:7 v.l., 38; 12:37; 3 Macc. 7:16; 4 Macc. 10:21. It also occurs in variant translations of the Pss. Thus the words hardly occur from Gen. to 2 Ki.

In addition the following cognates occur: hymnēsis (Ps. 71[70]:7 for t'hillâh; Ps. 118[117]:14 for zimrâh, melody, sound); hymnētos (Dan. 3:54, 56 LXX); hymnographos (4 Macc. 18:15); and hymnōdeō (1 Chr. 25:6 for baššîr).

2. Philo mentions the hymns of the Therapeutae (Vit. Cont. 25). If these were not the biblical Psalms, they could have been psalm-like songs. The Hallel psalms already occupied an outstanding position in the rites of the individual feast even when the first temple was standing, and continued to do so in the later worship of the synagogue (SB I 845). In the Passover festival the slaughtering of the lambs was accompanied by the repeated singing of these Hallel psalms (Pss. 114–118; SB IV 1 50). At the Passover meal, the first half of the Passover Hallel followed the Passover meal itself, the Haggadah, and the second half followed the final prayer of the meal and the drinking of the third cup (→ Feast, art. pascha; → Lord's Supper). The word hymnos was used by the rabbis as a loan-word (himnon), and specifically for a spiritual song as opposed to a secular.

3. Extra-canonical collections of hymns have also come down to us from various Jewish circles in Palestine; from the Qumran sect we have the great collection of Hodayot, the hymns of praise; and from Pharisaic circles the Pss. Sol., found in some MSS of the Gk. OT.

NT hymnos occurs in the NT only in Eph. 5:19 and Col. 3:16; hymneō only in Matt. 16:30 par. Mk. 14:26; Acts 16:25; Heb. 2:12.

1. The participle hymnēsantes, “when they had sung a hymn” (Matt. 26:30 par. Mk. 14:26) is generally understood by commentators to refer to the singing of the Hallel psalm at the close of the Passover meal prior to drinking the fourth cup. Whether or not this is so depends on whether Jesus' last meal with the disciples was in fact a celebration of the Passover (→ Lord's Supper, art. deipnon NT 4, where this view is argued). J. Jeremias argues that Jesus was greeted by the pilgrims on his entry into Jerusalem with the eschatological victory-cry from Ps. 118 (The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 1966², 258 ff.). This would mean that the Hallel Psalm was used here independently of the Passover meal. The present writer disagrees with the view that the Last Supper was a Passover meal (“Dies tut zu meinem Gedächtnis.” Zur Auslegung von 1. Kor. 11, 24–25, Dissertation, Mainz, 1959, 32–37, notes 261–285). He, therefore, thinks it unlikely that hymnēsantes refers to the Passover

Hallel. Any psalm or hymn of thanksgiving could have been used. According to Jeremias, Jesus strictly adhered to the law and customs concerning the Passover. If this is so, it is difficult to believe that Jesus should have broken off the celebrations suddenly before the decisive and important fourth cup with its messianic associations (cf. Bartels, op. cit., 35, notes 279 f.). ([Ed.] On the other hand, there are good reasons for thinking that Jesus did desire to keep the Passover with his disciples [cf. Lk. 22:15], but that he adapted the meal to meet the special needs of the situation → Lord's Supper, art. deipnon NT 4 (b).)

2. Acts 16:25 records how, after being beaten and imprisoned at Philippi, "about midnight Paul and Silas were praying and singing hymns to God [proseuchomenoi hymnounton theon], and the prisoners were listening to them." This need not have been a Hallel psalm. The story shows how they could praise God despite their circumstances (cf. the account of Joseph in Test. Jos. 8:5). Their action was at the same time a testimony to their fellow prisoners. God vindicated them, not so much by the earthquake which they did not use as an occasion for escape, but by the conversion of the jailer and their subsequent honourable release.

3. Heb. 2:12 gives to Ps. 22(21):22 a christological significance as an illustration of the solidarity of the speaker with the people of God: "saying, 'I will proclaim thy name to my brethren, in the midst of the congregation I will praise [hymnēsō] thee.'" The Ps. was cited by Jesus on the cross (Mk. 15:34 par Matt. 27:46; → God, art. theos NT 6 (d)). "Practically the whole of the lament to which the first part of the psalm is devoted was used in the Church from very early times as a testimonium of the crucifixion of Christ; not only is it expressly quoted, but its language has been worked into the very fabric of the New Testament passion narratives, especially in the First and Fourth Gospels [cf. Ps. 22:18 with Mk. 15:24 and Jn. 19:24; and see C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures, 1952, 97 f.; B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic, 1961, 88 ff.]. It is most natural, then, that when the psalmist's lament gives way to the public thanksgiving of which the second part of the psalm consists, the same speaker should be recognized, and the once crucified, now exalted Christ should be heard saying: 'I will declare thy name unto my brethren; in the midst of the congregation will I sing thy praise.' Following the Septuagint, our author used the word ekklēsia for 'congregation' (the Hebrew of Ps. 22:22 has qāhāl). The employment of this word in synonymous parallelism with 'brethren' in a Christian context indicates that those whom the Son of God is pleased to call His brethren are the members of His church. By virtue of His suffering He has now become 'the representative Head of a new mankind'" (F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 45 f.; cf. C. H. Dodd, op. cit., 20).

4. On Eph. 5:19 and Col. 3:16 → ōdē.

5. From the time of Justin the eucharistic prayer was called a hymnos (Apol. I, 13). It may be asked, therefore, whether hymnos might have been used on occasion in the time of the evangelists for a form of early Christian eucharistic prayer.

K. H. Bartels

ψαλμός

ψαλμός (psalmos), a sacred song, psalm; ψάλλω (psallō), sing (a hymn or praise).

CL In secular Gk. psallō is used from Homer onwards, originally meaning to pluck (hair), to twang a bow-string, and then pluck a harp, or any other stringed instrument. The noun psalmos refers in general to the sound of the instrument, or the actual production of the sound (cf. the scholion on Aristoph., Birds 218: “psalmos is actually the sound produced by the lyre”).

OT 1. In the LXX psallō and psalmos stand generally for Heb. zāmar or nāḡan, also for šr (→ ōdē). Generally it is the Psalms of our Psalter that are meant (e.g. 2 Sam. 23:1, which both in the MT and LXX is obscure and difficult to translate). This accords with the received meaning of Heb. šr or mizmôr, song, which is used in the headings to 49 Psalms, mostly with the addition of tō David (according to, with, or for, David). It is sometimes used also with a gen. (e.g. psalmos ōdēs, Ps. 68[67]:1; or odē psalmou, Ps. 66[65]:1). It can be assumed that, at least during the OT period, the singing of the Psalms was always accompanied by musical instruments. Further, psalmos can mean any spiritual song, whether or not an instrumental accompaniment is mentioned (cf. Ps. 33[32]:2). A spiritual song is possibly indicated in 1 Sam. 16:16, 18 (psallein en kinyra, to sing to a lyre), though some believe secular music is meant. Finally, psalmos can refer to profane songs, such as the drunkards’ songs of Ps. 69(68):12. For the classification of the various Pss. and their Sitz im Leben see the specialist studies listed in the bibliography below.

2. The particular significance of the Pss. (nearly always meaning the Psalms of David, but also later poems up to and including the Psalms of Qumran) consists in the fact that, by and large, they constitute the back-bone of Jewish synagogue worship. Some individual Psalms, or collections of Psalms, such as Ps. 105:1–15 and Ps. 96, comprised a daily form of prayer for the faithful Jew.

NT 1. In the NT two basic meanings can be ascertained. (a) psalmos stands for the Psalms of the OT; or the so-called Kethubim, “The Writings”, of which the Psalms, as the first document in this division, represent a pars pro toto. This latter meaning occurs only in Lk. 20:42; 24:44; Acts 1:20; 13:33. Hence, this usage is Lucan.

(b) More generally psalmos means a hymn of praise, and psallō, to sing a spiritual or sacred song. All the passages are non-Lucan: psalmos in 1 Cor. 14:26; Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16; psallō in the second sense occurs only in Rom. 15:9; 1 Cor. 14:15; Eph. 5:19; Jas. 5:13. This is probably the secondary meaning; it is clear from the Lucan par. to Matt. (Lk. 20:42; Matt. 22:43) that the OT Psalms were regarded as a prototype of spiritual songs.

2. It is remarkable, not only that these words occur only 4 times in Lk., 7 times in Paul, and once in Jas.; but also that they are used by Lk. only in the first sense, and by the others only in the second sense. But the reason for this is not so much theological, as that the vocabulary is influenced by the respective contexts. Lk., for instance, emphasizes the continuity of salvation history in Judaism and Christianity. The meaning “hymn of praise” or “to sing a spiritual or inspired song” can be further subdivided as follows.

(a) A hymn of praise, or the singing of praises, is a typical manifestation, either of the Spirit of God in his present activity in the community of the baptized (Eph. 5:18 ff.; Col. 3:16), or of God himself (1 Cor. 14:25 f.). This will include free compositions as well as repeated liturgical fragments (cf. O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship, SBT 10, 1953, 21 f.), and also new Christian songs (which may well have been modelled on the Pss. of the OT and of later Judaism, and which will often have exhibited similar features of ecclesiastical vocabulary), such as we know from the wording of the various songs of Rev. (cf. Rev. 5:9 ff; 7:12; 11:15, 17 f.; 12:10 ff.; 15:3 f.; 19:1 f., 6 ff.; for 5:9 and 15:3 → ōdē). Such songs are also mentioned in the famous letter of the younger Pliny, who writes (Epistle 10, 96, 7) that the Christians met “to sing a song [carmen = hymnos] antiphonally to Christ as to a god.”

1 Cor. 14:15 also regards singing as a manifestation of the Spirit, being a higher activity than speaking in tongues on the grounds that it is more edifying: “For if I pray in a tongue, my spirit prays but my mind is unfruitful. What am I to do? I will pray with the spirit and I will pray with the mind also; I will sing with the spirit and I will sing with the mind also” (1 Cor. 14:14 f.). The contrast here is not between tō pneumati, with or in the spirit (either the speaker’s or more probably the Holy Spirit), and tō noi, with or in the mind, but between being in the Spirit unintelligibly and therefore unedifyingly (in tongues) and being in the Spirit intelligibly (cf. vv. 16–19).

A similar meaning underlies Jas. 5:13, albeit in a weakened and less explicit sense: “Is any one among you suffering? Let him pray. Is any cheerful? Let him sing praise.” This answer is given in response to the question: How is the devout Christian to react to adversity and prosperity? Our feelings must be expressed in an intelligible form and they should be directed to God.

(b) psallō has the sense to sing hymns of praise in God’s honour in Rom. 15:9, where Ps. 18(17):49 and 2 Sam. 22:50 are seen as finding fulfilment in the coming of Christ and the response among the Gentiles: “and in order that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. As it is written, ‘Therefore I will praise thee among the Gentiles, and sing to thy name.’”

K. H. Bartels

ὠδή

ὠδή (ōdē), song, ode (of mourning, complaint or joy); ᾄδω (adō), sing.

CL adō is the contracted form of Att. Gk. aeidō. ōdē is a contracted form of aoidē. ōdos, a contraction of aoidos (singer), also occurs occasionally.

1. The vb. adō is used from Homer onwards with the following meanings: (a) to sing; (b) to produce all kinds of vocal sounds, e.g. the hoot of the owl or the croaking of a frog; (c) to produce the sound of a plucked string, or any other similar sound, such as the whistling of the wind in the trees; (d) (later) simply, to call; and also (e) to celebrate, praise or honour in the cult.

2. The noun ōdē occurs in Gk. tragedy with these meanings: (a) a song of mourning or lamentation; (b) a song of joy or praise; (c) poetry in general; and (d) singing in general, whether of men or birds. These words do not appear to have an intrinsically religious significance in non-biblical Gk.

OT In the LXX the vb. occurs 66 times rendering chiefly the Heb. šîr, sing (Exod.

15:1 twice, 21; Num. 21:17; Jdg. 5:1, 3; 2 Sam. 19:35; 1 Chr. 15:27; 16:9, 23; 2 Chr. 23:13; 29:28; 2 Esd. 2:41, 65, 70; 7:7; 10:24; Neh. 7:1, 44, 67, 73; 10:28, 39; 11:22; 12:28 f., 42, 45 ff.; 13:5, 10; Jud. 16:2; Pss. 7 title; 13[12]:6; 21[20]:13;

27[26]:6; 33[32]:3; 57[56]:7; 59[58]:16; 68[67]:4, 32; 89[88]:1; 96[95]:1; 98[97]:1; 101[100]:1; 104[103]:33; 105[104]:2; 106[105]:12; 108[107]:1; 137[136]:3 f.; 138[137]:5; 144[143]:9; 149:1; Eccl. 2:8 twice; Isa. 5:1; 26:1; Jer. 20:13). It also stands for the noun šîr (1 Chr. 6:31; 25:7; 2 Chr. 29:27; Isa. 23:16), šarat, serve (2 Esd. 8:17), zammâr, sing (2 Esd. 7:24), tôdâh, song of thanksgiving (Jer. 30[37]:19), and pâšah, be serene, (Ps. 98[97]:4). It has no equivalent at Hos. 7:2.

The noun ôdê occurs 87 times mainly for šîr and šîrâh (Exod. 15:1; Deut. 31:19 twice, 21 f., 30; 32:34; Jdg. 5:12; 2 Sam. 22:1; 1 Ki. 5:12 [4:32]; 1 Chr. 15:26; 16:42; 2 Chr. 5:13; 7:6; 23:18; 34:12; Neh. 12:27, 36; Pss. 137[136]:3 twice, 4; 144[143]:9; Amos 5:23; 8:10. It occurs 36 times in the titles of Psalms from Ps. 18 to Ps. 134. Other Heb. terms are higgâyôn (Pss. 9:16; 92[91]:3), mizmôr (in the titles of Pss. 4; 39[38]; 48[47]), maššâ' (1 Chr. 15:22, 27), nġînôt (Hab. 3:19), and šîgyônôt, (Hab. 3:1). Apart from various Ps. titles, ôdê occurs without Heb. equivalent in Jdg. 5:1 v.l.; 2 Sam. 6:5; 22:2; 1 Ki. 8:53; Jon. 2:3 v.l.; Isa. 5:1; 25:1; 26:1, 9; 38:9 (all v.l.); 1 Macc. 4:54; 13:51; 2 Macc. 7:6; 3 Macc. 6:32; 4 Macc. 18:18.

With the one exception of Deut. 31:30, where ôdê is spoken, singing is always indicated. Sometimes musical accompaniment is mentioned (e.g. 1 Chr. 16:42), and on occasion both music and dancing. David and the Israelites sang and danced before the ark (2 Sam. 6:5). Sometimes the vb. has a cognate acc. ("Moses sang [êse] this song [tên ôdên tautên]" (Exod. 15:1; cf. Num. 21:17 where asma is used). asma, song, does not occur in the NT, but is found in the LXX for šîr and šîrâh (Num. 21:17; Pss. 33[32]:3; 40[39]:3; 96[95]:1; 98[97]:1; 149:1; Eccl. 7:5[6]; 12:4; in the title of the Song of Songs and Cant. 1:1; Sir. 39:14; Isa. 5:1; 23:15; 26:1). adô is sometimes used in parallel with other words, such as hymneô (1 Chr. 16:9), agalliaô, rejoice, and psallô (Ps. 98[97]:4).

Sometimes the joyous nature of ôdê is stressed. But Amos 8:10 gives a dire warning to those who self-confidently await the day of Yahweh: "I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation. . . ." The new song was a song for festive occasions. The references in Chr. indicates something of the rôle of the temple singers and music in the cult.

Music is mentioned in various connexions in the OT: at a family gathering (Gen. 31:27); the acclamation of heroes (Jdg. 11:34; 1 Sam. 18:6); and the king's enthronement and martial occasions (Jdg. 7:18 ff.; 1 Ki. 1:39 f.; 2 Ki. 11:14; 2 Chr. 13:14; 2 Chr. 20:28); harem and court music (2 Sam. 19:35; Eccl. 2:8); feasts (Isa. 5:12; 24:8 f.); dirges and laments (2 Sam. 1:17 f.; 2 Chr. 35:25); incantations and cultic occasions (Exod. 28:35; Jos. 6:4–20; 1 Sam. 16:6 ff.; 2 Ki. 3:15); and occupational songs (Num. 21:17; Jdg. 9:27; Isa. 16:10; Jer. 31:4 f., 7; 48:33).

NT 1. In the NT ôdê and adô occur only 4 times in the Pauline writings and 6 times in Rev., with both noun and vb. together in Rev. (cf. Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16; Rev. 5:9; 14:3; 15:3). Rev. 5:9 indicates that the reference is always to a song that is sung: "And they sang a new song, saying, 'Worthy art thou to take the scroll and to open its seals, for thou wast slain and by thy blood didst ransom men for God from every tribe and tongue and people and nation.'" The verse is also an example of the so-called "Axios-acclamation" (from the Gk. axios, "worthy"), known in liturgical and juridical contexts from the time of the ancient Gk. world to the Byzantine em-perors (cf. E. Peterson, Heis Theos, 1926, 176 ff.). In Rev. the whole creation – in heaven, on earth, and below the earth – acknowledges, as of right, the lordship of the → Lamb in their eschatological paean of praise. The “song of Moses” in Rev. 15:3 transposes the song of Moses in Exod. 15:1 and also includes words from Ps. 145:7, giving them a christological significance: “And they sing the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, ‘Great and wonderful are thy deeds, Lord God the Almighty! Just and true are thy ways, O King of the ages!’” “As Moses once sang God’s praises after crossing the Red Sea, so the singers who have won their freedom through the Lamb celebrate God’s deeds which have been revealed in his work as judge” (E. Lohse, Die Offenbarung des Johannes, NTD 11, 1966⁹, ad loc.).

2. Songs clearly formed a central part of early Christian liturgy, as had already been the case in the worship of the OT community and of the later Jewish temple. The Pauline writings twice allude to songs in discussion of man’s spiritual activity. Rather than be drunk with wine, the Ephesian Christians are urged to “be filled with the Spirit, addressing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs [psalmois kai hymnois kai odais pneumatikais], singing and making melody [adontes kai psallontes] to the Lord with all your heart, always and for everything giving thanks in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to God the Father” (Eph. 5:18 ff.). These would doubtless include the OT Psalms which the NT writers often freely quote, but would evidently include also Christian hymns. O. Cullmann regards Rev. 5:9, 12 f.; 12:10 ff.; 19:1 f.; 19:6 as among the oldest of Christian songs; he also places the Odes of Solomon in this period (op. cit., 21 f.). Perhaps the earliest Christian hymn is contained in Phil. 2:6–11 which Paul cites in support of his plea to the Philippians to have the mind of Christ. This may have been a pre-Pauline hymn or something which Paul had composed himself and was also known to his readers (for discussion see R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii. 5–11 in Recent Interpretation and its Setting in Early Christian Worship, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 4, 1967; and Philippians, New Century Bible, 1976, 90–102, 109–16). Other possible christological hymns are Col. 1:15–20; Eph. 2:14 ff.; 1 Tim. 3:16; 1 Pet. 3:18–22; Heb. 1:3; and the Prologue of Jn. (for discussion see J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns: Their Historical Religious Background, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 15, 1971).

Lk.’s account of the birth and infancy narratives contains psalms like the Magnificat, expressing Mary’s praise for God’s saving mercies (Lk. 1:46–55), the Benedictus, Zechariah’s thanksgiving for his son, the future John the Baptist (Lk. 1:68–79), and the Nunc Dimittis, Simeon’s psalm on seeing the infant Jesus in the temple (Lk. 2:29–32). These psalms are all couched in terms of Yahweh’s saving acts against the background of OT expectation (on the opening chapters of Lk. see R. Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I–II, 1964⁹). Elsewhere music is mentioned in the NT in various connexions: dirges (Matt. 9:23); prophetic passages (Matt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:32; 1 Thess. 4:16; Heb. 12:19); the music (symphōnia) of the merrymaking at the return of the prodigal son (Lk. 15:25); and in a metaphorical sense (Matt. 6:2; 11:17; Lk. 7:32; 1 Cor. 13:1; 1 Cor. 14:7 f.).

Singing is an expression of Christian joy; it is at the same time edifying expression of the Spirit-filled life. Singing, music and spiritual verse are “a mode of the Word, in which Christ makes Himself heard" (H. Schlier, TDNT I 164 f.). This may be compared with Ignatius, Eph. 4:1 f., where the middle or passive vb. Christos adetai, "Christ is sung", can also be understood actively as "Christ sings". The following clause adds: "sing in unity with one voice to the Father through Jesus Christ [en henoētēi adete en phōnē mia dia Iēsou Christou iō patri]."

Col. 3:16 likewise sees singing as a means of edification and praise: "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, as you teach and admonish one another in all wisdom, and as you sing psalms and hymns and spiritual songs [psalmois hymnois ödais pneumatikais] with thankfulness in your hearts to God." Whilst pointing out that it is impossible to differentiate exactly between the three terms used here, E. Lohse says that, "Taken together, they describe the full range of singing which the Spirit prompts" (Colossians and Philemon, Hermeneia, 1971, 151). psalmoi often designates the OT Psalms (cf. Lk. 20:42; 24:44; Acts 1:20; 13:33), whereas hymnos is "the festive hymn of praise" (cf. LXX Isa. 42:10; 1 Macc. 13:51; Acts 16:25; Heb. 2:12) and ödē is "the song in which God's acts are praised and glorified" (cf. Rev. 5:9; 14:3; 15:3) (E. Lohse, ibid.). H. Schlier is doubtless correct in seeing that Eph. 5:18 ff. and Col. 3:16 presuppose a situation similar to that in 1 Cor. 14:15, i.e. the regular worship of the early Christian community. The eucharistountes, "giving thanks", of Eph. 5:20 doubtless takes up vv. 18 ff. by way of summary. Even if one cannot agree with Schlier that this refers exclusively to the eucharistic prayer of thanksgiving, one can go along with him when he says that all such liturgical singing is acclaimed by the Amen of the whole congregation, and that if things are well sung, this can edify those who are present by building them into a community "in Christ". It only needs a glance into the various works on the history of worship in the earliest Christian communities to see the importance of liturgy for church life, and in particular the importance of singing in worship. Dom Gregory Dix, for instance, states that the first attacks of the Roman state were directed not so much against the holding of Christian belief, as against the liturgy, because it was "the expression of that belief in the worship of the ecclesia" (The Shape of the Liturgy, 1945, 146). Christian worship, from the standpoint of the state, was deliberate treason (crimen laesae maiestatis), while from the standpoint of the church it was "the supreme positive affirmation before God of the Christian life" (op. cit., 147). "For the Christian, as for the persecutor, the liturgy formed the very life not only of the church corporately, but of the individual soul" (op. cit., 148). Next to the preaching of the word and participation in the sacrament, the heart of worship was this "spiritual singing", a festive recognition of God in Jesus Christ as the Lord of the congregation and of the world. In this context, the use of psallō in parallel to exhomologeomai, → confess, in Rom. 15:9 is particularly important: even singing psalms is a confession of faith before God, in this case, concerning the eschatological conversion of the Gentiles.

K. H. Bartels

(a). A. A. Anderson, The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, I-II, 1972; W. Bauer, "The Odes of Solomon", in Henn. Schn., II, 808 ff.; H. M. Best and D. Huttar, "Music; Musical Instruments", ZPEB IV 311-24; O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship, SBT 10, 1953; M. J. Dahood, Psalms, I-III, Anchor Bible, 1966-70; G. Dellings, hymnos, hymneō, psallō, psalmos, TDNT VIII 489-503; M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972; M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, The Epistle of James, Hermeneia, 1976; G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, 1945; B. D. Eerdmans, "The Hebrew Book of Psalms", OTS 4, 1947, 1-90; C. Grove, Dictionary of Music and Musicians, 1954⁵;

- H. H. Guthrie, Israel's Sacred Songs, 1966; J. Hempel, "Psalms, Book of", IDB III 942–58; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 1966²; A. S. Kapelrud, "Scandinavian Research in the Psalms after Mowinckel", ASTI 4, 1965, 74–90; A. D. Kilmer, "Music", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 610 ff.; J. Z. Lauterbach, "Psalms", The Jewish Encyclopedia, X, 241–50; E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon, Hermeneia, 1971; S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, I–II, 1962; J. B. Payne, "Psalms, Book of", ZPEB IV 924–47; R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii. 5–11 in Recent Interpretation and its Setting in Early Christian Worship, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 4, 1967; and Philippians, New Century Bible, 1976; W. O. E. Oesterley, The Sacred Dance: A Study in Comparative Folklore, 1923; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I–II, 1962–65; H. H. Rowley, "Psalmody and Music", in Worship in Ancient Israel, 1967, 176–212; C. Sachs, The Rise of Music in the Ancient World, 1943; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns: Their Historical Religious Background, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 15, 1971; H. Schlier, adó, óde, TDNT I 163 ff.; R. B. Y. Scott, The Psalms as Christian Praise, 1959; O. R. Sellers, "Musical Instruments of Israel", BA 4, 1941, 33–47; A. Sendrey and M. Norton, David's Harp: The Story of Music in Biblical Times, 1964; W. S. Smith, Musical Aspects of the New Testament, (Dissertation, Amsterdam) 1962; J. Stainer, The Music of the Bible, 1879; R. C. Tannehill, "The Magnificat as Poem", JBL 93, 1974, 263–75; A. Weiser, The Psalms, 1962; E. Werner, "Music", IDB III 457–69; "Musical Instruments", IDB III 469–76; and "Hebrew and Oriental Christian Metrical Hymns", Hebrew Union College Annual 23, 1946, 397–432; C. Westermann, "Psalms, Book of", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 705–10; and The Praise of God in the Psalms, 1965; A. N. Wilder, Early Christian Rhetoric, 1964.
- (b). W. Bauer, Der Wortgottesdienst der ältesten Christen, 1930; A. Büchler, "Zur Geschichte der Tempelmusik und der Tempelsalmen", ZAW 19, 1899, 96–133, 329–44; ZAW 20, 1900, 97–135; F. Crüsemann, Studien zur Formgeschichte von Hymnus und Danklied in Israel, 1969; R. Deichgräber, Gotteshymnus und Christushymnus in der frühen Christenheit. Untersuchungen zur Form, Sprache und Stil der frühchristlichen Hymnen, 1967; G. Delling, Gottesdienst im Neuen Testament, 1952; I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 1931³; R. Ficker, šr, THAT II 895 ff.; H.-J. Kraus, Psalmen, I–II, BKAT 15, 1972⁴; R. Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I–II, 1964⁴; J. Leipoldt, Der Gottesdienst in der ältesten Kirche, jüdisch? griechisch? christlich?, 1937; E. Lohse, Die Offenbarung des Johannes, NTD 11, 1966⁵; É. des Places, "Hymnes grecs au seuil de l'Ère chrétienne", Biblica 38, 1957, 113–29; J. Quasten, Musik und Gesang in den Kulturen der heidnischen Antike und christlichen Frühzeit, 1930; J. M. Robinson, "Die Hodajot-Formel in Gebet und Hymnus des Frühchristentums", in Apophoreta. Festschrift E. Haenchen, BZNW 30, 194–235; J. Schattenmann, Studien zum neutestamentlichen Prosahymnus, 1965; R. Stählin, "Die Geschichte des christlichen Gottesdienstes", Leiturgia 1, 1954, 1 ff.; C. Westermann, "Instrumentale Musik, Gesang und Dichtung in Israel", RGZ IV 1201–5; R. Wünsch, "Hymnus", Pauly-Wissowa IX, 1, 140 ff.

Soul

ψυχή

ψυχή (psychē), soul, life; ψυχικός (psychikos), pertaining to the soul or life, and thus physical (in contrast to spiritual), unspiritual.

CL 1. psychē is connected etymologically with the Indo-European root bhs*, from which is derived the German vb. blasen, to blow. It originally meant breath, breath of life. The original meaning of psychē is therefore impersonal: the breath which gives life to man. For the concept of "the soul . . . as the bearer of conscious experiences" (J. B. Hofmann, Etymologisches Wörterbuch des Griechischen, 1949, 428), Homer retains thymos (related to Latin fumus, smoke; cf. thyō, to sacrifice). The latter denotes the warm flow of blood, the life-force, hence, emotion (excitement, courage, desire, craving).

Both words connote a psycho-physical entity, but not an identical one. As early as Homer, Il. 11, 334, we find the attempt to combine the two, thymos kai psychē. When the dependence of the conscious soul (thymos) on the unconscious (psychē) became recognized, the meaning of psychē was broadened beyond its fixed usage in the earliest epic to include the content of thymos. Thus the psychē, which had originally been understood as an unconscious, impersonal basis of life, became the bearer of conscious experiences. The ideas about the transmigration of souls which were current in the 6th cent. B.C. indicate the conclusion of this process (→ Resurrection, art. anastasis CI): by now psychē embraces in equal measure the two concepts, basis of life and consciousness. The psychē is regarded as something permanent, and a person is given responsibility for its destiny.

If we examine this development in the meaning of psychē, we find that the word has three areas of meaning: (a) psychē in the sense of the impersonal basis of life, life itself; (b) the inward part of man; (c) an independent soul, in contrast to the body.

2. (a) In ancient Gk. literature, the soul is conceived as combined with the body. When it leaves the body, the body loses its life (Homer, Od. 14, 426). A person's soul is snatched away, and with it his life (Homer, Od. 22, 444). Thus the soul can simply stand for life. A person may plead for his life (Soph., OC 1326; Hdt. 1, 24, 2); he may fight for his life (Homer, Od. 22, 245); he may risk his life (Homer, Od. 3, 74). One may accept compensation for the soul, i.e. the life of a man (Hdt. 2, 134, 4). A person may release his soul, and so his life, from himself (Eur., Orestes 1172). psychē can even come to mean things as dear as life, e.g. money (Hesiod, Works 696) and children (Eur., Andromache 419).

(b) psychē can refer to the inward part of man, his personality. Thus the soul can be equivalent to the person (Eur., OC 499). The soul, bound as it is to the body, is so much a personal force, that psychē can be used instead of the personal pronoun, so that "my soul" is equivalent to "I" (Soph., Antigone 227). According to the inner attributes of a person, his soul can be characterized as strong (Aristophanes, Acharnenses 393), or as wise. Men can be categorized according to the strength of their soul (Hdt., 5, 124). If man is anything at all, he is soul (Plato, Alcibiades 1, 130a).

The actual power of the soul is seen first of all in the movement which it imparts to the body in which it lives (Plato, Laws 896a–b). The concept of the soul becomes that of the character (Soph., Philoctetes 55) and of the disposition (Hdt., 3, 14, 1). Aristotle enquires into the nature of the soul, this inward force which fills and moves a man, and describes it as fire and warmth (Aristotle, De Anima 407 b 22), Plato presents the idea that the soul can be robbed of its body (Plato, Laws 873a–b).

The soul is the seat of perception, of desire and pleasure, and of enjoyment (Aesch., Persae 841). The word "soul" is used generally in place of emotion. "To have a soul" means the same as "to have a certain feeling" (Demosthenes, 28, 21). Thus the soul, and not the body, is the seat of love and erotic desire (Eur., Hippolytus 505), of hunger and thirst (Xen., Institutio Cyri 8, 7, 4). The powers of reason and of will are, however, also part of the soul. Thus the soul finds a place alongside thought and judgment (Soph., Antigone 176).

The properties of the soul are movement, observation, perception, and above all incorporeality (Aristotle, De Anima 405 b 11). Thus the soul can be assessed morally, according to its powers. The soul has a certain ability; its tasks are to care, to rule, to advise (Plato, Republic 1, 353D). Without the soul as the foundation, sophia, wisdom, and nous, understanding, would have no chance to develop. Gk. philosophy generally pondered continually on the relationship between the different powers of the soul, and about their number and their capabilities. The Pythagoreans, for instance, regarded the soul as divided into three parts: logismos, thought, thymos, will, and epithymia, desire. Aristotle makes another tripartite division: nourishment, perception and thought (De Anima 413 b 11). Differences of view also exist on whether the soul is a special entity of quite different substance from the body, or whether, with Epicurus (Epistulae 1 p 19), one can assume that the soul has mass and is thus a body of infinitesimal size, which mixes itself with a vapour of warmth. For warmth can be observed to be the element of life, and remains even when the soul is conceived in a material form.

The Stoics held the soul to be material, nourished by material substances, and filling the body. It is correlated to the body. The substance of the soul is the pneuma, breath. Like the body, it results from procreation. It is fed by the evaporation of the blood, and by the air which it breathes in. pathē, affections, are the greatest enemies of the soul, and are in a position to rob it of liberty. They constitute an unnatural, irrational limitation for the soul.

The essential characteristic of the soul consists in the fact that it is in movement, that it can set itself in motion (Plato, Phaedrus 245e). Among all animate beings, man is the one in whom the deity has implanted the most powerful soul (Xenophon, Memorabilia 1, 9, 14). Furthermore, it has a share in divinity, since the divine power rules in man by means of the soul (Xenophon, Memorabilia 4, 3, 14). The soul can be trained, according to its various capabilities. The most important thing, however, as Socrates teaches (Plato, Apology 30b), is to cultivate or take care of, epimeleisthai, the soul, rather than wealth or happiness. For virtue does not result from wealth; on the contrary, the acquisition of wealth and of other good things both in private and in public life are the fruit of virtue. One could say that here for the first time we find the concept of the care of souls. Socrates is not concerned with speculations about the soul, its life before and after its time in the body, although these are questions which interested Plato (→ Resurrection, art. anastasis cl). Here a new ideal of education is envisaged, and the soul acquires a completely new meaning. This has nothing to do with the Orphic soul-demon, nor with the soul in Attic tragedy, nor with the Homeric, epic concept of eidōlon, the shadowy image of man which exists in the underworld (W. Jaeger, Paideia, II, 89 ff.; and The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers, 1947). Since the soul is a spirit capable of thought and reason, which has moral awareness, the care of the soul is service of God. The soul, as part of the cosmos, must be brought into harmony with the cosmos. Man reaches this harmony by gaining full mastery over himself. In this way he can hold his own in the face of destiny and of nature; the soul is enabled to govern the body.

(c) The Homeric epics speak not only of the departure of the soul, i.e. the loss of life, but they also know something of an abode of souls. In this there is no attempt at a speculative or theoretical understanding of the soul in contradistinction to the body. Rather, we see the effect of the parapsychological experiences which were common among men of ancient times. This is the background of the portrayal of Patroclus' ghost: he is dead, but not yet in Hades, and the ghost is just like Patroclus in height, voice and clothing. The soul goes into the underworld like a vapour, accompanied by rustling, chirping, and buzzing (like bats, Homer, Od. 24, 5 ff.); one could perhaps say that it flits. It is a likeness (eidōlon) of the person concerned, but not that person himself. The soul is thus represented here as an entity in its own right, as opposed to the body; it joins itself to its body and leaves it again (Homer, Il. 23, 64 ff., 100 ff.; Od. 11, 387).

Related to this in thought is the concept of a journey of the soul into the world beyond, and its return to the earth; or of its descent from the realm of light into the body (→ Knowledge, art. ginōskō CL 2 (c)) or to the earth, and its return to the heavenly world by means of a cycle of births, kyklos geneseōn. Another concept is that of a gathering of the souls in a field in the underworld, to hear the judgment as to whether they will partake in the eternal symposium, or lie in the mire of the underworld. The real driving force behind these ideas about the soul, and practices of liberating it, is the religious movement of Orphism. The concept of an independent soul, not tied to a body, which can leave its body for a certain time and then return, is found in other cultures as well (cf. for instance M. Eliade on Shamanism in RGG ³ V 1386 ff.; and in the Gk. world, W. Burkert, Weisheit und Wissenschaft, 1962, 98 ff.; and Goēs. Zum griechischen Schamanismus, Rheinisches Museum, Neue Folge 105, 1962, 36 ff.).

Plato provides us with the idea that the soul can be deprived of its body (Laws 873a–b), that it does not come fully into its own until it has been separated from the body (Phaedo 66e–67a), and that it is immortal (Republic 10, 608d; Phaedo 70c; Phaedrus 245c–e). He argues for the necessity of the soul's immortality on the ground that a lifetime is too short a period for the moral struggle in man. A man must therefore be able to collect and assess experiences from several incarnations of the soul. It has knowledge of the forms of ultimate reality which it acquired in pre-physical existence. The body is clothing for the soul (peribolon), or a kind of prison (desmōtērion; Plato, Cratylus 400c). Liberation from this prison may be achieved by Bacchic ceremonies, through the grace of gods who provide redemption, or by ascetic renunciation of earthly existence. The immortal souls are led into the underworld by Hermes. There, for the uninitiated, the amyētoi and atelestoi, there awaits the mire (borboros) of the underworld (Plato, Phaedo 60c).

Another conception of liberation is that according to which the soul rises to the light in a series of new incarnations, a kind of transmigration of the soul. Its particular deeds determine the character of its new existence (we find similar ideas in the Indian religions, but there Karma is a completely impersonal and moreover self-exhausting force). All these ideas depend on the belief that the soul is something totally independent of the body, having substance and immortality of its own.

In a figurative sense, the term psychē can also be used of the inspiring force in the constitution of a state. Isocrates speaks of the soul of the city (12, 138), and Demosthenes describes the virtue of men as the soul of Greece (60, 23). The thought of a world-soul as the life principle of the cosmos, so that the cosmos itself is soul and governing principle (hēgemonikon), is found in Chrysippus the Stoic.

OT 1. In the LXX (including the Apocrypha), psychē, soul, occurs over 900 times, and is distributed fairly equally among the various books. Most often it stands for the Heb. neṗeš (originally, throat, gullet; then breath, exhalation), but also 25 times for lēḇ, → heart, inner man (especially in Pss., Chr., Isa.; elsewhere lēḇ is usually rendered by kardia), 5 times for ḥayyâh, living thing (otherwise rendered by zōon; → life), twice (Gen. 41:8; Exod. 35:21) for rûah, spirit (otherwise rendered by pneuma), and once (Lev. 17:4) for ʾîš, man (otherwise rendered by anēr or anthrōpos; → man). The Heb. nʿšāmâh, breath, is generally rendered by pnōē, wind, breath (→ Spirit), but never by psychē.

(a) nepeš denotes that which makes a body, whether of man or beast, into a living being. Thus it can even on one occasion (Gen. 36:6) be translated sōma (→ body). When nepeš is translated as psychē, psychē “signifies that which is vital in man in the broadest sense” (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 153), in other words, that which is alive. We read of the living soul (Gen. 1:20; RSV “living creatures”). A dying person breathes out his soul (AV “gives up the ghost”; cf. Jer. 15:9), or pours it out (Lam. 2:12). It departs from the person who dies (Gen. 35:18). It (i.e. the life) can, however, return to a person’s body (1 Ki. 17:21). “Soul for soul” means “life for life” (Exod. 21:23). → Blood, as the seat of life, can be practically identical with psychē (Gen. 9:4 f.; Lev. 17:11, 14; cf. Deut. 12:23; → Blood; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT 3 (c)).

(b) psychē, rendering nepeš, is the sensitive part of the life of the ego, the seat of the emotions, of love (Cant. 1:7), of longing (Ps. 63[62]:1) and of gladness (Ps. 86:4). This is not the subject of any further reflection. The “soul” reveals its life in movement and the most various expressions of the emotions. It is the uniting factor for the inner powers of man: hence the phrase “with all your soul” (Deut. 13:3). Within the soul dwell the desire for food (Deut. 12:20, 21), the lust of the flesh (Jer. 2:24), and the thirst for murder and revenge (Ps. 27[26]:12). The soul expresses its feelings: it weeps (Ps. 119[118]:28), is poured out in tears (Job 30:16), is “made long” in patient endurance (Job 6:11). But knowledge and understanding (Ps. 139[138]:14), thought (1 Sam. 20:4) and memory (Lam. 3:20), have their seat in the soul as well. To such a degree is the soul the summing up of the whole personality, of the whole self of a person, that “soul” can be equivalent in meaning to “I myself” or “yourself” (1 Sam. 18:1). In Gen. 2:7, psychē means “person” or “being”.

So too living creatures can be described as souls: everything that lives, all living things, usually in a collective sense (Lev. 11:10). A “soul” in the laws means the person concerned in a particular ordinance (e.g. Lev. 4:2; 5:1, 2, 4, 15). When the people are numbered, counting is by “souls” (Exod. 1:5; Deut. 10:22). A clear indication of how unfamiliar the OT is with the concept of a soul separate from the body, or a soul which becomes separated from the body at death, is the fact that it can speak of a dead person as the soul of that person, and mean by this phrase the dead person in his corporeality (Num. 6:6).

(c) Whereas the usage of this word in the Qumran texts remains totally within the OT framework (e.g. 1QS 3:1, 8; 1QH 2:7–35; 3:6, 19; 5:12–39; 9:7 f., 28, 33; CD 16:1–9), Hellenistic influence is more clearly discernible in the apocryphal literature. While elsewhere we do not find reflection about the relationship between → body and soul, body and soul are here contrasted. A perishable body weighs down the soul (Wis. 9:15). The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God (Wis. 3:1). Pollution of souls is also mentioned (Wis. 14:26). It is especially bad when no healing can be found for the soul, so that it must perish eternally (Wis. 16:9).

2. Josephus makes use in his accounts of history and personalities of many-sided, powerful Hellenistic concepts, which he has at his disposal as a result of his education and training.

(a) For him too psychē is primarily the seat of outward, earthly life (to save the souls, as opposed to the goods, Ant. 9, 240; danger to the soul, i.e. mortal danger, War 1, 493).

(b) psychē is the sense of the inner man with its various powers as contrasted with the body (War 1, 430). It is the locus of the will and the virtues (Ant. 2, 9 distinguishes good birth and the virtue of the soul), the seat of the emotions (shock, Ant. 20, 83; hatred, Ant. 16, 93) and qualities (wickedness, Ant. 16, 301).

(c) Finally, immortal souls are contrasted with men's bodies (War 2, 154; cf. Ant. 18, 18, on the Essenes who regard their souls as immortal). The soul, not being subject to corruption, can pass over into another body. The evil soul will, however, suffer eternal punishment (War 2, 163). Mention should also be made of the speech which Josephus puts into the mouth of Eleazar, the leader of the rebels, at Masada (War 7, 341 ff.). Here too Josephus is moving in the world of Hellenistic thought concerning the immortality of the soul and its true life, separated from the body, in eternal fellowship with God (even Indian ideas are cited). Thus for Josephus the immortality of the soul and its connexion with eternal life open up opportunities which can be wasted, inasmuch as the immortal soul is determined and overpowered by the body.

(d) Josephus uses psychē and pneuma, → spirit, in the same context without further reflection. He says nothing of their individual functions. Clearly pneuma is the higher consciousness of man, while psychē stands for the life-force as such (Ant. 11, 240).

3. In Philo's doctrine of the soul, his doctrine of creation, which is conditioned by the OT, is further developed (Migr. 34). For him the soul is the side of human existence that has been equipped with divine powers and possibilities; it belongs to the divine Spirit (Virt. 217), and its first power is that of glorifying God. Of particular concern for Philo is the governing principle (hēgemonikon) of souls, the nous, understanding (Leg. All. 1, 39; → Reason). The essence of this governing part, the "soul" of the soul, is the Spirit of God (Rer. Div. Her. 55).

(a) Philo also knows psychē in the sense of life; its whole being is in the blood (Det. Pot. Ins. 84) and thus includes what is mortal.

(b) As in Gk. philosophy, we find in Philo the division of the soul into rational and irrational powers (Agric. 63), and also the concept of the soul as the seat of the emotions, especially virtue (Det. Pot. Ins. 59), and thus of life (ibid., 70). The power of the nous is expressed in thinking, willing, the power to beget, and perception.

(c) In striking contrast to the OT, Philo takes it for granted that there are bodiless souls (Sacr. 5; Som. 1, 135). He assumes that the universe, which for him is God's sanctuary, is filled with bodiless souls of a purely spiritual nature, i.e. the angels. In comparison with them, man appears as a mixture of reason and irrationality (Spec. Leg. 1, 66). He writes of higher beings which join themselves to mortal bodies for a certain length of time and then leave them again (Plant. 14). The soul achieves eternal life by the acquisition and practice of virtues (Conf. Ling. 161), especially that of glorifying God (Op. Mund. 155). The soul finally leaves the mortal part belonging to it behind (cf. above (a)), and goes into the world of things imperishable and incorruptible (Migr. 18). It is really at home in the divine world; in the body it finds itself in a place alien to it (Som. 1, 181). Being in constant motion, it belongs to God, who himself is the world-soul and is himself in constant motion (Aet. Mund. 84).

4. Hellenistic influences are also clearly discernible generally in Judaism. 4 Macc. in particular demonstrates this with its conception of an immortal soul which separates itself from the body in death. Death is the way to immortality (4 Macc. 14:5); the victor's prize for virtue is everlasting life, i.e. of the soul (4 Macc. 17:12). In the hour of death, the soul of the righteous man is received by the patriarchs (4 Macc. 5:37; 13:17). A clear example of the adoption of Hellenistic ideas is to be seen at about the middle of the 1st century A.D. in Johanan ben Zakkai. He speaks of Gehenna as an intermediate place of punishment (Berakoth 28b 23; cf. Ab. R. N. 25; 7a 51). The Midrash on Ecclesiastes (3:21, 22a) also pursues this line. Here the souls of the righteous as well as those of the ungodly rise at death to the heavenly height in order to receive the judgment on them. This view is in the background in two passages in the Gospel of Luke (in the Acts too Luke shows the influence of typical Hellenistic ideas), although psychē, soul, is not specifically mentioned: (a) at Lk. 16:23, Lazarus is in Abraham's bosom, and the rich man in the place of torment; (b) at Lk. 23:43, the well-known saying "Today you will be with me in Paradise" (→ Paradise). On the other hand, we do not find the concept of separate judgments for body and soul. If that were the case, the soul would have no responsibility for the body. Rather, we have the picture of a → resurrection, where God will bring the soul and the body together and then judge both. There is thus no room for the concept of the soul as the location of ideas, thoughts and moral conviction, with the body as the seat of the passions. Despite Hellenistic ideas about the soul, the typical Jewish hope remains of a resurrection, and thus of the righteousness of God, which can only then come into play. God holds an eschatological judgment on body and soul (Sanhedrin 91a). So too in the apocryphal literature (2 Esd. 7:78 ff.) we find the idea of a judgment of souls directly after death. By decree of the divine judge, the souls are sent to a place of refreshment and peace and sevenfold joy, or to a place of torments and of roaming in sevenfold pain. Thus Enoch catches sight of the dwellings of the righteous dead, who make request, and intercede and pray for the children of men (Eth. En. 39:4 f.). Similarly, Eth. Enoch 71:16 relates that at death the righteous enter heaven. The paraenetic ending of the book of Enoch follows the same theme: the souls of sinners go into the underworld, while the spirits (here meaning much the same as souls) of the righteous may rejoice and be glad, and do not die (Eth. Enoch 103:4, 7).

NT 1. In the NT, by way of contrast to the frequent use of the word in the LXX, psychē occurs in all only 101 times; of these 37 occurrences are in the Synoptic Gospels, 15 in Acts, and 10 in the Gospel of John. The majority of examples are therefore found in the narrative portions of the NT. In the Pauline Epistles it occurs altogether 13 times, 7 times in Rev., 6 times each in Heb. and 1 Pet., twice each in Jas., 2 Pet., and 1 Jn., and once in 3 Jn.

2. (a) In the NT psychē, soul, is also the seat of life, or life itself, as in the well-known saying, "whoever would save his life [psychē] will lose it; and whoever loses his life for my sake . . . will save it" (Mk. 8:35 par. Matt. 16:25, Lk. 9:24; cf. Matt. 10:39; Lk. 17:33; Jn. 12:25). What it means to say, that he who gives up his life will truly find it, becomes clear from the example of Jesus himself and his death and resurrection: true life is ever only won through sacrifice. Quite clearly psychē means life again in the saying Mk. 10:45 par. Matt. 20:28: Christ's mission here is to give his life as a ransom for many (→ Redemption, art. lytron NT). So too at Lk. 14:26

“hate his own soul” means “hate his own life” (cf. Lk. 9:23, to deny oneself). The counterpart of Lk. 14:26 is Rev. 12:11 which speaks of those who have not loved their lives.

psychē embraces the whole natural being and life of man for which he concerns himself and of which he takes constant care. Thus Matt. 6:25 speaks of being anxious for the psychē, i.e. for its food. Life (psychē) and body (sōma) are God’s handiwork: therefore they are of more importance than the food and clothing about which man is so concerned. At Lk. 12:19 the rich man addresses his soul, i.e. he speaks to himself. However, he does not bargain with the fact that his psychē, i.e. his life, can be taken from him at any moment. The citation of Ps. 16:10 in Acts 2:27 also speaks of the psychē – again in the sense of the seat of life – as being left by God in Hades, or given up to Hades (→ Resurrection, art. anastasis OT 2; → Hell), i.e. that the speaker will die. Even for Paul, to think little of the soul means to think little of one’s life (Phil. 2:30).

Jn. 10:11 speaks of Jesus laying down his psychē for the sheep. This is the reason why the Father loves the good shepherd (Jn. 10:17). The same expression is also used in Jn. 13:37 f., where Peter offers his own (“I will lay down my life for you”). In connexion with both vbs. tithenai, to put, place, but here to lay down (John’s Gospel), and dounai, to give (Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45), psychē means life, however the vbs. are interpreted.

In Rom. 16:4 Paul remembers those who have risked their own lives for his, and in Acts 15:26 Barnabas and Paul are described as men who have risked their psychē, i.e. their life, “for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ”.

The word psychē is also found in the NT in recording numbers of people (Acts 7:14, “Jacob and all his kindred, seventy-five souls”; Acts 27:37, two hundred and seventy-six “souls” at the shipwreck on Malta; 1 Pet. 3:20, eight “souls” saved in → Noah’s ark), and in the phrase “every soul” meaning “everyone” (Acts 2:43, “fear came on every soul”; cf. Acts 3:23; 27:22; Rom. 2:9; 13:1).

The expression “every living soul” (Rev. 16:3; cf. 8:9) is also to be understood in the OT sense. In the creation the dust of the ground was made into a “living soul” by the breathing in of the divine breath (cf. Gen. 2:7). Paul takes up this idea in 1 Cor. 15:45, in order to contrast this “living soul”, the power and directing force of natural, earthly life, with the life-giving → Spirit present in Jesus Christ.

(b) psychē means the inner life of man, equivalent to the ego, person, or personality, with the various powers of the soul. In 2 Cor. 1:23 Paul pledges his “soul” in a kind of curse upon himself, as a form of solemn asseveration. The reference here is not only to the life, but to the whole man, with all that he believes, hopes and strives for. Similarly in 1 Thess. 2:8, Paul writes concerning himself and his co-workers, that they have given their “souls”, i.e. their living powers of energy, themselves with all the powers of their personality, working day and night, in their care of the churches. “Soul” is meant in this sense of the person with its conscious powers in Jn. 10:24 in the Jews’ question of Jesus, “How long will you keep us in suspense [heōs pote tēn psychēn hēmōn aireis]”? If you are the Christ tell us plainly.” Jesus speaks of souls which are in need of rest and peace (Matt. 11:29). In the depth of the soul sorrow is experienced (Matt. 26:38 par. Mk. 14:34; cf. Ps. 42[41]:6). In Lk. 1:46 soul is used in parallel with spirit. Both have here the meaning of the whole inner man, in contrast to the outward aspect of lips and speech. Above all, the soul is spoken of here in a sense which goes beyond the world of Gk. thought. It is the seat of the religious life and of man's relationship to God. It is this religious root in human life which is referred to in Lk. 2:35, contrasted directly with the sword which wounds the body outwardly. We have here to do with a hidden, inward experience of the soul. The religious life of man is also the subject of 3 Jn. 2: "it is well with your soul." In this sense, the "righteous soul" is used in 2 Pet. 3:8 as a circumlocution for the religious man.

Of interest is the contrast of soul and spirit, as expressed in 1 Thess. 5:23, with its tripartite division of man. Here it is not a contrast between soul and body, but between → spirit, soul and body. The spirit in this context, as in Philo and Platonism, means the higher side of man, possibly something not far removed from Philo's hēgemonikon (cf. CL 2(c)). Soul thus means life, i.e. the fact of being alive, and the aspect of man which has to do with willing and emotion. In a similar way, in 1 Cor. 2:14 Paul contrasts the anthrōpos psychikos and the anthrōpos pneumatikos, man enlightened by God's Spirit. The former is animate man, filled with soul in the sense of life-force ("a living soul", Gen. 2:7; cf. 1 Cor. 15:45), the natural man, in contrast to the spiritual man. The spirit here referred to is (in distinction from that in 1 Thess. 5:23, see above) God's Spirit, not some higher spiritual power which is part of man's make-up even as natural man. In this contrast with spirit, soul does not refer to a different anthropological category, but to a different mode of existence.

The adj. psychikos is used again in Paul's discussion of the nature of the resurrection where the body of this life is contrasted with the resurrection body. The former is psychikos; the latter is pneumatikos. "It is sown a physical body [sōma psychikon], it is raised a spiritual body [sōma pneumatikon]. If there is a physical body [sōma psychikon], there is also a spiritual body [sōma pneumatikon]. Thus it is written, 'The first man Adam became a living being [psychēn zōsan]'"; the last Adam became a life-giving spirit. But it is not the spiritual [to pneumatikon] which is first but the physical [to psychikon], and then the spiritual [to pneumatikon]" (1 Cor. 15:44 ff.). In this way Paul counters the objection against the absurdity of thinking of the resurrection as the resuscitation of our corpses (cf. v. 35; → Resurrection, art. The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology 2; → Seed, art. sperma NT 2 (e)). The RSV rightly brings out the contrast between life under the conditions of space and time and the resurrection life by translating the adj. here by "physical". In Jas. 3:15 the sense is best brought out by translating it with the RSV as "unspiritual". Here the contrast is worldly wisdom and divine wisdom: "This wisdom is not such as comes down from above, but is earthly, unspiritual, devilish" (Jas. 3:15). Finally, in Jude 13 the RSV translates it as "worldly": "It is these who set up divisions, worldly people, devoid of the Spirit." In each case the emphasis falls on man as he is in himself without the new life of God.

When, on the other hand, Heb. 4:12 talks of a dividing asunder of soul and spirit, we are probably to think of a purely conceptual and not otherwise discernible division of the innermost powers of man. "That the word of God probes the inmost recesses of our spiritual being and brings the subconscious motives to light is what is meant" (F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 82). In Heb. 6:19 ("anchor of the soul"), "soul" again means the whole inner life of man with his powers of will, reason and emotion. In this connexion, mention should also be made of the use of psychē to mean insight, will, disposition, sensations, moral powers of man. This is also the meaning of “with all your soul” (Matt. 22:37 par. Mk. 12:30, Lk. 20:27; cf. Deut. 6:5; → Command; → Love). ek psychēs, from the heart, freely (Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:23; in each case the only occurrence in the letter), should be understood in the same way (cf. also Sir. 6:26; etc.). Similarly we find the phrase mia psychē, with one mind (Phil. 1:27), resulting from en henī pneumati, in one spirit. The background here is probably the notion that the church is the body of Christ, which – in a similar manner to the human body – is filled with a soul, showing itself as real and alive when it completes the unity of the body by bringing about a unity of inner powers within the church. In Acts 4:32, likewise, the common mind is meant, which causes the church to be united with one heart and one soul. This inner power of the church members is also the target of the exhortation in Heb. 12:3, not to grow weary or faint in the soul, i.e. inwardly. Souls which are not firmly established can be enticed and led astray (Heb. 10:39). Here the dispute is with inner desires, the uncontrolled movements of the soul. Souls can also be activated in wrong and evil ways: they can be poisoned (Acts 14:2).

In quotations from the OT the popular parallelism of “my soul” and “I” as equivalent expressions has been taken over. Thus God himself speaks of his soul, embracing in this expression all that characterizes the living person of God in the OT: his love, wrath, faithfulness, etc. (Matt. 12:18, cf. Isa. 42:1; Heb. 10:38, cf. Hab. 2:4).

(c) Hellenistic Judaism is familiar with the concepts both of the soul’s corruption and of the soul’s salvation. These lines of thought appear in the later epistles of the NT, but no reference is intended to the immortal soul as guarantee or substance of eternal life. Although such passages show definite traces of Hellenism, they are nonetheless brought on to a rather different level by biblical tradition, basic eschatological insights, and the Christian experience of faith in the risen Lord. Thus what, for example, in Xenophon is a call referring to physical life, when he says “save your souls” (Cyr. 4, 4, 10) in the sense of “save your lives”, becomes in the NT an exhortation to believe and obey the divine message. It is the task of the church leader to keep watch over souls destined for eternity (Heb. 13:17; O. Michel interprets “soul” here as “eschatological life” (Der Brief an die Hebräer, KEK 13, 1966¹², ad loc.).

Jas. 1:21 and 5:20 speak of the salvation of the soul which is in danger. The → death from which it is said that the soul will be saved is eternal death, exclusion from eternal life. The salvation of souls in this sense is the goal of faith and the content of the whole saving activity of God, in which he gives all those who are baptized a share (1 Pet. 1:9). It is probably for this reason that 1 Pet. 1:22 speaks of the purification and absolution of the soul, i.e. the inner life. It is a matter of the soul in its relationship to God. Against it, against its will and obedience the fleshly lusts strive (1 Pet. 2:11). The soul, as the part of us which believes and is sanctified, is destined to an inheritance in God’s future kingdom. Thus here the contrast is not between spirit, soul and body, but between the soul and the lusts of the flesh. It is souls in this sense that are meant in 1 Pet. 2:25, their shepherd and bishop being Jesus Christ himself. For the slaves who are addressed here there is a contrast between him and their earthly overseers, with their arbitrary and unjust ways. The consciousness that they have a true “bishop” watching over their souls cannot but give the slaves strength to be patient, loving and humble (1 Pet. 2:25). “Soul” is used again in the same sense of being destined for eternal life and victory over death, when Christians are exhorted in 1 Pet. 4:19 to entrust their souls to God in time of persecution, since he will preserve men for eternity.

Matt. 10:28 (cf. Lk. 12:5) also comes into this category. The soul is directed to God alone, who “is able to destroy both body and soul in hell.” The soul in this sense only exists because it is called by God and because it allows itself to be called and filled with divine power. God alone has power over it. He can let it live, and he can destroy it. Similarly in Rev. 6:9 and 20:4 mention is made of the souls of those who have been slain, who are under the altar of God in heaven, i.e. under the altar in the heavenly counterpart of the temple. This imagery is probably based on the fact that the blood of sacrifice was poured out before or on to the altar (Lev. 4:7; → Sacrifice, art. thyō OT 3, NT 5). The martyrs, who have shed their blood for Christ’s sake, are compared with the sacrifices. That is why their souls are under the altar, since the soul, i.e. the life, is in the blood. The dominant thought is that the souls which have been won by God, which have been saved, which believe in him and sacrifice themselves for him, are preserved in his keeping; and they are inextricably bound up with the realization of God’s aims and place, in his heavenly world with its future destiny and its future appearance upon earth.

3. Although the Hellenistic term psychē appears more frequently in the later epistles of the NT than in other parts (cf. 2 (c)), it must not be imagined that this implies the concept of the soul as the real and valuable part of man, the eternal and permanent element. That would be a misunderstanding. This kind of thinking, which incidentally was characteristic of German Idealism, deduces the immortality and permanence of the soul from its own particular quality. This is just what the NT does not teach. The soul is simply that area in which decisions are made concerning life and death, salvation and destruction. Moreover, every statement about the psychē in the NT is linked in context with eschatological statements about renewal and resurrection. Outside such a context this line of thought is impossible. Part of this context of ideas is the teaching that God is judge, that his judgment determines whether the soul shall be saved or destroyed, and the fact that the salvation of the soul is always understood in connexion with the → resurrection of the body, i.e. a new embodiment of the soul.

G. Harder

4. In addition to psychikos (discussed above under 2 (b)) the NT contains several other compounds. anapsyxis, which is found in cl. Gk. from Euripides and Plato, is found only at Acts 3:20 in the phrase kairoi anapsyxēōs, “times of refreshing”, i.e. the age of salvation, which is promised to the nation of Israel if it repents. Although great numbers of Jews are converted (Acts 2:41; 4:4; 5:14; 21:20), the Israel that Luke describes in Acts is one in which large numbers of Gentiles are incorporated, and from which many of the old Israel remain aloof (cf. E. Schweizer, TDNT IX 664 f.). The cognate vb. anapsychō has a transitive meaning at the only place where it occurs in the NT, as compared with its intransitive sense in the LXX where it means to refresh oneself (Exod. 23:12; Jdg. 15:19; 1 Sam. 16:23; 2 Sam. 16:14; Ps. 39[38]:14). 2 Tim. 1:16 mentions how Onesiphorus often refreshed Paul whilst he was in prison. It is not clear whether this refers to physical needs or spiritual encouragement, or both. Probably they are not to be separated (cf. E. Schweizer, TDNT IX 664). The term dipsychos, “double minded”, does not occur before Jas.

1:8. Perhaps it means with a divided heart (cf. 1QH 4:14; Deut. 29:17; Ezek. 14:3 ff.; Sir. 1:28; 1 Clem. 23:2 ff.; 2 Clem. 11:2 ff.; 19:2; Hermas, Man. 11:1 ff.; E. Schweizer, TDNT IX 665). But perhaps it was a local term (cf. S. Marshall, "Dipsychos: A Local Term?", StudEv VI = TU 112, 1973, 348–51). At any rate James makes the twofold point that such a man is unstable and that he cannot presume on the goodness of God, for prayer and devotion require a wholehearted attitude to God: "For that person must not suppose that a double-minded man [anēr dipsychos], unstable in all his ways, will receive anything from the Lord." The rare word oligopsychos means faint-hearted in Koine Gk., and means faint-hearted, discouraged in 1 Thess. 5:14. Such persons are to be encouraged, though the idle are to be admonished. sympsychos, harmonious, united in spirit, occurs in Phil. 2:2, where Paul exhorts the church to complete his joy by being of one spirit and love. Shortly afterwards he expresses the hope that he will be cheered (eupsycheō) by news of them, which no doubt implies the hope that they will have taken to heart his admonition of vv. 1–18.

C. Brown

→ Adam, → Body, → Flesh, → Heart, → Heaven, → Hell, → Life, → Man, → Paradise, → Reason, → Resurrection, → Spirit

* in this bibliography denotes philosophical studies which are included for the sake of comparison of biblical ideas with modern views.

(a). A. W. Argyle, "The Christian Doctrine of the Origin of the Soul", SJT 18, 1965, 273–93; G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God, 1962; G. Bertram, A. Dihle, E. Jacob, E. Lohse, E. Schweizer, K.-W. Troger, psychē etc., TDNT IX 608–66; C. A. Briggs, "The Use of nepesh in the Old Testament", JBL 16, 1897, 17–30; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 190–246; J. Burnet, "The Socratic Doctrine of the Soul", Proceedings of the British Academy 7, 1915–16, 235–60; E. De Witt Burton, Spirit, Soul and Flesh, 1918; C. A. Campbell, On Selfhood and Godhood, Gifford Lectures 1953–55, 1957*; A. B. Come, Human Spirit and Holy Spirit, 1959; H. Conzelmann, First Corinthians, Hermeneia, 1974; O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? 1958; F. DeLitzsch, A System of Biblical Psychology, 1867²; E. R. Dodds, The Greeks and the Irrational, 1951; W. Ellis, The Idea of the Soul in Western Philosophy and Science, 1940; R. H. Gundry, Soma in Biblical Theology with Emphasis on Pauline Anthropology, SNTS Monograph Series 29, 1976; W. Jaeger, "The Greek Ideas of Immortality" in K. Stendahl, ed., Immortality and Resurrection, 1965, 97–114; and The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers, 1947; R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of their Use in Conflict Settings, Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Christentums 10, 1971, 334–57; A. R. Johnson, The Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel, 1949; H. Jonas, The Gnostic Religion: The Message of the Alien God and the Beginnings of Christianity, 1963²; A. Kenny, The Anatomy of the Soul: Historical Essays in the Philosophy of the Mind, 1973*; W. G. Kümmel, Man in the New Testament, 1963³; L. Köhler, Hebrew Man, (1956) 1973; R. Laurin, "The Concept of Man as a Soul", ExpT 72, 1960–61, 131–34; H. D. Lewis, The Elusive Mind, Gifford Lectures 1966–68, 1969*; and The Self and Immortality, 1973*; J. R. Lucas, "The Soul", in B. Mitchell, ed., Faith and Logic: Oxford Essays in Philosophical Theology, 1957, 132–48*; D. Lys, "The Israelite Soul according to the LXX", VT 16, 1966, 181–228; D. W. Mork, The Biblical Meaning of Man, 1967; C. F. D. Moule, "St. Paul and Dualism", NTS 12, 1965–66, 106–23; A. Murtonen, The Living Soul, Studia Orientalia 23, 1, 1958; M. P. Nilsson, "The Immortality of the Soul in Greek Religion", Eranos 39, 1941, 1–16; R. B. Onians, The Origins of European Thought about the Body, the Mind, the Soul, the World, Time and Fate, 1954²; C. Partee, "The Soul in Plato, Platonism and Calvin", SJT 22, 1969, 278–95; B. A. Pearson, The Pneumatikos-Psychikos Terminology, 1973; C. A. van Peursen, Body, Soul, Spirit: A Survey of the Body-Mind Problem, 1966*; B. Reicke, "Body and Soul in the New Testament", StTh 19, 1965, 200–12; H. H. Rex, "Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Body, or What?", Reformed Theological Review 17, 1958, 73–82; H. W. Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man, 1911, 1–150; and "Hebrew Psychology", in A. S. Peake, ed., The People and the Book, 1925, 353–82; E. Rohde, Psyche: The Cult of Souls and Belief in Immortality among the Greeks, I–II, 1966; G. Ryle, The Concept of Mind, 1949*; C. S. Sherrington, Man on his Nature, Gifford Lectures 1937–38, 1940*; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Man, 1951; W. D. Stacey, “St. Paul and the Soul”, ExpT 66, 1954–55, 274–77; K. Stendahl, ed., Immortality and Resurrection, 1965; G. F. Stout, Mind and Matter, Gifford Lectures 1919–21, 1931*; P. F. Strawson, Individuals, 1959*; G. N. A. Vesey, The Embodied Mind, 1965*; Personal Identity, 1974*; G. N. A. Vesey, ed., Body and Mind: Readings in Philosophy, 1964*; and The Human Agent, Royal Institute of Philosophy Lectures 1, 1968*; B. Williams, Problems of the Self, 1973*; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974, 10–25; W. Zimmerli, Man and his Hope in the Old Testament, SBT Second Series 20, 1971.

(b). F. Barth, “La Notion Paulinienne de PSYCHĒ”, Revue de Théologie et Philosophie 44, 1911, 316–36; J. H. Becker, Het Begrip nepeš en het Oude Testament, 1942; J. Böhme, Die Seele und das Ich im homerischen Epos, 1929; E. Brandenburg, Fleisch und Geist, WMANT 29, 1968; P. Bratsiotis, “nepeš/psychē. Ein Betrag zur Erforschung der Sprache und der Theologie der LXX”, Volume du Congrès Genève 1965, VT Supplements 15, 1966, 58–89; W. Burkert, Weisheit und Wissenschaft, Erlanger Beiträge zur Sprach- und Kunstwissenschaft 10, 1962, 98–142; and Goēs. Zum griechischen Schamanismus, Rheinisches Museum Neue Folge 105, 1962, 36 ff.; G. Dautzenberg, “Sein Leben Bewahren.” Psychē in den Herrenworten der Evangelien, Studien zum Alten Testament und Neuen Testament, 14, 1966; M. Delcor, “L’Immortalité de l’Âme dans le Livre de Sagesse et dans les Documents de Qumrân”, Nouvelle Revue Théologique 77, 1955, 614–30; E. Dhorme, L’Emploi des Noms de Parties du Corps en Hébreu et en Akkadien, 1923; A. Dieterich, Eine Mithrasliturgie, (1903) 1966; A. M. Dubarle, “La Conception de l’Homme dans l’Ancien Testament”, Sacra Pagina I, Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 12, 1959, 522–36; R. Dussaud, “La Notion d’Âme chez les Israélites et les Phéniciens”, Syria 16, 1935, 267–77; E. von Dobschütz, Die Thessalonicherbriefe, 1909, 230 ff.; L. Dürr, “Hebr. nepeš = akk. napištu = Gurgel, Kehle”, ZAW 43, 1925, 262–69; W. Eichrodt, Das Menschenverständnis des Alten Testaments, ATHANT, 1944; H. Engelland, “Unsterblichkeit der Seele”, EKL III 1578 ff.; E. Fascher, “Seele oder Leben?”, ThZ 17, 1961, 305–18; A. J. Festugière, La Révélation d’Hermès Trismégiste, III. Les Doctrines de l’Âme, Études Bibliques, 1953; J. Fichtner, “Seele oder Leben in der Bibel”, ThZ 17, 1961, 305–18; F. P. Fiorenza and J. B. Metz, “Der Mensch als Einheit von Leib und Seele”, in J. Feiner and M. Löhrer, eds., Mysterium Salutis, II, 1967, 584–632; G. Fohrer, “Theologische Züge des Menschenbildes im Alten Testament”, Studien zur alttestamentlichen Theologie und Geschichte, BZAW 115, 1969, 176–94; O. Gigon, Grundprobleme der antiken Philosophie, 1959, 229 ff.; G. Guignebert, “Remarques sur quelques Conceptions chrétiennes antiques touchant l’Origine et la Nature de l’Âme”, Revue d’Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 9, 1929, 428–50; W. Gutbrod, Die paulinische Anthropologie, BWANT 67, 1934, 75 ff.; H. Hübner, “Anthropologischer Dualismus in den Hodayoth?”, NTS 18, 1971–72, 268–84; A. Hultkranz and F. Hartmann, “Leib und Seele”, *RGG*³ IV 286 ff.; W. Jaeger, Paideia, II, 1944, 87 ff.; A. Kammenhuber, “Die hethitischen Vorstellungen von Seele und Leib, Herz und Leibesinnerem, Kopf und Person”, Zeitschrift für Assyriologie Neue Folge 22, 1964, 150–212; J. Köberle, Natur und Geist nach der Auffassung des Alten Testaments, 1901; W. Kütenmeyer, “Leib und Seele”, EKL II 1062 ff.; F. M. T. de Liagre Böhl, “Das Menschenbild in babylonischer Schau”, in C. J. Bleeker, ed., Anthropologie Religieuse, Supplements to Numen 2, 1955, 28–48; M. Lichtenstein, Das Wort nepeš in der Bibel, 1920; B. Lifschitz, “Der Ausdruck psychē in den griechischen Grabinschriften”, Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 76, 1960, 159 ff.; D. Lys, Nèphèsh. Études d’Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 50, 1959; C. Masson, “L’immortalité de l’Âme ou Résurrection des Morts?”, Revue de Théologie et Philosophie New Series 3, 8, 1958, 250–67; R. Meyer, Hellenistisches in der rabbinischen Anthropologie 74, 1937; J. Moreau, L’Âme du Monde de Platon aux Stoiciens, 1939; M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen Religion, (1941) 1955², 637 ff.; W. Phillip, “Seele”, EKL III 895 ff.; G. Pidoux, L’Homme dans l’Ancien Testament, Cahiers Théologiques 32, 1953; and “L’Homme dans l’Ancien Testament”, in C. J. Bleeker, ed., op. cit., 155–65; B. Rigaux, Les Épitres aux Thessaloniciens, 1956, 596 ff.; E. Rohde, Psyche, Seelenkult und Unsterblichkeitsglaube der Griechen, (1893) 1925¹⁰; J. Rothermund, “Christliches und jüdisches Menschenbild”, KuD 16, 1970, 199–222; F. Rüsche, “Blut, Leben und Seele”, Studien zur Geschichte und Kultur des Altertums, Supplementary Volume V, 1930; O. Sander, “Leib-Seele-Dualismus im Alten Testament”, ZAW 77, 1965, 329 ff.; A. Safran, “La Conception juive de l’Homme”, Revue de Théologie et Philosophie 98, 1965, 193–207; J. Scharbert, Fleisch, Geist und Seele im Pentateuch, Stuttgarter Bibelstudien 19, 1966; O. Schilling, Geist und Materie in biblischer Sicht, Stuttgarter Bibelstudien 25, 1967; M. Schmaus, “Unsterblichkeit der Geistesseele oder Auferstehung von den Toten?”, Festschrift L. Jaeger und W. Stählin, 1963, 311–37; J. Schmid, “Der Begriff der Seele im Neuen Testament”, Festschrift G. Söhngen, 1962, 128–47; W. H. Schmidt, “Anthropologische Begriffe im Alten Testament”, EvTh 24, 1964, 374–88; J. N. Sevenster, Het Begrip psychē en het NT, 1946; and “Die Anthropologie des Neuen Testaments”, in C. J. Bleeker, ed., op. cit., 166–77; F. Wehrli, Hauptrichtungen des griechischen Denkens, 1964, 62 ff.; C. Westermann, νεψ̄ς, THAT II 71–96; U. Wilckens, Weisheit und Torheit, 1959.

Spirit, Holy Spirit

πνεῦμα

πνεῦμα (pneuma), spirit, wind; πνέω (pneō), to blow; πνοή (pnoē), wind, breath; ἐκπνέω (ekpneō), breathe out; ἔμπνέω (empneō), to pant; πνευματικός (pneumatikos), spiritual; πνευματικῶς (pneumatikōs), spiritually; θεόπνευστος (theopneustos), God-breathed, inspired by God.

CL The Gk. root pneu-, from which the NT word for spirit is derived, denotes dynamic movement of the air. Its derivatives have the following meanings: pneō, to blow (of wind and air generally, also on a musical instrument); to breathe (also in the sense of to be alive); to emit a fragrance, etc.; to radiate heat, anger, courage, benevolence, etc. (all presumably considered to be borne along on the element of air). pnoē means blowing, breathing (particularly panting), inspiration (by a deity), steam, evaporation. ekpneō means to breathe out, blow out, stop breathing (i.e. to die), to get out of breath, to stop blowing. empneō means to breathe in, to be breathing, to be alive, to blow on to or into something, to inbreathe, to inspire.

pneuma, spirit, a word of great significance in the NT, is formed from this root with the suffix -ma and denotes the result of this action, namely, air set in motion, considered as a special substance and with an underlying stress on its inherent power. When it first occurred (and there are no proven instances of it before the pre-Socratic school), it therefore meant wind or breath, but increasingly it took on the functions of related concepts, so that by the Hellenistic period it was a term of some importance, though still with a somewhat materialistic connotation.

The air that men breathe was considered to be the bearer of life (thus to discontinue breath means to die, Aesch., Pers. 507). From the 5th cent. onward Gk. physicians developed a physiology based on this and soon drew a distinction between man's inward, innate pneuma and the air he breathed. In Aristotle this pneuma was the formative power which, from the embryo onwards, gradually produced the mature individual and then, in the case of man, became the instrument whereby the soul controlled the body.

Already, therefore, it was approaching the meaning held by psychē, → soul, the distinction being that the latter was a purely functional term, while pneuma was regarded as a substance. In Stoic philosophy, however, pneuma took over the functions of psychē in relation to the senses and to thought and speech (some Stoic philosophers even came to identify it with nous, the specifically human power of intellect). Stoicism also regarded it as an elemental principle which gave coherence to the different entities in creation, while at the same time differentiating them one from another. Thus, as an ethereal, fire-like, extremely fine-textured substance, it arranged the world in terms of a descending scale, without which the world's very existence would have been an impossibility. In its purely ethereal form it was the Logos or God; as spiritual fire it was the soul of man; as physical pneuma it fashioned the plants, and as “habitual” pneuma it gave coherence to inanimate objects. Hence, it came to be regarded as the fifth element (or “quintessence”), having already been used, instead of “air”, as one of the four elements.

Probably under Stoic influence, Plutarch and several others abandoned the widely used functional term epipnoia (afflatus), which had formed the basis of Plato’s theory concerning the various types of ecstatic inspiration (Phdr. 244 ff.; cf. 265b). In its place, and in obvious dependence upon Plato, they used pneuma to denote inspiration, regarding it as a material substance which filled a man and enabled him to prophesy. This prophetic pneuma was considered in turn to be “enthusiastic”, visionary, demonic, holy (hieron), even divine. Papyrus finds reveal the active part it played in popular religion (always given to magic and soothsaying), and in the so-called Mithras Liturgy (ed. A. Dieterich, Eine Mithrasliturgie, 1923³, 4, 14, 21) it appears among the four elements, being described as “holy” and “immortal” and as elevating its recipient above mortal nature, probably by analogy with prophetic ecstasy.

Finally, it is found in the sense of “spirit”, “demon”, in Hellenistic inscriptions and papyri (also in later writers, e.g. Iamblichus, De Mysteriis 2, 3, 10). There is certainly Near Eastern influence here, and possibly some Jewish influence.

The adj. pneumatikos (the suffix -ikos denotes “pertaining to”) shares the meanings of its root noun and is used from the pre-Socratic school onwards. theopneustos (inspired by God) is rare, not being used before the Hellenistic period, and then only with reference to divination, apart from one isolated instance where it is applied to wisdom (cf. M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 120; → Scripture, art. graphē NT 1 (c)).

OT In the LXX the Heb. equivalent of pneuma is almost always rûah; only three times does pneuma render nšâmâh, breath. Furthermore, as far as LXX translations of rûah are concerned, pneuma predominates, for of the 377 instances of rûah in the Masoretic Text, 264 are translated by pneuma, the next most frequent rendering being anemos, wind, used 49 times. The idea behind rûah is the extraordinary fact that something as intangible as air should move; at the same time it is not so much the movement per se which excites attention, but rather the energy manifested by such movement. The basic meaning of rûah, therefore, is more or less that of “blowing”.

1. Hence, in roughly one third of all instances, it is used for the wind, which, being intangible, has God as its immediate cause (Gen. 8:1; Amos 4:13; Isa. 40:7; Ps. 104[103]:4). In this same connexion, rûah takes on two special senses: the direction of the wind (e.g. Ezek. 37:9; 42:16–20) and metaphorically, because of the wind’s ephemeral nature (cf. Ps. 78[77]:39), nothing, nothingness (e.g. Eccl. 5:15, LXX anemos).

2. The same phenomenon occurs in the breath, both of man (Ezek. 37:8, 10, cf. 9), and of beasts (Eccl. 3:19, 21 and passim). It denotes the life-force of the individual (Jdg. 15:19) and of the group (Num. 16:22), that which is lacking in idols (Jer. 10:14) but not in God (Ps. 33[32]:6) or the messiah (Isa. 11:4). God gives (cf. Isa. 42:5) and protects it (Ps. 31[30]:6), but is free to take it back again (Ps. 104[103]:29), whereupon it returns to God (Eccl. 12:7). As a life-force it manifests itself in varying degrees of intensity, the dominant idea being that of its accompanying vitality rather than that of breathing. It can be adversely affected by emotions ranging from anxiety (Gen. 41:8) and grief (Gen. 26:35), to utter despair (Job 17:1). It is heightened by jealousy (Num. 5:14) or anger (Jdg. 8:3), while there is a clear echo of the word's basic meaning in the vivid phrase expressing God's wrath: "the blast of his nostrils" (Exod. 15:8; Job 4:9).

This reveals the manner in which the OT speaks of → man: not clinically, with his human attributes all neatly classified, but concretely, i.e. the writers take a man as they find him and assess what he does, his behaviour towards his fellow-men and the attitude he displays towards the law of God. So concrete is the OT's approach that the basic terms it uses are taken from the ordinary, visible and tangible phenomena of the world about us. The thought implicit in rûah is that breathing, with the movement of air which this involves, is the outward expression of the life-force inherent in all human behaviour. This is true of behaviour requiring a greater or a lesser degree of energy; behaviour in which energy has to be directed along certain channels (e.g. Ezr. 1:1: to stir up someone's spirit, i.e. to bring him to a decision), in which case spirit may be synonymous with plan or intention (Isa. 19:3); behaviour towards other men, whether humble (Prov. 16:9) or proud (Eccl. 7:8), patient (Eccl. 7:8) or impatient (Prov. 14:29); or towards God, guileless (Ps. 32[31]:2), steadfast (Pss. 51[50]:12; 78[77]:8), submissive and looking to him for deliverance when bowed down with trouble or broken in penitence (Pss. 34[35]:19; 51[50]:17), disobedient (Hos. 4:12; Isa. 29:24). "Spirit" frequently stands alongside → "heart" (e.g. Exod. 35:31–35), the ideas behind the two words being very similar; the difference, however, is that the heart dwells within man, having indeed been created by God, but is not a fleeting, oscillating gift like the breath of a man's spirit. The heart may be said to denote a man's aims, his resolves, and his courage, while the spirit may be said to denote the direction in which a man's vitality flows, the self-expression involved in his behaviour – including ecstatic behaviour.

The term spirit is never used for that higher quality in man which distinguishes him from the beasts. Rather, just as the wind comes from God and the spirit of man is God's gift, spirit is essentially of God. In about 100 passages it is expressly called the Spirit of God (e.g. Gen. 1:2), or of Yahweh (e.g. Isa. 11:2), while in Isa. 31:3 "spirit" is the power of God contrasted with the impotence of the flesh, i.e. of mere creatures; such power is inescapable and universally present (Ps. 139[138]:7). It can come mightily upon a man (Jdg. 14:6; 1 Sam. 16:13 and passim), can "clothe" him (Jdg. 6:34 and passim), enter into him (Ezek. 2:2 and passim), descend upon him (2 Ki. 2:9; Isa. 11:2 and passim), impel him (Jdg. 13:25), all of which indicates the powerful operation of God upon a man, enabling him to perform some ecstatic, supernatural deed, such as the salvation of Israel by the judges (Jdg. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 1 Sam. 11:16; 16:13; Num. 27:18), or the office and utterances of the prophets (N.B. the verb translated "to prophesy" refers to spirit-wrought ecstasy, e.g. Num. 11:25–27; 1 Sam. 18:10; for the prophets' office cf. 2 Ki. 2:9; Neh. 9:30; for their utterances cf. Num. 24:2; Ezek. 11:5, etc.; and for their ecstatic vision cf. Ezek. 3:12; 8:3; 11:1, 24). In addition, the spirit is described as the source of any ecstatic utterance (e.g. 2 Sam. 23:2), even of the craftsman's skill involved in the building of the tabernacle (Exod. 31:3), or indeed of any outstanding ability (Dan. 6:3).

3. Even destructive → evil is a spirit sent by God, for there is, as far as the OT is concerned, no power of evil independent of him (1 Sam. 16:14, 15, 16, 23; Isa. 29:10; 1 Ki. 22:21 f.).

4. The writing prophets have a clearly delineated doctrine of the spirit. According to Isa. 32:15–20 (cf. Isa. 44:3), God will conclude his judgment of the proud and complacent, by pouring out from on high the spirit which, like rain, will bring about fertility, i.e. righteousness, peace and security. This salvation will be wrought by the offspring of → David (Isa. 11:1–8), who, being ordained by the Spirit of God, will exercise a dominion of perfect integrity and righteousness amid conditions of heavenly peace. Through the process of judgment and salvation, God heals his people's idolatry and backsliding (Hos. 4:12; cf. Isa. 29:24), giving a new spirit of godliness, not only to the nation at large (Ezek. 11:19 f.; 18:31; 36:26 f.; 39:29), but also to the individual (Ps. 51[50]:10). Ezekiel declares this to be nothing less than Israel's resurrection from the dead – his death having been caused by unbelief (Ezek. 37:1–14, a vision which, as the whole prophecy indicates, refers to the restoration of God's people as a whole and not to the personal revival of individuals within the nation). The later chapters of Isaiah proclaim the same message: the Servant of the Lord extends the blessings of his rule (already described in ch. 11) to include the Gentiles (42:1–4; 49:1–6), the covenant promise being fulfilled in God's irrevocable gift of his Spirit (59:21; cf. Joel 2:28 f.). Similarly in the past, the period of salvation at the exodus had been marked by the gift of the Spirit to Moses; indeed that whole national deliverance had taken place in the power of the Spirit (Isa. 63:11–14). The post-exilic prophets see this promise fulfilled in the re-establishment of Israel in Jerusalem (Hag. 2:5: the spirit in the midst of the people gives protection; Zech. 4:6: salvation comes not from an army nor from any human power, but from the Spirit of God). In this prophecy God's almighty, all-pervasive but intangible Spirit is linked with the covenant, for the latter reveals God not only working for the salvation of his people but bringing their lives into active conformity with his holy will, despite their hostility towards him.

5. In Judaism under the influence of its Hellenistic environment, the spirit was a vital force divinely breathed into man and forming a distinct part of his being; it was not distinguished from the → "soul" as far as terminology was concerned, but was contrasted rather with the body: the body is of the earth, the spirit stems from heaven (Wis. 15:11; rabbinic evidence for this and for what follows is found in E. Sjöberg, TDNT VI 375–89). At the same time in Palestinian Judaism the body was never the prison-house of the soul or its seducer into sin. Philo, on the other hand, called the flesh a "burden" which weighed down the spirit and confined it in earthly fetters; hence its appetites must be denied for the sake of the spirit (Gig. 31 ff.). Palestinian Judaism also differed from its Hellenistic counterpart in regarding the spirit not as part of a divine substance but rather as something divinely created and therefore to be clearly distinguished from its Creator. It possessed immortality (Wis. 12:1; Jub. 23, 26–31; Eth. Enoch 39:4 ff.), and at a later stage was also credited with pre-existence.

6. In the Qumran texts, the spirit manifested its presence when a man conducted his life wisely and with a view to pleasing God (1QS 5:21, 24), so that apostasy of spirit led to sinful conduct (1QS 7:18, 23), i.e. "spirit" expressed the basic orientation of a man's life. A variety of adjs. could be applied to it, e.g. "broken" (1QS 8:3), "apostate" (8:12), and it could also be viewed collectively as "the spirit of the fellowship of [God's] truth", i.e. "the spirit of uprightness and humility" which atoned for sins (1QS 3:7 f.). This spirit was regarded as special insight either bestowed upon the devout man by God himself (1QH 12:11; 13:19 and passim), or created within him from his mother's womb (1QH 4:31; 15:22 and passim), i.e. it was either an eschatological gift or something eternally predestinated.

7. Although in the OT God is never said to dwell among "spirits" (1 Ki. 22:21 ff. merely contains an account of a "spirit" coming into his presence), this plur. came to be used throughout Judaism as a collective term for heavenly beings (e.g. Eth. Enoch 15:4, 6). "Spirits" (with or without the epithet "evil") also denoted the demons so familiar to Judaism (e.g. Eth. Enoch 15:6–10). Linked with this, and found throughout apocalyptic literature, was the belief in → Satan and his evil spirits, God's adversaries who tempted men to sin. The idea of temptation, however, became less prominent in rabbinic literature, where demons harmed men's health and threatened their lives.

8. Under the influence of Iranian cosmology, which regarded the epochs of the world as stages in the struggle between Ormazd and the evil spirit Ahriman, the Qumran texts developed the theory of two angels or spirits, one of "righteousness" or "light", the other of "iniquity" or "darkness". As the principles of good and evil which God had established on behalf of man, these two were locked in perpetual conflict in this world (1QS 3:13–4:26). Each had a retinue of virtues or vices respectively, likewise described as spirits. Echoes of this teaching are also to be found in Test. XII, e.g. Test. Jud. 20; Test. Ash. 6; Test. Reub. 3.

9. The "spirit of God" (e.g. Eth. Enoch 91:1), the "divine spirit" (Philo) and the "holy spirit" (as in rabbinic literature) sometimes meant the God-given spirit of man. In particular, however, it meant that spiritual reality, independent of man, which performed God's work on earth, e.g. creation (Wis. 1:7; 12:1 and passim), and especially prophecy (e.g. Sir. 48:12). The rabbis believed that this spirit spoke particularly in the OT scriptures, all of which were "uttered by him". Stress was laid upon Isaiah's promise of a messiah who would have a special endowment of the Spirit (Test. Lev. 18, 7, 11 and passim) and upon Joel's prophecy (2:28–29) concerning the pouring out of the Spirit upon all the godly in the last days (Sib. 3:582 ff.).

E. Kamlah

NT As in earlier Jewish thought, pneuma denotes that power which man experiences as relating him to the spiritual realm, the realm of reality which lies beyond ordinary observation and human control. Within this broad definition pneuma has a fairly wide range of meaning. But by far the most frequent use of pneuma in the NT (more than 250 times) is as a reference to the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, that power which is most immediately of God as to source and nature.

1. The Human Spirit. At one end of pneuma's spectrum of meaning it denotes the human spirit, or perhaps better, man in so far as he belongs to the spiritual realm and interacts with the spiritual realm. In this sense pneuma occurs in the NT nearly 40 times.

Thus the spirit of man is that aspect of man through which God most immediately encounters him (Rom. 8:16; Gal. 6:18; Phil. 4:23; 2 Tim. 4:22; Phlm. 25; Heb. 4:12; Jas. 4:5), that dimension of the whole man wherein and whereby he is most immediately open and responsive to God (Matt. 5:3; Lk. 1:47; Rom. 1:9; 1 Pet. 3:4), that area of human awareness most sensitive to matters of the spiritual realm (Mk. 2:8; 8:12; Jn. 11:33; 13:21; Acts 17:16; 2 Cor. 2:13; 7:13). Often in talk about this area of encounter, it is not clear whether the language refers to the spirit of man, or to a particular force that he experiences through this dimension of his being, or to a spirit or power from without. Hence, the ambiguity of several passages: Mk. 14:38 par. Matt. 26:41 – probably the Holy Spirit since the language is drawn from Ps. 51:12; Lk. 1:17, 80; 9:55(D); Acts 18:25 – probably the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 12:11); Rom. 8:15; 11:8; 1 Cor. 4:21; 6:17; 14:14, 32; 2 Cor. 4:13; 12:18; Gal. 6:1; Eph. 1:17; 4:23; 2 Tim. 1:7; Rev. 22:6.

The NT writers can speak of the (human) spirit as though it was a something possessed by the individual; but this does not mean that they envisaged the spirit of man as a divine spark (the real “I”) incarcerated in the physical, “the ghost in the machine” (an anthropology more typical of Greek philosophy). This language is more likely to be simply a natural and easy way of speaking about man in his belongingness to the spiritual realm, the power he experiences in him which relates him to the beyond, “the dimension of the beyond in the midst”. So Lk. 8:55 (cf. Jdg. 15:19); Rom. 8:16; 1 Cor. 2:11; 5:5; 7:34; 16:18; 2 Cor. 7:1; 1 Thess. 5:23 (cf. Deut. 6:4). Here too there still persists the ancient Hebraic idea of the pneuma (rûah) as the breath of God (2 Thess. 2:8; cf. Jn. 20:22), the breath of life (Rev. 11:11; 13:15).

So too death as a giving up the spirit (Matt. 27:50; Lk. 23:46; Acts 7:59) is to be interpreted not so much as the release of the ghost from the machine, but in terms rather of the physical body ceasing to be the embodiment of the whole man. At death man ceases to exist both in the realm of the physical and in the realm of the spiritual, and continues existing only in the spiritual; and the physical body, ceasing to be the embodiment of the whole man in the observable world, becomes merely a corpse (Jas. 2:26). Whereas, in Paul’s terms, the danger confronting man in the world is that he lives solely on the level of the world of sense and soul (“according to the flesh”) and not also and predominantly on the level of the spirit (“according to the Spirit”), so that when the body dies, the whole man dies in the destruction of the flesh (cf. 1 Cor. 15:42–50) – the danger Paul evidently seeks to counter in 1 Cor. 5:5.

From this it follows also that the dead person can be thought of simply as a pneuma, as belonging wholly to the spiritual realm (Lk. 24:37, 39; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 12:23; 1 Pet. 3:18 f.; 4:6). It is possible that Paul also thought of man as able, while still in this life, to leave his body temporarily and to project himself through the spiritual realm into the presence of others (1 Cor. 5:3; Col. 2:5) or into heaven (2 Cor. 12:2–4; → Paradise); but the two former passages may simply be earnest expressions of empathetic concern and fellow feeling, and in the latter Paul evidently did not know how to understand the experience himself.

2. Evil Spirits and Good Spirits. It was natural in the world-view of the first century that the mysterious powers which afflict men should be thought of as evil spirits and → demons (so more than 40 times, mainly in the Synoptic Gospels, 30 times, and Acts 8 times, not at all in the Fourth Gospel; e.g. Matt. 8:16; Mk. 1:23, 26 f.; 9:25; Lk. 4:36; 11:24, 26; Acts 19:12 f., 15 f.; also 1 Tim. 4:1; Rev. 16:13 f.; 18:2). This power of evil can also be depicted as a particular spirit which dominates the world of man, the spirit or god of this world (1 Cor. 2:12; 2 Cor. 4:4; Eph. 2:2; cf. 2 Cor. 11:4; 1 Jn. 4:6; → Satan). These were all understood as experiences of personal forces from the spiritual realm, evil or unclean because they injured and hindered a man's full relationship with God and his fellows. But at no time do the NT writers give way to a dualism, where the evil which thus manifests itself is as strong as God. Always the evil spirits are shown as inferior to God and subject to the power of the Spirit of God operating through his agents. Indeed it was precisely this effective power over evil spirits in his ministry of exorcism which Jesus saw as proof that the end-time kingdom was already present, since it indicated to Jesus that the final rout of → Satan had already begun (Mk. 3:23–7 par. Matt. 12:25–29, Lk. 14:17–20; Matt. 12:27 f.; cf. Lk. 11:19 f.; Lk. 10:17 f.).

Other forces operating upon man's world from the spiritual realm are thought of as good spirits or → angels (Acts 23:8 f.; Heb. 1:7, 14; 12:9). But Paul and John in particular recognize the ambiguity of such experiences of spirits, and the need for a discernment of spirits to distinguish good from evil (1 Cor. 12:10; 14:12; 2 Cor. 11:4; 1 Thess. 5:19–22; 2 Thess. 2:2; 1 Jn. 4:1, 3, 6). Compare the ambiguity noted above over (human) spirit and (Holy) Spirit.

3. Jesus and the Spirit. (a) If we are to understand Jesus' teaching on the Spirit as fully as possible, we must recall that Jesus' ministry followed that of John the Baptist. The Q traditions (Matt. 3:7–12; Lk. 3:7–9, 15–8), generally agreed to be the earliest, present John as a prophet of → judgment; his proclamation included, perhaps largely centred on the imminent coming of one who would administer God's final judgment. In particular, the Coming One would baptize en pneumatī hagiō kai pyri ("in holy spirit and fire"). Suggestions that John spoke only of a → baptism in → fire or only of a baptism in wind (= pneuma) and fire (with addition and alterations made in the light of → Pentecost) need no longer be entertained: John's message was not solely of judgment (about wheat as well as chaff, Matt. 3:12); the Coming One's baptism was in some sense a promise to those who accepted John's baptism of repentance; and the Qumran community, who probably influenced John to some extent, had already been speaking of the pneuma as a cleansing, purifying power (particularly IQS 3:7–9; 4:21).

John's metaphor is best understood as a variation on a prominent theme within intertestamental apocalyptic expectation, viz. the belief in the messianic woes, the conviction that the new age could be inaugurated only after a period of affliction and suffering – "the birth pangs of the messiah" (SB I 950; cf. e.g. Dan. 7:19–22; 2 Bar. 25–30). Thus "fire" could denote judgment and purification (e.g. Amos 7:4; Mal. 3:1 f.; 4:1), pneuma likewise (e.g. Isa. 4:4; Jer. 4:11 f.), and the river or flood vividly portrayed overwhelming calamity (Ps. 69:2, 15; Isa. 43:2). Notice particularly how the three elements were combined in Isa. 4:4; 30:28; Dan. 7:10. John's baptism in the Jordan (presumably by immersion) was therefore a very potent symbol of the end-time tribulation = baptism in Spirit and fire = God's fiery pneuma like a great stream through which all men must pass. Those who acknowledged their liability to judgment by submitting to the symbolized judgment of John's baptism would experience the messianic woes as a cleansing by a spirit of judgment and by a spirit of burning (Isa. 4:4). Those who denied their guilt and did not repent would experience the Coming One's baptism in Spirit and fire as the bonfire which burned up the unfruitful branches and chaff.

(b) Jesus' understanding of his own mission in terms of the Spirit was, however, different. This comes to clearest expression at two places in the Jesus-tradition:

Jesus' explanation for his success as an exorcist, and Jesus' consciousness of inspiration.

(i) Jesus' explanation for his success as an exorcist is preserved in the group of four or five controversy sayings in Mk. 3:22–9 and Q (Matt. 12:24–29 par. Lk. 11:15–23; → Satan). Almost all scholars accept Matt. 12:28 par. Lk. 11:20 as an authentic word of the historical Jesus. The arguments in favour of “Spirit” (Matt.) or “finger” (Lk.; → Hand, art. cheir NT 3) as original are fairly evenly balanced, though the case for “Spirit” is probably stronger (cf. J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit, 1975, 45 f.). But either way the saying embodies a claim to exorcize by the power of God. The emphasis in the Gk. falls on the two phrases, “Spirit of God” and → “kingdom of God”: “Since it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons then the kingdom of God has come upon you.” The significance of the saying is twofold. First, the presence of the kingdom (the distinctive note in Jesus' proclamation) is defined in terms of the effective power of the Spirit. The end-time rule of God can be said to be already operative, because the end-time power is evidently at work conquering demonic power (cf. the weakly attested Lucan variant to the second petition of the Lord's Prayer, “May your Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us”, Lk. 11:2). Second, Jesus is claiming a unique empowering by the Spirit: there were other exorcists, but their work did not bear the same significance (Matt. 12:27 par. Lk. 11:19). Jesus' exorcisms were so effective that he was able to conclude that his was the power of the end-time rule of God. The same self-understanding is implied in Mk. 3:27: that he had been empowered by God to begin the final battle with Satan. It is also implied in Mk. 3:28 f. par. Matt. 12:31 f., Lk. 12:10 which are frequently attributed to a post-resurrection origin, but without sufficient justification (J. D. G. Dunn, op. cit., 49–52). Probably first spoken in response to attacks on his exorcistic ministry (as Mk. claims, Mk. 3:30), it again testifies to Jesus' understanding of his exorcisms: they were obviously effected by the power of the Spirit, and there was an eschatological finality about this power that to deny it was to put oneself beyond forgiveness (→ Revile, art. blasphēmō).

(ii) Jesus' consciousness of inspiration is clearly implied in the astonishingly authoritative claims made by Jesus (“But I say . . .”, Matt. 5:22 etc.), and in his understanding of himself as a → prophet (particularly Mk. 6:4 par. Matt. 13:57; cf. Jn. 4:44; Lk. 13:33). Since the Spirit was principally regarded as the Spirit of prophecy in the Judaism of that time, Jesus' claim was in effect a claim to be inspired by the Spirit. And since the rabbis taught that the Spirit had been withdrawn from Israel since Malachi and would be given again only in the last days, Jesus was in effect claiming to be the eschatological prophet (see particularly Deut. 18:15, 18 f.; Isa. 61:1 ff.). In fact, there is good evidence that Jesus himself regarded Isa. 61:1 f. as fulfilled in his own ministry, as Lk. 4:18 f. states explicitly. This understanding of his mission as a Spirit-anointed proclamation of good tidings to the poor is clearly implied in the first two or three Beatitudes (Matt. 5:3–6 par. Lk. 6:20 f.) and in Matt. 11:5 par. Lk. 7:22, which few would dispute as authentic words of the historical Jesus. There are several points of significance here: Jesus attributed his ministry and its effectiveness to an anointing with the end-time Spirit (presumably at Jordan, as all the Gospels affirm, see below, 4); consequently his ministry had eschatological significance – the hopes for the new age were already being realized through his ministry; the proclamation of this good news to the → poor was even more important to him than his work of healing (proclamation to the poor is the climax of the Matt. 11:5 list); the Spirit was so bound up with Jesus that he himself was part of the offence of his own ministry (Matt. 11:6), he himself as thus empowered by the Spirit had become the focus of eschatological significance.

(c) Jesus therefore saw his ministry in relation to the Spirit in terms more of eschatological blessing than of judgment. His response to the Baptist in Matt. 11:5 par. Lk. 7:22 seems deliberately to pick up the promise of blessing in Isa. 29:18–20; 35:3–5 and 61:1 f., and to ignore the threat of judgment which all three passages also contained. But probably he did not reject the Baptist's message outright. There are some indications that he did see his ministry also in terms of dispensing fiery judgment (Lk. 9:54; 12:49 f.; Mk. 9:49; Matt. 10:34–6 par. Lk. 12:51–3; Gos. Thom. 10, 16, 82), and the parallelism of Lk. 12:49–50 suggests that Jesus anticipated his death as a fiery baptism, that is as a suffering of the messianic woes (cf. Mk. 10:38 f.; 14:27, 36 and the probable influence of Dan. 7 and Isa. 53 on his understanding of his mission). It is possible then that he also saw his own earlier anointing with the Spirit in terms of the Baptist's preaching – that is, as a baptism with Spirit.

But did Jesus also see himself as dispenser of the Spirit, as baptizer in Spirit? The answer is uncertain, since it is not clear how Jesus envisaged the vindication which he almost certainly looked for beyond death or in particular his relation to his disciples prior to his parousia as the glorious Son of man. The only pre-resurrection saying in the Synoptics, Mk. 13:11, has a very restricted reference – to the disciples' experience of persecution and trial. Acts 1:5 quite likely is a Lucan interpretation giving Jesus' assurance more precise reference to → Pentecost. The Paraclete promises of Jn. 14–16 (see below, 7) could be drawn ultimately from a core of primitive tradition, as elsewhere in John. Lk. 22:29, Jesus' last will and testament, is also relevant in view of the close tie-up between Spirit and kingdom in Jesus' thought.

Further than this we cannot penetrate back into the thought and self-understanding of Jesus, since no other Spirit-saying as such can be attributed to him with any confidence, apart from the inconsequential Mk. 12:36, which simply echoes the contemporary doctrine of inspiration.

4. The Evangelists' View of Jesus and the Spirit. In the four Gospels the relation between Jesus and the Spirit already implied in Jesus' own teaching is immeasurably strengthened. The Evangelists have no doubts that Jesus was the wholly unique Man of the Spirit. His birth, or rather conception, was effected by the power of the Spirit without the agency of a human father: Matt. 1:18–25 – so that Jesus fulfils the Emmanuel prophecy (Isa. 7:14); Lk. 1:35 – an allusion to the Shekinah, perhaps with the further implication that Jesus as Son of God manifests the divine glory (cf. Jn. 1:14). The message of the Baptist on the relation between Jesus and the Spirit is tailored by Mark to fit the Christian fulfilment of Pentecost (1:8 – all note of judgment is omitted) and by the Fourth Evangelist to present John simply and solely as the perfect witness to Christ (Jn. 1:19–34). All the Gospels are clear that at Jordan Jesus was anointed with the Spirit and thus entered upon his messianic rôle (Mk. 1:11; Matt. 3:17; Lk. 3:22; Jn. 1:33; cf. 3:34). The Synoptics all stress that Jesus went forth to his temptations at the instigation of the Spirit (Mk. 1:12; Matt. 4:1; Lk. 4:1). Mark concentrates this introduction to his Gospel into a few sentences, thereby tying together the promise of the Baptist (Mk. 1:8) with the descent of the Spirit on Jesus (Mk. 1:10) and the Spirit's thrusting Jesus into the wilderness (Mk. 1:12). All agree that Jesus' ministry was effective by the power of the Spirit: in addition to the controversy sayings (above, 3 (b)), Matt. and Lk. reinforce this view by incorporating quotations from Isa. (Matt. 12:18 = Isa. 42:1; Lk. 4:18 = Isa. 61:1; see also Acts 10:38). The portrayal of Jesus as the dispenser of the Spirit (Mk. 13:11 par. Matt. 24:20; Lk. 21:15) is strengthened by Lk. 11:13's redaction of the Q saying Matt. 7:11 ("Holy Spirit" substituted for "good things") and the inclusion of Lk. 24:49 and Acts 1:5, 8 as post-resurrection sayings, in a different way by the Matthean formulation of the great commission (Matt. 28:19), and in a much fuller way by John (see below, 7). Jesus' post-resurrection ministry is also characterized in terms of the Spirit in Acts 1:2, with the outpouring of the Spirit explicitly referred to Jesus in Jn. 20:22 and Acts 2:33.

It should be noticed that none of the evangelists is content to portray Jesus simply as the pneumatic exemplar or the first (Christian) charismatic. To be sure, Luke does portray Jesus' ministry in more distinctively charismatic terms, particularly in Lk. 4:1, 14 and 10:21, but Jesus is hardly presented as an ecstatic even by Luke, and any parallel at this point between the ministry of Jesus and that, say, of Peter in Acts is only incidental. It is possible that there was a stronger charismatic element in Jesus' ministry which the Evangelists have suppressed (so H. Windisch), though not very likely. On the other hand, it is very unlikely that the pneumatic features and Spirit sayings attributed to Jesus should be completely discarded. The evangelists' portrait of Jesus at this point bears the stamp of authenticity.

We should, however, not ignore a certain schematization which Luke has contrived in his two volumes (Luke-Acts) whereby Jesus, precisely in his relation with the Spirit, provides a bridge between the old age of Israel and the new age now recognized as the age of the church. Thus the conception and birth of Jesus by the power of the Spirit takes place in the context of a sporadic reappearance of the Spirit of prophecy (Lk. 1:15, 17, 41, 67; 2:25–7) – a last flare-up of the spiritual power and vitality of the divine revelation of the OT era before Jesus alone fills the centre of the stage. As a result of the descent of the Spirit at Jordan, Jesus, already Son of God (1:35; 2:49), enters a fuller relation of sonship or higher stage of his mission as Son (Lk. 3:22, citing Ps. 2:7 in full in a variant arguably original; Acts 10:38), wherein he is led by the Spirit as the archetypal Son (Lk. 4:1–14; cf. Rom. 8:14–7; Gal. 4:6 f.; 5:18). But only with his ascension does Jesus enter upon the fullness of sonship and messianic office (Acts 2:36; 13:33), and only then does he become Lord of the Spirit, the one who dispenses the Spirit to others not only by virtue of his own anointing, but by virtue also of his death and exaltation (Acts 2:33).

5. The Spirit in the earliest Christian Communities and in Acts. "Holy Spirit" denotes supernatural power, altering, working through, directing the believer (there is no significant difference between the phrase with the definite article and without). This is nowhere more clearly evident than in Acts where the Spirit is presented as an almost tangible force, visible if not in itself, certainly in its effects. This power of the Spirit manifests itself in three main areas in Luke's account of the early church.

(a) The Spirit as a transforming power in conversion. Christianity properly speaking dates from the earliest experiences of the Spirit after Jesus' death and resurrection. Luke sets the first of these in → Jerusalem at the first Pentecost after Jesus' resurrection, and there is no substantial reason why this location and dating should be rejected (→ Pentecost). It was evidently a very dramatic experience, and certainly ecstatic in nature (including visionary elements and automatic speech). It transformed the group of disciples into a confident and dynamic sect, keen to propagate and live out their faith in Jesus as messiah and soon-coming Son of man. Luke has caught much of the atmosphere of these early days in the opening chapters of Acts (2–5), though he almost wholly omits the sense of eschatological fervency which must have featured strongly.

Probably too this first experience was understood to set something of a pattern for the reception of the Spirit thereafter (as Acts 11:15 f. suggests): the Spirit was the eschatological gift par excellence, and possession of the Spirit would be the mark of one who belonged to the messianic community of the last days (hence the promise of the Spirit as the climax to the first sermon of Peter, Acts 2:38 f.); and the coming and reception of the Spirit would be determined by the visible transformation of the individual, usually reckoned in manifestations of ecstasy (a view probably confirmed by the ecstatic experience referred to in Acts 4:31). Consequently at critical or problematic moments of the early mission thereafter what was looked for above all else was the reception or possession of the Spirit (Acts 9:17; 11:15 f.; 15:8; 18:25; 19:1 f.) as testified by clear-cut manifestations of spiritual power or ecstasy (Acts 8:15–9; 10:44–7; 19:6). Luke draws attention only to inspired utterance (prophecy and glossolalia), but that may be because for him prophecy is the sign of the Spirit (see below (b), and cf. 6 (a)).

Luke also well represents this early evaluation of the Spirit. The Spirit is tied in with ecstatic manifestations to such an extent that its presence cannot be assumed in the absence of such tangible effects: it is precisely their absence in the cases of the Samaritans in Acts 8:12 ff. and the Ephesians in Acts 19:1 ff. which causes the evangelists in question to conclude each time that the Spirit had not yet been given; and it is the manifest presence of the Spirit in the case of Cornelius and company in Acts 10:44 ff. and Apollos in Acts 18:25 (cf. Rom. 8:11) which proves that they already belong to the eschatological community (hence the reasoning of Acts 11:15–8). Thus, on the one hand, there is no justification for the conclusion either that Luke ties the Spirit to baptism (as manifestly he does not in Acts 8:12 ff. and 10:44 ff.), or that he views the Spirit as a gift subsequent to conversion – for Luke there is only one “gift of the Spirit” and that clear-cut in its effects on the receiver. And on the other, Luke’s view of the Spirit is dominated by the early enthusiastic understanding of the first Christians (Acts 9:31 and 13:52 are probably only formal exceptions), exciting and challenging in its vitality, but lacking the richer theological balance of Paul.

(b) The Spirit of prophecy. For the first Christians, the Spirit was most characteristically a divine power manifesting itself in inspired utterance. The same power that had inspired → David and the prophets in the old age (Acts 1:16; 3:18; 4:25; 28:25) was now poured out in eschatological plenitude as Joel had foretold (Acts 2:17 ff.; cf. Joel 2:28–32); the excited sense that → Moses’ ancient hope had been fulfilled, that all the Lord’s people were prophets, that the Lord had put his Spirit upon them (Num. 11:29), comes through clearly in Acts 2:17 f., 38 f. and 4:31; and certainly it was inspired utterance which indicated the coming of the Spirit in Acts 2:4; 10:44 ff. and 19:6. Beyond conversion, this power was experienced as a surge of inspiration in moments of crisis and relief, giving both words and boldness of speech (Acts 4:8, 13, 29–31; 7:55; 13:9), and more generally the Spirit was understood as the power enabling effective testimony and teaching (Acts 5:32; 6:10; 18:25). But while this Spirit was given to all and all might experience a filling up of the Spirit and overflowing of inspired utterance in particular instances, there evidently arose quite quickly the recognition that certain individuals had a fuller bestowal of the prophetic Spirit, or at least were more regularly inspired to prophesy – hence the appearance of both resident and wandering prophets in the earliest communities (Acts 11:27 f.; 13:1; 15:32; 20:23; 21:4, 9–11). The particular noun phrase plērēs pneumatos, “full of the Spirit” (as distinct from the more regular Lucan verbal phrase “. . . were filled with the Spirit”, Lk. 1:41, 67; Acts 2:4; 4:8, 31; 9:17; 13:9), may derive from a special “Hellenist” source (Acts 6:3, 5; 7:55; 11:24; though note Luke 4:1). In this case it could denote either a more sustained experience and manifestation of inspiration, or it might simply be a variant on the verbal phrase.

Luke shares this view of the Spirit as pre-eminently the Spirit of prophecy: it is precisely that gift known at best so sporadically in the old age (Lk. 1–2) which in the new age has become the prerogative of all (emphasized by the addition of “and they shall prophesy” to the Joel quotation in Acts 2:18). It is also rather surprising that Luke never links the Spirit specifically with any of the miracles performed in Acts (though such a link is implied in 2:19, 43; 4:30 f. and 6:8), presumably because the link with prophecy is so dominant. In addition, we need simply observe: that he makes no effort to distinguish prophecy from glossolalia in Acts 2:17 f. = 2:4, 13, and 19:6, and may indeed have thought prophecy was always manifestly ecstatic in character; and that he makes no effort to resolve the problem of conflicting prophecies in Acts 20:22 and 21:4.

(c) The Spirit as the director of mission. The Spirit was evidently experienced as a numinous power pervading the early community and giving its early leadership an aura of authority which could not be withstood (Acts 4:31; 5:1–10; 6:10; 8:9–13; 13:9–11). With the movement out from Jerusalem after Stephen’s death, the Spirit becomes much more regularly understood as the power of mission, directing the evangelists into the new developments that continually opened up before them (Acts 8:29, 39; 10:19; 11:12; 13:2, 4; 15:28; 16:6 f.; 19:21; cf. 7:51). In this expansion ecstatic visions evidently played a significant rôle too (particularly Acts 9:10; 10:3, 7, 10–16; 16:9 f.; 22:17 f.), but these are not attributed to the Spirit (despite 2:17). In Luke’s presentation this compulsion to mission and outreach characterized the earliest community’s understanding of the Spirit from the first (Acts 1:8; 2:5–11, the inspired utterance of Pentecost as telling the mighty works of God to Jews “from every nation under heaven”). So too the more formally structured ecclesiastical leadership of presbyters or overseers (→ bishops) is attributed specifically to the Spirit in Acts 20:28 (cf. 15:28). However, the more fundamental theological question as to the relation between the exalted Christ and the Spirit is not clarified: Christ introduces “the last days” by dispensing the Spirit (Acts 2:33), but thereafter the two are brought together only in the enigmatic reference to “the Spirit of Jesus” in Acts 16:7.

6. The Spirit in the Pauline Letters. Of the NT writers, Paul most deserves the title, “the theologian of the Spirit”, for he gives a more rounded and more integrated teaching on the Spirit than we find in any other literature of that time, or indeed for several centuries before and after.

(a) The Spirit as the fundamental mark of belonging to Christ. As with the first Christians (above 5 (a)) so with Paul, the gift of the Spirit is what makes the individual a member of Christ (Rom. 8:9; cf. 1 Cor. 2:12; 2 Cor. 11:4; 1 Thess. 4:8), united with him through the Spirit (1 Cor. 6:17), a sharer in his sonship (Rom. 8:14–6; Gal. 4:6). The Spirit, as it were, is the exalted Lord's steward taking possession of his property on his behalf (1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19 f.). It is the reception of the Spirit through faith which marks the beginning of the Christian life (Gal. 3:2 f.), a gift which fulfils the promise to → Abraham and which therefore is another name for justification (Gal. 3:14; 1 Cor. 6:11) – that is, the gift of righteousness understood as having “the character of power” (cf. E. Käsemann, “‘The Righteousness of God’ in Paul”, New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 168–82). Alternatively expressed, it is by being baptized in the one Spirit, drenched with the one Spirit, that individuals become members of the one body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:13). For Paul it was precisely the gift of the Spirit which distinguished the Christian from the Jew, the new age from the old (Rom. 2:29; 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6–8; Gal. 4:29; Phil. 3:3). The Spirit constitutes that immediacy of personal relationship with God which Moses had fitfully enjoyed (2 Cor. 3:13–8) and which Jeremiah had only foreseen from afar (2 Cor. 3:3, referring to Jer. 31:33 f.; cf. Eph. 2:18). In all this, “Spirit” is almost synonymous with “grace” in the sense of God's action in reaching out to men and establishing a positive relation with them (as e.g. in Rom. 3:24; 1 Cor. 15:10; 2 Cor. 6:1; Gal. 1:15; Eph. 2:8).

It is important to realize that for Paul too the Spirit is a divine power whose impact upon or entrance into a life is discernible by its effects. In some cases the manifestation was charismatic utterance and act (1 Cor. 1:4–7; Gal. 3:5; cf. above 5 (a)). But in others it was evidently an overwhelming experience of being accepted by God (Eph. 1:7 f.), of being swamped by divine love (Rom. 5:5), of a joy that made light of affliction (1 Thess. 1:6). In others again it was an experience of illumination as to the significance of Jesus (1 Cor. 2:10–12; 2 Cor. 3:14–17; 4:6; Gal. 1:12, 15 f.; cf. Eph. 1:17; 3:5) or of liberation from the deadening effect of the law and of sin's power (Rom. 8:2; 2 Cor. 3:17) or of moral transformation dramatic in its suddenness (1 Cor. 6:9–11). It is most probably to some such experiences that Paul refers in the vivid metaphors of 1 Cor. 12:13, and when he likens the Spirit to a → seal affixed to goods or documents to indicate ownership (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30). Many interpreters have referred these passages to baptism, but it is more likely that it was the vivid experience of the Spirit itself which Paul recalls (as also e.g. in 1 Cor. 2:4 f.; 1 Thess. 1:5).

(b) The eschatological Spirit. As for Jesus so for Paul, the Spirit is the power of the new age already broken into the old, not so as to bring the old to an end or render it wholly ineffective, but so as to enable the believer to live in and through the old age in the power and in the light of the new. Thus the Spirit is the “down-payment and guarantee” (arrabōn) that God will complete the work begun in Christ and through the Spirit (2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:13 f.; → Gift); the Spirit is the “first fruits” (aparchē) of God's harvest at the end of time (Rom. 8:23; → Sacrifice; → Seed); the Spirit is the first instalment of the believer's inheritance in the kingdom of God (Rom. 8:15–17; 14:17; 1 Cor. 6:9–11; 15:42–50; Gal. 4:6 f.; 5:16–24; Eph. 1:13 f.). This means also: (1) The gift of the Spirit is only the beginning of a life-long process of being saved, of sanctification, of being conformed to the image of Christ (2 Cor. 3:18; 2 Thess. 2:13; cf. Rom. 8:28; 16:16; Gal. 6:8; Eph. 3:16 f.). (2) The believer's life in the present is characterized by a tension and even warfare between the old age and the new, between the desires of the flesh and those of the Spirit, between the powers of death and of life both at work in him and each seeking to gain the mastery over him (Rom. 7:14–25; 8:10, 12 f.; Gal. 5:16 f.). (3) The final consummation of God's redemptive activity is the completion of what he has already begun in the gift of the Spirit and is achieved when the Spirit takes full control over the whole person – that is, in the → resurrection of the body, when and only when the believer becomes a “spiritual body”, wholly belonging to the new age, wholly like Christ, wholly under the Spirit's direction (Rom. 8:11, 23; 1 Cor. 15:44–9; 2 Cor. 5:1–5; Eph. 1:14). Consequently, (4) there is no foundation in Paul for a distinctively second or third gift of the Spirit – the Spirit always has the essential character of that power which begins the process of salvation and carries it through to completion. Nor is there room in Paul for a gift of the Spirit in this life which sets the believer free from the eschatological tension and warfare between → flesh and Spirit. On the contrary, the Spirit's activity in the present age is marked more by → hope than by fulfilment or complete victory (Rom. 5:5; 8:18–25; 15:13; Gal. 5:5; Eph. 1:17 f.), and prayer in the Spirit is at the same time the inarticulate groaning of this-worldly → weakness (Rom. 8:26 f.; → Prayer, art. entynchanō).

(c) Life in the Spirit. For Paul, the believer has a responsibility to live his life in the power of the Spirit. In general terms that means to let his character be moulded by God according to the pattern of Jesus Christ – not as something which the believer achieves for himself (“work”), but as something which by attentive openness to God he allows the Spirit to produce through him (→ “fruit”) (2 Cor. 3:18; Gal. 5:18–23; cf. Rom. 8:28; 9:1; 14:17; 15:13, 30; 2 Cor. 6:6; Gal. 6:1; Col. 1:8). In particular, it means that Paul was able to talk of his daily conduct as a “walking by the Spirit”, a being “led by the Spirit”, as an “ordering one's life by the Spirit” (Rom. 8:4–6, 14; Gal. 5:16, 18, 25; cf. Rom. 8:13; Gal. 6:8). It is noticeable that he contrasts this experience of daily guidance with the sort of dependence on the rule book of the law which had characterized his previous religious practice (Rom. 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6; Gal. 5:1, 16). That is to say, he experienced the Spirit precisely as the fulfilment of the prophetic hope that the law would be written on the heart not just on tablets of stone, that men would know God for themselves and be able to discern God's will immediately without having to refer to the Scriptures and the case-law of tradition each time (Rom. 12:2; 2 Cor. 3:3, alluding to Jer. 31:31–34). Similarly worship and prayer were not a matter of liturgical rote or outward form, but worship was characterized precisely as worship in or by the Spirit of God (Rom. 2:28 f.; Phil. 3:3; cf. Eph. 2:18, 22), and → prayer precisely as prayer in the Spirit (Eph. 6:18; see also Rom. 8:15 f., 26 f.; 1 Cor. 14:14–7; Gal. 4:6).

(d) The charismatic Spirit. It is important for Paul that the Spirit is a shared gift; it is a centripetal force drawing believers together into the one body of Christ. Thus, on the one hand, the corporate life of Christians arises out of the shared experience of the Spirit. They are constituted the one body of Christ by their common participation (koinōnia) in the one Spirit (1 Cor. 12:13; 2 Cor. 13:14; Eph. 4:3 f.; Phil. 1:27; 2:1; → Fellowship). And, on the other, the continuing existence and unity of any church depends on the sharing of that shared Spirit; that is to say, the Spirit who creates community constantly seeks to manifest himself in the concrete expressions of grace (charismata) which alone can build up that community to maturity in Christ (Rom.

12:4–8; 1 Cor. 12:14–26; 14:12, 26; Eph. 4:11–16). These manifestations of the Spirit are marked out for Paul as given (not achieved by man), as expressions of divine energy (not human potential or talent), as acts of service which promote the common good (not for personal edification or aggrandizement) (1 Cor. 12:4–7). Such charismata may be individual acts or utterances such as Paul mentions in Rom. 1:11, 1; Cor. 12:8–11 and 14:26, or more regular ministries as in Rom. 12:6–8; 1 Cor. 12:28 and Eph. 4:11. In particular, the Spirit seeks to come to expression in speech: it is prophecy which serves to build up the church most effectively (Rom. 12:6–8; 1 Cor. 14:1–5, 13–9; see also 1 Cor. 2:13 f.; 7:40; 12:3), just as it is the speech inspired by the Spirit which is most effective to convict and convert the unbeliever. Paul experienced the Spirit as a centrifugal as well as a centripetal force (Rom. 15:16–19; 1 Cor. 2:4 f.; 14:24 f.; 2 Cor. 3:4–6; Eph. 6:17; 1 Thess. 1:5). The importance which Paul places on the charismata of the Spirit explains his concern lest they be restricted in their range or expression (Eph. 5:18 f.; 1 Thess. 5:19 f.; cf. Eph. 4:30); but concern equally lest they be abused by overemphasis on some or by failure to exercise critical discernment on any (Rom. 12:3; 1 Cor. 2:12–14; 1 Thess. 5:19–22; cf. 1 Cor. 12:3; 2 Thess. 2:2).

(e) The Spirit of Christ. Most significant of all, the Spirit for Paul has been constitutively stamped with the character of Christ. Christ by his resurrection entered wholly upon the realm of the Spirit (Rom. 1:4; cf. 8:11). Indeed, Paul can say that Christ by his → resurrection “became life-giving Spirit” (1 Cor. 15:45). That is to say, the exalted Christ is now experienced in, through and as Spirit. Christ now cannot be experienced apart from the Spirit: the Spirit is the medium of union between Christ and the believer (1 Cor. 6:17); only those belong to Christ, are “in Christ”, who have the Spirit and in so far as they are led by the Spirit (Rom. 8:9, 14). Conversely, the Spirit is now experienced as the power of the risen Christ – the Spirit now cannot be experienced apart from Christ. It is precisely the confession of Jesus’ Lordship which marks out that inspiration which is the Spirit’s (1 Cor. 12:3). It is precisely the reproduction of Jesus’ own distinctive Abba-prayer which marks out the Spirit as the Spirit of the Son (Rom. 8:15 f.; Gal. 4:6). It is precisely the transformation of the believer’s character into the character of Christ which marks out the eschatological Spirit (2 Cor. 3:18). The Spirit is now nothing less and nothing more than the Spirit of Christ (Rom. 8:9; Gal. 4:6; Phil. 1:19; cf. 2 Thess. 2:8). The more formless and impersonal power which characterized the Spirit in the old age has been given sharper definition and personality. It is because the Spirit has taken the shape of Christ that the character of Christ can and must serve as the basic criterion whereby the Spirit’s activity may be discerned; only that which makes the individual or church more like Christ can claim fully to be an expression of the Spirit of Christ.

7. The Spirit in the Gospel and Letters of John. The Spirit is also of considerable importance in John’s theology. His understanding of the Spirit overlaps with that of earlier NT writers at several points. In particular, the new life of the Spirit is presented under the very vigorous metaphors of (re)birth from above (Jn. 3:5–8; 1 Jn. 3:9), of new → creation (Jn. 20:22, the verb deliberately echoing Gen. 2:7; Ezek. 37:9; Wis. 15:11), of life-giving → water and → bread (Jn. 4:14; 6:63; 7:38 f.), and of → anointing (1 Jn. 2:20, 27). And in the Johannine writings as elsewhere the Spirit is also detectable by the effects of his coming (Jn. 3:8), so much so that the immediacy of the Spirit’s indwelling is one of the tests of life in 1 Jn. (3:24; 4:13). Once again the recognition of the vividness and immediacy of the experience of the Spirit for John should cause interpreters to hesitate before they refer such verses as Jn. 1:33; 7:38 f.; 1 Jn. 2:20 to baptism as such. Jn. 3:5 (water) may very well indicate that for John baptism has a part in birth from above, but not that the two were equated in John's mind. Indeed, Jn. 13:10 may be a protest against such a view, just as Jn. 6:63 may be seen as a protest against a too literal understanding of the words of institution in the Lord's Supper (Jn. 6:53–8).

More distinctive of John's pneumatology is the way in which he expresses the relation between the Spirit and Christ. (1) Although his christology is very high (Jesus as the incarnate Logos), it is noteworthy that he gives a firm place to the tradition of Jesus being anointed with the Spirit at Jordan (Jn. 1:32 f.; 3:34). (2) He ties Jesus' gift of the Spirit much more closely to Jesus' death: to receive the Spirit of the ascended Jesus is to eat his flesh given for the life of the world (Jn. 6:51–8, 62 f.); it is from the side of Jesus glorified in his death that the Spirit (= water) comes (Jn. 7:38 f., with 7:38 punctuated so as to refer to Jesus, as was most probably John's intention; 19:34); it is the crucified Jesus who "handed over the Spirit" (Jn. 19:30); it is Christ newly risen and ascended who bestows the Spirit on the disciples (Jn. 20:22). The recognition that John is making a theological point in Jn. 20:22 (death, resurrection, ascension and gift of Spirit form a single theological unity), rather than offering a strict chronological account, should render unnecessary any attempt to achieve a chronological or theological harmonization of Jn. 20:22 with Acts 2. (3) The unity of Christ and Spirit in personality and mission is neatly expressed by identifying the Spirit as the "other Paraclete" (Jn. 14:16), where Jesus is by implication the first Paraclete (cf. 1 Jn. 2:1), so that the Paraclete continues the presence and work of the Son once the Son has departed (Jn. 14:16–28; → Advocate); or, alternatively expressed, so that the Spirit becomes the seed of sonship, the Spirit of the Son (1 Jn. 3:9, 24; 4:13). Thus, as in Paul, the Spirit is conformed to the character and work of Christ and only that Spirit which displays that character and testifies to Jesus the Christ is to be recognized as the Spirit of God (1 Jn. 4:1–3, 6; 5:6–8).

Where John derives the title "Paraclete" (paraklētos) from is not clear. It is quite possible that he coined the title himself to express in a single word the various functions he attributed to the Spirit. The nearest parallels to the forensic and intercessory functions are to be found in late Jewish angelology (cf. particularly Job 16:19; 19:25; 33:23, 26; 1QS 3:20; CD 5:18; 1QM 13:10) and in early Christian understanding of the Spirit (Mk. 13:11; Acts 5:32). If a single word translation of paraklētos is desired, rather than "Paraclete", RSV's "Counsellor" is both sufficiently precise and sufficiently comprehensive (but see the discussion under Advocate, art. paraklētos NT). The chief function attributed to the Paraclete is that of witness, revealer, interpreter: this embraces both recalling of the teaching originally given (14:26; 15:26; 16:14; cf. 1 Jn. 5:6–8) and leading into new truth (Jn. 16:12 f.; cf. Isa. 42:9; 44:7; 1 Jn. 2:27). This implies that new revelation and original teaching are to be held in constant tension for John, so that the Spirit's rôle is never simply that of repeating the original teaching as first given, nor that of revealing new truth wholly unrelated to the old, but that of reinterpreting the old to give it contemporary significance and that of revealing the new in a way consistent with the old. The freedom and restraint in John's own portrait of Jesus exemplifies this function of the interpreter Spirit, as no doubt John intended. The same sort of balance between the freedom of present inspiration and the constraint of earlier revelation is present in the description of true worship in Jn. 4:23 f.: as God is Spirit in his communication and communion with men, so men must worship in the liberty of the Spirit and in accordance with his definitive revelation in Christ.

Finally, we may note the Spirit's rôle in mission in Jn. 16:8–11, where the NEB translation serves as a useful commentary. This, together with 1 Cor. 14:24 f., is the only passage which talks of the Spirit's rôle in bringing conviction of sin. It is noteworthy that for John the chief sin is failure to recognize the real significance of Jesus, that he has conquered the prince of this world. On the other hand, when men respond to the Spirit-inspired mission of the disciples, their sins are forgiven (Jn. 20:22 f.).

8. The Spirit in other NT Writings. The Spirit is nowhere else so prominent in the rest of the NT.

(a) The Pastorals show far less consciousness of the Spirit as a present reality. He is mentioned in the early formulae preserved in 1 Tim. 3:16 as the mode of Jesus' exalted life (cf. Rom. 1:4; 1 Cor. 15:45; 1 Pet. 3:18) and in Tit. 3:5 as the power of regeneration and renewal poured out by Christ (cf. Acts 2:33; Jn. 3:5–8). In 1 Tim. 4:1 he is the inspirer of prophecy in the period prior to these "later times". 2 Tim. 1:7 is very like Rom. 8:15, but overall the Spirit's manifestations have become more formalized and institutionalized (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6) and the Spirit is more the power preserving tradition than leading into new truth (2 Tim. 1:4).

(b) Hebrews recalls the charismatic vitality of the early mission (Heb. 2:4) and conversion is still understood as a coming to share in the Spirit and in the illumination and eschatological powers by which the Spirit manifests himself. The statements of Heb. 3:7; 9:8 and 10:15 reflect the traditional view of the Spirit as the inspirer of → Scripture, so that Scripture can be presented as the voice of the Spirit. More distinctive is the fierceness of Hebrews' warning that the new relation of grace can be so abused that the Spirit of grace be lost (Heb. 6:4 ff.; 10:29), and the author's assertion that Christ was enabled to offer himself up in death by the power of the eternal Spirit (Heb. 9:14).

(c) James 4:5 presents more puzzles than clarity: to what Scripture does it refer? Does it speak of the human spirit as the breath of God, as in ancient Hebrew thought (Gen. 6:3; Job 33:4), or of the divine Spirit as given in conversion, as more regularly in the NT? (See S. S. Laws, "Does Scripture speak in vain? A reconsideration of James iv. 5", NTS 20, 1973–74, 210 ff.)

(d) 1 Peter's understanding of the Spirit is nicely typical of the NT – the Spirit of prophecy (1 Pet. 1:11), the inspirer of mission and the power of the gospel (1 Pet. 1:12), the power that sets men apart for God (1 Pet. 1:2) and transforms into the image of God's glory through suffering and persecution (1 Pet. 4:14), the mode of existence in the life beyond death (1 Pet. 3:18; 4:6).

(e) Jude 19–20 is very Pauline in character: believers are those who by definition have the Spirit, whereas those who boast of their spirituality thereby give evidence of their unspirituality (cf. 1 Cor. 2:12–3:4); he alone outside the Pauline letters exhorts his readers to pray in the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 14:15; Eph. 6:18).

(f) 2 Peter 1:21's view of inspiration is the nearest the NT approaches to the more typically Greek idea of inspiration as a complete surrender of mind and will to the overpowering Spirit.

(g) The seer of Revelation attributes his inspiration and visions to the Spirit (Rev. 1:10; 4:2; 14:13; 17:3; 21:10; 22:17) and writes to the seven churches at the Spirit's dictation (Rev. 2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22). He probably refers to the Spirit of God under the symbolism of the seven spirits (Rev. 1:4; 4:5; → Number, art. hepta), particularly as he also represents them as the spirits (Spirit) of the exalted Jesus (Rev. 3:1; 5:6). Perhaps his most interesting reference is to "the testimony of Jesus" as "the Spirit of prophecy" (19:10), presumably an affirmation that prophecy must always be understood in relation to and be judged by the Jesus-tradition and/or the earliest witness to Christ. Note also Rev. 11:11, where pneuma is the breath of resurrection life, a divine power which antichrist tries to ape in order to deceive (Rev. 13:15).

9. Spiritual (pneumatikos). pneumatikos, the adj. formed from pneuma, conveys the sense of belonging to the realm of spirit/Spirit, of the essence or nature of spirit/Spirit, embodying or manifesting spirit/Spirit. Within the NT it is almost exclusively a Pauline word; elsewhere in the NT it occurs only in 1 Pet. 2:5, which is a letter quite heavily influenced by Pauline theology anyway. 15 out of the 24 Pauline occurrences are in 1 Cor. Where the word is introduced at key points in that letter (2:13–3:1; 12:1; 14:1, 37; 15:44–6), it looks very much as though Paul is both taking over and reformulating the language of his opponents, thereby meeting the challenge of what is best understood as an incipient gnosticism expressing an élitist and perfectionist spirituality.

Paul uses the word in three ways. (a) As an adj., a spiritual something. Whatever gift (charisma) Paul shares with the Romans will be spiritual, from the Spirit and expressing the life and power of the Spirit (Rom. 1:11). The law is spiritual in the sense that it derives from the Spirit (given by revelation and inspiration) and was intended to achieve a fruitful encounter between divine Spirit and human spirit (Rom. 7:14). The → resurrection body is spiritual in that it embodies the Spirit; Spirit is the unifying centre and motivating force of its existence (1 Cor. 15:44, 46). Paul's point is that the spiritual (body) does not precede the natural (so as to be untainted by the natural), but rather the spiritual (body) succeeds the natural (body). It is in some sense a re-creation of the natural, and so is not yet (→ Soul, art. psychē NT 2 (b)). According to Eph. 1:3, the blessings are spiritual in that they derive from the Spirit and take their character from the Spirit. Similarly, "spiritual understanding" (Col. 1:9) and "spiritual songs" (Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16; → Song), and perhaps also "spiritual stones" and "spiritual sacrifices" (1 Pet. 2:5; → Rock).

In 1 Cor. 10:3 f. the adj. could be taken in a similar way – food, drink, rock which embodied the Spirit, in the sense of conveying the Spirit (so, e.g., E. Käsemann, "The Pauline Doctrine of the Lord's Supper", Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964, 113). On this view, Paul's understanding of the → Lord's Supper has been heavily influenced by the mystery cults – to partake of the meal is to partake of the cult deity, to take into oneself his spirit. 1 Cor. 10:1–4, however, is better understood as a midrash with allegorical elements (cf. 2 Cor. 3:7–18; Gal. 4:22–31), where "the rock" which accompanied the people in the wilderness in the old legend is to be interpreted as equivalent to Christ in his presence with his people, and the manna and water from the rock are to be interpreted as pictures of the Christian's supernatural sustenance. In this case pneumatikos is used in a slightly extended sense, almost equivalent to "allegorical", so explicitly the adverb in Rev. 11:8, and perhaps also the adjective in 1 Pet. 2:5 – that is “spiritual” in the sense of denoting a spiritual reality or conveying a spiritual meaning rather than in the sense of actually conveying the Spirit itself. (For further discussion of 1 Cor. 10:3 f. → Hunger, art. pinō NT 4 (a).)

(b) As a masc. noun, spiritual man. Both Paul’s opponents and Paul himself claim that some Christians are “spiritual men” and others are not – that is, they are possessed by and manifest the Spirit of God more than others, or in a manner not yet experienced by others (1 Cor. 2:13, 15; 3:1; 14:37; Gal. 6:1). But where for Paul’s opponents this higher spirituality is marked out by superior wisdom and speech and divisive self-concern, for Paul the “spiritual man” is marked out by his love and concern for others, by his lack of self-conceit and envy, and by his ability to distinguish what is loving from what is merely lawful, what is of God from what is merely inspired, what is for the benefit of the whole community from what merely edifies the individual (1 Cor. 2:13–15; 14:37).

(c) As a neut. noun, the spirituals, spiritual things. In Rom. 15:27 and 1 Cor. 9:11 “the things of the Spirit” seem to denote the whole range of activities, attitudes, experiences, etc. which ultimately depend on and derive from the Spirit and which draw their significance from the Spirit – in contrast to the merely material, or to those activities, attitudes etc. which derive from the flesh and draw their significance from the merely physical, human and worldly. In 1 Cor. 12:1; 14:1 and probably 2:13 pneumatika is used in a more restricted sense in reference to spiritual gifts, more or less equivalent to charismata. Of the two words the latter seems to be Paul’s preferred choice (cf. Rom. 1:11; 12:6; 1 Cor. 1:7). The Corinthian situation and the way in which Paul introduces the subject of 1 Cor. 12–14 strongly suggest that “the spirituals” is the word preferred by many Corinthians, emphasizing perhaps thereby the more ecstatic character of their spirituality. The use of pneumatika in Eph. 6:12 in reference to evil spirits confirms that pneumatika has a more ambiguous meaning than charismata in Paul’s mind, and underlines again the ambiguous nature of “spiritual things” which necessitates that discernment and evaluation (1 Cor. 2:13–15; 14:37) which the Corinthians so evidently lacked (14:12).

J. D. G. Dunn

10. Other Words Used in Connexion with the Spirit. The noun pnoē which is used in the LXX chiefly for n’sāmāh means a blowing, wind. It occurs in the description of the coming of the Spirit at → Pentecost: “And suddenly a sound came from heaven like the rush of a mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting” (Acts 2:2). The account recalls the moving of the Spirit of God over the waters in creation (Gen. 1:2), and perhaps too the wind which preceded God speaking to → Elijah (1 Ki. 19:11). In both cases the movement of the wind precedes the utterance of the Word of God. The quotation from Joel 2:28–32 in Acts 2:17–21 indicates that Peter proclaimed the manifestation of the Spirit as the sign that the new created order was dawning. In Acts 17:25 pnoē means breath (cf. Gen. 2:7) in the proclamation that the God who made all things does not live in shrines, “nor is served by human hands, as though he needed anything, since he himself gives to all men life and breath and everything.”

The cognate vb. pneō occurs in the parable of the houses built on the rock and the sand, signifying the day of reckoning (Matt. 7:25, 27), in the saying about the south wind (Lk. 12:55), in the account of the storm (Jn. 6:18), in the vision of the four winds held back by the angels (Rev. 7:1), and in the description of the movement of the Spirit which man cannot discern (Jn. 3:8). ekpneō means to breathe out, to breathe one's last, expire (Mk. 15:37, 39; Lk. 23:46). enpneō means to breathe on, to breathe, and is used fig. of Saul's threats of murder against the disciples of the Lord (Acts 9:1). For theopneustos, lit. God-breathed, inspired by God (2 Tim. 3:16) → Scripture, art. graphē NT 1 (c).

C. Brown

→ Gift, → God, → Jesus Christ, → Pentecost

(a). C. K. Barrett, The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition, 1947; and "The Holy Spirit in the Fourth Gospel", JTS New Series 1, 1950, 1–15; G. R. Beasley-Murray, "Jesus and the Spirit", A. Descamps and A. de Halleux, eds., Mélanges Bibliques en hommage au R. P. Béda Rigaux, 1970, 463–78; H. Berkhof, The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit, 1965; R. E. Brown, "The Paraclete in the Fourth Gospel", NTS 13, 1966–67, 113–32; F. D. Bruner, A Theology of the Holy Spirit, 1970; E. D. Burton, Spirit, Soul and Flesh, 1918; W. D. Davies, "Paul and the Dead Sea Scrolls: Flesh and Spirit", in K. Stendahl, ed., The Scrolls and the New Testament, 157–82; J. Denney, "Holy Spirit", J. Hastings, ed., Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels, 1 731–44; L. Dewar, The Holy Spirit and Modern Thought, 1959; W. P. Dickson, St. Paul's Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit, 1883; J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit, SBT Second Series 15, 1970; "2 Corinthians 3:17 – 'The Lord is the Spirit'", JTS 21, 1970, 309–20; "The Washing of the Disciples' Feet in Jn. 13:1–20", ZNW 61, 1970, 247–52; "Spirit and Kingdom", ExpT 82, 1970–71, 36–40; "John 6 – a Eucharistic Discourse?", NTS 17, 1970–71, 328–38; "Spirit and Fire-Baptism", NovT 14, 1972, 81–92; "Jesus – Flesh and Spirit: an Exposition of Romans 1:3–4", JTS 24, 1973, 40–68; "1 Cor. 15:45 – Last Adam, Life-giving Spirit", in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., op. cit., 127–41; Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament, 1975; and Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: An Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity, 1977; J. E. Fison, The Blessing of the Holy Spirit, 1950; M. Green, I Believe in the Holy Spirit, 1975; N. Q. Hamilton, The Holy Spirit and Eschatology in Paul, 1957; G. S. Hendry, The Holy Spirit in Christian Theology, 1965²; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 202–93; P. G. S. Hopwood, The Religious Experience of the Primitive Church, 1936; R. B. Hoyle, The Holy Spirit in St Paul, 1927; J. H. E. Hull, The Holy Spirit in the Acts of the Apostles, 1967; R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of their Use in Conflict Settings, Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Christentums 10, 1971; and "Spirit", IDB Supplementary Volume 1976, 839 ff.; G. Johnston, The Spirit-Paraclete in the Gospel of John, 1970; H. Kleinknecht, F. Baumgärtel, W. Bieder, E. Sjöberg, E. Schweizer, pneuma etc. TDNT VI 332–455; K. Lake, "The Holy Spirit", in F. J. Foakes Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, V, 96–111; G. W. H. Lampe, "The Holy Spirit in the Writings of St Luke", in D. E. Nineham, ed., Studies in the Gospels, 1955, 159–200; "Holy Spirit", IDB II 626–38; "The Holy Spirit and the Person of Christ", in S. W. Sykes and J. P. Clayton, eds., Christ, Faith and History: Cambridge Studies in Christology, 1972, 111–30; and The Seal of the Spirit, 1967²; A. R. C. Leaney, "The Johannine Paraclete and the Qumran Scrolls", in J. H. Charlesworth, ed., John and Qumran, 1972, 38–61; B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament. In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973; D. Moody, Spirit of the Living God, 1968; J. Moltmann, The Church in the Power of the Spirit, 1977; R. Otto, The Idea of the Holy, 1923; J. K. Parratt, "The Holy Spirit and Baptism in the New Testament", ExpT 82, 1970–71, 231–5, 266–71; B. A. Pearson, The Pneumatikos-Psychikos Terminology, Society for Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 12, 1973; I. de la Potterie and S. Lyonnet, The Christian Lives by the Spirit, 1971; J. Pryke, "'Spirit' and 'Flesh' in the Qumran Documents and Some New Testament Texts", Revue de Qumrân 5, 1965, 345–60; T. Rees, The Holy Spirit in Thought and Experience, 1915; H. W. Robinson, The Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit, 1928; E. Schweizer, pneuma, TDNT VI 332–455; E. F. Scott, The Spirit in the New Testament, 1923; R. Scroggs, "Paul: SOPHOS and PNEUMATIKOS", NTS 14, 1967–68, 33–55; T. S. Smail, Reflected Glory, 1975; W. D. Stacey, The Pauline View of Man, 1956; B. H. Streeter, ed., The Spirit, 1919; H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the New Testament, 1910; and The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, 1912; J. V. Taylor, The Go-Between God, 1972; G. Vos, "The Eschatological Aspect of the Pauline Concept of the Spirit", Biblical and Theological Studies, 1912, 211–59; A. W. Wainwright, The Trinity in the New Testament, 1962; B. B. Warfield, "The Spirit of God in the Old Testament", in Biblical and Theological Studies, 1952, 127–56.

(b). M. Albertz and C. Westermann, rûah, THAT II 726–52; H. von Baer, Der heilige Geist in den

Lukasschriften, 1926; H. Bertrams, Das Wesen des Geistes nach der Anschauung des Apostels Paulus, 1913; E. Brandenburger, Fleisch und Geist: Paulus und die dualistische Weisheit, 1968; F. Büchsel, Der Geist Gottes im Neuen Testament, 1926; H. Clavier, "Brèves Remarques sur la Notion de Sōma Pneumatikon", in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1956, 342–62; C. Colpe, "Der Spruch von der Lästerung des Geistes", in Der Ruf Jesu und die Antwort der Gemeinde: Festschrift für J. Jeremias, 1970, 63–79; G. Dautzenberg, Urchristliche Prophetie, 1975; M. Dibelius, Die Geisterwelt im Glauben des Paulus, 1909; G. Friedrich, "Geist und Amt", WuD 3, 1952, 61–85; D. A. Frövig, Das Sendungsbewusstsein Jesu und der Geist, 1924; E. Fuchs, Christus und der Geist bei Paulus, 1932; H. Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes nach der populären Anschauung der apostolischen Zeit und nach der Lehre des Apostels Paulus, 1888; W. Gutbrod, Die paulinische Anthropologie, 1934; G. Hasenhüttl, Charisma: Ordnungsprinzip der Kirche, 1969; C. Heitmann and H. Mühlen, eds., Erfahrung und Theologie des Heiligen Geistes, 1974; I. Hermann, Kyrios und Pneuma, 1961; R. Koch, "L'Aspect Eschatologique de l'Esprit du Seigneur d'après Saint Paul", Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus Internationalis Catholicus 1961, 1963, 131–41; H. Leisegang, Pneuma Hagion, 1922; J. Lindblom, Gesichte und Offenbarungen, 1968; W. Michaelis, Reich Gottes und Geist Gottes nach dem Neuen Testament, 1931; W. Pfister, Das Leben im Geist nach Paulus, 1963; B. Rigaux, "L'anticipation du salut eschatologique par l'Esprit", Foi et Salut selon S. Paul, 1970, 101–30; P. Schäfer, Die Vorstellung vom heiligen Geist in der rabbinischen Literatur, 1972; J. Schniewind, "Das Seufzen des Geistes", Nachgelassene Reden und Aufsätze, 1952; G. Schrenk, "Geist und Enthusiasmus", Studien zu Paulus, 1954, 107–27; K. Stalder, Das Werk des Geistes in der Heiligung bei Paulus, 1962; P. Volz, Der Geist Gottes, 1910; H. Weinel, Die Wirkungen des Geistes und der Geister im nachapostolischen Zeitalter bis auf Irenäus, 1899; H. D. Wendland, "Das Wirken des Heiligen Geistes in den Gläubigen nach Paulus", TLZ 77, 1952, 457–70; G. P. Wetter, Charis, 1913; H. Windisch, "Jesus und der Geist nach synoptischer Überlieferung", in S. J. Case, ed., Studies in Early Christianity, 1928, 209–36.

Stir up, Trouble, Agitate

ταράσσω tarássō (tarassō), shake together, stir up, disturb, unsettle, thrown into disorder; táραχος (tarachos), commotion, confusion, disturbance; ταραχή (tarachē), stirring up, disturbance.

CL tarassō, a Homeric term (the root tarach-, still discernible in trachys, rough, harsh, savage), means to shake something out of inertia and throw it into confusion, i.e. to disturb, to upset, to confound, to agitate (from the stirring up of the sea or movement of the air, to violent emotional agitation), hence to confuse, but also, to shake (both of shaking up a medicine and of shaking a conviction, causing shock). There is a corresponding use of the passive: to be disturbed, agitated, confused, even to become alarmed. The noun tarachos similarly connotes agitation, confusion, tumult.

OT The LXX uses tarassō on the whole in the same way as cl. Gk., to render various Heb. equivalents (cf. Ezek. 32:2, 13, to trouble water; Ps. 46:6 [45:7], of the nations; Isa. 8:12, to be dismayed, alarmed).

NT In the NT tarassō occurs 17 times, tarachos twice (Acts 12:18; 19:23), and tarachē only once (Jn. 5:4 v.l.). The meaning is essentially the same as in cl. Gk.

1. tarassō is used of troubling water (Jn. 5:4, 7). The water in the Bethesda pool was probably disturbed from time to time by an intermittent spring. Popular belief supposed that at such times an angel endued the water with healing properties. R. D. Potter points out that there is no spring in this part of Jerusalem, but fragments of pipes have been found in the vicinity. The moving of the water could have been caused by renewal from the pipes (“Topography in the Fourth Gospel”, StudEv I = TU 73, 1959, 336). The pool was 16 metres deep, with no shallow end. A cripple would have had to be carried and held all the time.

2. (a) It is used in the act. in a figurative sense to express the stirring up of spiritual or emotional excitement or confusion, as for instance when the Jews excited, i.e. stir up inwardly, the crowds (Acts 17:8, 13), or when false teachers brought the churches into confusion (Acts 15:24; Gal. 1:7; 5:10; cf. also Acts 12:18, tarachos). The participle hoi tarassontes in Gal. 1:7 may indicate that the false teachers have made it their conscious aim to throw the churches of Galatia into confusion. Probably, however, Paul is simply making it clear that as the result of another, adulterated gospel, the churches of Galatia have become confused in their understanding and therefore also in their actions – a confusion which may be fatal, since it destroys the living organism of the church. The generic sing. in Gal. 5:10 refers to the same false teachers (cf. H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Galater, KEK 7, 1951¹¹, 238). They will have to answer for the confusion they have sown before the judgment-seat of God.

At Jn. 11:33 tarassō, together with embrimaomai (be deeply moved), denotes the wave of anger which came over Jesus when confronted with so much lack of faith and hope, although life itself, and the Lord over death, are present in his person.

(b) The pass. is always used in the NT in a negative sense, connoting emotional disturbance: to become terrified, to be afraid or overawed.

It is worth noting that in the Synoptic Gospels tarassomai is found only 5 times, always with this meaning, and that two of these are in epiphany stories (Matt. 2:3; 14:26; Mk. 6:50; Lk. 1:12; 24:38). In every case the reference is to an emotional shock which is brought about not by any human action, but by the action of God. This is also the implication of Matt. 2:3, where Herod and Jerusalem are shaken at the report of the messiah’s birth. A different thought is contained in the expression mē tarassesthō hymōn hē kardia, let not your hearts be troubled (Jn. 14:1, 27). In this formula, found both in Semitic (e.g. Pss. 55[54]:5; 143[142]:4) and in cl. Gk. (e.g. Soph., Ant. 1095), the → heart stands for the self. Since the disciples are now to be left alone in a world within which a conflict will take place between the powers of this world and God’s revelation, the believer, in his isolation from the world, will undergo inward shock and anxiety. This anxiety is overcome, however, by faith in God, which is identical with faith in Jesus, since this faith knows of a home (Jn. 14:1) where death has been conquered. The believer need not remain in a condition of fear and anxiety, since he has the promise of eschatological → peace (Jn. 14:27; cf. also 1 Pet. 3:14).

At Jn. 12:27 Jesus’ words “my soul is troubled” do not refer simply to an emotional experience. The fear and anxiety experienced by the One who has been sent shows that he has humbled himself to the utmost, in order to take upon himself the lost condition of man, and in this very condition to glorify the Father.

3. tarachos denotes the stir caused by Christians in both its occurrences (Acts 12:18; 19:23).

H. Müller

Strength, Force, Horn, Violence, Power

The words of this group, whose meaning is very similar to that of words dealt with under → Might, are concerned with the ability of one party to impose its will upon another. The words associated with bia denote coercive force, but may include the idea of friendly though firm persuasion. ischys denotes primarily, though not exclusively, physical power, while kratos is similar in meaning but refers rather to the exercise of authority. keras, horn, which can indicate strength, and ischys are the two words closest in meaning to dynamis and exousia.

βία

violent.

βία (bia), force, violence; βιάζω (biazō), to use force or violence; βιαστής (biastēs), a violent man; βίαιος (biaios),

CL & OT 1. bia is found from Homer onwards and is used in rabbinic literature as a borrowed word; it means force and the use of force. The LXX uses it fairly infrequently, but as a translation of 6 Heb. words (e.g. perēk, Exod. 1:13 f.). Occasionally God's power is described as bia (Isa. 28:2; 30:30), while in the LXX version of Ezek. 44:18 the new order of priests is said to be powerless: kai ou perizōsontai bia, "and they shall not be girded with power." Other instances of bia in the LXX are Exod. 14:25 (k'bedut), Neh. 5:14 f., 18; Est. 3:13; Wis. 4:4; 5:11; 7:20; 17:5, 18; 19:13; Sir. 20:4; 30:20; Hab. 3:6; Isa. 17:13; 52:4; 63:1; Dan. 11:17; 1 Macc. 6:63; 3 Macc. 2:28; 3:15; 4:7; 4 Macc. 11:26; 17:2, 9.

2. biazō is quite rare in the act., but in the mid. expresses the idea of forcible action both in deed and word. Trans. it means to violate, rape; intrans. to use force, enforce one's will; and pass. to suffer violence. It occurs 18 times in the LXX, where it translates 7 Heb. words. The following shades of meaning all contain the idea of forcible action: to urge (using friendly constraint; e.g. Gen. 33:11; Jdg. 13:15 f.; 19:7; 2 Sam. 13:25, 27); to rape (Deut. 22:25, 28); and to break through (Exod. 19:24). Other instances of the vb. in the LXX are 2 Ki. 5:23; Est. 7:8; Sir. 4:26; 31(34):21; Jon. 1:13 v.l.; 2 Macc. 14:41; 4 Macc. 2:8; 8:24; 11:25.

3. biastēs, which does not occur in the LXX, means a violent man, and carries a derogatory sense.

NT 1. In the NT bia occurs only in Acts and denotes force or violence (cf. also biaios, violent, Acts 2:2; → Spirit, art. pneuma). Thus Acts 27:41 refers to the force of waves smashing a ship. Acts 21:35 records the violence of the mob threatening Paul, while in Acts 5:26 Peter and the apostles are arrested, "but without violence", for fear of the crowd. In every case the violence is a potential threat to men's lives.

2. These Lucan passages may give us an insight into Lk. 16:16: "The law and the prophets were until John; since then the good news of the kingdom of God is preached, and everyone enters it violently [pas eis autēn biazetai]" (cf. par. Matt. 11:12). The latter is a saying widely attributed to Q which Lk. has independently rephrased. If so, pas eis autēn biazetai would mean: everyone acts against the kingdom of God with violence. This would imply a background of persecution, such as Lk. describes in Acts, and the sense of the saying would be: ever since the kingdom of God has been preached, violence has been used against it. Furthermore, the polemical nature of the context should be noted: in reply to the Pharisees' mockery (v. 14), Jesus replies: "What is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God" (enōpion is typically Lucan). However, basing their argument upon the use of eis rather than of pros or epi, most exegetes consider Lk.'s meaning to be: everyone presses into the kingdom of God. To take the vb. as pass., i.e. "everyone is forced into the kingdom of God", is probably the unlikeliest interpretation. In recent Lucan research Lk. 16:16 has special significance for our understanding of the unique nature of the third Gospel, because of the clear way in which it distinguishes one epoch from another (cf. H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke, 1960, 20 ff.).

The earlier formulation can be seen in Matt. 11:12, but here too various interpretations are possible. To take the vb. as mid. gives the unlikely meaning: the kingdom of heaven uses force, it coerces. To take it as intrans. gives a more probable interpretation: the kingdom of God accomplishes its purpose mightily, it is eagerly striven for, and those who violently press towards it seize (upon) it. But this translation, although frequently advocated, is still unsatisfactory, since it depicts the kingdom as "suffering violence" in a good sense, with men pressing towards it and striving vehemently to grasp it, whereas their action is more likely to be hostile. The best interpretation, therefore, is the one which takes biazesthai as pass. in an unfavourable sense: the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and violent men assault it, meaning either that hindrances are placed in its way, or that it is forcibly introduced. A special problem arises in the second half of the verse in regard to the phrase harpazousin autēn. Matt. presumably understands the vb. as meaning to take something away from someone (cf. 13:19), but this was not necessarily Q's interpretation. At the stage of tradition represented by Q, the accusation levelled at Jesus may possibly have been common knowledge, namely that he had sought to snatch at equality with God (cf. Phil. 2:6; Mk. 14:61 f.; Matt. 26:63 f.), to which Matt. 11:12 Q may have been replying: Not Jesus, but "the persecutors [biastai] lay violent hands upon the kingdom of heaven". For further discussion → Snatch, art. harpazō NT1 (d). G. Braumann

ισχύς	ισχύς (ischys), strength, power, might; ισχύω (ischyō), be strong, powerful; ισχυρός (ischyros), strong, powerful, mighty; κατισχύω (katischyō), to be strong, powerful, be dominant, prevail.
--------------	--

CL 1. Found from Hesiod onwards, ischys denoted the strength and power possessed by living beings or by things (→ Might). In the Gk. tragedies it was applied to deities, but at a later period became less prominent.

2. ischyō means to be able to do something, be capable of, have the ability to, be strong, healthy (e.g. Sophocles, Trach. 234: "When I left him, he was alive, healthy, flourishing, and untroubled by any sickness"). In addition, it can mean to use force, exercise power, particularly bodily, physical power. Then finally, and particularly in the legal sphere, it acquired the meaning to be valid, be applicable, have value.

3. From Sophocles onwards, katischyō meant to be superior to others, be the victor, gain the upper hand, prevail.

4. ischyros, found from Aeschylus onwards, means strong either in body or mind, and can be applied to deities, living creatures or things.

OT 1. In the LXX ischys translates 30 Heb. words altogether (and in particular kōah), being the term most frequently used to denote manifestations of power. It can express man's physical strength (e.g. Jos. 8:3; Jdg. 16:5; Pss. 22[21]:15; 31[30]:10; Ezek. 30:21) or his intellectual power (Prov. 8:14), but is used particularly for divine power, e.g. Num. 14:13, "Then the Egyptians will hear of it, for thou didst bring up this people in thy might from among them" (cf. Pss. 29[28]:4; 147[146]:5). As such it can be a gift of God to men (Mic. 3:8; Pss. 18[17]:1; 29[28]:11).

2. ischyō is used in the LXX to translate 24 Heb. equivalents, including hāzaq. It denotes becoming strong, or being strong in the physical sense, of things (e.g. "lest your bonds be made strong", Isa. 28:22), and of men (e.g. "and it came to pass when Israel was strong [enischysen]", Jdg. 1:28).

3. katischyō stands for 16 Heb. equivalents, very frequently for hāzaq (in the qal and piel), and denotes being superior in a physical sense. It is used of men (e.g. Jos. 17:13: "when the children of Israel grew strong"; Ezek. 30:24: "I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon"), of things (Isa. 54:2: "strengthen your stakes") and of God's power (1 Chr. 29:12, "it is in thy hand to make great and to give strength to all").

4. In the LXX ischyros translates 25 Heb. equivalents, and is also frequently found in the other Gk. translations of the OT. The word denotes strong of persons (e.g. Num. 13:18, whether the people are strong or weak), of animals (e.g. Prov. 30:30, the lion), of things (Isa. 8:7, water) and of God (Deut. 10:17).

NT 1. This group of words is found in almost all the NT writings (ischyō being especially common in Lk.) and refers to the strength and power (ischys) of living creatures (e.g. Heb. 11:34) or things (e.g. Heb. 6:18, strong consolation; Heb. 5:7, strong cries). The particular translation depends on the nuances of the context. Peter (Mk. 14:37) and the disciples (Matt. 26:40) have to answer the question "Are you not able to watch [with me] one hour?" Men are called upon to → love God with (ex or en) all their strength (Mk. 12:30; Lk. 10:27). Salt which has lost its taste is fit for nothing (Matt. 5:13). In Lk. 15:14 the famine is described as great. The prayer of a righteous man has great power in its effects (Jas. 5:16). The → gates of Hades shall not prevail (Matt. 16:18); the voices of the mob prevailed (Lk. 23:23). In a metaphorical sense the healthy can be called ischyontes in contrast with the sick (Mk. 2:17; cf. also Rev. 6:15). As a legal term ischyō means to avail, to be valid (Heb. 9:17, of the validity of a will; cf. Gal. 5:6).

2. Some NT passages need special attention. The synoptic tradition uses this group of words in a manner which implies approval of the action or quality involved; thus the strong man is safe, unless one comes who is stronger than he (Mk. 3:27). Since in Isa. 49:24 f. it is God who sets the prisoners free, Mk. 3:27 may first of all have suggested that God, being the stronger one, has conquered → Satan, the strong one, and cast him out of heaven. In the Marcan context, however, the passage means that his victory over the demons proves Jesus to be stronger than the strong, i.e. stronger than demons or demon-possessed men (cf. Acts 10:38); acting in the power of God, he has conquered them and is now spoiling them of their prey. His superiority is also seen vis-à-vis John the Baptist; the expected one is mightier than John, and will demonstrate this by baptizing with the Holy Spirit and with → fire (the fire of judgment) (Matt. 3:11; Lk. 3:16 Q), or with the Holy Spirit as a gift of salvation (Mk. 1:7, 8). Finally, ischyō is used in various places to depict Christ's superior power in contrast to the impotence of others, thereby emphasizing the greatness both of the → miracle and of the one by whom it is wrought. In Mk. 5:4 the observation that no one had sufficient strength to subdue the demoniac, prepares us to appreciate the greatness of Christ's miracle. This particular emphasis, intelligible in the light of form criticism, reappears in Lk. 8:43: the seriousness of the malady indicates the remarkable nature of the cure (cf. also Rev. 18:10). Christ's opponents also are inferior to him (Lk. 14:6; cf. 14:29 f.; 20:26), their impotence merely throwing his superior power into sharper relief; the same superiority is evident in the growth of the infant church in Acts 19:20, and in "the wisdom and the Spirit" with which Stephen spoke (Acts 6:10) – and in spite of which he was stoned to death.

3. In defending himself against his opponents in Corinth, who were proud of their strength and their abundance of → gifts (1 Cor. 4:10), Paul set → weakness and impotence over against strength. Even the weakness of God is stronger than men (cf. 1 Cor. 10:22); God puts the strong to shame by choosing what is weak (1 Cor. 1:25 f.). Paul himself had to suffer the reproach that, while his letters were weighty and strong, he himself was weak (2 Cor. 10:10). Nevertheless, Paul did not regard his own lack of strength as a disadvantage. On Paul's "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor. 12:7) → Fruit, art. skolops NT. Since he argued from the strength of God which the non-believer regards as foolishness, i.e. weakness (1 Cor. 1:18), in other passages he could say that → circumcision or uncircumcision, being Jew or Gentile, avail nothing for those who are in Christ (Gal. 5:6), since Christ's power, like God's power, carries the day, and is transmitted to those who live in him (Phil. 4:13). On this basis there is no power inherent in man; it can exist only when God's strength is displayed in human weakness (2 Cor. 12:9).

4. Eph. and 2 Thess. use the ischyō word-group to express their own concept of strength and power, which is somewhat different from the other Pauline literature (→ Might, art. dynamis). Eph. 1:19 and 6:10 speak of the power of God, not the power of Christ, and 2 Thess. 1:19 echoes Isa. 2:10, 19 in ascribing to the power of God the punishment of the ungodly at the last day.

5. In Rev. the grandeur of the imagery is conveyed by ischys and ischyros. "Might" figures among the ascriptions addressed to the → Lamb (Rev. 5:12), and to God (Rev. 7:12; 18:8). Strength is also attributed to the → angels (Rev. 5:2; 10:1; 18:21; cf. 2 Pet. 2:11), whose voice is mighty (Rev. 18:2; cf. 19:8) and who are superior to the → dragon (Rev. 12:8; cf. the use of ischys in inscriptions about princes, A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 1927⁴, 363). They belong to the heavenly kingdom and are thus closely associated with God, hence in the worship of heaven the hymn addressed to God may likewise be addressed to them.

G. Braumann

κέρας

κέρας (keras), horn.

CL keras is etymologically related to Eng. "horn" (cf. also Heb. qeren; Lat. cornu). It is found from Mycenaean Gk. and Homer onwards, and is a common word in profane Gk. It denotes the horn of an animal and later came to mean courage or stubbornness.

In ancient religion, though probably not in Greece, horns symbolized the strength of gods and men (a vestige of earlier animal-worship). Thus Assyrian princes, and Babylonian priests, wore two-horned headdresses similar to those which normally adorned the gods. Alexander the Great was known as “The Horned One”.

OT In the LXX keras is used in two different connexions.

1. (a) It denotes the horns of animals (Deut. 33:17) and is particularly frequent with this meaning in apocalyptic and late Jewish literature (e.g. Dan. 7:7; 8:3; Eth. Enoch 90:9).

(b) In priestly and sacrificial contexts the word refers to the twisted horn-like corners or projections of the altar (Exod. 27:2; Lev. 4:7; Ps. 118 [117]:27; → Sacrifice, art. thyō OT 2; → Temple; → Tent).

2. From these two original connotations there arose the figurative use of keras to express the power and might of men and Yahweh. As in the prophetic and symbolic act of Zedekiah (1 Ki. 22:11), the horn frequently denotes physical power and superiority in men (Mic. 4:13), but also well-being in general (1 Sam. 2:1; Job 16:15, LXX sthenos). When Yahweh is addressed (in priestly language) as “the horn of my salvation [keras sōtērias mou]” (Ps. 18:2 = 2 Sam. 22:3), he is considered to be the power which brings about the salvation of men and preserves it against hostile attacks.

NT In the NT keras is found only in Lk. 1:69 and in Rev.

1. In Zechariah’s → song of praise (Lk. 1:68–79), which is strongly reminiscent of OT psalms and full of OT imagery, the phrase “horn of salvation” is taken over from Ps. 18:2 and means “saving power”. The vb. “to raise up” (ēgeiren) parallels “to exalt” (hypsōsei) in 1 Sam. 2:10: by his acts in history God brings about salvation. The addition of “in the house of his servant David”, which goes back to Ps. 132:17, specifies the messiah as the horn of salvation (cf. Eth. Enoch 90:37 f., where the messiah appears as a white bull with black horns). Lk. 1:69 glorifies God as the one who has demonstrated his power in history, and who by sending the messiah has raised up for men a power that brings salvation.

2. Rev. 9:13 refers to the horns of the golden altar before God (→ Sacrifice, art. thyō NT 9). The allegorical use of horns in Rev., where they have no organic connexion with the animals concerned and so cannot in any sense be envisaged biologically, is connected with OT and Jewish apocalyptic. The → Lamb bears seven horns (Rev. 5:6), the → dragon and the beast ten each (Rev. 12:3; 13:1; 17:3 → Animal, art. thērion). “In accordance with the symbolic meaning of the number seven . . . and of the figure of the horn, the seven horns of the Lamb express the divine plenitude of power” (W. Foerster, TDNT III 670; → Number, art. hepta). Rev. (17:3, 7, 12, 16) has taken over the ten horns of Dan. 7:7 as well as their application to the ten kings (cf. Dan. 7:24), who, according to Rev. 17:12 ff., give over their power to the beast, but, joining with the latter in his war against the Lamb, are vanquished. The meaning of the allegory is disputed. Many interpret it as referring to its own historical period, i.e. the beast represents Nero redivivus and the ten horns represent princes or Roman emperors. Foerster’s interpretation is also possible, however: the passage shows that “all the rulers of the last time and their subjects (cf. 19:17 ff.), are at the disposal of Antichrist in the open battle against Christ” (TDNT III 671).

H.-G. Link, J. Schattenmann

κράτος

κρατέω (krateō), to be strong, to take possession of, hold, grasp, seize; κράτος (kratos), power, might, rule; κραταίω (krataiōō), make strong, strengthen; κραταίος (krataios), strong, mighty; παντοκράτωρ (pantokratōr), the Almighty; κοσμοκράτωρ (kosmokratōr), ruler of the world; κράτιστος (kratistos), most honourable, illustrious, excellent.

CL & OT 1. krateō, found from Homer onwards, can mean to be strong, to possess might (e.g. Sophocles, OT 530, “for what the mighty do, I do not see”); to be in control of, to be master of (e.g. Sophocles, Ai. 1099, “as one who is master of himself”, autou kratōn); to obtain victory over, to gain the upper hand over. krateō can also indicate the act of seizing, and particularly that of arresting (e.g. Sophocles, OC 1380 f., “therefore do (the curses) seize thy seat and throne”), or can express a continuous action, i.e. holding fast, keeping. In the legal sphere the word acquired the meaning to have the right of possession. All the above senses, except the legal one, occur in the LXX, where it is found some 170 times, frequently as a translation of hāzaq hiph., e.g., “be strong” (Jer. 20:7), “rule” (Prov. 16:32; 4 Macc. 1:5), “take control” (1 Macc. 10:52; 2 Macc. 4:27); “seize” (Jdg. 8:12; Ps. 137[136]:9), “hold” (Cant. 3:4). The expression “to take by the hand” (kratein tēs cheiros) is found at Gen. 19:16; Isa. 42:6; cf. Isa. 41:13; 45:1; Jdg. 16:26B; 1 Sam. 15:27; Josephus, War 1, 352; Ant. 14, 480. But it is not found in secular literature. In Philo krateō means to “rule” (Leg. All. 1, 73; 1, 100; Rer. Div. Her. 269; Cher. 115; Decal. 149), to “be lord over” (Post. C. 42), “conquer” (Ebr. 75; 105), and to “gain the upper hand” (Leg. All. 3, 92).

2. kratos, found from Homer onwards, denotes power and strength, such as physical strength (e.g. Homer, Il. 7, 142, “this man Lycurgos slew, but not by strength did he do it”), or the power possessed by men, rulers or gods (e.g. Homer, Il. 2, 118, “for to him belongs supreme power”). The word is a title of royalty (Deissmann, op. cit., 368), and also means rule or dominion (e.g. Herodotus, 3, 69, “he who has dominion over the Persians”) and victory (e.g. Homer, Il. 1, 509, “meanwhile grant victory to the Trojans”). In the LXX kratos corresponds to 9 Heb. words, often being used, however, without a Heb. equivalent. It denotes the power and strength of men and things, e.g., Ps. 89:9 (LXX 88:10), particularly the power of God, e.g. Ps. 62:11 (LXX 61:13), which can be given to men, e.g. Ps. 86:16 (LXX 85:16).

3. krataiōō, to make strong, to take courage, to gain the upper hand over, is found no earlier than the LXX (e.g. Job 36:22; Jud. 13:7; 2 Sam. 1:23; 11:23; Ps. 105[104]:4), where it occurs 64 times; elsewhere it occurs rarely (e.g. in Philo, Conf. Ling. 101, 103; Agric. 160).

4. krataios mighty, full of power (e.g. Homer, Il. 11, 119, “the mighty beast”), can be found in combination with cheir, → hand, as early as Sophocles, Phil. 1110, “with strong hands”. The LXX usually applies the adj. to God (e.g. Deut. 7:21; Pss. 24[23]:8; 71[70]:7; Prov. 23:11), and combines it with cheir in 31 passages. In nearly every instance the reference is to the mighty hand of God (e.g. Exod. 3:19; 6:1; 13:3, 9, 14, 16; Deut. 7:8, 19, 21; 11:2; Ps. 136[135]:12).

5. pantokrator, the Almighty, not found before the LXX, is used as a title for deities (e.g. of Hermes, Epigrammata Graeca 815, 11; of Isis, Inscriptiones Graecae V, 2, 472). The LXX translates š'ba'ôṭ and šadday by pantokrator, and the word also occurs in the magical papyri (e.g. Job 5:17; 8:5; Hos. 12:6[5]; Amos 3:13; 5:14 ff.; Zech. 1:3–17; 8:1–23; Mal. 1:4–14; Jer. 3:19).

6. kosmokrator, ruler of the world, not found before the Christian era, is a designation of the planets, then generally of the rulers of the universe on whom the fate of men depends. The LXX and Philo make no use of the word. It returns, however, as a borrowed word in rabbinic literature.

7. kratistos, found since Homer, also in the LXX (e.g. Amos 6:2), in Philo and Josephus, is a very respectful form of address used to persons of high rank.

NT 1. In the synoptic tradition krateō is sometimes a technical term meaning to arrest or seek to arrest: Matt. 14:3 par. Mk. 6:17 tells of the arrest of John the Baptist; Mk. 12:12; 14:1, 44 par. Matt. 26:48 report the plan to arrest Jesus; and Mk. 14:46 describes his actual arrest. It is striking that Luke obviously avoids the expression in this sense (the only exception being Acts 24:6, 23). Acts of seizing, if not of official arrest, are recorded in Mk. 14:51; Matt. 18:28; 22:6.

2. krateō means generally to take hold of: Jesus took hold of the dead child's hand (Mk. 5:41 par. Matt. 9:25, Lk. 8:54), and of that of a sick woman (Mk. 1:31). It is characteristic of the → miracle stories that the miracle-worker touches the patient's → hand in order that his miraculous power may flow into the other's body. Matt. mentions the taking hold of a sheep that has fallen into a well on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:11), and speaks of the disciples taking hold of Jesus by the feet (Matt. 28:9).

3. The holding fast of Jewish → tradition is called in question in Mk. 7:3 f., the reason being that such tradition consists of human ordinances rather than the commandment of God (v. 8; → Hand, art. cheir NT 2). In the course of time a Christian tradition developed, observance of which was laid down as binding (2 Thess. 2:15; Heb. 4:14; 6:18; Rev. 2:13, 25; 3:11), while those who clung to false doctrines were opposed (Rev. 2:14 f.).

Mk. 9:10 tells how the disciples kept the word of Jesus to themselves and did not pass it on; this evangelist consistently depicts the messiahship of Jesus as having to remain → secret. The OT and Jewish concept of sins being retained (cf. Matt. 16:19; 18:18) is expressed by krateō in Jn. 20:23 (cf. paratērein anomias Ps. 130:3 LXX; diatērein hamartias Sir. 28:1; → Bind; → Open, art. kleis NT 3).

The Emmaus disciples saw Jesus but failed to recognize him; their eyes "were holden" (Lk. 24:16 AV). In Acts 2:24 death is said to have been unable to hold Jesus. The lame man, once he was healed, clung to Peter and John (Acts 3:11), showing that he owed his healing to them, and ultimately to God. The idea of holding fast is also expressed in Acts 27:33: they supposed that they had obtained their purpose. These examples indicate that in his use of krateō Lk. thinks of "holding fast", the continuous action, rather than of the momentary act of "taking hold".

4. kratos, like → ischys, is used along with other words dynamis, → might; timē, honour, doxa, → glory; charis, → grace, etc.) as an attribute and honorific title for kings, emperors and their households, all these terms being later applied to God (1 Pet. 5:11; Rev. 5:13) and to Christ (1 Tim. 6:16; 1 Pet. 4:11; Rev. 1:6; 5:13). Power which is not used directly on men, i.e. which is not soteriological in character, serves to describe majesty and grandeur. The word itself is immaterial, as is shown by its interchangeability with other words; thus in Rev. 4:9; 7:12, kratos is missing. The holding of the seven stars and the four winds (Rev. 2:1; 7:1), and the seizing of the → dragon (Rev. 20:2), are apocalyptic and symbolic ways of expressing power and might. On the other hand, those passages which reveal the effects of God's power are anthropological: in the Magnificat God puts forth his strength in order to scatter the proud (Lk. 1:51). Acts 19:20 also describes God's power at work among men: the word of God (i.e. the gospel and its proclamation) has had a success which can only be ascribed to God. Eph. 1:19, although in the form of a doxology, teaches nevertheless by its use of eis hēmas that "the working of the power of his might" is seen in believers; similarly in Eph. 6:10 "the power of his might" is to become effective in those who are addressed (cf. Col. 1:11). The power of death, according to Heb. 2:14, has been taken from the devil.

5. krataioō is used in the Lucan birth narratives to describe the child Jesus growing and becoming strong in spirit (Lk. 1:80) and wisdom (Lk. 2:40). Otherwise the word is not common in the NT. It clearly refers to manly strength in 1 Cor. 16:13, which is a quotation (cf. Ps. 31:24; 2 Sam. 10:12); and has a metaphorical sense in Eph. 3:16; in gnostic terminology, the inner man is expected to be strengthened with might. The phrase esō anthrōpos means the inner man, the new man, the man who has become new; not the introspective, inward-looking man.

6. krataios occurs only in 1 Pet. 5:6: the hand of God, under which man is called to humble himself, is a mighty hand.

7. The term pantokratōr, the Almighty, the Lord of all, occurs both in connexion with OT quotations (2 Cor. 6:18; cf. Hos. 1:10; Isa. 43:6) and independently (Rev. 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22). In both cases the title serves to describe the immense greatness of God. He has power over all men and all things.

8. kosmokratōr occurs only in Eph. 6:12 and then in the plur.: it refers to the cosmic rulers, the evil spirits, against whom we are to wage war.

9. kratistos, most excellent, honourable, is a friendly form of address in Lk. 1:3; when applied to Felix and Festus, however (Acts 23:26; 24:3; 26:25), it is used in its official sense. In its technical sense, corresponding to Lat. egregius, it was applied to members of the equestrian order in Roman society. G. Braumann

→ God, → Might

(a). G. B. Caird, Principalities and Powers, 1956; H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke, 1960; A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 1927⁴; W. Foerster, keras, TDNT III 669 ff.; W. Grundmann, ischyō etc., TDNT III 397–402; W. Michaelis, kratos etc., TDNT III 905–15; C. H. Powell, The Biblical Concept of Power, 1963; H. Schlier, Principalities and Powers in the New Testament, 1961; G. Schrenk, biazomai, biasiēs, TDNT I 609–14.

(b). W. Foerster, "Die Bilder in Apk. 12 f. und 17 f.", ThStKr 104, 1932, 279 ff.; E. Grässer, Das Problem der Parusieverzögerung in den synoptischen Evangelien und der Apostelgeschichte, BZNW 22, 1960²; W. Grundmann, Der Begriff der Kraft in der neutestamentlichen Gedankenwelt, BWANT 4, 8, 1932; SB I 9 f., 70; II 110 f.; I. Scheffelowitz, "Das Hörnermotiv in den Religionen", ARW 15, 1912, 451–487; G. Strecker, Der Weg der Gerechtigkeit. Untersuchung zur Theologie des Matthäus, FRLANT 82, 1971³.

Suffer

πάσχω

πάσχω (paschō), suffer, endure; κακοπαθέω (kakopatheō), suffer evil, endure hardship; συνκακοπαθέω (synkakopatheō), endure hardship together with someone; συμπαθέω (sympatheō), have compassion, sympathize with; συμπάσχω (sympaschō), suffer the same thing as, suffer together with, sympathize with; πάθημα (pathēma), suffering, affliction, misfortune; παθητός (pathētos), subject to suffering, capable of suffering; πάθος (pathos), suffering, passion.

CL The etymological derivation of paschō (with the stems penth-, ponth-, path-) is still not clear.

1. The basic meaning of the vb., in use from Homer onwards, is that of experiencing something which stems from outside of myself but which affects me, either for good or ill. The opposite idea is expressed by vbs. denoting freedom of action, e.g. erxai (Homer, Od. 8, 490), energein (Corp. Herm. 12, 11; → Work, art. ergon).

2. (a) paschō originally meant nothing more than “to be affected by”, but how one was affected had to be expressed by additional words, e.g. kakōs paschein, to be in a bad situation (Homer, Od. 16, 275); eu paschein, to be in a good situation (Sophocles, OC 1489). However, since such additions tended to be negative, the vb. itself came to have a negative meaning, unless there were clear indications to the contrary. Thus the idea of being affected is replaced by that of suffering, e.g., anthrōpinon ti paschein, to die (further instances are given by W. Michaelis, TDNT V 904 ff.). In most cases it is a matter of being delivered up to an adverse fate or to malevolent gods and men (Diogenes Laertius, 5, 61; Diodorus Siculus, 13, 98, 2), and only rarely refers to enduring a punishment.

(b) The situation is similar in the case of the noun to pathos. It means that which is passively experienced, in contrast with nouns denoting action, such as ergon (→ Work), praxis (→ Work, art. prassō) and poiēma (→ Work, art. poiēō). The nature of the experience is then specified by the addition of adjs., e.g. makarion pathos paschein, to be in a blissful state (Plato, Hp. Mi. 364a). But for the most part pathos describes the emotions of the soul, i.e. human feelings and impulses which a man does not produce within himself but finds already present, and by which he can be carried away. Although used by Aristotle in both a good and a bad sense (cf. especially Eth. Nic. 2, 4, 1105b, 20 f.), pathos acquired a predominantly negative meaning, that of passion, especially among the Stoics (see below, 4).

3. At an early period questions were being asked concerning the purpose and the meaning of suffering. Salutary lessons can be learned from one’s own suffering and that of others; trials make men wise, according to the epic poet Hesiod (Works 218). The tragedies teach the profound truth that through suffering we learn who we are and what station befits us in life (Aeschylus, Ag. 170; Prom. 309).

4. The Stoics extended the idea of suffering into something universal and cosmological: all non-divine being is subject to suffering, i.e. it is affected by external influences and emotions. Such emotions, however, hinder true knowledge and the practice of virtue, so the passions (pathē) must be overcome in order that the ideal of “dispassionateness” (apatheia) may be attained.

5. The Hermetic writings, too, regard everything created as subject to suffering, the latter being unknown only in the sublimest of heavenly spheres. Hence the requirement facing the mystic is that the self be liberated from the → body (cf. → Knowledge, art. ginōskō CL). Such liberation occurs in this life at moments of ecstasy but will be permanently enjoyed only after death (Corp. Herm. 1, 15; 1, 122; cf. W. Michaelis, TDNT V 906 f.).

OT 1. In the LXX paschō occurs only 21 times. It translates the Heb. ḥamal, to feel compassion (Ezek. 16:5; Zech. 11:5), and also ḥālāh niph., to be affected, impressed (Amos 6:6), since there is no exact equivalent for paschō in Heb. The same is true for to pathos, which in Job 30:31 translates ʿēḇel, although the latter is elsewhere rendered, far more appropriately, by to penthos, mourning (Gen. 27:41; Deut. 34:8; Isa. 60:20; Amos 5:16 and passim). Despite the absence of precise Heb. equivalents, however, the ideas expressed by paschō and its derivatives are clearly present in the OT, where the question of suffering is approached from various angles.

(a) The cause of suffering is most commonly seen to lie in the inherent causality of an evil deed: such a deed brings its own retribution by virtue of its consequences, and so produces suffering. This idea is by no means restricted to the subjective and individualistic sphere (Gen. 20:3 ff.; Jos. 7; 1 Sam. 14:24 ff.) and thus shows similarity with the thought of the Gk. tragedies: “the moral suffering of Oedipus is . . . brought about by the fact . . . that he has done something, albeit unwittingly and unintentionally, which in itself is heinous” (K. von Fritz, “Tragische Schuld und poetische Gerechtigkeit in der Antike”, Stud. Gen. 1955, 195). On the questions of expiation and propitiation → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT.

(b) On the other hand, this idea is restricted to the individual, particularly in the Wisdom poetry, one reason certainly being messages about individual → guilt and responsibility such as that of Ezek. 18, which must undoubtedly have brought relief to the minds of the exiles. “He who digs a pit will fall into it, and a stone will come back upon him who starts it rolling” (Prov. 26:27). Each individual is personally responsible for the moral decisions he makes.

(c) These two ideas, however, are not mutually exclusive. Rather, they indicate that whenever Israel was called upon to suffer, he always endeavoured to understand what Yahweh was doing in history. If Yahweh is not a dead but a living God, then both good and evil come from him (Amos 3:6; Job 2:10), although he may use secondary causes as well. The OT therefore leaves practically no room for suffering that is fortuitous (1 Ki. 22:19–23; Job 1:1–2:10; Jdg. 9:23; cf. however 1 Sam. 26:10). The question of suffering is not thought through anthropologically for man to obtain a deeper insight into his own existence (see above, CL 3), but is entirely a matter of God’s providence. Thus G. von Rad makes the following comment on the story of Joseph: “this chain of guilt and suffering has nothing in common with the pessimistic belief in fate found in Greek tragedy, for the story of Joseph distinctly has guidance as its subject. God has directed all things for good” (Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 172; cf. Gen. 45:5 ff.; 50:20, 24).

(d) The fact that there is no tension between the problem of suffering as such and the problem of one’s own individual suffering is indicated by the Psalms of lament, which show the psalmist overwhelmed with every conceivable kind of trouble (Ps. 22). Such Psalms are not biographies of the psalmist, nor do they give allegorical accounts of his spiritual experiences; rather they are liturgical formularies for common use within the OT community. Important for the psalmist is not the analysis of his personal sufferings but his experience of comfort from the priestly oracle (see J. Begrich, "Das Priesterliche Heilsorakel", ZAW 52, 1934, 81 ff.) or from seeking refuge in Yahweh (Ps. 17:8 and passim).

2. The question as to the purpose of suffering is one which emerges only in course of time. Hence Prov. 12:1; 13:1 refer to its educational value: suffering improves character.

3. The Book of Job in particular is radical and uncompromising in its attitude to the view of suffering dealt with under 1 (a). In his own case Job can acknowledge no causal connexion between guilt and suffering (Job 6:24). He comes to see one thing very clearly: that mere man cannot enter into litigation with Almighty God (9:32 f.); and the book therefore ends with a hymn in which God declares his own omnipotence; his inscrutable wisdom reduces men to silence even in the face of unaccountable suffering (38:1–42:6). For what man can claim to understand the mysteries of human life or presume to give God counsel or reproof? Thus the Book of Job challenges us not to offer blind allegiance to a theological scheme linking sin with suffering, but rather to submit to God himself.

4. (a) A further aspect of the suffering of the innocent is the exemplary suffering endured by chosen individuals (e.g. → Moses, Num. 11:11; → Elijah, 1 Ki. 19; Hosea, Hos. 1–3; Jeremiah, Jer. 15:10; 18:18; 20:14 ff.), men whose very office exposes them to suffering. "The hearers refuse the prophet's message, and in so doing refuse the God from whom the message comes. Hence the fate suffered by the prophets visibly demonstrates Israel's hostility to Yahweh. By rejecting his prophets, they reject God himself" (J. Stamm, Das Leiden des Unschuldigen in Babylonien und Israel, AThANT 10, 1946, 67). Yahweh's own suffering as a result of his people's → sin is therefore exemplified in the suffering of elect individuals (→ Election).

(b) The idea of vicarious suffering comes to a climax in Isa.'s message concerning the "Suffering Servant" (→ Son of God, art. pais theou; cf. H. H. Rowley, "The Servant of the Lord in the Light of Three Decades of Criticism", and "The Suffering Servant and the Davidic Messiah", in The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament, 1965², 1–60, 61–94). His suffering is seen as punishment for the sins of others (Isa. 53:4–6).

5. In Wis. the educational aspect of suffering once again emerges (Wis. 12:22). Israel's enemies suffer by way of punishment and warning (Wis. 12:20, 25–27). When God's children suffer, this is God carefully leading them to repentance (Wis. 12:19, 21). However, the educational and manward aspects of suffering (see above, CL 3) receive less emphasis than its teleological and redemptive aspects. According to 2 Macc., even the God-fearing man suffers as a punishment for his sin (2 Macc. 7:18, 32), though joy comes from suffering as a martyr "in the fear of God" (2 Macc. 6:30) (→ Fear, art. phobos OT 2). "In general Philo's usage is very much under the influence of the terminology and outlook of Gk.-Hell. philosophy" (TDNT V 909). Josephus, however, who frequently deals with the subject, sees the possibility of pious Jews suffering any extreme "for their Law" (War 2, 196). paschō rarely refers to a happy experience (Ant. 3, 312); more often it is used in the sense of to endure (Ant. 7, 209 and passim), to suffer punishment (Ant. 4, 270 and passim), or even to suffer death (Ant. 9, 43). But not all suffering leads to death. In rabbinic Judaism, especially after the destruction of Jerusalem and the consequent cessation of the sacrifices, atoning power was attributed to all suffering for sin; since it was intended to lead the sinner to repentance, he could only thank God for it (SB I 169, 417 f.; II 274–282). There was also a doctrine of vicarious suffering (SB II 275, 279–282), and of meritorious suffering (SB II 193 f., 275). Earthly sufferings, in the rabbinic view, could mitigate retribution in the world to come (cf. 1 Pet. 4:1). Thus the righteous man could actually see God’s love at work in his sufferings, while the unrighteous, having no sufferings to bear, was thereby deprived of the chance to make amends (cf. W. Wichmann, Die Leidenstheorie. Eine Form der Leidensdeutung im Spätjudentum, BWANT 4, Folge, 2, 1930). It must, however, be admitted that paschō and its derivatives provide the content rather than the precise terminology of the rabbinic theology of suffering (cf. texts given by Wichmann, op. cit., 91 ff.). Gen. R. 44:6 on Gen. 15:1 contains the statement (probably directed against Christianity) that in every generation there is one righteous man who makes atonement for sin through his sufferings (cf. Midrash on Cant. 1:14, § 60).

6. The Qumran community looked forward to the birth of a messiah amid numerous woes and birth-pangs described in cosmic terms (1QH3:5–18; which alludes to Isa. 9:5 and 26:16–21). A. R. C. Leaney comments: “Here we have a prayer, the metaphor of useless travail, followed by promise of rebirth, and vindication of God’s people by punishment of iniquity” (“The Eschatological Significance of Human Suffering in the Old Testament and the Dead Sea Scrolls”, SJT 16, 1963, 294). Leaney also sees Isa. 60:21 in 1QH 8:1–8. 1QH 9 expresses confidence in Yahweh’s vindication amid suffering: “But behold, from desolation to ruin, and from the pain to the sore, and from the travail to the throes, my soul meditates on Thy marvellous works. In Thy mercies Thou hast not cast me aside; season by season, my soul shall delight in the abundance of mercy. I will reply to him who swallows me up and I will rebuke my oppressor; I will declare his sentence unjust and declare Thy judgement righteous.” Leaney contends that the author is in no doubt that he lives in the time of the messianic woes and that his duty is to enter fully into the creative process which he describes poetically as a travailing to bring to birth, but the enthusiasm at Qumran for the law and their desire for the rebirth of the nation were to be cruelly disappointed in A.D. 70 (op. cit., 295).

NT 1. The vb. paschō, used 42 times in the NT, does not occur in OT quotations or in the Gospel of Jn. and the Johannine Epistles. It is also absent from Rev., apart from 2:10, and among the general epistles occurs only in 1 Pet. Paul rarely uses it (only 9 times, including sympaschō); it is very common, however, in the Synoptic Gospels, Acts and Heb. The noun pathēma is found only in Paul (Rom. 8:18; 2 Cor. 1:5 ff.; Phil. 3:10; Col. 1:24; 2 Tim. 3:11; including 2 passages where the word means passion: Rom. 7:5; Gal. 5:24), in 1 Pet. 1:11; 4:13; 5:1, 9, in Heb. 2:9 f.; 10:32. synkakopatheō (Heb. 4:15; 10:34) and kakopatheō (2 Tim. 2:9; 4:5) occur with reference to suffering as followers of Christ. In addition, kakopatheō is used more generally in Jas. 5:13. The adj. pathētos occurs only once (Acts 26:23; Christ was subject to suffering), while sympatheō is used twice, to express the thought that the exalted Christ (Heb. 4:15) and his people (Heb. 10:34) are able to exercise compassion. pathos occurs only in Rom. 1:26; Col. 3:5; 1 Thess. 4:5.

In the light of the fact that the Synoptic Gospels are, in a sense, passion accounts extended both backwards and forwards in time, i.e. the passion is their central theme, it is striking that they make relatively little use of paschō and pathēma. In Jn. the whole life of the incarnate Logos is presented as his passion (Jn. 1:5, 11 and passim), though as a passion in which he is glorified (→ Glory, art. doxa). Despite this emphasis, however, Jn. makes no use at all of these words, so that the importance of the passion idea in the NT cannot be inferred from mere statistics.

2. There are only a few places where paschō and its derivatives are used in a general sense. Thus in Gal. 3:4; Lk. 13:2; Acts 28:5 it could equally well be rendered by “to experience”. Pilate’s wife is badly frightened by a dream (Matt. 27:19), and the woman with the issue of blood has suffered a great deal at the hands of many physicians (Mk. 5:26). Principally, however, the word-group serves to describe the suffering of Christ and that of his disciples.

3. The Suffering of Christ. (a) paschō has a twofold use in reference to Jesus’ passion: first, it can refer exclusively to his → death, especially in phrases where, although death is not explicitly mentioned, his suffering stands alongside something else, such as his resurrection (Lk. 24:46; Acts 3:18; cf. 3:15; 17:3), his entry into glory (Lk. 24:26), or his showing himself alive (Acts 1:3). In such passages his suffering is pathēma tou thanatou (Heb. 2:9), i.e. death itself (Heb. 13:12).

On the other hand, in the fourfold statements of Mk. 8:31 par. Matt. 16:21 and Lk. 9:22; cf. Mk. 9:12 par. Matt. 17:12; Lk. 17:25, where the forthcoming sufferings of Christ are first announced, the phrase polla pathein, suffer many things, can only refer to those sufferings prior to his trial before the high priest, and scarcely to his death, (i) because his being killed receives separate mention as the 3rd element of the four; (ii) because polla pathein cannot be a summary of his being rejected, being killed, and rising again. In Lk. 17:25, however, the use of the first two elements suggests that “suffering and being rejected” is a fixed phrase. “On God’s side the fate of Jesus is a polla pathein, on man’s an apodokimasthenai” (W. Michaelis, TDNT V 915; cf. above OT4 (a)). Matt., by contrast, deliberately extends the scope of polla pathein to cover the sufferings of Christ up to and including his death: he must “suffer many things from the elders, high priests and scribes, and be killed . . . and be raised” (Matt. 16:21). On the cup of suffering of Christ → Hunger, art. pinō NT 3.

(b) The NT strongly insists that Christ’s passion is no accident but is of divine → necessity (art. dei; Matt. 16:21 par.; Lk. 13:33; 17:25; 24:26; Acts 17:3) and has been predicted in the OT (Mk. 9:12; Lk. 24:26; Acts 3:18; 1 Pet. 1:11). Hence, the author of Heb. says that like the OT sin-offering (Lev. 16:27), Jesus suffered outside the gate of Jerusalem (Heb. 13:11–13).

(c) Christ’s suffering acquires its soteriological aspect from the fact that it is substitutionary in character: he is the atoning → sacrifice for our → sins (Heb. 13:12; 1 Pet. 2:21 and passim). This is proved by quotations from Isa. 53 (cf. 1 Pet. 2:22, 24 with Isa. 53:9, 5). Thus through the suffering of death (Heb. 2:9 f.), Christ becomes the author of believers’ salvation (archēgos; → Begin, art. archē; sōtēria, → redemption; → reconciliation; see above OT4 (b)).

(d) The uniqueness of Christ’s sufferings follows from this, and is shown by the fact that in the Synoptic Gospels paschō is used only in those words of Christ which refer to his own passion. Heb. also uses it only in connexion with Christ (except Heb. 10:32), and emphasizes par excellence the uniqueness, all-sufficiency and completeness of his atoning sacrifice: his vicarious suffering took place ephapax, once for all (Heb. 7:27; 9:12; Rom. 6:10; cf. 1 Pet. 3:18; → One, art. hapax).

(e) Christ's vicarious suffering means, however, for his followers not deliverance from earthly suffering, but deliverance for earthly suffering. He has suffered and been tempted as we are (Heb. 2:18), yet without sin (Heb. 4:12); indeed, since he has shared in all his people's experiences, he is able as the exalted one to "sympathize with their weaknesses" (sympathēsai, Heb. 4:15). His suffering was a test which he was called upon to undergo and in which he learned obedience (Heb. 5:8). Having been tested by suffering (see above, OT 3), he is our pattern and example (hypogrammos, 1 Pet. 2:21; → Image, art. hypogrammos). His suffering requires us as his followers to tread a similar path (1 Pet. 2:21; Heb. 13:12 f.).

(f) Christ is described as pathētos, subject to suffering, only in Acts 26:23. As suffering and resurrection are mentioned together (see above, 3 (a)), the thought here is similar to that in Lk. 24:26 and Acts 17:3. Hence, the question is not whether Christ, being God, could suffer. The more his deity was stressed in the post-NT period, the greater became the danger of Docetism, which argued from his deity to his "impassibility", i.e. inability to suffer (see above, CL 4, 5). Ignatius, however, basing his argument upon the idea of atonement, pointed out that unreal suffering meant unreal redemption (Ign., Pol. 4, 2). Certainly Christ is apathēs, incapable of suffering, in his pre- and his post-existence (Ign., Pol. 3, 2; Ign., Eph. 7, 2), but on soteriological grounds it was necessary to maintain his complete humanity (Ign., Smy. 4, 2) and consequently his ability to suffer (cf. 1 Pet. 4:1, Christou pathontos sarki, Christ having suffered in the flesh).

4. The Suffering of Christ's People. (a) Suffering and fellowship. The idea of suffering is inseparable from the NT concept of koinōnia (→ Fellowship; → Lord's Supper). He who arms himself with the same mind as Christ will have to suffer in the flesh (1 Pet. 4:1; cf. 2 Cor. 11:23 ff.). To suffer "as a Christian" (1 Pet. 4:16) means to share in the sufferings of Christ (1 Pet. 4:13; Phil. 3:10), to suffer with him (sympaschomen, Rom. 8:17). Indeed, such is the mystic union existing between Christ and his body the church that their sufferings may be identified as one and the same (2 Cor. 1:5; → Church). Different churches are united by the bonds of common suffering (1 Thess. 2:14; 1 Pet. 5:9), and the same applies to any individual church. If the members of a fellowship are to show not merely sympathy with one another but active and practical compassion (sympaschō), then true unity in the faith is required (1 Cor. 12:26; Heb. 10:34). A further important example of fellowship in suffering is that existing between the apostle on the one hand and the local church (2 Cor. 1:6 f.) or an individual disciple (2 Tim. 1:8; 2:3) on the other. The great example is Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 2:21), not only for an apostle himself as a "witness of the sufferings of Christ" (1 Pet. 5:1; cf. Ignatius, Rom. 6, 3), but also for those who follow an apostle (2 Tim. 3:10 f.) or who are called upon to imitate him (1 Cor. 11:1). Just as the prophets were good examples of how to endure unjust suffering (kakopatheia, Jas. 5:10; contrast the bad example set by the generation in the wilderness, which lusted after evil things, kaka, 1 Cor. 10:6), so now the apostles set a good example. Their sufferings are part of their ministry (→ Serve, art. diakoneō), and serve to identify the true servants of the church (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23 ff.). The apostle Paul's "sufferings for . . . the church" (Col. 1:24) are not redemptive but missionary in character.

But not all suffering is fellowship with the sufferings of Christ. For suffering to be in this category, the apostles and the church must suffer for the sake of their office or of their Christian calling (see above, OT 4 (a)); they must suffer as Christians (1 Pet.

4:16), unjustly (1 Pet. 2:19 f.), being regarded not as evildoers or murderers (1 Pet. 4:15; Lk. 23:32 ff.), i.e. justly so (Lk. 23:41), but merely like evildoers (1 Pet. 2:12) and made to suffer as such (kakopatheō, 2 Tim. 2:9). True suffering in this sense is called suffering “according to God’s will” (1 Pet. 4:19), suffering “in the name” of Jesus Christ (Acts 9:16; Phil. 1:29), “for the gospel” (2 Tim. 1:8), “in mindfulness of God” (1 Pet. 2:19; → Conscience), “for righteousness’ sake” (1 Pet. 3:14), and – looking forward in hope – “for the kingdom of God” (2 Thess. 1:5).

(b) The eschatological aspect of suffering. Just as Christ’s suffering is not an end in itself, but a means to a great end, namely, perfection (Heb. 2:10), so also in the case of his people (1 Pet. 5:9; AV translates epiteleisthai as “[the same afflictions] are accomplished . . .”, so doing justice to the root telos, → goal). The essential goal for which the Christian suffers is that of the kingdom of God. Compared with the hope of “eternal glory”, a Christian’s present period of suffering shrinks to “a little while” (1 Pet. 5:10). In Rom. 8:18 Paul emphasizes that the sufferings of the present time bear no comparison with future glory, so that even suffering may be regarded as a precious gift (Phil. 1:29; 1 Pet. 2:19) from “the God of all grace, who has called you to his eternal glory” (1 Pet. 5:10). The Gospel of Jn. views the whole of Christ’s earthly life from this same standpoint, that of his glorification, and therefore makes no use whatsoever of paschō. In the same way Paul, in Phil. 3:10, speaks of the aim of his new life as being to enter experimentally into the → knowledge (first) of the power of Christ’s → resurrection, and (only then) of the fellowship of his sufferings. Again and again in the NT suffering and glory (Rom. 8:17; 1 Pet. 5:1, 10), as well as suffering and → patience (2 Thess. 1:4 f.; Heb. 10:32), are mentioned in the same breath. Thus Paul conceives his fellowship with the Corinthians as being fellowship in suffering and in comfort (2 Cor. 1:7). Indeed, Paul can take the idea of suffering as being temporary because advancing towards eschatological glory, and extend it to cover the whole of → creation (Rom. 8:18 ff.; see above, OT 4, 5): not only man but the whole creation is treading the path of suffering which leads to the glorious goal (telos). Thus the Christian awaits not the end of suffering but its goal. “The raising of Christ is not merely a consolation to him in a life that is full of distress and doomed to die, but it is also God’s contradiction of suffering and death, of humiliation and offence, and of the wickedness of evil” (J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope, 1967, 21).

B. Gärtner

→ Beat, → Cross, → Demon, → Evil, → Fall, → Guilt, → Heal, → Lament, → Reconciliation, → Redemption, → Satan, → Sin, → Tempt, → Torment, → Weakness, → Woe

(a). M. B. Ahern, The Problem of Evil, 1971; A. Bertrangs, The Bible on Suffering, St. Norbert Abbey Series 11, 1966; J. Bowker, Problems of Suffering in Religions of the World, 1970; A. Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, 1928; R. Bultmann, lypē etc., TDNT IV 313–24; P. Dhorme, The Book of Job, 1967; C. T. Francisco, “Evil and Suffering in the Book of Hosea”, Southwest Journal of Theology 5, 1962–63, 33–41; J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love, 1977; A. R. C. Leaney, “The Eschatological Significance of Human Suffering in the Old Testament and in the Dead Sea Scrolls”, SJT 16, 1963, 286–301; L. J. Kuypers, “The Suffering and Repentance of God”, SJT 22, 1969, 257–77; C. S. Lewis, The Problem of Pain, 1940; E. Lohse, History of the Suffering and Death of Jesus Christ, 1967; J. L. McKenzie, “Divine Passion in Osee”, CBQ 17, 1955, 287–99; J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope: On the Ground and the Implications of a Christian Eschatology, 1967; and The Crucified God, 1974; W. Michaelis, paschō etc., TDNT IV 904–39; L. B. Paton, “The Problem of Suffering in the Pre-exilic Prophets”, JBL 46, 1927, 111–31; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962; H. H. Rowley, “The Servant of the Lord in the Light of Three Decades of Criticism”, and “The Suffering Servant and the Davidic Messiah”, in The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament, 1965², 1–60 and 61–94; Submission in Suffering and Other Essays, 1951; and Job, New Century Bible, 1970; J. A. Sanders, Suffering as Divine Discipline in the Old Testament and in Post-biblical Judaism, 1955; J. Scharbert and J. Schmid, “Suffering”, EBT III 890–97; A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle, 1931; E. F. Sutcliffe, Providence and Suffering in the Old and New Testament, 1955; A. Wikenhauser, Pauline Mysticism, 1960.

(b). E. Balla, “Das Problem des Leidens in der Geschichte der israelitisch-jüdischen Religion”, in Eucharisterion. Festschrift H. Gunkel, FRLANT 19, 1923, I, 214–60; J. Begrich, “Das priesterliche Heilsorakel”, ZAW 52, 1934, 81 ff.; G. Braumann, “Leidenskelch und Todestaufer (Lk. 10, 38 f.)”, ZNW 56, 1965, 149 ff.; H. Braun, Das Leiden Christi. Eine Bibelarbeit über den I. Petrusbrief, THEH 69, 1940; J. Carmignac, “La Théologie de la Souffrance dans les Hymnes de Qumrân”, Revue de Qumrân 3, 1961–62, 365–86; H. Conzelmann, “Historie und Theologie in den synoptischen Passionsberichten”, in Zur Bedeutung des Todes Jesu, 1967, 35 ff.; J. Coste “Notion grecque et Notion biblique de la Souffrance éducatrice”, RSR 43, 1955, 481–523; F. K. Euler, Die Verkündigung vom leidenden Gottesknecht aus Jes. 53 in der griechischen Bibel, BWANT 4. Folge, 14, 1934; H. Frey, “Zur Sinndeutung des Leidens im Alten Testament”, WuD 6, 1959, 45–61; K. von Fritz, “Tragische Schuld und poetische Gerechtigkeit in der Antike”, Stud. Gen., 1955, 190 ff.; O. Garcia de la Fuente, “El Problema de Dolor en la Religión babilónica”, La Ciudad de Dios 174, 1961, 43–90; H. Gödan, Christus und Hippokrates, 1958; E. Güttgemanns, Der leidende Apostel und sein Herr, FRLANT 90, 1966; E. Haenchen, “Historie und Geschichte in den johannischen Passionsberichten”, in Zur Bedeutung des Todes Jesu, 1967, 35 ff.; N. J. Hein et al., “Leiden”, *RGG*³ IV 294 ff.; A. Juncker, Jesus und das Leid, 1925; K. Keller-Hüschemenger, Die Kirche und das Leiden, BEvTh 20, 1954; A. Köberle, “Ursprung und Sinn des Schmerzes”, Wege zu Menschen 4, 1962; H. Kremers, “Leidensgemeinschaft mit Gott im Alten Testament”, EvTh 13, 1953, 122 ff.; and “Leiden”, EKL II 1067 ff.; E. Larsson, Christus als Vorbild, Acta Seminarü Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 23, 1962; R. Liechtenhan, “Die Überwindung des Leidens bei Paulus und in der zeitgenössischen Stoa”, ZTK 3, 1922, 368–99; E. Lohse, Martyrer und Gottesknecht, FRLANT 46, 1963²; C. Maurer, “Knecht Gottes und Sohn Gottes im Passionsbericht des Markusevangeliums”, ZTK 50, 1953, 1–38; G. Mensching, Die Bedeutung des Leidens im Buddhismus und Christentum, 1930²; D. Meyer, “polla pathēin (Mk. 8, 31 par.; 9, 12b; Lk. 17, 25)”, ZNW 55, 1964, 132 ff.; W. Michaelis, Herkunft und Bedeutung des Ausdrucks “Leiden und Sterben Jesu Christi”, 1945; W. Nauck, “Freude im Leiden”, ZNW 46, 1955, 68 ff.; W. Nestle, “Die Überwindung des Leids in der Antike”, in Griechische Weltanschauung in ihrer Bedeutung für die Gegenwart, 1946, 414 ff.; N. Peters, Die Leidensfrage im Alten Testament, 1923; G. von Rad, “Die Konfessionen Jeremias”, EvTh 3, 1936, 265 ff.; E. Reisner, “Schuld und Unschuld des Leidens”, EvTh 14, 1954, 246 ff.; J. Scharbert, Der Schmerz im Alten Testament, 1955; K. H. Schelkle, Die Passion Jesu in der Verkündigung des Neuen Testaments, 1949; G. Schille, “Das Leiden des Herrn”, ZTK 52, 1955, 161 ff.; J. Schneider, Die Passionsmystik des Paulus, 1929; T. von Sicard, “Der Schmerz und die Seelsorge”, Wege zu Menschen 8, 1961, 257 ff.; J. J. Stamm, Das Leiden des Unschuldigen in Babylon und Israel, AThANT 10, 1946; G. Strecker, “Die Leidens- und Auferstehungsvorausagen im Markusevangelium”, ZTK 64, 1967, 16 ff.; A. Vanhoye, “Structure et Théologie des Récits de la Passion dans les Évangiles Synoptiques”, Nouvelle Revue Théologique 99, 1967, 135 ff.; W. Wichmann, Die Leidenslehre. Eine Form der Leidensdeutung im Spätjudentum, BWANT 4, Folge 2, 1930; H. W. Wolff, Jesaja 53 im Urchristentum, 1952³.

Suffice, Satisfy

The words dealt with here reflect the fact that reality hardly ever tallies with men's expectations, that goals are set but not achieved, or that given conditions are felt to be unacceptable. That which does comply with the norm or does meet men's requirements is described by the adj. hikanos, either in an ethical sense (worth, worthy, competent) or a material sense (enough, sufficient). However, where the idea is not that of meeting a given standard but of acknowledging its rightness, this is expressed by words of the arkeō group. The thought here is of remaining within certain bounds, the latter being either inherent in a given situation, or self-imposed, or seen as God-given. There is a close affinity here with words dealt with under → humility.

ἀρκέω ἀρκέω (arkeō), be enough, suffice, be adequate; pass. be satisfied or content with; ἀρκετός (arketos), enough, sufficient, adequate; αὐτάρκεια (autarkeia), sufficiency, contentment; αὐτάρκης (autarkēs), self-sufficient, independent, content.

CL arkeō, suffice, be sufficient, pass. to be satisfied, is found already in Homer with the meaning to give protection, ward off, to have power, to help. The adj. arketos does not occur until the 1st cent. A.D. (Chrysippus of Tyana, A Handbook of Cookery) and means sufficient, while the noun autarkeia (from Democritus and Hippocrates onwards, 5th cent. B.C.) denotes a sufficiency of means, a “competence”, such as that enjoyed by an independent, self-supporting man. Similarly autarkēs means self-sufficient, hence strong (Herodotus, 1, 32), and is frequently found with the vb. einai, to be, in the sense of to be satisfied.

In the moral philosophy of Stoicism the ability to be content (arkeisthai) became the essence of all the → virtues. So the Stoic Diogenes Laertius speaks of Socrates as being autarkēs kai semnos, contented and devout. To practise the virtue of contentment was to acquiesce wisely in that which suited one’s own nature or one’s daimōn; becoming independent of things, a man relied upon himself or – as others taught – submitted to the lot meted out to him by the gods (Diogenes Laertius, 2, 24; Epicetetus, Dissertationes 1, 1, 12 f.). To have no needs was the ideal of Stoicism.

OT The LXX makes little use of arkeō and its derivatives, its main Heb. equivalents being māšāʾ, to attain to, find, be sufficient, reach, and hōn, wealth, sufficiency, (adv.) enough. In Num. 11:22 the meaning is to be sufficient; in 1 Ki. 8:27, to contain, be sufficient for; in Prov. 30:15; 2 Macc. 5:15; 4 Macc. 6:28; Wis. 12:22, to satisfy. OT piety, however, knows more of the wisdom of contentment than the mere incidence of words would indicate (cf. Pss. 73[72]:23 ff.; 131[130]; Hos. 12:8 f.; 13:6; G. Kittel, TDNT I 465).

NT The words are not widely used in the NT: arkeō and arketos occur only 11 times in all, of which 6 are in the Gospels; autarkēs and autarkeia (3 times) are found only in Pauline writings.

1. On the one hand, arkeō expresses the idea that something is sufficient (e.g. oil, Matt. 25:9; bread, Jn. 6:7), while, on the other hand, it describes the attitude of mind which is satisfied or content with what is available (Heb. 13:5), with food and clothing (1 Tim. 6:8) or with wages (Lk. 3:14).

2. arketos, enough, is used as an adjectival predicate in Matt. 6:34; 10:25; 1 Pet. 4:3. autarkeia occurs only in 2 Cor. 9:8 and 1 Tim. 6:6. Paul is convinced that if only they give from the heart, the Corinthians will “in all things always have a full sufficiency”, i.e. God will richly bestow upon them all the necessities of life (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4). Contentment, when linked with → godliness, is said in 1 Tim. 6:6 to be great gain. This is very similar to Stoic thought (cf. Diogenes Laertius’ opinion of Socrates, CL above). Similarly in Phil. 4:11 Paul describes his own attitude: he has learned, in whatever state he is, to be content (autarkēs einai).

3. Such an attitude of contentment presupposes in the NT the trust and confidence which God's children have in their heavenly Father. Since they are secure in his love, they can be content with what they have, because it is allotted them by God himself who, in his promises, undertakes to watch over them all their lives (Heb. 13:5). Such confidence (→ faith) banishes anxiety about the future, for the future, like the present, is provided for by God (Matt. 6:34). His children are delivered from anxiety about themselves that they may be free to care for others (→ Care).

In 2 Cor. 9:8 Paul is lavish in his praise of God's grace, which is given in superabundance to those who for their part willingly give (→ Fullness, art. perisseuo; cf. perisson in Jn. 10:10). God gives them "a full sufficiency" that they may "provide in abundance" for every good work. Under the gospel the mark of autarkeia is no longer autonomy and self-sufficiency but freedom to give to others; man, amazingly enough, no longer lives exclusively for himself.

4. For Paul, contentment springs from complete readiness to accept whatever God gives (Phil. 4:11). He makes no distinction between the necessary and the superfluous, but simply gives thanks for everything. He can accept both abundance and want as part of his life, and he gives thanks that he has received both as a gift together with God's gracious forgiveness and quickening power. In the case of the sickness which he has to endure as a thorn in the flesh, he is called upon to exercise the virtue of contentment and to request no more than God is graciously pleased to give. The sickness serves as a repeated reminder to him that he is utterly dependent, in all he does, upon the enabling power of his Lord (2 Cor. 12:7 ff.); → Fruit, art. skolops).

5. Finally, the scope of the word becomes clear in one further passage, namely Jn. 14:8. Philip claims that if he and the other disciples were shown the Father, then, according to this account, they would be "satisfied" (kai arkei hēmin). The answer he receives is that their true need, like that of all men, is in fact more limited: it is sufficient to see Christ, for he who sees him sees the Father. Christ's revelation of God is the most complete and comprehensive revelation conceivable to man.

B. Siede

ἱκανός	ἱκανός (hikanos), enough, worthy, able, competent, qualified; ἱκανότης (hikanotēs), ability, competence; ἱκανόω (hikanoō), enable, make sufficient, qualify.
---------------	--

CL hikanos, found only from the time of the Gk. tragic poets, is related to hikanō, to attain, reach. The word conveys the idea of attaining a fixed goal, realizing a set purpose, and means adequate, sufficient, large enough, numerous enough.

OT 1. In the LXX (and other Jewish and Christian translations of the OT) hikanos mostly renders the Heb. day, sufficiency, enough, need: what craftsmen need for their work (Exod. 36:7); a brother's need of help (Lev. 25:25 ff.); what is needed to ward off hunger (Prov. 25:16), for a sacrifice (Lev. 5:7), or to bring down divine judgment (Obad. 5). Here then it is no longer a result or a person being assessed as to whether they reach a given standard; the whole reference is to a person and his needs. The sense of the word has shifted from that of objective measurement (to suffice, be enough) to the personal idea of to need, stand in need of.

2. It is also striking that the LXX renders the divine šadday not only by pantokrator, the Almighty, but also, quite often, by ho hikanos. šadday may originally have been a non-Israelitish deity who provided a ready transition to Yahweh (cf. O. Eissfeldt, Kleine Schriften, III, 1965, 441 ff. on Ps. 91:1 f.). Passages sometimes attributed to the priestly document in Genesis regard the patriarchal families as being worshippers of šadday (Gen. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3), and speak of them meeting with Yahweh only through the call of Moses (Exod. 6:2 ff.). Yet at an early date šadday was only another name for Yahweh, the meaning of which was not understood (cf. O. Eissfeldt, op. cit., I, 145 f. on Ps. 91:9). The similar verses Isa. 13:6 and Joel 1:15 represent a prophetic attempt to interpret the name: šadday brings fearful judgment (šōd, havoc, devastation) upon his people Israel. The LXX translation produced another interpretation. The Heb. consonants were divided into two groups, vocalized to make the relative še and day, and then read as follows: Yahweh, "who is sufficient (of himself)", the Almighty (Ruth 1:20 f.; Job 21:15; 31:2; 40:2; Ezek. 1:24). As šadday, Yahweh has not to conform to some external standard or to some ideal (this would have been the same as the Gk. concept of moira, fate, to whom even the gods were subject); rather he himself sets the standard for himself and hence also for his creation.

NT 1. The use of the word in the NT comes largely from the language of Hellenism and Gk. Judaism. By far the most instances (27 out of 40) occur in Lk.'s writings, where hikanos almost always means much, considerable, applied either to → time (Lk. 8:27 and passim) or to → numbers (Acts 11:24 and passim); nothing of theological importance arises here, except in the difficult saying of Christ concerning the two swords (Lk. 22:38).

Having originally sent his apostles forth on their preaching mission without any external means of protection (Lk. 22:35), Jesus now urges them to show courage and endurance in the face of trials. The swords are not intended for use, as Lk. 22:49 ff. and Acts 21:38 ff. indicate. Rather the apostles are to have the courage of "sword-bearers", men who are ready to risk their lives for their cause. Since Jesus perceives that this is their intention, he says, "It is enough!" This verse, in other words, gives no support to the theory of the "two swords", by which the Bull Unam Sanctam (1302) sought to confer upon "Peter's successor" supreme temporal and spiritual power.

2. Almost all other instances of hikanos in the NT occur in Paul. Taken in connexion with Mk. 1:7 and Matt. 8:8, they indicate the development of an early Christian language of confession: I am not worthy, nor is anyone worthy (2 Cor. 3:5; 2:16) to be an → apostle (1 Cor. 15:9), to be a minister of the new covenant (2 Cor. 3:6) or to serve Christ (Mk. 1:7). I am not worthy of his presence (Matt. 8:8), which transforms me into his likeness (cf. 1 Cor. 11:1). It is entirely of God's grace that we are able to do anything (2 Cor. 3:5 f.; Col. 1:12: hikanotēs and hikanoō). By contrast, 2 Tim. 2:2 clearly indicates that in the later period gifts, particularly faithfulness, made some men more competent to teach than others. But this in no way obscured the conviction that the Christian's sufficiency is always the gift of God. Paul who is thoroughly conversant with Gk. usage where hikanos means considerable (of time, Rom. 15:23; or of numbers, 1 Cor. 11:30), follows the LXX in its use of the word to translate Heb. day, need. A Christian's own worth is meaningless when it comes to his sufficiency before God. Works acceptable to God are not those performed for God, but only those which he himself requires and which the Christian therefore receives at his hand (cf. Exod. 4:10 ff.).

W. von Meding

→ Fullness, → Right, → War

(a). A. Alt, "The God of the Fathers", in Essays on Old Testament History and Religion, 1966, 1–66; C. K. Barrett, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973; H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke, 1960; G. Kittel, arkeō etc., TDNT I 464–67; R. P. Martin, Philippians, New Century Bible, 1976; I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke: A Commentary on the Greek Text, New International Greek Testament Commentary, 1978; W. Michaelis, machaira, TDNT IV 524–27; K. H. Rengstorf, hikanos etc., TDNT III 293–96.

(b). R. Bultmann, Der Stil der paulinischen Predigt und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe, FRLANT 13, 1910; O. Eissfeldt, Kleine Schriften, III, 1965, 441 ff.; E. Lohmeyer, Die Briefe an die Philipper, Kolosser und an Philemon, KEK 9, 1956¹¹; K. H. Rengstorf, Das Evangelium nach Lukas, NTD 3, 1965¹⁰; A. Schlatter, Die beiden Schwerter, Beiträge zur Förderung der christlichen Theologie 20, 6, 1961; H. Windisch, Der zweite Korintherbrief, KEK 6, 1924⁹.

Sun, Moon, Stars

The three words which designate the heavenly luminaries commonly occur together or at least in the same context. The literal, metaphorical, and apocalyptic usage of these words is similar. The apocalyptic application is the most significant for NT theology and is discussed most fully under hēlios.

ἥλιος

ἥλιος (hēlios), sun.

CL & OT 1. hēlios is found throughout Greek literature in literal reference to the most conspicuous of the heavenly bodies. The use of the word in the LXX is quite similar to that of classical Greek. The most common use in the LXX is to mark time, whether of the day, by reference to its rising, setting, and midday heat, or of the season. The second most frequent use is the more specialized "under the sun" by which Ecclesiastes designates life in the real world, a usage found also in the Greek writers. Both the LXX and Greek literature use the rising of the sun to designate the direction East; the intense heat and light of the sun are referred to occasionally.

The permanence of the sun and the fixed order it manifests are sometimes stressed. Throughout the LXX the sun is understood to be the creation of God, the greater light made to rule the day (Gen. 1:16).

2. Metaphorical use of hēlios is found in classical Greek and the LXX, generally in referring to excellence, permanence, beauty or strength (Jdg. 5:31; Ps. 89:36 [LXX, 88:37]; Cant. 6:10; Wis. 7:29; Sir. 23:19; 26:16; 58:7). It is also associated with → righteousness (Wis. 5:6).

3. The conspicuous character of the sun, its fundamental importance to life and especially agriculture, its daily journey across the sky – all readily explain the nearly universal worship of the sun in primitive societies. Frequently the sun is personified into a god, e.g. Shamash in Mesopotamia, Helios in the Greek world, Sol Invictus in the Roman world. The OT clearly stands against this widespread practice, strictly forbidding the worship of the sun, moon, and stars (Deut. 4:19; 17:3; cf. 2 Ki. 23:5, 11; Jer. 8:2; Ezek. 8:16). In the LXX we do come near to a personification of the sun in Mal. 4:2 (LXX 3:20), "But for you who fear my name the sun of righteousness shall rise, with healing in its wings." (This is probably related to the representation of the sun as a winged disk common in the art of the Ancient Near East.) The LXX avoids hēlios in its translation of the Hebrew of Ps. 84:11 (LXX 83:12): "The LORD God is a sun (šemeš) and shield."

4. A specialized group of references in the LXX, which are particularly important to the background of the NT, may be described as apocalyptic in tone. (a) Although the judgment oracles in particular refer to anticipated judgment in history, at the same time they allude to and foreshadow the divine wrath of final judgment. Most frequent is the reference to a darkening of the sun as a prelude to or an accompaniment of divine judgment. In some passages an impending historical judgment is in view: Isa. 13:10 (Babylon); Ezek. 32:7 (Egypt); Joel 2:10, 31; 3:15 (Jerusalem); Micah 3:6 (Jerusalem). There is, however, a tendency for this language to shade into a description of the eschatological Day of the Lord. This tendency becomes more apparent in the utilization of the same language in the Pseudepigrapha (e.g. Ass. Mos. 10:5; Sib. 3:801 f.) and in the NT. In addition to a darkening of the sun, judgment may be indicated by other irregularities: e.g. the sun does not rise (Job 9:7); it stands still (Hab. 3:11); it goes down at noon (Amos 8:9) or while yet day (Jer. 15:9); it shines at night (2 Esd. 5:4). In the contexts of these passages one regularly finds reference to shame, sorrow, and confusion. (b) In the eschatological blessing that follows judgment "the sun shall be no more your light by day . . . but the Lord will be your everlasting light" (Isa. 60:19 f.). (c) On the other hand, indicative of the incomparable glory of the promised new reality, "the light of the sun will be sevenfold, as the light of seven days" (Isa. 30:26). This is metaphorical language for judgment and blessing. Parallels in classical literature are not easily found since the framework of eschatological expectation is lacking. Perhaps the closest is found in Roman writers (e.g. Pliny, Nat. Hist. 2, 30; Plutarch, Caesar 69, 3; Dio Cass. 45, 17, 5) who connect a darkened sun with tragedy as in the death of Caesar or the war between Octavian and Mark Antony.

Mention should be made of astronomical and quasi-religious speculation about the sun and moon found in Eth. Enoch 72–74; 78; Sl. Enoch 11–16; Gr. Baruch 6–9.

NT 1. The NT continues the ordinary usage of hēlios as the marker of time (Mk. 1:32 par. Lk. 4:40; Mk. 16:2; Eph. 4:26) and direction (Rev. 7:2, 16:12; Acts 27:20, referring to the impossibility of navigation), and the source of scorching heat (Matt. 13:6 par. Mk. 4:6; Jas. 1:11; Rev. 7:16; 16:8). Consistent with the OT idea of "life under the sun", Jesus teaches that the Father in heaven "makes his sun rise on the evil and on the good" (Matt. 5:45). In his argument concerning the nature of the resurrection body, Paul speaks of the contrasting glory of the sun, moon and stars (1 Cor. 15:41). Paul's Damascus Road experience causes a blindness that makes him unable to see the sun (Acts 13:11).

2. The metaphorical use of hēlios is found quite often. In the transfiguration narrative of Matt. 17:2 (but not the parallels) the face of Jesus is said to have "shone like the sun." John's vision of Christ similarly describes his face as "like the sun shining in full strength" (Rev. 1:16). The description of the mighty angel of Rev. 10:1 likens his face to the sun. The angel who announces the great supper of God in Rev. 19:17 is described as "standing in the sun." The woman of Rev. 12 (probably to be identified with the Zion of Isa. 66:7 ff.), who gives birth to the child destined to rule all nations, is portrayed as "clothed with the sun" (Rev. 12:1). Jesus teaches in Matt. 13:43 that "the righteous [dikaioi] will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father." The light from heaven which Paul saw on the Damascus Road prior to his blindness is described as "brighter than the sun" (Acts 26:13).

3. References to hēlios which are apocalyptic in tone are relatively frequent in the NT and of course are dependent upon the same imagery as found in the LXX references listed above.

(a) Most obviously eschatological, signifying the wrath of God in judgment, are the references in Rev. At the opening of the sixth seal "the sun became black as sackcloth" (Rev. 6:12); at the blowing of the fourth trumpet "a third of the sun was struck" so that its light was diminished by a third (Rev. 8:12); at the fifth trumpet the sun was darkened by smoke from the opened bottomless pit (Rev. 9:2). Similar in tone is the saying of Jesus in the Synoptics that "the sun will be darkened" (Matt. 24:29 par. Mk. 13:24) or, less precisely, that there will be signs in the sun (Lk. 21:25). These words clearly have an eschatological ring to them although their primary reference is probably to the historical event of the fall of Jerusalem (→ Generation; → Present). The same problem confronts us in the quotation of Joel 2:28–32 in Acts 2:17–21. How is one to understand "the sun shall be turned into darkness" etc. (Acts 2:20), as it stands in the context? Certainly the primary meaning of the quotation as a whole is the eschatological fulfilment experienced in the reception of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. It is possible that Peter regarded the second half of the quotation (Acts 2:19–20) as simply symbolic for the inauguration of the eschatological age. (J. D. G. Dunn regards it as probable that cosmic signs were understood as "apocalyptic stage-effects which did not belong to the substance of the prophecy or require literal fulfilment," Baptism in the Holy Spirit, SBT Second Series 15, 1970, 47.) There is the further possibility of an association in his and his listeners' minds between the failing of the sun's light at the time of the crucifixion, Lk. 23:45 (cf. the darkness recorded in Matt. 27:45 par. Mk. 15:33), and the prophecy of Joel (F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, NLC, 1965, 69). It is, however, consistent with the meaning of this language elsewhere (both OT and NT) to understand Acts 2:19–20 as referring to coming judgment (here, eschatological). The point is that eschatology has begun and judgment is part and parcel of eschatology (at least for Peter, if not for Luke). Warnings and the call to repentance are therefore timely (Acts 2:38, 40; 3:19, 23). Salvation is available to those who call on the name of the Lord, as the last verse of the Joel passage stresses (Acts 2:21; cf. 4:12). (Haenchen explains the inclusion of Joel 2:30–31 [Acts 2:19–20] in the quotation as due mainly to the interest of Luke in this final verse, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 186.)

(b) Like the LXX, the NT also contains the use of hēlios in describing the glorious aspect of eschatology, here as exhibited in the city coming down out of heaven, the new Jerusalem. That city is of such splendour that there is no need of the sun to shine (Rev. 21:23). God's servants there will "need no light of lamp or sun, for the Lord God will be their light" (Rev. 22:5).

It is worth noting that, whereas most of the references to hēlios in the LXX are literal rather than metaphorical or apocalyptic in character, in the NT the reverse is true. This is of course explained by the eschatological orientation of the NT. Our difficulty in understanding its language about cosmic signs simply reflects the inherent complexity of fulfilment without consummation. Moreover, there is a theological interconnexion between God's blessings on the one hand and his judgments on the other, whereby earlier blessings may typify eschatological blessing and earlier judgments may typify eschatological judgment. So magnificent is the kingdom inaugurated by Christ at his first advent that it may rightly be characterized in language that, strictly speaking, refers to the consummation (e.g. Luke 4:18; 7:22; 10:18, 24). In the same way, so full of significance is the fall of Jerusalem as a judgment sign that it connotes the eschatological judgment and, as do many other judgments in the historical narrative of the Bible, points proleptically to the eschaton and so may be described in the boldest of language (as in our passages about the darkening of the sun, etc.).

hēlios in the NT focuses alternately on glory and judgment. Given the prominence of revelation, fulfilment, and anticipated consummation in the NT, the symbolic imagery of hēlios receives special emphasis.

D. A. Hagner

σελήνη

σελήνη (selēnē), moon; σεληνιάζομαι (selēniazomai), be moon-struck.

CL & OT 1. The use of selēnē in its literal sense is not uncommon in the classical writers or in the LXX. Commonly in view is its specialized function of marking time by waxing and waning. The religious festivals of the Hebrews, as of many primitive societies, were determined by the lunar calendar (see especially Sir. 43:6–8). (It should be noted that hōdeš, “month”, is translated by neomēnia, “new moon”, in the LXX.) Also found are references to nocturnal light which the moon provides, and in the LXX the fixed order it demonstrates (Jer. 31:35 [LXX 38:35]), its beauty (Ps. 8:3), and its permanence (Ps. 72[71]: 5, 7). 2. A few metaphorical references are found in the LXX (e.g. Cant. 6:10; Sir. 27:11; 50:6). 3. The moon with its unique cycle of phases, its growth and decline, its effect upon the tides, though a lesser light, is more prominent in pagan mythology and religion than is the sun. Classical writers refer to Selene, the moon goddess. Worship of the moon, as of sun and stars, is prohibited in the OT (see references under hēlios). A specialized reflection of popular belief in the preternatural power of the moon is the promise that under Yahweh's protection the moon will not smite one by night (Ps. 121[120]:6). 4. As with the sun, the prospect of eschatological judgment and blessing affects the light of the moon. (a) In judgment it will be darkened (Eccl. 12:2; Isa. 13:10; Ezek. 32:7; Joel 2:10); “confounded” (Isa. 24:23); turned into blood (Joel 2:31; Ass. Mos. 10:5); held up in its course (Hab. 3:11; cf. Eth. Enoch 80:4; 2 Esd. 5:4). (b) In blessing its light will be as the light of the sun (Isa. 30:26); the moon will not function as a luminary at night (Isa. 60:19); no longer will the moon withdraw itself (Isa. 60:20).

In the LXX the moon is never referred to alone; only twice is the moon referred to apart from the sun, and in both places it is associated with the stars (Job 25:5; Ps. 8:3).

NT In the NT selēnē occurs only in association with hēlios. Only two occurrences are not apocalyptic in tone: a reference to the glory of the moon as distinct from sun and stars in Paul's argument about the resurrection body, and the metaphorical reference in the description of the woman of Rev. 12 (see above, on hēlios) who has the moon under her feet (12:1). The cognate verb selēniazomai is found in Matt. 4:24 and 17:15, and reflects the popular connexion of demon possession with the moon (cf. the English word "lunacy"). The latter passage describes symptoms of something like epilepsy and the malady is attributed to an evil spirit which the disciples are unable to cast out. selēniazomai does not occur in the LXX, although it is common in the papyri (Moulton-Milligan, 571).

The cosmic phenomena associated with eschatological happenings regularly include references to the moon alongside those to the sun. (a) In passages where judgment is in view the apocalyptic language of the LXX is utilized. As the sun will be darkened, so "the moon will not give its light" (Mk. 13:24 par. Matt. 24:29). The Lucan parallel simply indicates that there will be signs in sun, moon and stars (Lk. 21:25). The quotation of Joel 2:31 in Acts 2:20 speaks of the moon being turned into blood; Rev. 6:12 similarly says that at the opening of the sixth seal "the full moon became like blood." When the fourth angel blew his trumpet in Rev. 8:12, the moon, together with sun and stars, was darkened by one third. (b) The only other reference to selēnē concerns the eschatological era of blessing: the holy city, the new → Jerusalem is said to need no moon to shine upon it since the glory of God is its light (Rev. 21:23).

The applicability of apocalyptic language both to events which have happened in history as well as to events more properly eschatological is discussed at the end of the article on hēlios.

D. A. Hagner

ἀστήρ

ἀστήρ (astēr), star; ἄστρον (astron), star, constellation.

CL & OT 1. The literal use of astēr and astron is found in Greek writers and LXX.

The latter may refer to a constellation, but in the LXX ordinarily the plural forms of the two words are interchangeable. In the OT, the stars, like the sun and moon, are the creation of God (Gen. 1:16). They are referred to in classical writers and LXX in indicating time (i.e. by their appearance), and by their fixed order, direction as well as (with the moon) light and beauty. The most frequent use of both astēr and astron in the LXX is in reference to their incalculable number, usually with the descendants of the patriarchs in mind (cf. Gen. 15:5; 22:17; 26:4; Exod. 32:13; Deut. 1:10; 10:22; 28:62).

2. The metaphorical use of astēr and astron is common in classical literature and LXX. Most frequent in classical usage is the application to an illustrious person. In the LXX, those "who turn many to righteousness" will shine "like the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. 12:3). Often similes employ the beauty or glory of the stars (e.g. 1 Chr. 27:23; Wis. 7:29; Sir. 50:6). Obad. 4 speaks of pride as setting one's nest among the stars; similarly Isa. 14:12 refers to Heōsphoros (RSV: Day Star) who in his proud heart will ascend above the stars of God and make himself like the Most High (cf. 2 Macc. 9:10) (→ Light, art. phōs NT 4). In Num. 24:17 an astron is prophesied to come forth out of Jacob, a man (anthrōpos) out of Israel who will rule in victory. (This text is understood as messianic at Qumran, but is not utilized in the NT unless possibly in Rev. 22:16; cf. 1QM 11:5–7; CD 7:19–20 and 4Qtest 12 f.) It was applied to Simeon Bar Kochba, whose name in Aram. means “Son of a Star”, the leader of the Jewish rebellion against the Romans in A.D. 132. The guerilla leader Bar Kochba was regarded as the messiah in his resistance to Hadrian’s project to rebuild Jerusalem as a Graeco-Roman city with a temple to Jupiter on the site of the Jewish temple. (Cf. E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ [175 B.C.–A.D. 135], eds., G. Vermes and F. Millar, I, 1973², 543 ff.).

3. Astrology and the worship of the stars are known both in Greek writers and LXX. Although the stars are sometimes personified in the LXX (e.g. Jdg. 5:20; Ps. 148:3; Bar. 3:34; Ep. Jer. 60), a strong stance is taken against astrology and the worship of the stars (Deut. 4:19; Isa. 47:13; Jer. 8:2; Amos 5:26). The polemic in Jer. 10:2 (i.e. not to be dismayed at the signs of the heavens as the nations are) is probably directed against astrology (cf. Wis. 13:2).

4. The imagery of darkened stars is associated with suffering and judgment in the LXX (Job 3:9; 9:7; Eccl. 12:2; Wis. 17:5). The failure of the stars to give their light becomes standard apocalyptic language used to describe historical and eschatological judgment (Isa. 13:10; Ezek. 32:7; Joel 2:10; 3:15). Occasionally the imagery varies, referring to stars falling, the host of heaven rotting away, and the skies being rolled up like a scroll (Isa. 34:4; cf. Dan. 8:10). This metaphorical language points symbolically to the eschatological era.

NT astēr and astron are both found in the NT; the difference between the two words is stylistic, Lk.-Acts for example exclusively using astron, Rev. exclusively astēr.

1. Out of the 28 occurrences of the words, only five may be described as ordinary or literal: Acts 27:20 (as guides to navigation at sea); 1 Cor. 15:41 (where astēr occurs three times in reference to differing orders of glory); and Heb. 11:12 (referring to the innumerable descendants of → Abraham).

2. Unique to the infancy narrative of Matt. (2:1–12) is the story of the magi and the astēr which led them to Bethlehem. It was not uncommon in the ancient world to associate the birth of a great ruler with extraordinary phenomena in the heavens. Whether in Matt. we have to do with a miraculous star or something natural such as the conjunction of planetary bodies or a supernova is uncertain. Quite possibly the star seen by the wise men was, as Johannes Kepler first suggested, a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn which occurred three times in 7 B.C. This possibility is strengthened by a Jewish astrological tradition about the conjunction, as well as the common association of Jupiter with kingly rule (and hence the messiah) and Saturn with the Jewish people. (Cf. R. A. Rosenberg, “The ‘Star of the Messiah’ Reconsidered,” Biblica 53, 1972, 105–9.) It must be remembered that the magi were experts in esoteric knowledge, persons for whom astrology with its careful observation of the stars would have been centrally important (→ Magic, art. mageia NT 2(b)). Theologically the star may be said to serve as a sign of the dawning of the new, glorious era of the kingdom which the birth of the King inaugurates.

3. The metaphorical use of astēr is frequent in the NT, especially in Revelation. Five times in the opening chapters of Rev. reference is made to seven stars. These seven stars are held in the right hand of the One who discloses himself to John in a vision (Rev. 1:16, 20; 2:1); one reference omits the specific mention of the right hand

(Rev. 3:1). In Rev. 1:20 the mystery is explained: the stars are “the angels of the seven churches” (the seven lampstands are said to symbolize the seven churches). It is unlikely that the mention of the seven stars is to be explained by actual heavenly bodies, whether the seven planets or a particular constellation. More probably the number derives from the common seven-branched candelabra of Israel, if not from the symbolic perfection of the number itself. Nevertheless, as G. R. Beasley-Murray suggests (following E. Lohmeyer, Die Offenbarung des Johannes, HNT 16, 1953²), there may also have been an association of the seven stars in Revelation with the sovereignty symbolized by the seven planets (The Book of Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974, 79). True sovereignty, over against the sovereignty claimed by the Roman emperors, thus lies with Christ and his people.

The symbolism of the “morning star” (ho astēr ho prōinos) in Rev. 2:28 and 22:16 is also difficult. The latter passage has Jesus say “I am the root and offspring of David, the bright morning star.” Although this can be related to the words of Num. 24:17 (a star shall come out of Jacob), more probably it alludes to the morning star Venus, with the connotation not only of beauty, but of daybreak, and so of sovereignty and victory. Venus as the symbol of victory and sovereignty is attested in Roman times (Lohmeyer, op. cit., followed by Beasley-Murray, op. cit., 93 and 342). In Rev. 2:28, then, we may also understand the morning star given to the faithful as sovereignty or rule, which has the virtue of being consistent with the context as well as avoiding the awkward identification of the morning star with Christ.

Further metaphorical use of astēr is found in the crown of twelve stars worn by the woman of Rev. 12:1, where the stars obviously symbolize the twelve tribes of Israel. Jude 13 speaks of ungodly and heretical persons as “wandering stars” destined to an eternal darkness.

Stephen’s speech in Acts provides an allusion to the worship of stars in the OT period (7:43).

4. The stars are associated with the sun and moon in the apocalyptic imagery of eschatological judgment. In contrast to the LXX, where the darkening of the stars is common, only one passage in the NT refers to this: Rev. 8:12, where with sun and moon the light of the stars is darkened by one third. Elsewhere the eschatological imagery in the NT refers to the falling of the stars from the sky, a phenomenon mentioned only twice in the LXX. Jesus speaks of a time when “the stars will be falling from heaven” (Mk. 13:25 par. Matt. 24:29; Lk. again simply refers to “signs” in the stars, using the word astron, 21:25). The next clause in this passage reads “and the powers [hai dynameis] in the heavens will be shaken.” In this clause (also in Lk. 21:26) the powers may simply refer to the heavenly bodies previously mentioned. On the other hand, cosmic powers in the sense of spiritual authorities and powers may be in view (→ Might). In either case, what is symbolized by this language is an event, a turning point, of very great significance. If, as is probable, this language refers to the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the theological continuity with and anticipation of the final eschatological judgment is not to be missed.

Further employment of the imagery of falling stars is found in Rev. At the opening of the sixth seal the stars fell to the earth “as the fig tree sheds its winter fruit when shaken by a gale” (Rev. 6:13). Isa. 34:4 is recalled in the words which follow: “the sky vanished like a scroll that is rolled up” (Rev. 6:14). The blowing of the third trumpet announces the falling of “a great star from heaven, blazing like a torch,” which has the name Wormwood (Gk. apsinthos) and makes bitter a third of the waters (Rev. 8:10 ff.; → Gall). At the fifth trumpet a star is seen “fallen from heaven to earth” (Rev. 9:1) and finally the tail of the dragon in Rev. 12 “swept down a third of the stars of heaven, and cast them to the earth” (Rev. 12:4).

Unlike the sun and moon in the NT, there is no reference to the stars in the context of eschatological blessing. The closest we come to this is the identification of Jesus as “the bright morning star” (Rev. 22:16).

In the apocalyptic language about sun, moon, and stars a recurrent question concerns how literally it is to be understood. One may debate the possibility of these luminaries being literally darkened, but not that the stars literally fall to earth, or that the sky is rolled up like a scroll. These statements about the stars underline the figurative nature of apocalyptic language. The real meaning of this language is theological. In the NT we have moved into the era of fulfilment prior to the consummation of God’s purposes. Momentous events have occurred and are yet to occur – all of which are part of the same fabric of judgment and blessing, and call for the most exalted language.

D. A. Hagner

→ Light, → Present, → Time, → Weather

- (a). G. R. Beasley-Murray, A Commentary on Mark Thirteen, 1957; The Book of Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974; W. Foerster, astēr, astron, TDNT I 503–5; T. H. Gaster, Myth, Legend and Custom in the Old Testament, 1969; “Sun”, IDB IV, 463–5; “Moon”, IDB III, 436–7; L. Hartmann, Prophecy Interpreted, 1966; B. O. Long, “Astrology,” IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 76–78; D. M. Roark, “The Great Eschatological Discourse,” NovT 7, 1964, 123–7; R. A. Rosenberg, “The ‘Star of the Messiah’ Reconsidered,” Biblica 53, 1972, 105–9; “Star of Bethelhem,” IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 842; D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic, 1964, 271–6.
- (b). R. Pesch, Naherwartungen, 1968, 157–66.

Swear, Oath

ὄμνύω	ὄμνύω (omnyō), swear; ὄρκος (horkos), oath; ὀρκίζω (horkizō), adjure, implore; ἐνορκίζω (enhorkizo), adjure, cause someone to swear; ἐξορκίζω (exhorkizō), adjure, charge under an oath; ἐξορκιστής (exhorkistēs), exorcist; ἐπιορκέω (epihorkeō), swear falsely, commit perjury, break one’s oath; ἐπίορκος (epihorkos), perjured, perjurer; ὀρκωμοσία (horkōmosia), asserting on oath, taking an oath.
-------	---

CL 1. (a) omnyō (from Hdt. onwards) is a parallel form to omnymi (both are attested from Hom. onwards). It originally meant to hold fast (holy objects), and thence to swear. The word is used either with the acc. of the person or thing (e.g. Xen., Anab. 7, 6, 18) or with the prepositions pros, kata, epi, en or eis. Occasionally it is followed by an infinitive.

(b) horkos (from Hom. onwards) meant originally the staff which was grasped and raised in swearing (Hom., Il. 10, 321 and 328), thence oaths in general. The noun occurs frequently in the phrases horkon omnyeîn, to take up the oath-staff, and horkon didonai or lambaneîn, to give or accept on oath (Aristotle, Rhet. 1, 15, 1377a, 7 f.). The corresponding vb. horkizō has the meaning: (i) to put on oath (Xen., Sym. 4, 10); (ii) adjure (Josephus, Life 258; in the NT only in Mk. 5:7; Acts 19:13). The compound enhorkizō is a stronger form and means to adjure (in the NT only in 1 Thess. 5:27). exhorkizō expresses in particular the idea of adjuring by a deity or → demon (in the NT only in Matt. 26:63; Acts 19:13, v.l.). exhorkistēs is an exorcist who drives out demons by magical formulae (in the NT only in Acts 19:13; → Satan). epihorkeō (from Hom. onwards) means to swear falsely, commit perjury or break an oath (in the NT only in Matt. 5:33); correspondingly epihorkos means perjurious (in the NT only in 1 Tim. 1:10). The noun horkōmosia is infrequent and means asserting on oath (in the NT only in Heb. 7:20 f., 28).

(c) The etymology of omnyō and horkos suggests that the gestures of grasping an object or raising one's hand were from the first part of the act of swearing. The original meaning of the oath lay in the guaranteeing of man's word. An undoubtedly higher court of appeal was frequently provided by calling upon a deity (cf. the theoi horkioi as a witness to the truth, e.g. nē Dia, by Zeus). The formula of the oath originally had the character of conditionally cursing oneself (→ Curse), if the statement should prove not to correspond to the truth. A distinction can be drawn between assertive oaths, which are concerned with past and present events and are chiefly taken in court, and promissory oaths which promise a future activity and play an important part in religious as well as private life.

2. (a) In their public life the Greeks applied oaths to many areas, for many reasons and in many forms. Their original setting was a cultic one, but the practice of swearing oaths found a place in politics and law with oaths for officials, citizens and judges. Even the appropriate deities were fixed by the legislator. "This means that the oath in public life gives religious sanction and divine basis to the political order" (J. Schneider, TDNT V 458). Apart from this, oaths were used in contracts whose reliability might be guaranteed by the pledging of valuable property (the marriage-bed, children or weapons). The Greeks also used oaths in medicine.

The Hippocratic oath is generally attributed to the Greek physician Hippocrates (c. 460 – c. 357 B.C.) who was a native of the island of Cos. "I swear by Apollo Physician, by Asclepius, by Health, by Heal-all, and by all the gods and goddesses, making them witnesses, that I will carry out, according to my ability and judgment, this oath and this indenture: To regard my teacher in this art as equal to my parents; to make him partner in my livelihood, and when he is in need of money to share mine with him; to consider his offspring equal to my brothers; to teach them this art, if they require to learn it, without fee or indenture; and to impart precept, oral instruction, and all the other learning, to my sons, to the sons of my teacher, and to pupils who have signed the indenture and sworn obedience to the physicians' Law, but to none other. I will use treatment to help the sick according to my ability and judgment, but I will never use it to injure or wrong them. I will not give poison to anyone though asked to do so, nor will I suggest such a plan. Similarly I will not give a pessary to a woman to cause abortion. But in purity and holiness I will guard my life and my art. I will not use the knife either on sufferers from stone, but I will give place to such as are craftsmen therein. Into whatsoever house I enter, I will do so to help the sick, keeping myself free from all intentional wrong-doing and harm, especially from fornication with woman or man, bond or free. Whatsoever in the course of practice I see or hear (or even outside my practice in social intercourse) that ought never to be published abroad, I will not divulge, but consider such things to be holy secrets. Now if I keep this oath and break it not, may I enjoy honour, in my life and art, among all men for all time; but if I transgress and forswear myself, may the opposite befall me" (E.T. by W. H. S. Jones, Hippocrates, Loeb Classical Library, 1952, I, 298 ff.).

(b) In earlier times men almost always swore by the gods (Xen., Anab. 6, 6, 17). Plutarch describes in his Life of Dio (56) the undertaking of a "great oath": "They required of him the great oath. He who would take it enters the sanctuary of Demeter and Persephone; after sacred ceremonies he puts on the goddess's purple mantle and, taking a blazing torch in his hand, pronounces the words of the oath." In the Hellenistic-Roman period, oaths by deities were supplemented or replaced by those involving kings or emperors: they involved either the person or the entire dynasty of the ruler of the day. It was the custom among the Romans for the one who took the oath to take a stone in his hand and ask that he might be hurled forth like this stone if he broke his word. Jupiter Lapis was the god of oaths in dealings between different peoples.

(c) The increasing frequency of the making of oaths led to a decline in their power and authority. Hence, we early find a tendency to limit or abolish oaths in Greece. Rhadamanthys was the first to try to limit the everyday use of oaths and to make their misuse punishable (cf. Plato, Ap. 22a). Sophocles wrote: "I do not wish to bind you by an oath as I would a base man. [Theseus] You would have won no more indeed than with my word! The love of Delphic Apollo enjoins: 'Use no oaths!'" (OC 650). The Pythagoreans also forbade their disciples to use oaths. Plutarch declares that an oath, being a constraint upon the spirit of a free man, was an indignity (Quaestiones Romanae 44). The Stoic Epictetus shared the same view (Enchiridion 33, 5), and his disciple, Marcus Aurelius, wrote: "You must always be able to do without the swearing of oaths and the calling up of witnesses" (Meditationes 3, 5). However, these efforts to abolish oaths met with no success in Greece.

OT 1. The LXX usually translates the niph. of šāba' by omnyō, and the hiph. by horkizō. The original meaning of šāba' is to come under the influence of seven things (cf. šeba', seven). Gen. 21:20 f. provides evidence that in early times an oath was ratified by the sacrifice of seven animals (cf. Gen. 15:10). horkos corresponds to the Heb. š'bi'āh, oath, and occasionally to 'alāh, → curse, act of cursing, or, words of a curse (Prov. 29:24). The terms are found chiefly in narrative books, horkos often and omnyō principally in Gen. and Deut.

2. (a) A very ancient form of oath is the practice of calling Yahweh to witness between two partners: "God is witness between you and me" (Gen. 31:50; cf. 1 Sam. 20:12). Special weight is given to an oath by the similarly ancient practice of invoking a curse on oneself if the oath is broken: "The LORD do so to me, and more also, if . . ." (1 Sam. 20:13). The most frequent form is the phrase, "As the LORD lives" (Jdg. 8:19; 1 Sam. 20:3); this may be varied into an oath by the life of the king (1 Sam. 17:55) or of the person addressed (1 Sam. 1:26; 20:4).

(b) In treaties (between Abraham and Abimelech, Gen. 21:23; Jacob and Laban, Gen. 31:50), and bequests by father to son (Jacob and Joseph, Gen. 47:31), the oath had its original promissory function: the partners placed themselves under the power and judgment of Yahweh, who was invoked and recognized as witness for the validity of the promise. Thus the OT oath originally contained by implication a confession of faith in Yahweh (Deut. 6:13; 10:20). To swear falsely is tantamount to a misuse of Yahweh's → name (Exod. 20:7; Lev. 19:12). The OT does not know the assertive oath of a witness before a lawcourt; instead it has the so-called oath of purification in which the accused, in the absence of pertinent witnesses, asserts his innocence before Yahweh and corroborates this with curses upon himself if he is guilty of perjury (Num. 5:11–28). Since perjury can rarely be detected by man (in which case, Lev. 5:3–6 would apply), the person guilty of it is generally assigned to the judgment of God (1 Ki. 8:31 f.).

(c) Whereas in Gen. we read chiefly of oaths taken by men, Deut. speaks primarily of Yahweh's oath. Yahweh swears by himself, and the form of oath is: "As I live . . ." (Num. 14:21; cf. Gen. 22:16; Amos 6:8). Yahweh guarantees with an oath the truth of his word, so that his oath is tantamount to a corroboration of his → promise. He has sworn the land of Canaan to the patriarchs (Deut. 1:8; 6:10, 18, 23), and sealed with an oath the → covenant he made with the fathers of Israel (Deut. 4:31; 7:8, 12; 29:12 ff.). The basic elements contained in Yahweh's promises to the patriarchs in Gen., viz. the people (Gen. 12:2), the land (Gen. 13:15), and the covenant (Gen. 17:7), are taken up again in the exhortations of Deut. and their validity reinforced by references to Yahweh's oath (Deut. 8:1, the land; Deut. 8:18, the covenant).

(d) Yahweh's oath can also, however, take the form of a → curse, with which he punishes the disobedience of his people. Thus the grumbling Israelites will die in the wilderness (Num. 14:21, 28; Deut. 1:34 f.; 2:14); Moses will not enter the promised land (Deut. 4:21); the guilt of Eli will not be expiated (1 Sam. 3:14). The double-sided nature of Yahweh's oath, serving as it does both as corroboration of his promise and curse of disobedience, corresponds in fact to the structure of → blessing and → curse (cf. Deut. 28; 30:19).

3. In rabbinic Judaism the practice of oath-taking was widespread. The following types of oath may be distinguished: (a) corroborative oath; (b) oath of testimony; (c) oath under pledge (oath of purification); (d) judge's oath; (e) rabbinical oath; and (f) perjurious oath (cf. J. Schneider, TDNT V 461; SB I 321 ff.). As in Hellenism, there were efforts to limit the excessive use of oaths (Sir. 23:9 ff.). Philo, like the Stoics, advocates the abolition of oaths (Spec. Leg. 2, 2–38). In his opinion it is best not to swear, second best to swear truly, but the worst thing of all is to commit perjury (Decal. 84–93; cf. J. Schneider, TDNT V 179). The most radical rejection of oath-taking is found among the Essenes, who instead prized the plain word very highly (cf. Josephus, War 2, 8, 6; cf. also CD 9:1–10:3 which, commenting on 1 Sam. 25:26, allows the oath of cursing to be demanded only by judges). But the Essenes had oaths of initiation (Josephus, War 2, 8, 7; CD 15:5; 1QS 5:7–11).

NT The NT generally uses omnyō in references to swearing; less frequently horkos, and on two occasions only, horkizō. Words of this group occur here and there in various books; only in Matt. and Heb. do they appear more frequently.

1. (a) Matthew has handed down to us, in the fourth antithesis of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:33–37), the decisive pronouncement of Jesus on oaths. It is joined (v. 33) to the OT prohibition of perjury (Lev. 19:12), and the commandment to keep one's vows (Num. 30:3 f.; Deut. 23:23). In contrast, Jesus pronounces a total prohibition: mē omosai holōs, "you shall not swear at all" (v. 34). In order to exclude any misunderstanding that might water the teaching down, four explanatory phrases are added to give sharpness and clarity: neither by heaven, earth, Jerusalem nor one's own head is one permitted to swear (vv. 34–36). This constitutes an attack on the contemporary Jewish practice of oath-taking, in which the attempt was made to avoid the misuse of God's name in the numerous oaths which were taken each day, by means of circumlocution. According to D. Hill, heaven is not the Jewish periphrasis for the divine name but stands here for the heavenly world (The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 126). In the Mishnah, swearing by the heavens and the earth is not binding upon witnesses (Shebuoth 6:13). Such an oath would be thus ambiguous and indeed a contradiction in terms. V. 34 contains an allusion to Isa. 66:1: "Heaven is my throne and the earth is my footstool." In v. 35 "by Jerusalem" means "towards Jerusalem", and may reflect the rabbinic view that a vow made "by Jerusalem" is nothing unless it is sworn towards Jerusalem, i.e. while facing in the direction of Jerusalem (Tosefta Nedarim 1). The rest of the phrase refers to Ps. 48(47):2. An oath "by the life of thy head" is referred to in Mishnah Sanhedrin 3:2. Although it might be thought that a man has power over his head (i.e. over the colour of his hair), it is not so. This is determined by God. What was not realized here was that, in invoking other authorities, one still had God to reckon with, as the Lord of all of them. The third woe (Matt. 23:16–22) attacks with like severity the casuistic attitude to oaths and vows of the scribes and Pharisees. He who swears by the altar, the temple, or heaven, includes in his oath him who has given these things their authority, namely God. In this way the hair-splitting rules governing the Jewish practice of oath-taking are reduced to absurdity. With these explanations, it is impossible to be in any doubt about the universal validity of Jesus' prohibition: Jesus forbids every oath, whether it is made in the religious sphere, in court, in everyday life, or in private. For the oath adds nothing to the simple affirmation or negation. "Let what you say be simply 'Yes' or 'No'; anything more than this comes from evil" (Matt. 5:37).

(b) In view of the freedom with which oath-taking is presupposed and practised in the OT, the question arises as to the purpose and meaning of Jesus' radical prohibition of swearing. An oath demands complete truthfulness in what a man says, and thus presupposes lying (→ Lie) in everyday human speech. The OT uses the oath to fight the lie. Lying, however, creeps even into the taking of oaths, in the form of perjury and the misuse of God's name, as the casual practice of the Hellenistic period and of rabbinic Judaism demonstrates. Jesus therefore uses a prohibition of swearing in order to fight against lying. His aim in this is stated in the last sentence of the antithesis: "Let what you say be simply 'Yes' or 'No'" (Matt. 5:37; cf. also Jas. 5:12). He replaces swearing by a simple "yes" and "no" without invocation of God's name. As a result the disciple is by no means released from responsibility before God. On the contrary, not only isolated statements, but the whole speech of the Christian takes place in the presence of the all-knowing God. Each of his words is to be nothing but truth, so that none needs to be confirmed by an oath. An oath casts a shadow of doubtfulness over all his other words: therefore it is "from the evil one". The disciple, however, is called to be "a light even in his words" (D. Bonhoeffer, The Cost of Discipleship, 1959⁶, 123).

The aims of Jesus in forbidding oaths is not to substitute a secular form of words (yes or no) for a religious one, but to insist on absolute truthfulness in every word of man. The fourth antithesis, which opposes Jewish practice, but not the intention of the OT, is to be understood not as a law of the letter, but a law to be obeyed in spirit. If the truth is going to be obscured by refusal to take an oath, it will be necessary to decide in favour of taking an oath, as in the OT, for the truth's sake. The radical nature of Jesus' prohibition aims at bringing about complete truthfulness in human speech.

(c) The words of Jesus are frequently introduced by the formula, "Truly [amēn; → Amen] I say to you" (Matt. 5:18), or in the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount, "But I [egō de] say to you" (Matt. 5:22, 28, 32, 34, 39, 44). These are not forms of oath, but rather the underlining of Jesus' words by the authority of his person (egō, → I). He is the truth (cf. Jn. 14:6), and his words are therefore true (amēn). "For all the promises of God find their Yes in him. That is why we utter the Amen through him, to the glory of God" (2 Cor. 1:20). Before the Sanhedrin Jesus was pressed to state on oath that he was the Son of God (Matt. 26:63 f.). Jesus refused the oath, and simply affirmed what the high priest has asked with the words: "You have said so", which is equivalent to the confession: "Yes, I am the Son of God".

(d) Matt. 14:7 par. Mk. 6:23 provides an example of the rash practice of oath-taking. Herod, intoxicated at his birthday feast, casually swore to grant whatever his step-daughter might ask. The mother, Herodias, took the opportunity to demand the head of John the Baptist who had been imprisoned by Herod for denouncing Herod's liaison with her. In the denial scene, Peter maintained that he did not know Jesus, and corroborated this lie with an oath and curses on himself (Matt. 26:74, par. Mk. 14:71; cf. Lk. 22:60). H. Merkel suggests that Peter may even have cursed Jesus ("Peter's Curse", in E. Bammel, ed., The Trial of Jesus. Cambridge Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, SBT Second Series 13, 1970, 66–71).

2. No forms of oath are found in Paul's writings. Instead he used asseverations to underline the sincerity of his words. Particularly in his battle for the churches in Galatia and Corinth, he calls God to witness for the truth of his life story (Gal. 1:20), his actions (2 Cor. 1:23), and his gospel (Rom. 1:9). To put beyond all doubt his concern for his own nation (lest it be misunderstood as anti-Jewish polemics), he asserts (Rom. 9:1): "I am speaking the truth in Christ. I am not lying; my conscience bears me witness in the Holy Spirit." Attacked by his opponents, the apostle calls God to witness to his truthfulness.

3. As in the OT, so in the NT we read of God's oath. In Lk. 1:73; Heb. 6:13; and Acts 2:30, the oath of God means no more than his → promises given to → Abraham and → David. Hebrews even carries over the negative divine oath, God's → curse upon the disobedient Israelites in the → wilderness (Heb. 3:11, 18; 4:3; cf. Num. 14:21–23; Deut. 1:34), in order to add a warning exhortation to obedience and zeal for the promised → rest of the people of God (Heb. 4:9–11). Heb. 6:16 f. alludes to the practice of oath-taking, in order to contrast human oaths by someone or something greater, with God's plain oath by himself. Heb. 7:20–22 (horkōmosia) goes still further, drawing a distinction between God's plain word and his word under oath. In contrast to the appointment of → Levitical priests, which is made without an oath, Heb. uses God's oath in Ps. 110:4 to demonstrate confidently that Christ's priesthood is better, and unchangeable. Rev. 10:6 mentions, in an echo of Dan. 12:5–7, an angel who announces the end with an oath.

4. Jesus rejected oath-taking completely, Peter committed perjury, Paul used asseverations, and Hebrews speaks of God's oaths of promise and cursing. All this must be interpreted by reference to the demand for unconditional truthfulness. "The cross is God's truth about us, and therefore it is the only power which can make us truthful. When we know the cross we are no longer afraid of the truth. We need no more oaths to confirm the truth of our utterances, for we live in the perfect truth of God" (D. Bonhoeffer, op. cit., 125).

H.-G. Link

→ Blessing, → Covenant, → Curse, → Promise, → Revile, → Truth

- (a). S. Blank, "The Curse, Blasphemy, the Spell and the Oath", Hebrew Union College Annual 23, 1950–51, 73–95; D. Bonhoeffer, The Cost of Discipleship, 1959⁶; 122–25; H. C. Brichto, The Problem of Curse in the Hebrew Bible, 1963; A. E. Crawley, E. Beet, M. A. Canney, "Oath", ERE IX 430–38; D. Daube, Studies in Biblical Law, 1947; M. Greenberg, "The Hebrew Oath Particle Hay/Hē", JBL 76, 1957, 34–39; T. M. Gregory, "Oath", ZPEB IV 476–79; C. H. W. Johns, The Relation between the Laws of Babylonia and the Laws of the Hebrew People, 1914; M. G. Kline, "Oath and Ordeal Signs", WTJ 27, 1965, 115–39; ibid. 28, 1965, 1–37; G. van der Leeuw, Religion in its Essence and Manifestation, 1964², §59; S. A. B. Mercer, The Oath in Babylonian and Assyrian Literature, 1912; H. Merkel, "Peter's Curse", E. Bammel, ed., The Trial of Jesus. Cambridge Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, SBT Second Series 13, 1970, 66–71; M. H. Pope, "Oaths", IDB III 575 ff.; V. Rogers, "The Use of rš in an Oath", JBL 74, 1955, 272 f.; J. Schneider, omnyō, TDNT V 176–85; and horkos etc., TDNT V 457–67; J. E. Tyler, Oaths: Their Origin, Nature and History, 1835. H. L. White, "The Divine Oath in Genesis", JBL 92, 1973, 165–79.
- (b). O. Bauernfeind, Eid und Frieden, Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Geistesgeschichte Neue Folge 2, 1956; H. Bethke, ed., Eid, Gewissen, Treuepflicht, Antworten 8, 1965; A. Gerlach-Praetorius, Der Kirche vor der Eidesfrage. Die Diskussion um den Pfarrereid im "Dritten Reich", Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Kirchenkampfes 18, 1967; J. Hempel, "Die israelitischen Anschauungen von Segen und Fluch im Lichte der altorientalischen Parallelen", Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft 4, 1925, 20 ff.; M. Honecker, "Der Eid in einer säkularisierten Gesellschaft", EvKomm 2, 1969, 569 ff.; F. Horst, "Der Eid im Alten Testament", EvTh 17, 1957, 366 ff. (reprinted in Gottes Recht, ThB 12, 1961, 292 ff.); C. A. Keller, šb', THAT II 855–63; W. Luther, "Wahrheit" und "Lüge" im ältesten Griechentum, 1935; S. Morenz et al., "Eid", *RGG*³ II 347 ff.; G. Niemeier, ed., Ich schwöre. Theologische und juristische Studien zur Eidesfrage, 1968; J. Pedersen, Der Eid bei den Semiten, 1914; J. Scharbert, "'Fluchen' und 'Segen' im Alten Testament", Biblica 29, 1958, 1–26; E. Seidl, Der Eid im römisch-ägyptischen Provinzialrecht, I–II, 1933–35; G. Stählin, "Zum Gebrauch von Beteuerungsformeln im Neuen Testament", NovT 5, 1962, 115 ff.; H. Strathmann, "Eid", EKL I 1027 ff.; G. Wehmeier, Der Segen im Alten Testament, 1970; E. Ziebarth, "Eid", Pauly-Wissowa, V, 2075–83.

T

Take, Receive

The process of taking can be understood actively in the sense of taking possession of, passively in the sense of taking delivery. The two Gk. vbs. lambanō and dechomai correspond to these two operational directions. lambanō stresses primarily the active aspect of getting hold of, whereas dechomai emphasizes more the passive attitude of receiving. The meanings of the numerous compounds formed from both vbs. are frequently assimilated to one another, as are the meanings of the root words in figurative senses and contexts, and they are occasionally used synonymously. Both word-groups have a special significance in the NT through expressing particularly the complementary movements of faith in appropriation and acceptance.

δέχομαι	δέχομαι (dechomai), take, receive, accept; δεκτός (dektos), acceptable, welcome, agreeable, favourable; ἀποδέχομαι (apodechomai), admit; ἀποδοχή (apodoche), acceptance, approval; ἀπόδεκτος (apodektos), acceptable, pleasing; εὐπρόσδεκτος (euprosdektos), acceptable, pleasant, welcome; προσδέχομαι (prosdechomai), take up, receive, welcome, wait for, expect; δοχή (doche), reception, banquet; εἰσδέχομαι (eisdechomai), take in, receive, welcome.
----------------	---

CL 1. dechomai is used from Homer onwards, and is cognate with Lat. dexter, (on) the right hand. Its basic meaning is accept or receive (Homer, Il. 23, 647). Letters, presents, and offerings etc. are the principal objects. It can also be used more specifically in the sense of to receive words, i.e. to hear, understand (logon dechesthai, Eur., Medea 924), and to accept persons, i.e. offer hospitality (Xen., Oec. 5, 8). Man is generally the subject, who is able to accept things increasingly even to the point of enduring blows of fate (Homer, Il. 18, 115). More rarely the subject, in a religious context, is the godhead who receives sacrifices and prayers (Homer, Il. 2, 240). The corresponding noun doche means primarily a receptacle (Eur. and Plato), and then, figuratively, reception of people, a meal for guests (Plut.). The accompanying verbal adj. dektos (unattested before the NT) or dekteos (first used by Lucian) indicates, lit., that which one can accept, and then, generally, agreeable, welcome, favourable (cf. in the NT Lk. 4:19; 2 Cor. 6:2).

2. (a) The compound apodechomai, similarly attested since Homer, strengthens the positive significance of the simple vb. in the sense of welcoming, approving, agreeing, valuing (Polyb., 21, 35, 5; Philo, Abr. 90; Josephus, Ant. 9, 176). The common Hellenistic noun apodoche correspondingly means acceptance, approbation, approval (Polyb. 1, 5, 5; Josephus, Ant. 6, 347; cf. in the NT 1 Tim. 1:15; 4:9). The verbal adj. apodektos (as in Plut. Mor. 1061a; cf. 1 Tim. 2:3; 5:4 in the NT) has a similar meaning to dektos, viz. acceptable, agreeable, pleasing.

(b) prosdechomai (used since Homer) refers either to persons, meaning to admit someone to a place or into a community (Plato, Leg. 4, 708a; Josephus, Ant. 14, 285); or to things meaning to accept something (Xen., Hell. 7, 4, 2; and especially in the LXX). Further, as with ek- or apekdechomai, it has the meaning of to expect, or wait for (Eur., Alcestis 130; Soph., Phil. 123; cf. in this eschatological context the discussion of the compounds in → Hope, art. apokaradokia).

OT In the LXX the word-group occurs chiefly in prophetic, cultic, Wisdom and Apocryphal literature. dechomai is a rendering frequently of Heb. lāqah, take, (cf. also → lambanō); eisdechomai generally renders qābaš, gather, collect; prosdechomai predominantly renders rāšâh, be pleased; dektos nearly always renders rāšôn, goodwill; and dochē (right up to Dan. 5:1 LXX) always renders mišteh, meal for guests, feast.

1. (a) Apart from everyday usage (e.g. Gen. 33:10, accept gifts), dechomai denotes primarily the readiness to receive and accept the divine word (Deut. 33:3; Jer. 9:20) and action (e.g. paideia, discipline, correction, Zeph. 3:7). In Jer. and Zeph. it occurs in the negative declarations of judicial prosecution: Israel has not accepted Yahweh's correction (Jer. 2:30; 5:3; 7:28; Zeph. 3:2) and will therefore have to endure the divine → judgment (Jer. 25:28, the picture of the cup of wrath; cf. Hos. 4:11). dechomai thus obtains the further meaning of involuntary and necessary submission to disaster.

(b) eisdechomai, on the other hand, is found largely in prophetic announcements of salvation. Yahweh will again gather his outcast and scattered people and thus receive them again into fellowship with him (Hos. 8:10; Mic. 4:6; Jer. 23:3; Ezek. 20:34; Zeph. 3:19 f.; cf. 2 Cor. 6:17).

2. Occasionally dechomai, prosdechomai and dektos also occur in cultic priestly passages. The formulations ou (pros-)dechthēsetai/(pros-)dechthēsetai or alternatively ou dehton/dekton are the LXX translations of the so-called declaratory formulae: "it is not acceptable." By this means the priests made known the acceptance or rejection of an offering for Yahweh (Lev. 22:19–25). Yahweh is here represented as the receiver of the offering; but the decision, concerning the acceptance or rejection or repudiation of the gifts, in the mouth of the priest equally embraces a divine judgment as to whether the man who is bringing his offering is acceptable to Yahweh or not (cf. the pass. constructions in the LXX; see G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 260 f.; → Sacrifice).

3. In the Wisdom literature dechomai characterizes the intellectually and existentially open and receptive life of the pious man: the wise man accepts the words of wisdom (Prov. 4:10); he heeds commandments (Prov. 10:8); he accepts discipline (Prov. 16:17) and receives insight (Prov. 21:11). The word dektos, continuing the prophetic critique of → sacrifice (cf. Jer. 6:20), gains a non-cultic and ethical stamp in the Wisdom literature: "To do good is the beginning of the right way; that is more acceptable to God than to present sacrifices" (Prov. 16:7 LXX; cf. 15:8, 28 LXX [29]; Sir. 2:5; 3:17).

NT In the NT the dechomai word-group is found chiefly in the Synoptic Gospels (especially in Lk.) and in Paul who also uses the compounds frequently.

1. As in the whole ancient world, and particularly in Judaism, so in the NT hospitality plays a large rôle. Because of their wandering existence Jesus, Paul and the other apostles were very dependent on it. Lk. mentions from time to time the friendly reception which Jesus and Paul met with amongst the people and in the congregations (Lk. 8:40; Acts 18:27; 21:17, apodechomai), just as Jesus and Paul willingly accepted those who approached them (Lk. 8:11; Acts 28:30). Paul thanks his congregations for their hospitality (Gal. 4:14; 2 Cor. 7:15) and exhorts them to be ready to accept others as well (Col. 4:10). Being a Christian includes exhibiting this kind of humanitarianism.

2. (a) Acceptance of disciples and apostles is not however simply a matter of an unwritten humanitarian law. On the contrary, the messenger of Jesus represents his message and person: "He who receives you receives me, and he who receives me receives him that sent me" (Matt. 10:40; cf. Lk. 9:48; 10:16; Jn. 13:20). The apostles' continuation of Jesus' mission (cf. TDNT I 414; II 53 for the background of the office of the Shaliach [šālîḥ]) means that the hospitality they are offered stands for acceptance of Jesus and therefore acceptance of God.

But Christ does not only meet men in his messengers, he also confronts his church incognito in every unfortunate man in need of help: "Whoever receives one such child in my name receives me" (Mk. 9:37 par. Matt. 18:5; Lk. 9:48). God is to be accepted in the non-religious secular sphere of everyday life.

(b) It corresponds with this that dektos, apodektos and euprosdektos have lost their cultic content, as was already the case in the Wisdom literature. The offering that is pleasing to God now is the → sacrifice of the individual life for daily service in the world (Phil. 4:18; Rom. 12:1; 15:16). apodektos is used in 1 Tim. 2:3 and 5:4 to express what is acceptable to God: intercession for rulers who also come within the scope of God's salvation and the duty of children to parents. dektos occurs in Lk. 4:19 (cf. Isa. 41:2); Lk. 4:24; Acts 10:35; 2 Cor. 6:2 (cf. Isa. 49:8); and Phil. 4:18. euprosdektos is found at Rom. 15:16, 31; 2 Cor. 6:2; 8:12; 1 Pet. 2:5.

3. In the early Christian communities the phrase ton logon dechesthai, to receive the word, became a technical term for the believing acceptance of the → gospel (Lk. 8:13; Acts 8:14; 11:1; 17:11; 1 Thess. 1:6; 2:13). dechesthai is also linked with basileia tou theou, the → kingdom of God (Mk. 10:15 par. Lk. 18:17), euangelion, gospel (2 Cor. 11:4), charis, → grace (2 Cor. 6:1; cf. Rom. 5:17, where lambanō is used), and agapē tēs alētheias, love of the → truth (2 Thess. 2:10). The parallelism or synonymy of believing and receiving is evident from Acts 2:41, where the Western text D replaces apodexamenoi by pisteusantes. Faith is nothing but the affirmative acceptance of God's rule, as a child accepts a gift (Mk. 10:15 par. Lk. 18:17; cf. Matt. 18:3).

4. The Hellenistic word apodochē occurs only in a kerygmatic formula in 1 Tim. 1:15a: "The saying is sure and worthy of full acceptance that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" (cf. also 1 Tim. 4:9). There remains the application of Isa. 61:2 in Lk. 4:19: with the coming of Jesus the "acceptable" (dektos) time of salvation has begun (cf. 2 Cor. 6:2; cf. above 2 (b)).

H.-G. Link

λαμβάνω	λαμβάνω (lambanō), take, receive; ἀναλαμβάνω (analambanō), take up, take to oneself; ἀνάληψις (analēmpsis), reception; ἐπιλαμβάνομαι (epilambanomai), lay hold of, grasp, catch; καταλαμβάνω (katalambanō), seize, grasp, attain, make one's own, take possession; μεταλαμβάνω (metalambanō), receive a share; μετάληψις (metalēmpsis), sharing, receiving; παραλαμβάνω (paralambanō), take to oneself, take with or along, take over; προλαμβάνω (prolambanō), anticipate, take, get; προσλαμβάνω (proslambanō), take, receive or accept into one's society; πρόσληψις (proslēmpsis), admission, acceptance; ὑπολαμβάνω (hypolambanō), take up, think, assume, be of the opinion that; ἀπολαμβάνω (apolambanō), receive, get back.
---------	---

CL 1. lambanō, originally grasp, seize, is attested since Homer.

(a) It means to take or grasp. It can indicate both benevolent and hostile actions, and have as object either people or things; e.g. take a wife, collect taxes, accept a verdict, take a road, and fig. take courage. It is used with a material subject, as when, for example, fear or terror seizes men. lambanō may serve to enliven the style when used pleonastically.

(b) lambanō also means to receive, regularly with acc. of the thing; used to embrace all areas of life from simple things to spiritual benefit.

2. The compounds strengthen or enlarge the basic meaning. analambanō means receive up (on) high, to receive to oneself; the corresponding noun being analēmpsis, lifting or taking up. hypolambanō means take up from below; then take hold, take up, and finally mentally to apprehend, believe, hold an opinion. epilambanō means to lay hold of, occupy, and also assist; mid. obtain for oneself, hold firm, seize. katalambanō strengthens the original intention, meaning to seize, take a firm grip, attack; mid. seize for oneself; mental apprehension is basically appropriation and understanding. metalambanō takes the partitive gen. of the thing, and means to gain a share, get, receive; metalēmpsis denotes participation, acceptance. In prolambanō the temporal significance of pro is dominant; it means take in advance, forestall. proslambanō allows a slight reminder of the prepositional pros, and means to take in addition, draw in; mid. take aside, admit. The corresponding noun is proslēmpsis, admission, acceptance. paralambanō stands with the acc. of person or thing, and means to draw someone to oneself, take over an office or a thing.

OT 1. In secular speech lambanō and its compounds are widely attested.

In the LXX (chiefly for the Heb. lāqah, and more rarely nāsā') the act. meaning of take dominates: e.g. take the sword (Gen. 34:25), take a wife (Gen. 4:19). It has a material subject in Exod. 15:15: "trembling seizes them." The pass. meaning of receive is rarer: e.g. receive presents, take bribes (1 Sam. 8:3), receive an office or reward (Ps. 109[108]:8; Prov. 11:21).

2. The following compounds may be mentioned. analambanō is used regularly in the LXX with personal or material objects. It is theologically significant in the aorist pass. for the translation of Enoch (Sir. 49:14) and of Elijah (2 Ki. 2:11; Sir. 48:9; 1 Macc. 2:58). The LXX uses epilambanō in its basic meaning of holding or taking hold in 2 Sam. 13:11; Isa. 3:6; Jer. 31:32; Zech. 14:13. katalambanō is used in the LXX to describe God's holding grip, and men's. God's → hand takes hold of the world (Isa. 10:14). He traps men (Job 5:13), and comprehends the incomprehensible (Job 34:24). Man asks how he is to conceive of God and lay hold of his righteousness and wisdom, i.e. make it his possession (Sir. 15:1; 27:8). The powers of destruction also clutch at man and attack him (Gen. 19:19; Num. 32:33). proslambanō (act. form only in Wis. 17:10) denotes the way in which God draws his people or elect out of danger and destitution to himself (Pss. 18[17]:17; 27[26]:10; 65[64]:5; 73[72]:24; 1 Sam. 12:12).

3. paralambanō has a distinct meaning in Hellenism and in Judaism. It means to receive, and indicates the way one takes over a tradition, whether it is the teaching and training of a philosopher, or the mysteries and rites of the mystery religions. In Judaism, tradition limited itself to the Torah and its exegesis (cf. Mk. 7:4). The technical term for the receiving of tradition is qibbēl. The rabbis, too, passed on certain subject matter in teaching (cf. SB I 579; Ḥagigah 2:1) under conditions of strict secrecy in order to prevent misunderstandings amongst the religiously impure.

NT 1. In the NT lambanō is attested 258 times; it is found to a conspicuous degree in Matt. (53 times), John (46 times) and Rev. (23 times), whereas the whole Pauline corpus contains only 34 occurrences of the word.

(a) lambanō has a broad range of meaning: to take (in the more active sense), e.g. bread, lamps, the tithe, and (fig.) to take one's cross upon oneself (Matt. 10:38), or take the form of a servant (Phil. 2:7). It also means to remove or take possession of, e.g. remove money (Matt. 28:15), diseases (Matt. 8:17, cf. Isa. 53:4), a crown (Rev. 3:11), peace from the earth (Rev. 6:4). In a theological context Jesus has the power to take his life back again (Jn. 10:18). The enemy also has the ability to attack people's lives (cf. Matt. 21:35 ff. in context) or to seize the sick (Lk. 9:39). Emotions take control of men (Lk. 5:26; 7:16). Further, lambanō has the sense of admit: to admit someone into the house; with a personal object, the important sense of receiving Jesus (Jn. 1:12; 5:43; 13:20), and, connected with that, receiving his words (Jn. 12:48; 17:8; Mk. 4:16).

(b) Secondly, lambanō means to receive (in the more passive sense): e.g. a bite, money, alms. It is important with theological objects: eternal life (Mk. 10:30), the Spirit (Jn. 7:39), grace (Rom. 1:5), condemnation (Mk. 12:40), forgiveness (Acts 10:43), mercy (Heb. 4:16). Finally lambanō is used as a circumlocution for the pass.; e.g. receive edification, be edified (1 Cor. 14:5).

(c) lambanō is theologically significant in its meaning of receive. It corresponds with God's giving (didonai): God gives – man receives.

(i) Jesus himself lives by receiving: he has received his commission, the Spirit, power (Jn. 10:18; Acts 2:33; Rev. 2:28). He is the gift of God and lives by receiving. In taking the form of a servant (Phil. 2:7) and taking away our infirmities (cf. Matt. 8:17 with reference to Isa. 53), he takes upon himself the death of a sinner and fulfils the commission which he has received from the Father (Jn. 10:18). So too in resurrection and exaltation: the crucified One is worthy to receive "power and wealth and wisdom and might and honour and glory and blessing" (Rev. 5:12). Even the exalted One remains the receiving One.

(ii) Only when a man receives, does he find himself and stand within the God-given order and plan which Jesus Christ reveals. For the man who hears the witness of Jesus, the acceptance of that word decides over life and death. At this point, Jn. distinguishes the various objects which are received, accepted or laid hold of. He who receives the martyria, the witness of Jesus, sets his seal to this “that God is true” (Jn. 3:33). By his acceptance of the word he attests the truth of God and lives by it. He who accepts the rhēmata, the words, of Jesus gains knowledge of the word of revelation: Jesus comes from God and receives his life from God (Jn. 17:8; cf. 1 Cor. 2:12). So Jesus himself, who is the rhēma theou, the Word of God, can become the object of believing acceptance. Whoever receives him has a share of his inexhaustible grace and receives the Holy Spirit (Jn. 1:16; 7:39; 20:22). Whoever does not accept him, i.e. does not recognize or acknowledge him, has a judge (Jn. 12:48). That same word of Jesus will be his judge on the last day.

(iii) For Paul lambanō means sharing in the fulfilment of the promise in Christ (Gal. 3:14), receiving the Spirit (Rom. 8:15), receiving grace and the gift of righteousness (Rom. 5:17), just as he himself received his apostleship as an especial token of God’s grace (Rom. 1:5). Though poor in God’s sight, the man who receives is exceedingly rich (1 Cor. 4:7); for when he accepts, he receives eschatological salvation, fellowship with Christ and life in the future world (Phil. 3:12 ff.).

2. The compounds analambanō and hypolambanō develop the aspect of taking up.

(a) analambanō means to take with or take up, to bring, or take someone on board (2 Tim. 4:11; Acts 20:13 f.). Used fig. in Eph. 6:13 – “take up the whole armour of God” – it is a powerful picture of the active fight of the believer against the powers of darkness (cf. also v. 16; → War). analambanō in the aorist pass. is used of the ascension of the resurrected One, which is attested in the concise formula, he “was taken up” (analemphtheis, Acts 1:11; anēlemphtē, Acts 1:2, 22; 1 Tim. 3:16). The goal of the taking up is heaven, the sphere of God’s glory (1 Tim. 3:16). There is a similarly brief formulation of the ascension of Christ without any indication of place in the longer ending of Mk. which describes the status of the risen Christ who is seated at the right hand of God (Mk. 16:19; → Hand, art. dexia). The vb. also occurs at Acts 7:43; 10:16; 20:13 f., 23:31; 2 Tim. 4:11.

analempsis, lifting up high, being taken up, is found in the NT only in Lk. 9:51 and is generally interpreted of Christ’s ascension, but analempsis can also mean death, decease (Arndt, 56; cf. intertestamental literature, e.g. Pss. Sol. 4, 18). Both are implicated in the NT expectation of Jesus’ death, since the death includes the exaltation of the Lord.

(b) hypolambanō occurs 5 times in the NT. Acts 1:9: “a cloud took him out of their sight.” This taking suggests a taking upwards from below, lifting up in the sense of hiding or carrying away. 3 Jn. 8 exhorts that strangers are to be taken up, i.e. hospitably welcomed and cared for. When extended to mental processes hypolambanō approximates to the Eng. “to pick up someone’s words” (Lk. 10:30). It can also express supposition: “These men are not drunk, as you imagine” (Acts 2:15 NEB; cf. Lk. 7:43).

3. The compounds epilambanō and katalambanō intensify the original meaning of the word and mean seize.

(a) epilambanō denotes both violent apprehension and trustful holding of the hand. Paul is seized by his opponents (Acts 17:19; cf. 9:27; 16:19; 18:17; 21:30, 33; 23:19; Lk. 23:26). Fig. epilambanō means to catch somebody out in their speech; thus Jesus’ opponents attempted to catch him out in his words (Lk. 20:20). Jesus himself touched the blind, the children, the man with dropsy (Mk. 8:23; Lk. 9:47;

14:4), and stretched out his hand to Peter as he began to sink (Matt. 14:31) in order to help him. In the Synoptics the use of epilambanō is pointed and striking: it denotes both the scheming behaviour of Jesus' opponents and also the love of the Lord as he turns to give help to the sick and lost.

Paul finds epilambanō the right word for characterizing the movement of faith. It is directed to eternal life: "take hold of eternal life" (1 Tim. 6:12). epi states the goal; lambanō denotes the intensity of the act of faith. It also occurs at Heb. 2:16; 8:9. anepilēptos means irreproachable (1 Tim. 3:2; 5:7) and is a qualification for bishops and church members in their care of widows.

(b) katalambanō is used in the NT to designate the attack of evil powers, and also the grip of Christ on men. The lad with epilepsy was attacked by a dumb spirit and dashed to the ground (Mk. 9:18). The → darkness which has not "received" the → light, i.e. has neither accepted nor comprehended Christ (Jn. 1:5, cf. v. 11), overtakes men when they do not have Christ (Jn. 12:35). Paul warns his readers against a false reliance on their faith, since the Day of the Lord will "surprise you like a thief" (1 Thess. 5:4). On the positive side, katalambanō marks the hold of Christ on a believer. Paul has been apprehended by Jesus Christ; he is the possession of Christ and therefore, in the fight of faith, is stretching out towards the goal of the high calling (Phil. 3:12 f.). Only someone who has been laid hold of strives to obtain the victor's imperishable → crown of eternal life (1 Cor. 9:24). The mid. katalambanomai (of mental or spiritual comprehension or perception) denotes grasping truth, by which one may recognize God's hidden actions (Acts 4:13; 10:34; 25:25). The vb. also occurs at Rom. 9:30 (of the Gentiles attaining righteousness, even though they did not pursue it), and Eph. 3:18 (of the believer comprehending the extent of God's love).

4. metalambanō and metalēmpsis (only in 1 Tim. 4:3) indicate participation in physical and spiritual benefits. Food is taken and eaten (Acts 2:46; 27:33; cf. 2 Tim. 2:6). God created it "to be received with thanksgiving" (1 Tim. 4:3). The earth "receives a blessing from God" (Heb. 6:7). God waits for the Yes which responds to his offer, for the obedience and thankfulness which respond to the giver and his gifts. Heb. 6:4 ff. includes the warning that a blessing which has been received is forfeited for ever by an act of conscious apostasy from Christ. Every kind of discipline serves towards our participation in God's holiness (Heb. 12:10). Only in Acts 24:25 is metalambanō followed by the acc. kairon, meaning "when I find a convenient occasion" or "when I have an opportunity."

5. In prolambanō the temporal significance of pro is retained, "she [the woman] is beforehand with anointing my body for burial" (Mk. 14:8, NEB), i.e. she has anointed it in advance. The woman's loving action is a prophetic sign of his imminent death and a substitute for the anointing of the body, as yet not carried out. 1 Cor. 11:21 speaks of individuals going ahead with their own meals (to idion deipnon prolambanei) at the Lord's Supper; their actions are unbrotherly and unworthy, for they are doing in advance on their own what all should do together. In Gal. 6:1 Paul encourages clemency towards a sinner, if he "is overtaken in any trespass." Here prolēmpthē suggests in the pro of the initial syllable that the sinner has been forcibly laid hold of by sin before he was able to reflect. Paul therefore requests gentleness and brotherly assistance.

6. proslambanō is found in the NT only in the mid. It means to take along (Acts 17:5), take (of food, Acts 27:33, 36), and to take aside, introducing an intense personal conversation. “Peter took him to one side” (Mk. 8:32; cf. Matt. 16:22; Acts 18:26). proslambanō has a theological importance when meaning “admit into fellowship.” “God has welcomed him”, i.e. the one who is weak in faith (Rom. 14:3). “Welcome one another . . . as Christ has welcomed you” (Rom. 15:7). Paul exhorts the Romans to seek out those who have a weak faith, because strong and weak are equally accepted into fellowship with God through Christ’s death. Even for Jews, who by their rejection of Christ are rejected from salvation, Paul awaits proslēmpsis, acceptance by God: “For if their rejection means the reconciliation of the world, what will their acceptance [proslēmpsis] mean but life from the dead?” (Rom. 11:15). Because he in himself experienced that God accepted him and conferred new life on him, he connects the acceptance of his own people inextricably with the gift of eternal life.

7. In the Gospels and Acts paralambanō is frequently followed by the acc. of person, i.e. take someone with oneself, to choose out from a large number, offer fellowship to a chosen one or introduce a particular plan. Thus Jesus took to himself three disciples in order to reveal himself to them (Matt. 17:1; 20:17; 26:37; cf. Mk. 5:40). He “came to his own home and his own people received him not” (Jn. 1:11; on this interpretation → Possessions, art. peripoiemai NT 3). But for believers there stands the promise: “I will take you to myself that where I am you may be also” (Jn. 14:3; cf. Matt. 24:40).

Paul further uses paralambanō to denote the acceptance of mental and spiritual benefits, and refers the actual acceptance: (i) to teaching and ethical traditions which he has received, amongst which may be numbered the words of institution of 1 Cor. 11:23 and the paraklēsis of Phil. 4:9 (cf. 1 Thess. 4:1; 2 Thess. 3:6); (ii) to “the Word of God which you heard from us” (1 Thess. 2:13); to the “gospel” which Paul according to 1 Cor. 15:3 received; and, according to Col. 2:6, to “Christ Jesus” the Lord; (iii) to the personal revelation of Jesus Christ which Paul received outside Damascus; the gen. “of Jesus Christ” designates him as both content and mediator of the revelation.

8. apolambanō means: (i) to receive (adoption, Gal. 4:5; → Child, art. hyios NT 2 (a) on hyiothesia; the good things in life, Lk. 16:25; cf. J. D. M. Derrett, “Dives and Lazarus and the Preceding Sayings”, in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 78–99; material things, Lk. 18:30 v.l.; rewards and punishments, Lk. 23:41; Rom. 1:27; Col. 3:24; 2 Jn. 8); (ii) receive in return, get back (the same amount, Lk. 6:34; the prodigal son, Lk. 15:27); (iii) take aside (Mk. 7:33); (iv) welcome (3 Jn. 8 v.l.).

B. Siede

- (a). G. Delling, lambanō etc., TDNT IV 5–15; W. Grundmann, dechomai etc., TDNT II 50–59.
 (b). K. Wegenast, Das Traditionsverständnis bei Paulus und in den Deuteropaulinen, WMANT 8, 1962.

Tax, Tax Collector

λογεία

λογεία (logeia), collection (of money), tax.

CL The use of logeia in the pre-Christian era is not attested apart from occurrences in the papyri and inscriptions from the 3rd century B.C. on.

NT The two NT examples of logeia are found in 1 Cor. 16:1–2. In answer to a question concerning the collection for the Jerusalem saints that had been posed by the Corinthians in their letter to Paul, the apostle repeats instructions he had already given to the Galatian churches (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4). Every Sunday each believer was privately to set aside and store up some money in proportion to his gains of the previous week, so that collections would not be needed after Paul arrived.

While it is not impossible that some Jerusalem Christians regarded this collection as a semi-formal levy on Gentile Christians that was the rightful due of the mother-church of Christendom, Paul himself promoted it as an act of service to God (2 Cor. 9:12–13) that would honour Christ (2 Cor. 8:19) and as a spontaneous gesture of brotherly love (cf. Rom. 12:13; 13:8; 15:31; 1 Cor. 16:3; 2 Cor. 9:1, 5; Gal. 6:10) that called for generous, voluntary contributions (2 Cor. 8:7, 24; 9:5–14; eu-logia in 9:5 may be a play on words), although he did regard it as a tangible expression by Gentile believers of their spiritual indebtedness to the church at Jerusalem (Rom. 15:19, 27; cf. 1 Cor. 9:11).

M. J. Harris

στατήρ	στατήρ (staiēr), stater, a silver coin worth four drachmas; δίδραχμον (didrachmon), a double drachma, two-drachma piece, worth about half a shekel among the Jews; κῆνσος (kēnsos), tax, poll-tax; τελέω (teleō), pay; τέλος (telos), tax, customs duties (for other meanings of teleō and telos → Goal); φόρος (phoros), tax, tribute.
--------	--

OT According to Exod. 30:11–16, when the Israelites were subjected to a compulsory census in the wilderness, Moses commanded each man to pay half a shekel as ransom money to prevent the plague spreading among the people. Before the exile there were no real coins; metals were fashioned into lumps of recognized weights. The Heb. šeqel derives from a root meaning to weigh, and means a pound. Various forms are mentioned (e.g. the king's weight, 2 Sam. 14:26; the shekel of the sanctuary, Lev. 5:15; cf. Exod. 30:13; 38:26). The money raised by the levy was spent on the sanctuary (Exod. 30:16; 38:24 ff.). During the building of the first temple Solomon raised heavy taxes which were resented (1 Ki. 12:4). 2 Ki. 12:10 describes a collecting box for the upkeep of the temple, but 2 Chr. 24:6, 9 speaks of the tax levied by Moses as something that was to be perpetuated. Neh. 10:32 speaks of it as a third of a shekel, but it was evidently raised to half a shekel later. All Israelites over twenty had to pay, except for women and slaves (though at Elephantine women apparently also paid it). Gentiles and Samaritans were excluded. It was paid as long as the temple stood. The Romans evidently recognized it (cf. Cicero, Pro Flacco 28; Josephus, Ant. 16, 6, 2 and 4 f.). Jews of the Diaspora contributed, and the bullion trains required strong protection (Philo, Spec. Leg. 1, 77 ff.; Josephus, Ant. 18, 9, 1). The tax is dealt with in the Mishnah tractate Shekalim. After the destruction of the temple, Vespasian decreed that the tax should still be paid, not to the Jewish temple, but to Jupiter Capitolinus (Josephus, War 7, 6, 6). It is generally assumed that it ceased in the time of Nerva (c. A.D. 96).

NT 1. The Temple Tax and the Coin in the Fish's Mouth. The following story is recorded by Matt.: "When they came to Capernaum the collectors of the half-shekel tax [hoi ta didrachma lambanontes] went up to Peter and said, 'Does not your teacher pay the tax [ou telei ta didrachma]?' He said, 'Yes.' And when he came home, Jesus spoke to him first saying, 'What do you think, Simon? From whom do kings of the earth take toll or tribute [lambanousin telē ē kēnson]?' From their sons or from others?' And when he said, 'From others,' Jesus said to him, 'Then the sons are free. However, not to give offence to them, go to the sea and cast a hook, and take the first fish that comes up, and when you open its mouth you will find a shekel [statēra]; take that and give it to them for me and for yourself'" (Matt. 17:24–27).

H. Montefiore sees a Sitz im Leben for this story in the situation between A.D. 70 and A.D. 96 when the church was confronted by the question of whether to pay the tax to Jupiter Capitolinus, since Christians were often thought of as a Jewish sect and therefore liable to the tax ("Jesus and the Temple Tax", NTS 11, 1964–65, 60–71, see especially 64 f.). For Matt.'s readers Jesus' words would have been understood as a comparison of the pagan tax with portoria and poll-tax (telē ē kēnson), payable by foreigners but not by Roman citizens. However, Montefiore rejects the suggestion that the story was specially invented for this situation. On the other hand, he sees parallels to the coin in the fish's mouth in the Hellenistic story of Polycrates' ring (Hdt., 3, 41 f.), rabbinic folk tales of a gem representing all the wealth of a man lost at sea and found again in a fish (Shabbath 119a), and a gem found in a fish by a poor tailor on the day of atonement (Ber. R. II on Gen. 2:3). He suggests that the original saying of Jesus advised payment of the tax in order to avoid offence. In particular, he thinks that Jesus's position cut across the debate between the Pharisees and the Sadducees over the use of revenue for the temple. To refuse the temple tax would give the impression that Jesus disapproved of all temple worship. "What the Pharisees demanded as a legal due, Jesus gave as a free-will offering of the heart" (op. cit., 71). J. M. Allegro has argued that the Essenes maintained the same attitude as Jesus ("An Unpublished Fragment of Essene Halakhah [4Q Ordinances]", JSS 6, 1961, 71 ff.).

For further discussion of the background see J. D. M. Derrett, "Peter's Penny", (NovT 6, 1963, 1–15; reprinted in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 247–65). Derrett claims that Peter could have claimed exemption on the grounds that Jesus and the disciples were fully employed in God's service (cf. op. cit., 250 ff. for rabbinic discussions). The matter would then have been referred to Jerusalem for a ruling. On the other hand, refusal to pay would bring Jesus into direct conflict with the authorities. The collectors were not rabbis who could decide for themselves on the legality of the situation. Although Jesus could claim to be not liable to the tax, he was obliged by the Torah to save the collectors from the sin of compelling him to supply the half-shekel. "Therefore it would be a sin to refuse to pay the said half-shekel!" (op. cit., 257). Jesus was concerned for the moral welfare of the collectors, even though he knew that the tax was not due. He could readily have ordered payment from the funds given to the disciples, but these had been given for their maintenance. It would thus have been wrong to misappropriate the funds in order to pay the tax.

The dilemma is resolved by finding the lost stater in the fish's mouth. The coin in question would be a Tyrian shekel which was sufficient for a poor man's payment for himself and his friend. Coins are not identifiable, when found singly. In Jewish law the finder would be allowed to keep the coin; for when an owner had no hope of recovery of an item the property was deemed to be lost (Baba Kamma 10:2; cf. op. cit., 258). "The collectors were doubtless as well satisfied with this coin as they would have been by a coin obtained from a patron: but charity money had not been used, and the important admission had not been made. The earthly king would provide that his servants were not liable to customs duty; but the heavenly king in this case, caring for the souls of the collectors, would provide for the payment of the half-shekel. God enabled the need to be met, but he did not admit the liability to the due as such" (ibid.).

The view has been put forward that Jesus' instructions to Peter were a figurative way of telling him to catch a fish and use the money for payment of the tax (cf. F. V. Filson, The Gospel According to St. Matthew, BNTC, 1960, 196). C. H. Dodd considers that the story was originally a pronouncement story of a parabolic kind which in the course of time was transformed into a miracle story (Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel, 1963, 227). But Derrett prefers to see the whole episode as a historical event. The fish in question would be the cat-fish, Clarias lazera, known to the Greeks as korakinos (Josephus, War 3, 10, 8 [519 f.]; cf. C. Kopp, The Holy Places of the Gospels, 1963, 174 ff.). It is an omnivorous predator, liking shallow water and scavenging around landing-places. It would be attracted by a bright disc which could easily have stuck in the back of its throat. A scaleless fish, it was prohibited as food by the law, and no Jew would have dreamt of catching it for food. "The vision of the fisherman Peter rushing to fetch up a Clarias with a hook is so incongruous that its genuineness seems certified" (op. cit., 259).

If Derrett is correct, we need not look for a Sitz im Leben for the story in the life of the later church. It is already present in the life and ministry of Jesus, although it would naturally be of interest to the later church in providing guidance for its own relations vis-à-vis the Jews and the Romans. It is doubtful, therefore whether the story can be used, as G. D. Kilpatrick thinks, to determine the date of Matthew (The Origins of the Gospel According to St. Matthew, 1946, 42 f., 129). In the context of Matt. the story illustrates the distinction drawn by Jesus already in his earthly ministry between his followers as the true people of God and the Jewish nation. The disciples are the true sons of God who do not need to pay tribute to aliens. But to avoid giving offence the tax is paid.

2. The Question concerning Tribute to Caesar. On this question which is recorded in Matt. 22:15–22 par. Mk. 12:13–17, Lk. 20:20–26 → Caesar, art. Kaisar (cf. also for discussion of the background J. D. M. Derrett, "Render to Caesar . . .", Law in the New Testament, 1970, 313–38). Here the word kēnsos, tax, poll-tax, is used in Matt. 22:17, 19 and Mk. 12:14; Lk. uses phoros with the same meaning (Lk. 20:22; cf. 23:2).

3. Paul. In Rom. 13:6 f. Paul adopts the same attitude as Jesus with regard to payment of taxes to the Roman state: "For the same reason you must also pay taxes [phorous teleite], for the authorities are ministers of God, attending to this very thing. Pay all of them their dues [apodote pasin tas opheilas], taxes to whom taxes are due, revenue to whom revenue is due [tō ton phoron ton phoron, tō to telos to telos], respect to whom respect is due, honour to whom honour is due.” The premises of Paul’s position are that “there is no authority except from God, and those that exist have been instituted by God” (Rom. 13:1; cf. 1 Pet. 2:13 ff.; → Might, art. exousia NT), that these have been instituted for the well-being of men (vv. 2 ff.), and therefore to resist what God has appointed is to resist God and thus provoke divine wrath and defile one’s own → conscience (vv. 4 f.). Moreover, in submitting and giving, one is actually fulfilling the law (vv. 8 ff.). For “love is the fulfilling of the law” (v. 10). By implication this means that the Christian (whether he be a Gentile or a Jewish Christian) is not breaking the law by submitting to an alien, pagan authority. Rather, the essential meaning of the law (which is concerned with love) requires him to submit in all matters which do not contravene the will of God. Paul’s use of leitourgoi, “ministers”, for the authorities in v. 6 has sacred overtones (cf. M. Black, Romans, New Century Bible, 1973, 161). Black sees in the closing paraenetic chapters of Rom. several versions of the words of Jesus which Paul has adapted and interpreted (cf. also Rom. 12:14 with Matt. 5:44 par. Lk. 6:28; Rom. 12:17, 21; 13:9 with Matt. 19:18 par. Mk. 10:19; Lk. 18:20; ibid.); → Serve, art. leitourgeō.

C. Brown

τελώνιον

τελώνιον (telōnion), customs house, tax office; τελώνης (telōnēs), farmer of taxes, tax collector; ἀρχιτελώνης (architelōnēs), chief tax collector; τέλος (telos), toll, customs duty, revenue; τελέω (teleō), to pay what is owed (for other meanings of telos and teleō → Goal).

CL The telōnēs, tax farmer, was a notorious figure at Athens from the time of Aristophanes, and is frequently quoted in reproach: “All are tax collectors, all are robbers” (Xen.). The system of farming out sources of government revenue from taxes, tolls, property, land, mines, etc., goes back to the Gk. city states. Their polis constitutions did not provide for long-term civil servants. But by the tax-farming system the city was guaranteed a known income without the need for a complex financial administration. The privilege of farming taxes was auctioned annually. The successful individual or group, who had to have acceptable backers underwriting prompt payment, then had to pay a first instalment before being allowed to collect dues from the public. For the actual collection the tax farmers used employees, who in turn had to extract a sum over and above that required by their masters in order to provide an income for themselves. From the public’s point of view it was a hateful system, all too easily open to abuse.

A somewhat similar system was operated by the Romans. The corresponding Latin term publicani, state contractors, refers to the leading officers, chiefly belonging to the equestrian order, who farmed the Roman revenue (publicum habebant), and paid into the public treasury (in publicum) a certain definite sum contracted with the government. These publicani, who were all wealthy individuals, sublet the tax-collecting to agents (magistri), and the agents engaged local officials (portitores) to collect the dues. It was these portitores who are referred to in the NT as telōnai.

The telōnai needed to belong to the native population, to be aware of local ways and to run less risk of being deceived. Indeed they themselves almost invariably succeeded in deceiving and fleecing the tax-paying public. By the time Augustus came to power, the publicani had by their greed so damaged state and provincial finances that the emperor and his successors had to re-organize the tax system. Tax-farming cartels were finally abolished in the 2nd cent. A.D.

telōnion means a custom house, tax office (Posidippus), and by the time of Strabo, customs duty. telos, which usually means end, fulfilment (→ Goal), can also denote duty for the state, payment of toll or tax (Plato). teleō (or teleiōō) means to carry out (instructions, a sacrifice, a practice), execute a plan; pay what one owes, especially in dues and taxes (Hdt.); pass., to be subject to tax or tribute (Dem.); hence, since in many Gk. cities the citizens were distributed into classes according to their taxable property, to be in a certain social class.

OT In the LXX telos, when meaning tax, tribute, toll, translates meḳes, tax collected for Yahweh from war booty (Num. 31:28, 37–41). telos once renders miḳ'sâh, the redemption price of a field in the year of jubilee (Lev. 27:23), and once mas, general tribute imposed by king Ahasuerus (Est. 10:1). telōneō, to impose taxes, occurs in 1 Macc. 13:39, of tolls exacted from the Jews by the Syrians. telos, in the sense of indirect tax, customs duty, is found in 1 Macc. 10:31, 11:35. Josephus uses telos with this meaning in Ant. 12, 141, and teleō, in reference to payment of tribute, in Ant. 10, 2, 155; but teleō does not appear in the LXX with the meaning of render or pay.

The first reference to tax farming in Palestine dates from the time of Ptolemy II Philadelphus in the 3rd cent. B.C. The collecting of taxes from the Jews during the Seleucid period is narrated by Josephus (Ant. 12, 138–53; 13, 49–57). The capture of Jerusalem by Pompey in 63 B.C. led to the imposition of Roman taxation. But in 30 B.C. Augustus remitted the tribute due and Herod the Great was allowed to control his own finances, collecting taxes directly through royal slaves.

Jewish sources distinguish two classes of tax officials, those responsible for income tax and poll tax (Josephus, Ant. 18, 4), and customs officers, who were stationed at bridges and canals, and on state roads. The Romans built fine bridges, it was said, simply in order to collect tolls (Shabbath 33b). During the time of Roman rule, taxation remained constant, but at a harsh level. The province of Judea alone had to find 600 talents (Ant. 17, 320; War 2, 97). Tacitus mentions that in A.D. 17 the provinces of Syria and Judea begged for a reduction in taxes. There was some relief from A.D. 37 when the governor Vitellius remitted the market duty on crops (Ant. 18, 90). But it was indicative of public feeling that during the siege of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 the refusal to pay taxes was seriously reckoned to be the only cause of the revolt (War 5, 405).

A Jew entering the customs service cut himself off from decent society. He was disqualified from being a judge or even a witness in court, and excommunicated from the synagogue. The members of his family were considered to be equally tarnished (Sanhedrin 25b). Because of their exactions and extortions, customs officials were in the same legal category as murderers and robbers (Baba Kamma 113a), thieves (Tohoroth 7:6), the robbers and money-changers (Derek 'eres 2), and counted among the 'am hā-'āres, the common herd (Bekhoroth 30b). Money handled by tax collectors was tainted and could not be used, even for charity (Baba Kamma 10:1), for to touch the wealth of a man who obtains it unlawfully is to share his guilt.

NT The telōnai are mentioned only in the Synoptic Gospels. They themselves are not the holders of the tax-farming contracts, who were usually foreigners, but subordinates hired from the native population. (dēmosiōnēs, which normally represents the Latin publicanus, does not occur in the NT.)

Herod Antipas adopted the farming system for Galilee and Perea. As an imperial province, Judea paid taxes not through tax farmers but direct to the imperial treasury (Mk. 12:14). The responsibility for collection was imposed upon the Sanhedrin, under the supervision of the procurator. Arrears were collected by force by Roman officials.

The prevailing method of tax collection afforded collectors many opportunities to exercise greed and unfairness. For centuries force and fraud had been constantly associated with the revenue system of Palestine (Nedarim 3:4). Hence telōnai were hated and despised as a class. Strict Jews were further offended by the fact that the tax collector was rendered unclean through continual contact with Gentiles, and because his work involved breaking the sabbath. Contemporary public opinion is accurately reflected in the disagreeable associations expressed in the NT: telōnai are linked with sinners (Matt. 9:10), heathen Gentiles (Matt. 18:17), harlots (Matt. 21:31), and extortioners, imposters, and adulterers (Lk. 18:11).

Jesus teaches that for Christians to fail to include their enemies and persecutors in their love is to leave themselves on no higher a moral and spiritual plane than the most despised classes. In the eyes of Jews, these would be specifically tax collectors and ethnikoi, heathen Gentiles (Matt. 5:46 f.). Luke, writing to a wider audience, has the more general term hamartōloi, sinners (Lk. 6:33).

Jesus' summons to a tax collector to join him (Matt. 9:9) must have outraged and bewildered public opinion. For Matthew himself (called Levi by Mark and Luke) the call of Jesus entailed great sacrifice. He left everything (Lk. 5:28). Fishermen could return to their boats (Jn. 21:3), but a telōnēs who gave up his occupation had no prospect of another job, even with the skills that he undoubtedly possessed. Of necessity a tax collector would be versed in several languages, experienced in keeping records, and probably know shorthand (G. Milligan, The New Testament Documents, 1913, 241–7). A system of shorthand invented by Marcus Tullius Tiro, a freedman of Cicero, in 63 B.C. was widely used.

The toll house (telōnion) at Capernaum was an important centre commanding both the sea route from east and north of the lake and also the great land road, the way of the sea (Matt. 4:15), leading from Damascus to the Mediterranean coast. Custom would thus be levied on all goods carried by ship or caravan. In Matthew's case the duty would be collected not on behalf of the Roman government but for the tetrarch Herod Antipas. This fact would however not make his calling or class any the less unpopular. Two inscriptions from the Asian cities of Magnesia and Ephesus mention "those concerned with the toll on fish" (A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, 1963⁶, 302), and it is possible that a toll on catches of fish was collected at Capernaum as well. If so, Matthew would have known the fishermen-disciples, and probably Jesus himself, who used Capernaum as his headquarters. This would explain Matthew's immediate and total response to Jesus' call to discipleship.

Jesus' presence at the farewell banquet Matthew arranged for his old associates (Lk. 5:29) inevitably drew criticism from the scribes and Pharisees. In answer to the accusation that by eating with people who were excommunicate he was defiling himself, Jesus uses a current proverb to equate tax collectors with the sick. He associates with these people, not for his own sake (because, unlike the Pharisees, they were sympathetic to him and receptive to his message), nor even as his enemies might hint because birds of a feather flock together. Just as a doctor has to get near to his patients in order to treat them, so Jesus is prepared to share the company of the outcasts of society, for he knows that they are spiritually sick (Matt. 9:12; Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:31).

Apart from the special call to Matthew, Jesus does not suggest that tax collectors should give up their profession. Neither did John the Baptist. In Lk. 3:12 f. John advises tax collectors to carry out their work fairly, neither abusing their position nor extorting excessive sums of money for their own enrichment. The employment is in itself lawful and necessary for the financing of government. But let those engaged in it be honest and just in their duties.

Jesus speaks of the refusal of the Pharisees to respond either to the Baptist or to himself, with their very different approaches. John was criticized for his asceticism and Jesus for exuberance in the company of tax collectors and sinners (Matt. 11:19; Lk. 7:29, 34). Often the spiritual response of the despised put their religious betters to shame (Matt. 8:2, 8 f.; 9:9–13; 15:28; 21:32), but as a type tax collectors could still be referred to as those who were uninterested in spiritual matters. If an offending Christian brother refuses to heed the local congregation, he is to be regarded as putting himself outside the religious community, i.e. joining the same class as Gentiles and tax collectors (Matt. 18:17).

Light is thrown on the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18:23–35) when it is seen against the background of tax farming. The two debtors and the other servants are ministers (douloi) of the king, and engaged in the collection of taxes. The vast sum due to the king from the first minister is not incredible or hyperbolic, as is often assumed: the tax-farmer Joseph son of Tobias contracted for 16,000 talents (Josephus, Ant. 12, 176). The minister's plea for time is genuine, and the king releases him from the immediate liability. Then, instead of carrying over the debt to the next year, thus doubling the amount due and probably incurring an intolerable burden for his tax-paying subjects, the king wisely cancels the debt. When later the same minister's own hard-heartedness is exposed, the king delivers him to the torturers (basanistēs), who by severe examination would extract information from him about all his personal assets. Meanwhile his relations, friends, and dependants would do all in their power to raise funds to secure his release, or his blood would be upon their heads. See J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the New Testament, 1970, 32–47.

Since architelōnēs is found only once (Lk. 19:2), Zacchaeus' official position is not clear. Probably he was the equivalent of the Roman magister, the intermediary between the portitores and the publicani. Jericho was a likely post for a tax officer of some standing, and one who would inevitably become rich. The city was an important customs station at the main ford of the Jordan, some 17 miles from Jerusalem on the major route between Judea and lands east of the river. Besides controlling an extensive carrying trade, Jericho produced and exported costly balsams. Zacchaeus' undertaking to recompense anyone he had defrauded (Lk. 19:8) need not imply his own use of extortion or menaces. As the leading member of a company of publicani, he was responsible for and tainted by the actions of his subordinates. Conversely, Zacchaeus' declaration of intent was not only binding and an expression of his change of heart, but in effect purified his property, so that he could now receive Jesus into his home without causing his guest to be ceremonially contaminated. By inviting himself to the house in the first place, Jesus had gently put pressure on his host's conscience. Jesus' initiative accomplished what many people must have regarded as a miracle no less astonishing than any of his supernatural actions (Derrett, op. cit., 278–85).

telōnion, custom house, toll booth, tax office, occurs only in connexion with Jesus' call of Matthew (Matt. 9:9; Mk. 2:14; Lk. 5:27). On toll booths in Palestine, including Capernaum, see A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament, 1963, 125 f.

In 1 Cor. 10:11 Paul declares that warnings in Scripture have been recorded for the benefit of Christians, upon whom ta telē of the ages have come. telos is usually translated as end (→ Goal). The plural used here would then refer to the two ends which form the meeting-point of the two ages, i.e. the close of the old age and the beginning of the new (J. Héring, The First Epistle of Saint Paul to the Corinthians, 1962, 88 f.). But telos may have its other meaning: upon whom the (spiritual) revenues of the ages have come (A. Souter, Pocket Lexicon of the New Testament, 1916, s.v.).

N. Hillyer

(a). I. Abrahams, "Publicans and Sinners", in Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels I, 1917, 54–61; G. Dellling, telos, in TDNT VIII 51 f.; J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the New Testament, 1970; C. H. Giblin, "The Things of God' in the Question concerning Tribute to Caesar", CBQ 33, 1971, 510–27; L. Goppelt, "The Freedom to Pay the Imperial Tax", StudEv 2, 1964, 183–94; H. A. Homeau, "On Fishing for Staters: Matthew 17:27", ExpT 85, 1973–4, 340–2; P. E. Hughes, Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians, NLC, 1961, 283 f.; G. Kittel, logeta, TDNT IV 282 f.; N. J. McEleney, "Mt. 17:24–27 – Who Paid the Temple Tax?", CBQ 38, 1976, 178–92; O. Michel, telōnēs, in TDNT VIII 88–105; H. Montefiore, "Jesus and the Temple Tax", NTS 11, 1964–5, 60–71; K. F. Nickle, The Collection: A Study in Paul's Strategy, SBT 48, 1966; S. Safrai and M. Stern (eds.), The Jewish People in the First Century (Compendium Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum I), 1974, 330 ff.; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament, 1963; E. Stauffer, Christ and the Caesars, 1955.

(b). D. Georgi, Die Geschichte der Kollekte des Paulus für Jerusalem, ThF 38, 1965; SB I 377–80, 498.

Teach, Instruct, Tradition, Education, Discipline

διδάσκω

διδάσκω (didaskō), teach; διδάκτος (didaktos), taught; διδακτικός (didaktikos), skilful in teaching.

CL 1. didaskō, to teach, comes from di-dak-sko (root dek-, to accept, extend the hand to). The reduplicated stem and inchoative suffix convey the idea of repeatedly extending the hand for acceptance; the word therefore suggests the idea of causing someone to accept something. It occurs frequently in Gk. from Homer onwards, and in the act. means to teach, inform, instruct, demonstrate, prescribe; in the pass. to be instructed, be taught; in the mid. to learn for oneself, to think out, to master. In the act. the word occurs chiefly with the acc. of the person (to teach someone) or with the acc. of the thing (to teach something), but also with the dat. It is clear that the word is used typically for the relationship between teacher and pupil, instructor and apprentice. What is taught may be knowledge, opinions or facts, but also artistic and technical skills, all of which are to be systematically and thoroughly acquired by the learner as a result of the repeated activity of both teacher and pupil. Herodotus also uses didaskō to describe the work of the chorus-master (1, 23; 6, 21). The word is rarely found, however, to describe an activity of the gods. The aim of all teaching is to communicate knowledge and skill with a view to developing the pupil's abilities, but not to force his will in a particular direction.

2. In the sphere of religion the word is rare in Gk., not occurring till the 1st cent. B.C. Thus in the Isis-hymn of Andros it is said that the goddess causes men to be instructed in the things of religion and culture. The inscriptions collected by F. Preisigke show a further use of didaskō in the sense of to demonstrate (Wörterbuch der griechischen Papyrusurkunden, 1925, 371). Philo's usage, as so often, conforms to that of cl. Gk., so that he regards Moses, for instance, as a teacher in the Gk. sense (Gig. 54; Spec. Leg. 1, 59), one who makes contact with another's mind, as does the philosopher in Epictetus (Dissertationes 1, 9, 12; 2, 21, 10). Hence, didaskō can be said to denote the activity of a teacher, whose concern is to develop his pupil's abilities and to impart knowledge and skills.

OT 1. In the LXX didaskō occurs about 100 times, including 57 instances where it translates words from the root lmd (particularly limmaḏ, to teach) which in the LXX are almost always rendered by didaskō. The word is found most commonly in the Pss., in Deut., in Jer., and (apart from Sir. and Wis.) in Job and in Eccl., where, however, the LXX uses didaskō rarely as a translation of limmaḏ and more often as a translation of other words such as the hiph. forms of yāda' (cause to know, teach) and yārāh (teach, instruct). But in its LXX usage (as opposed to that of profane Gk.), the word does not primarily denote the communication of knowledge and skills (e.g. 2 Sam. 22:35), but means chiefly instruction in how to live (e.g. Deut. 11:19; 20:18 and passim), the subject matter being the will of God. God's dikaiōmata, ordinances, and krimata, judgments, are to be learnt and understood; being learnt, however, they require obedience and an act of the will. They may be taught by God himself (Deut. 4:1, 10, 14 and passim), by the fathers of families teaching their children (Deut. 11:19; Exod. 10:1 f. and passim) or by the godly who know the will of God. The fact that the LXX never uses didaskō for the preaching of the prophets may be explained by the close link between teaching and the → law.

didaskō stands for forms of lammaḏ at Deut. 4:1, 10, 14; 5:28(31); 6:1; 11:19; 20:18; 31:19, 22; Jdg. 3:2; 2 Sam. 1:18; 22:35; 1 Chr. 5:18; 25:7; 2 Chr. 17:7, 9; Ezr. 7:10; Job 21:22; Pss. 18(17):34; 25(24):4 f., 9; 34(33) 11; 51(50):13; 71(70):17; 94(93):10, 12; 119(118):12, 26, 64, 66, 68, 99, 108, 124, 135, 171; 132(131):12; 143(142):10; 144(143):1; Prov. 5:13; 30:3(24:26); Eccl. 12:9; Cant. 3:8; Hos. 10:11; Isa. 29:13; Jer. 9:13(14), 19(20); 12:16; 13:21; 31(38):18, 34; 32(39):33; Dan. 1:4. didaskō stands for yāda' in the hiph. at Job 10:2; 13:23; 37:19; 42:4; Prov. 1:23; 22:21. It stands for yārāh in the hiph. at Job 6:24; 8:10; 34:32; Prov. 4:4, 11; 6:13; Isa. 9:14(15); Ezr. 44:23. Other equivalents are: 'ālēp in the piel, to teach (Job 33:33); bîn in the hiph., give understanding (Job 32:8); hāwāh in the piel, declare, make known (Job 33:4); yāṣā' in the hiph., bring forth, i.e. utter (Job 8:10); sākan, be profitable to (Job 22:2, where the translation is not lit.); pāraš in the pual, declare distinctly (Neh. 8:8). It occurs in a free translation of Dan. 12:4, and is without equivalent in Deut. 32:44; 1 Esd. 8:7, 23; 9:48 f., 55; Ps. 18(17):35; Wis.

6:10; 7:22; 9:18; 12:19; Sir. 18:13; 22:7; 30:3, 27(36); 45:17; Isa. 55:12; Dan. 11:4; 4 Macc. 5:24; 18:10, 12, 18.

2. The usage of the Qumran documents largely corresponds to that of the LXX. Words from the root lmd occur 10 times, the subject-matter of the teaching being on occasions the requirements of the will of God (1QS 9:13; 1QH 2:17), and the ordinances of the covenant (1QSa 1:7; 1QM 10:10) and requirements for battle (1QM 10:2; 14:6). Here too then the teaching is connected with the will of God and the obedience of men. Only in 1QM 6:12 f. does a derivative of lmd denote battle-trained stallions or experienced horsemen. See also 1QS 3:13; 4QM^a 4; 1Q28^a 1:7.

3. In rabbinic Judaism, as indeed in the later portions of the OT (e.g. 2 Chr. 17:7 ff.), limmaḏ denotes the communication of the will of God concerning man's relationship to God or to his fellow-men, this will being discerned through the interpretation of the → law. There are, it is true, passages in rabbinic literature where limmaḏ is used in its profane sense, but limmaḏ in the strict sense is now a specialized term for the translation of the Torah into concrete directions for the life of the individual (K. H. Rengstorf, TDNT II 140). Hence, it is best regarded as pronouncing a scholarly opinion on the basis of scriptural interpretation. It is sometimes claimed that by holding this view of limmaḏ, the rabbis were closer to the Hellenistic concept of didaskō than they were to that of the LXX. This is unlikely, for despite the intellectual exertions of both expositor and pupil, the rabbi's undoubted concern was not the development of his pupil's abilities but the promotion of obedience to the will of God; this is shown even in such passages as Kiddushin 1:10: "He that has no knowledge of Scripture and the Mishnah and right conduct has no part in the habitable world."

NT In the NT didaskō occurs 95 times, of which 38 are in the Synoptic Gospels (14 in Matt., 17 each in Mk. and Lk.) 9 in Jn., and 16 in Acts. The rest are distributed as follows: 15 instances in the Pauline Epistles; 2 in Heb.; 3 in the Johannine Epistles; and 2 in Rev. The meaning is almost always to teach or instruct, though the purpose and content of the teaching can be determined only from each individual context.

1. Jesus' Teaching Work according to the Synoptic Gospels. It is the unanimous testimony of all the Synoptic writers, and one that doubtless coincides with historical reality, that Jesus "taught" publicly, i.e. in synagogues (Matt. 9:35; 13:54 par. Mk. 6:2; Mk. 1:21 and passim), in the temple (Mk. 12:35; Lk. 21:37; Matt. 26:55 par. Mk. 14:49, cf. Jn. 18:20) or in the open air (Matt. 5:2; Mk. 6:34; Lk. 5:3 and passim). Only Lk. 4:16 ff. gives details concerning the outward form of his teaching, viz. his standing to read a portion from the prophets, then sitting to expound it, this being the normal Jewish and rabbinic custom (cf. Lk. 5:3; Mk. 9:35; Matt. 5:2; SB II 150; IV 161, 185).

In 13 places in the Gospels didaskō is used absolutely as a comprehensive term for Jesus' → preaching (Mk. 2:13; 6:6; 10:1; 12:35; 14:49; Lk. 4:15; 13:22, 26; 19:47; Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 11:1). In addition, the vb. is also used to denote his preaching and teaching in given situations (e.g. Mk. 1:21 f.; 4:1 f.; 8:31; 11:17; Matt. 5:2; 21:23; Lk. 5:3, 17; 6:6; 13:10).

As regards the subjects and aims of Jesus' teaching, one's view depends on whether one takes account of all the synoptic passages containing sayings of Jesus, or only those where his utterances are specifically called “teaching”, or only those passages which the consensus of historical critics consider to be very probably authentic.

What did Jesus teach when on earth? In brief, the answer is → God, his → kingdom and his → will, all themes of contemporary Judaism, which Jesus, in the manner of a → rabbi or a → prophet, spoke about in his conversations with the Jews (→ Israel). He differed from his rabbinic counterparts not in his subject-matter but in the radical way he handled it, consistently applying all he said to concrete situations in man’s life with his fellow-man, and involving himself personally in the subjects under discussion. (On Jesus as a teacher, see G. Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth, 1960, 96 ff.; on Jewish teaching, see W. G. Kümmel, Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte, 1965, 15 ff.; K. Wegenast, Das Verständnis der Tradition, 1962, 24 ff. and bibliography.) Instead of giving merely theoretical teaching about God, his providence, his grace or his wrath, Jesus shows God’s goodness and wrath at work in concrete situations (e.g. Lk. 15:1 ff.). Instead of speculating on the kingdom of God, he announces its nearness (Mk. 1:15) and so issues a call to repentance and to a change of behaviour (Mk. 7:15; Matt. 5:21 ff.). And instead of inculcating the type of legal casuistry which seeks to ensure salvation, he tells his hearers: “Whatever you wish that men would do to you, do so to them” (Matt. 7:12; on the whole subject, see H. Conzelmann, An Outline Theology of the New Testament, 1969, 115–27).

(a) Mark. In Mk. 4:2 Jesus’ teaching consists of → parables of the → kingdom of God, that kingdom whose nearness has already been summarized as the essence of his preaching (Mk. 1:14 f.). Then in Mk. 2:13 didaskō is used to describe his confrontation with contemporary Jewish legalism; in Mk. 10:1 ff.; 12:14 ff. the vb. introduces examples of Jesus giving his ruling on controversial matters; while in Mk. 11:17; 12:35 f. the subject of his teaching is a passage from the OT. It would seem that Mk. attaches importance to the link between teaching and doing (6:2, 34; → Work).

In short, Mk. uses didaskō not only in the sense of to teach, i.e. to give practical instructions or rulings on the basis of scriptural interpretation, but also (as in Mk. 1:15) in the sense of to preach the kingdom of God and the gospel, the content of the latter being, as W. Marxsen has shown, Jesus himself (Mark the Evangelist, 1969, 126–38). This verse (Mk. 1:15) betrays a marked shift in subject matter compared with the rest of Christ’s “teaching” when on earth.

(b) Luke. Lk. frequently adopts Mk.’s use of didaskō and, where he does so, uses it in senses barely distinguishable from those of Mk. This applies also to passages where the vb. is peculiar to Lk. (6:6; 11:1; 12:12; 13:26; 23:5). His view of what Jesus taught emerges most clearly from his account of Jesus in the Temple (chs. 20 f.), where the subjects are the → Law, future events (→ goal) and matters concerned with christology. As H. Conzelmann (The Theology of St Luke, 1960) has convincingly shown, the main thrust in Lk. is to the nearness of God’s kingdom, despite appearances to the contrary in passages like Lk. 17:20 f. In Lk. 4:14 ff. Lk. replaces his original (Mk. 1:14 ff.) by a summary of Jesus’ activity up to the start of his last journey to Jerusalem (Lk. 9:51), Lk. 4:16 ff. providing an example of his work during this period: Jesus reads Isa. 61:1 f. and points to himself as the fulfilment of the prophetic promise. Now is the period of salvation, having already been manifested (v.

21) in → miracles; the latter are no longer merely signs of the authority inherent in the miracle-worker's teaching, but are part of the teaching itself.

(c) Matthew. Like Lk., this evangelist also interprets his original in some places, but the basic sense of didaskō still remains: to teach, preach. As regards content, however, Matt. 5:2, 19 and 28:20 are noteworthy (cf. 22:37). In Matt. 5:2 f. (the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount), Jesus is shown teaching his disciples, hence it is they, not the → scribes, to whom the polemic of v. 21 ff. is addressed; the scribes are the ones whose righteousness must be exceeded (v. 20). This explains the absence of scripture proof normally so typical of Christ's polemic discourses: for Matt., Jesus is the teacher of the church who supersedes the Sinaitic revelation and its rabbinic interpretations ("it was said to men of old") in order to lay a new foundation ("but I say to you"). After the death of Jesus, Peter guarantees this foundation (Matt. 16:18), holding the office of the keys (→ Open, art. kleis NT 3) which to the Jews meant the office of a teacher. The foundation guaranteed by him is no new law, but the fulfilment of the old, now freed from rabbinic distortions. Only now does the original intention of the law become clear (Matt. 19:8: "from the beginning"). These two verses (Matt. 16:18; 19:8) throw light on Matt. 5:19: he who lives without the Torah is without righteousness. The follower of Jesus is called not to lawlessness but to a superior → righteousness, the foundation of which is the law and Christ's interpretation of it. This is why, after his resurrection, this interpretation must be passed on through teaching (Matt. 28:20). (→ Scripture, art. graphē NT; → Redemption, art. lyō NT 6 (a).)

(d) It is now clear, in retrospect, that the original teaching of Jesus (made up of discussions on the law, words of wisdom and announcements of God's nearness, i.e. exhortations coupled with commands) has been specifically interpreted in the Synoptic Gospels. In several important passages of Mk. and Lk., the preacher has become the one who proclaims himself; the christology implicit in Jesus' teaching has become the direct and explicit christology of the church's faith. The rabbinic sense of didaskō (i.e. that of the Heb. limmad) has been replaced by the meaning "to proclaim salvation". Despite this, however, and especially in Matt., the vb. can still mean to teach in the sense of to command, or even to expound. Our investigations have therefore shown that the Synoptics' use of didaskō is similar in form to that of the LXX and so in some measure to that of the rabbi: it does not convey the idea of developing a person's abilities but rather of instructing him in how to live; it also involves addressing him personally with commands based on the interpretation and declaration of God's will.

2. The Disciples' Teaching. (a) The Synoptic Gospels speak not only of the teaching carried out by Jesus but also of that undertaken by his → disciples (Mk. 6:30; Matt. 28:20 and passim), and of the "human tradition" passed on by the scribes (e.g. Mk. 7:1–23 par. Matt. 15:1–20; → Gift, art. korban; → Hand, art. cheir NT). In Lk. 12:12 the Holy Spirit is promised as teacher (cf. Jn. 14:26).

(b) In the Acts of the Apostles didaskō is by no means restricted to the teaching of Jesus. Even the subject-matter of the teaching indicates this: in Acts 4:2 it is the → resurrection from the dead; in Acts 5:42 and 15:35 "Christ Jesus" or "the word of the Lord"; and in Acts 4:18; 5:28, 39 (cf. 18:25) the whole message of the disciples, as is clearly indicated by the following phrases linked with didaskō: epi tō onomati tou Iēsou, in the name of Jesus; epi tō onomati toutō, in this name; ta peri tou kyriou

Iēsou Christou, the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ. Then in Acts 15:1 there is a reference to some who were “teaching” → circumcision, and in Acts 21:21 (cf. v. 28) Paul is said to have been charged with teaching apostasy from → Moses; in both cases the teaching arises from the normal Jewish practice of discussing the law.

In Acts 4:2 and passim didaskō is linked with katangellō, to preach, proclaim; similarly in Acts 15:35 with euangelizomai, which has the same meaning. However, if only because of the rhetorical character of these pairs of words, any distinction here between “teaching” and “preaching” would seem to be inadmissible, and particularly as in Acts 18:11, 25, 28; 28:31 didaskō involves adducing scriptural proofs. The background of these passages is the post-resurrection message of salvation (cf. Acts 1:1; 4:18; 5:21, 25, 28, 42; 11:26; 15:1, 35; 20:20), and it is, therefore, salvation as understood by the post-resurrection church which forms the subject-matter of didaskō in Acts. Conversely Paul is accused of teaching the Jewish people to forsake Moses, the customs of the Jews, the temple, the people and the law (Acts 21:21, 28). Luke regards the essence of this salvation as having become manifest in Jesus (Lk. 4:16 ff.; Acts 1:21 f.).

(c) In the Johannine writings the word occurs in the Gospel 10 times (Jn. 6:59; 7:14, 28, 35; 8:2 v.l., 20, 28; 9:34; 14:26; 18:20) and in 1 Jn. once (2:27). Apart from Jn. 8:28; 14:26, 9:34 Jesus himself is the subject of the vb., while the theme of the teaching is always the message of Jesus as the one who reveals God; it is a message which demands → faith and is recognized as the true message from God only by him who believes. The same is true in 1 Jn. 2:27, where the author encourages the church and alludes to their “anointing” (on chrisma, anointing, cf. R. Bultmann, The Johannine Epistles, Hermeneia, 1973, 41). This anointing bestows upon them the Holy → Spirit, who according to 1 Jn. 3:24 (cf. Jn. 14:25) is the source of all knowledge. Hence those who have the anointing need no further instruction: they know the → truth already (cf. 1 Jn. 2:21). One of the two instances in the NT of didaktos, taught, occurs in Jn. 6:45 in the quotation from Isa. 54:13, where those who come to Jesus are seen as fulfilling the prophecy, “And they shall all be taught by God.” It is God himself who draws men to Jesus.

(d) Paul uses didaskō only 5 times in Rom., 1 Cor. and Gal. (Rom. 2:21; 12:7; 1 Cor. 4:17; 11:14; Gal. 1:12), which is not surprising when one considers the weight of associations it must have brought to his mind after his conversion. His whole life had been governed by the paradoseis patrikai, the traditions of the fathers (Gal. 1:14), which were “taught”. In Rom. 2:21 he uses didaskō entirely in the traditional sense of Heb. limmad, when he asks the Jew: “You then who teach others, will you not teach yourself?” Rom. 12:7 refers to the office, within the church, of the → didaskalos, teacher, whose task it is to expound the principles of the faith (cf. 1 Cor. 4:17, where Paul says that Timothy reminds the church of the apostle’s “ways in Christ” – probably meaning his principles – and teaches them). In Gal. 1:12 didaskō means to hand on a tradition. Paul’s language is noteworthy in 1 Cor. 11:14, where he speaks of → nature teaching; this idea may well have a Stoic background (cf. Epicurus, Dissertationes 1, 16, 10). The use of didaktos in 1 Cor. 2:13 is similar to the other occurrence in Jn. 6:45 (see above, (c)), where God himself is the teacher: “And we impart this in words not taught by human wisdom but taught by the Spirit, interpreting spirit and truths to those who possess the Spirit.”

(e) The situation is somewhat different in those epistles which some scholars regard as Deutero-Pauline. In 2 Thess. 2:15 (“hold to the traditions which you were taught by us, either by word of mouth or by letter”) the reference is to 1 Thess. and to (more or less fixed) oral traditions. Here, therefore, “to be taught” no longer means “to hear the message in a concrete situation”, but “to receive and keep the teaching handed down” – reminiscent of the teaching methods employed by the rabbis. didaskō also occurs in the pass. in Eph. 4:21, where the phrase en autō edidachthēte, “you were taught in him”, like the previous phrase manthanein Christon, to “learn Christ”, refers to the conversion of those who are being addressed (cf. Col. 2:7).

It is difficult to determine the meaning of didaskō in Col. 1:28 and 3:16. But the reference is probably to the practical exhortation required of all members of the church. The phrase en pasē sophia, in all wisdom, which qualifies didaskō in both passages, probably has to do with the manner rather than the content of the teaching.

In these epistles, therefore, the use of didaskō lacks all uniformity and is altogether different from that of the Gospels.

(f) In the Pastoral Epistles, it is Timothy’s right and duty to teach (1 Tim. 4:11; 6:2); in 2 Tim. 2:2 teaching is the task of those who meet certain requirements, while in 1 Tim. 2:12, women are debarred from teaching. In all these passages what is taught is assumed to be “good” or “sound” doctrine (didaskalia), which is passed on and preserved (i.e. taught). It is interesting that teaching is now restricted to specific persons, and is no longer for all Christians as in Col. 1:28. In Tit. 1:11 didaskō refers to heretics who, for the sake of gain, are teaching Jewish myths and commands of men. But invariably “to teach” involves passing on a tradition which is more or less fixed, as is stressed in the Pastorals by the phrase pistos ho logos, “the saying is sure” (1 Tim. 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; 2 Tim. 2:11; Tit. 3:8). The emphasis falls on handing it on. The sole instances of didaktikos, skillful in teaching, occur in 1 Tim. 3:2 and 2 Tim. 2:24, where it is listed among the qualifications of → bishops and God’s servants.

(g) Closely related to the usage of the word in the Pastoral Epistles is that of the Epistle to the Hebrews. In Heb. 5:12 the author reproaches his readers with the fact that, although they might already have been teachers, they still need to be taught afresh the first principles of God’s word (i.e. those basic Christian doctrines indicated in Heb. 6:1 ff.). In Heb. 8:11 the word occurs in the quotation of Jer. 31:31 ff., where the knowledge of God, which doubtless is also knowledge of his will, seems to be the subject of the teaching.

(h) The two occurrences of didaskō in Rev. (2:14, 20) refer to the activity of false teachers in Pergamum and Thyatira respectively.

3. To summarize: the NT uses didaskō in the following two senses:

(a) (mainly in the Gospels and Acts) to proclaim, call for a decision, address men in the sense of teaching them those things which God requires of the whole man;

(b) (mainly in the Pastorals and 2 Thess.) to teach in the sense of handing down a fixed body of doctrine which must be mastered and then preserved intact. The only passage not conforming to this usage is Eph. 4:21.

K. Wegenast

διδάσκαλος	διδάσκαλος (didaskalos), teacher, master; νομοδιδάσκαλος (nomodidaskalos), teacher of the law; καλοδιδάσκαλος (kalodidaskalos), teaching what is good; ψευδοδιδάσκαλος
------------	---

(pseudodidaskalos), false teacher; ἑτεροδιδασκαλέω (heterodidaskaleō), teach a different, i.e. heretical, doctrine.

CL didaskalos, derived as a nomen agentis from the present stem didask-, is widely used in Gk. in the sense of teacher or tutor, from Homer onwards (e.g. Homer, Hymnus ad Mercurium 554 ff.; Aesch., PV 110 f.; Plato, Prt. 326c; Epictetus; Enchiridion 17; on the Gk. usage see E. Reisch, didaskalos, Pauly-Wissowa V 401 ff.). The term covers all those regularly engaged in the systematic imparting of knowledge or technical skills: the elementary teacher, the tutor, the philosopher, also the chorus-master who has to conduct rehearsals of poetry for a public performance. Since the teacher's activity is confined to specific areas (reading, writing, the art of war, a trade, etc.), the word didaskalos is often more closely defined by the subject he teaches. In this connexion it is interesting that Socrates did not want to be known as a teacher, for virtue was not something that could be taught (cf. Plato, Ap. 33a). Epictetus, on the other hand, actually recommended himself as a teacher for those striving after perfection (Dissertationes 1, 9, 12)).

Philo's usage conforms to that of cl. Gk. Hence, he uses the term "teacher" not only of Moses (Gig. 54) but also of God himself (Rer. Div. Her. 102 and passim). In both cases he regards a teacher as one who imparts knowledge, not as one who lays ethical demands before others.

OT 1. In the LXX didaskalos occurs only twice: in Est. 6:1 where the meaning is "reader" and in 2 Macc. 1:10 to denote Aristobulus, the head of the Egyptian Jewish community, who, having dedicated an exposition of the Pentateuch to King Ptolemy Philometor, is called a teacher clearly for this reason. The usage of 2 Macc. 1:10, where didaskalos means a teacher of the law, is in striking contrast with those translations of the word so far discussed. Its roots lie neither in familiar Gk. usage nor in Philo (where didaskalos means either one who imparts knowledge, or a tutor), but in Palestinian Judaism and in the Heb. vb. lāmaḏ, to learn (piel form limmaḏ, to teach). The reason for the rare occurrence of the word in the LXX may be not merely that the translators of the Heb. Scriptures did not regard the Gk. title didaskalos as adequate for a teacher of the law; the Heb. equivalent of didaskalos, môreh, is also rare and is rendered only once (Prov. 5:13) by the participle didaskōn, teaching. Elsewhere it is translated by other words such as planōntes, seducers (twice in Isa. 30:20); plāsas, sculptor (Hab. 2:18); brōmata, food (Joel 2:23). It is clearly not just the word but the whole idea of "teacher" which is foreign to the OT since the latter is more concerned with obedience than with the imparting of information.

2. The situation is different in the Qumran texts, where môreh occurs more frequently, though usually with some qualifying phrase like ha ṣaddiq, the righteous one; s'ḏāqāh, righteousness; yahaḏ, union or community; so e.g. 1QpHab 1:13; 2:2; 5:10; 7:4; 8:3; 9:9; 11:5; CD 1:11; 20:32; for ha yāhîd CD 20:1 and 14). These titles probably refer to the founder of the sect, who taught the true understanding of the Torah (cf. G. Jeremias, Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit, StUNT 2, 1963, 109, 168–267, 319–353; cf. also F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts, 1957). Other Heb. terms used are maškîl, instructor (e.g. 1QS 3:13; 9:12, 21; cf. CD 12:21; 13:22) and raḥ, teacher of the law (cf. E. Lohse, art. rhabbi, TDNT VI 961–65; → Rabbi). A raḥ or rabbî in the Judaism of the time of Christ had the task of expounding the Torah and of giving rulings in matters of the law. He had pupils (talmidim) who studied his exposition and his rulings and were in duty bound to respect and obey their teacher. The pupil normally addressed his teacher as rabbî, my teacher, and it was this suffixed form which, in the 1st cent. A.D., became the exclusive term for an officially appointed teacher of the law.

NT In the NT didaskalos occurs 59 times, the vast majority of which are in the Gospels (12 times in Matt. and Mk. respectively; 17 times in Lk. and 9 times in Jn.). The word refers to Jesus on 41 occasions of which 29 represent a direct form of address. In the Gospels didaskalos also applies to John the Baptist (Lk. 3:12), Nicodemus (Jn. 3:10) and the scribes (Lk. 2:46). Elsewhere in the NT, it denotes the "teachers" of the church (Acts 13:1; 1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11; Jas. 3:1). In 1 Tim. 2:7 and in 2 Tim. 1:11 the author of these Epistles calls himself didaskalos, a term which he uses alongside kēryx, herald (→ Proclamation, art. kēryssō) and apostolos (→ Apostle).

1. Jesus as Teacher. The vocative form didaskale, master, applied to Jesus (e.g. Mk. 9:17, 38; Matt. 8:19; Lk. 10:25 and passim) or to John the Baptist (Lk. 3:12) is merely the translation of the Heb. rabbî (cf. Jn. 1:38; 20:16, where this is made explicit). rhabbi also occurs in the Gospels as a Gk. transliteration (e.g. Mk. 9:5; 11:21). Although the meaning of the two words largely coincides, viz. "master" in the sense of a teacher of the law in Israel, it should be noted that their semantic history is quite different. The use of "Rabbi" as a form of address to Jesus may be historically authentic, for according to the tradition he had all the marks of the Rabbi: he is asked to give rulings on disputed questions of the law (Lk. 12:13 f.), and on doctrinal issues (Mk. 12:18 ff., concerning the resurrection); he also has pupils. The later conditions for bearing the title rabbî, namely study and ordination, were not yet binding in the time of Jesus (cf. E. Lohse, Die Ordination im Spätjudentum und im Neuen Testament, 1951, 50 ff.).

It is, therefore, all the more interesting that in some passages Matt. has discarded the vocative didaskale which he found in his original text, and has used it only when it comes from the lips of his opponents or of outsiders, while Lk., generally speaking, adopts the usage of his original and even inserts didaskalos in 4 other passages (Lk. 7:40; 11:45; 12:13; 19:39). Only in 3 places (Lk. 8:24, 45; 9:49) does Lk. replace the original didaskale by epistata, teacher, master. The reason why Matt. largely discards the title rhabbi is clear: being in sharp conflict with the rabbis, he wishes to avoid the too-frequent ascription of their title to Jesus. The term rhabbi may also be displaced in favour of titles which are christological in content (cf. Matt. 8:25 with Mk. 4:38). Lk., on the other hand, uses didaskalos for the most part quite spontaneously and, like Mk., without attaching to it any christological significance.

In addition to its use in the vocative, ho didaskalos is very often used absolutely in the Gospels to denote Jesus: outsiders use it without any special emphasis (Matt. 9:11; 17:24 and passim). It occurs in the saying which Jesus applies to himself: "a disciple is not above his teacher" (Matt. 10:24 f.), describing the relationship existing between Jesus and his followers (→ Disciple), and then in Matt. 23:8 (a passage exclusive to Matt.), where Jesus admonishes his disciples: hymeis mē klēthēte rhabbi; heis gar estin hymōn ho didaskalos (but you are not to be called rabbî, for you have one teacher). As F. Hahn has shown, here and also in Mk. 14:14 didaskalos is to be interpreted christologically: Jesus, above all others, is the Teacher, whose authority continues even after his death (cf. Jn. 3:2; 11:27 f.; 13:13 f., where didaskalos is used together with other christological titles; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969, 77 ff.).

2. The Teaching Office in the Early Church. In 1 Cor. 12:28 didaskalos is mentioned as the third charismatic office of a triad (alongside → apostles and → prophets). Men holding this office had the task of explaining the Christian faith to others and of providing a Christian exposition of the OT. It is true that these three offices receive the addition of a fourth – that of the euangelistēs, evangelist – in Eph. 4:11, but in both cases the teacher is appointed to a particular church (cf. Acts 13:1, where the didaskaloi are mentioned together with the prophets; also Did. 13:2; see H. Greeven in ZNW 44, 1952–53, 1 ff.). Jas. 3:1, warning against too strong an influx into the teaching office (an office which the writer himself appears to hold), points out that the failures of teachers will incur severe penalties in the judgment. Heb. 5:12 refers to Christians who ought long since to have been “teachers”, but who still need to be taught the first principles of the faith. In 2 Tim. 4:3 the word appears to be applied ironically to heretics.

To summarize: in its use of didaskalos as a form of address to Jesus and others, the NT follows Jewish usage. The latter may have had some influence, too, on the remaining NT usage, apart from that in Matt. 23:8 and Mk. 14:14, where the word has christological force.

3. The following compounds may be noted. nomodidaskalos, teacher of the law, is found only in Christian writings. In 1 Tim. 1:7 it is used of false teachers who desire to be teachers of the law, but are without understanding and have fallen into vain discussion. They evidently occupied themselves with → myths and endless → genealogies (v. 4). In Acts 5:34 the term describes the Pharisee, Gamaliel, who was “held in honour by all the people” and who urged the other leaders to leave the apostles alone, “For if this plan or undertaking is of men, it will fail; but if it is of God, you will not be able to overthrow them. You might even be found opposing God!” (vv. 37 f.). In Lk. 5:17 it denotes the Pharisees. kalodidaskalos, teaching what is good, is found only in Tit. 2:3, where it is a description of what the older women ought to be. pseudodidaskalos, false teacher, occurs only at 2 Pet. 2:1 where such men are seen as counterparts to the false prophets of old. They will secretly bring destructive heresies and even deny the Master who bought them; but they will bring swift judgment upon themselves. heterodidaskaleō means to teach a different, i.e. heretical, doctrine. It occurs only twice. Timothy is urged to remain at Ephesus and “charge certain persons not to teach any different doctrine” (1 Tim. 2:3). These people were evidently the same as those who aspired to be nomodidaskaloi in v. 7. In 1 Tim. 6:3 the test of such a teacher is whether he agrees with “the sound words of our Lord Jesus Christ and the teaching which accords with godliness”. The character of those who do not is delineated in the following verses. K. Wegenast

διδασκαλία	διδασκαλία (didaskalia), teaching, instruction; διδασκῆ (didachē), teaching.
-------------------	--

tivity of one who is a teacher in the Gk. sense. This active meaning is found in profane Gk. from Pindar onwards, but the word also occurs with a passive meaning, viz. doctrine (i.e. that which is taught) or tuition (i.e. being taught) (for references, see E. Reisch, Pauly-Wissowa V 394 ff.). Philo, and Judaism in general, display the same usage (Jos. 1; Deus Imm. 54; Op. Mund. 79; cf. TDNT II 160).

In the LXX the word occurs only 4 times (in Prov. 2:17 as a translation of 'allâp, companion; and in Sir. 24:33; 39:8; Isa. 29:13 as a translation of m'lummaqâh, that which is taught). In the first 3 passages mentioned, didaskalia means "the law" considered as the will of God, but in Isa. 29:13, where the LXX changes the underlying sing. to plur., it means "doctrines of men", which by their very multiplicity are to be distinguished from the one will of God. The reason for the rarity of didaskalia in the LXX lies in the fact that its primary meaning in profane Gk. is intellectual teaching with a view to knowledge, whereas Israel saw teaching as meaning the law of God, to which the only appropriate response was obedience.

2. On the other hand, didachê, derived directly from the verbal stem, occurs in Gk. from Herodotus and Thucydides onwards in the sense of instruction, or of doctrine imparted by teaching; similarly in Plato and (sporadically) in Philo and Josephus. In the LXX it is found only in Ps. 59:1 in the phrase eis didachên, for instruction, which translates the Heb. l'ammêd. The Heb. equivalent of didachê would in fact be talmûd, as found, e.g. in Aboth 6:2, "thou findest no freeman excepting him who occupies himself with the study of the Law."

NT In the NT didachê occurs 30 times, of which 13 are in the Synoptic Gospels and the Acts, and 9 in the Johannine writings including Rev. In contrast to this relatively wide spread, out of 21 instances of didaskalia, 15 alone are found in the Pastoral Epistles, with 2 more in Eph. and Col. In other words, it is only in the later writings of the NT that didaskalia comes into its own.

1. In relation to didachê, the following details emerge:

(a) In Mk. 1:22, 27 it is Jesus' preaching which is called didachê, without any further details being given as to its content (cf. Mk.'s use of → didaskô). It is worthy of note that Mk. sees this teaching as having a close connexion with Jesus' → miracles, since these are proof, so to speak, of the divine authority behind the teaching. In Mk. 11:18 his authoritative teaching is given as the reason for the scribes' plotting to kill him, while in Mk. 12:38 the term didachê is extended to cover his polemic against the scribes.

(b) Matt. uses didachê editorially in Matt. 7:28 to describe the foregoing passage, namely the Sermon on the Mount, a portion of Christ's message characterized by exposition of the → law (cf. 22:33). However, he does not confine the term exclusively to the teaching of Christ, but uses it also for that of the Pharisees and Sadducees (Matt. 16:12).

(c) The usage in Acts is similar. Here didachê is used for the early Christian preaching, and appears in a variety of phrases: "the apostles' teaching" (Acts 2:42); "the teaching of the Lord" (Acts 13:12); "new teaching" (Acts 17:19); all these expressions, in the mind of Luke, denote the testimony of the apostles to Jesus Christ (cf. Acts 1:21). Exposition of the law, which Matt. could still describe as didachê, is no longer considered part of the teaching.

(d) Jn.'s use of didachê in Jn. 7:16 f. (cf. 18:19) points in the same direction. The Johannine message in the mouth of Jesus is described as teaching which comes from the Father. This message of "Jesus" becomes in 2 Jn. 9 f. the didachē Iēsou Christou, but the content of both is identical.

(e) Paul uses didachē only in the gloss Rom. 6:17, and again in Rom. 16:17, referring in both cases to the whole of his apostolic teaching. In 1 Cor. 14:6, 26 the word denotes one of several types of "edifying speech", all contrasted with speaking in tongues (→ Word, art. glōssa).

(f) Paul's use of didachē in Rom. and 1 Cor. may be contrasted with the usage found in the Pastoral Epistles. In the former epistles the scope of the word is left undefined, whereas in the Pastorals (cf. 2 Tim. 4:2; Tit. 1:9) didachē has probably become a given body of doctrine which is to be inculcated as such. This is indicated elsewhere by the fact that "teaching" is referred to as parathēkē, that which is entrusted (1 Tim. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:12, 14), and didaskalia, doctrine. The situation in Heb. is probably similar: Heb. 6:2 mentions baptismōn didachē, a doctrine of ablutions, while in Heb. 13:9 the writer describes the teachings of his opponents as didachē (cf. Rev. 2:14, 15, 24).

(g) To summarize, therefore: in the NT didachē denotes Christ's message (with his call to repentance and faith) and the early Christian preaching in the widest sense. It is striking that no explicit distinction is made between a fixed body of doctrine (handed down by tradition) and the message preached at any given time. The fact that the early church, at a relatively early stage, possessed a more or less fixed body of doctrine, is indicated by the brief confessions of faith quoted by Paul, even though he himself may not yet have viewed them as sacrosanct. The material collected in the Sermon on the Mount points in the same direction. Such compilations lead on to the Didachē of the Twelve Apostles (Did. 2:1; 6:1; 11:2) and to that of Barnabas (9:9), which were regarded as authoritative teaching. (For further discussion → Proclamation, art. The Structure and Content of the Early Kerygma.)

2. This development can be observed still more clearly in the use of didaskalia, as already indicated by the statistics given above.

(a) The phrase didaskalias anthrōpōn, precepts of men, is applied to the teachings of the scribes and Pharisees in Mk. 7:7; Matt. 15:9, quoting Isa. 29:13 (LXX). The same quotation from Isa. is used in Col. 2:22 to describe the doctrines of Judaizing Christian gnostics (cf. G. Bornkamm, "Die Häresie des Kolosserbriefes", in Das Ende des Gesetzes, 1952, 138 ff.). Similarly 1 Tim. 4:1 refers not only to the spirits of seduction and error but also to the doctrines of → demons.

(b) Wherever else it occurs in the NT, didaskalia is in the sing. In Rom. 12:7 it means the teaching office, and in Rom. 15:4 it describes the function of Ps. 69:9, quoted in v. 3, namely to provide Christians with instruction. In Eph. 4:14 Christians wavering in spiritual discernment are said to be peripheromenoi panti anemō tēs didaskalias, carried about with every wind of doctrine.

(c) The Gospels and Paul, with their limited use of didaskalia (6 times only) form a contrast with the Pastoral Epistles, where it occurs no less than 15 times. In 1 Tim. 1:10; 2 Tim. 4:3; Tit. 1:9; 2:1 the word is qualified by hygiainousa, → sound, and means that relatively fixed "orthodoxy" which the churches have received and which it is their duty to preserve against heresy. The same fixed doctrinal tradition is called in 1 Tim. 6:3 hē kat' eusebeian didaskalia, the teaching which accords with godliness, in 1 Tim. 4:6 kalē didaskalia, good doctrine, and in 1 Tim. 4:16 simply didaskalia (cf. 2 Tim. 3:10). The word denotes an activity in 1 Tim. 4:13 (cf. Tit. 2:7; 1 Tim. 5:17). In 2 Tim. 3:16 we learn that the Scripture inspired by God (i.e. the OT) is profitable for teaching; and finally in Tit. 2:10 slaves are told that their behaviour should “adorn the doctrine” (cf. 1 Tim. 6:1).

The frequent use of didaskalia in the Pastoral Epistles shows a freedom from the inhibitions of the LXX translators (see above CL & OT 1). There is no hesitation in calling Christian preaching didaskalia, and likewise parathēkē and didachē. No tension is felt between the gospel, constantly preached afresh, and doctrine to be learnt, kept pure and defended against heresies. K. Wegenast κατηχέω	κατηχέω (katēcheō), inform, instruct; κατήχησις (katēchēsis), instruction; κατηχούμενος (katēchoumenos), pupil; κατηχῶν (katēchōn), teacher.

---------	--

CL This word, rare in profane Gk. and found only at a late date, meant originally to sound from above, and so denotes the action of poets or actors who speak down from a stage (see Lucian, Juppiter Tragoedus 39; cf. Philostratus, Imagines 1, 19). In Plutarch (de Fluviiis 7, 2 (II, 1154a)) the word occurs with a double acc. in the very general sense of to give information about something, report something. It is also found with the meaning to instruct, teach. The noun katēchēsis is used in Stoic literature (e.g. Diogenes Laertius, 7, 89).

OT The word is absent from the LXX, and its usage in Philo and Josephus conforms to that of profane Gk. Its Heb. equivalent is the hiph. of yārâh, to show, to instruct, with the acc. (cf. Isa. 28:9; 1 Sam. 12:23).

NT The noun katēchēsis occurs nowhere in the NT, and the vb. only in Paul and Lk. (4 times each). Lk.'s usage covers both normal meanings (to report something, Acts 21:21, 24; to instruct someone, Acts 18:25; the meaning of the word in Lk. 1:4 is disputed). On the other hand, Paul uses the word exclusively in the sense of to instruct someone regarding the content of the faith (see 1 Cor. 14:19; Gal. 6:6; in Rom. 2:18 the law is the subject of instruction), so that katēcheō may even be regarded as a technical term for “to instruct in the faith”. This meaning seems particularly appropriate in 1 Cor. 14:19, where Paul asserts that he would rather speak five intelligible words “in order to instruct others” than ten thousand words in tongues, which after all may merely encourage self-glorification on the part of the speaker.

In Gal. 6:6 Paul enjoins that he who is taught (katēchoumenos) should supply the material needs of his teacher (katēchōn). This is probably the earliest evidence we have for a “full-time” teaching office in the early church (cf. 1 Cor. 9:3–18), and it is even possible that Paul himself introduced the term katēchōn for the teacher of the gospel, a term as rare in Hellenistic Judaism as elsewhere in the NT.

The use of katēcheō as a technical term also occurs in Acts 18:25, if “the way of the Lord” refers to God’s redemptive work in Christ and in history. There is dispute as to the meaning of the phrase in Lk. 1:4 hina epignōs peri hōn katēchēthēs logōn tēn asphaleian (that you may acknowledge the certainty of those things which you have been taught). With many others, the present writer inclines to the view that the logoi of this verse are to be identified with the pragmata (events) of v.1, by which Lk. means the life, death and resurrection of Jesus as recorded in pre-Lucan literature. If such is the case, this would be yet another instance of the technical use of katēcheō in the early church. By the time 2 Clem. 17:1 came to be written, the word had already become the normal term for baptismal instruction given to catechumens.

katēcheō, therefore, supplied the early Christians with a specific word for an essential aspect both of their evangelistic work and of their church life: teaching the saving acts of God.

K. Wegenast

παράδωμι

παράδωμι (paradidōmi), to hand down, pass on, transmit; παράδοσις (paradosis), tradition.

CL 1. paradidōmi is found in Gk. from Plato onwards, meaning to hand down, pass on instruction from teacher to pupil (e.g. Theaet. 36, 198b). (For its other meanings, to hand over, deliver up, see → Judgment, art. paradidōmi.) In the sense of handing down instruction paradidōmi is also found in Aristotle, Polybius, Plutarch and others. In the Hellenistic mysteries the word is used in connexion with the delivery of a hieros logos (holy teaching) (cf. Theon Smyrnaeus, ed. E. Hiller, 1878, 14; Strabo, 10, 3, 7; Diodorus 5, 48, 4; Corp. Herm. 1, 32; 13, 15 and passim; and the Lat. equivalent tradere in Cicero, Tusculanae Disputationes 1, 13, 29 and Apuleius, Met. 9, 21). It is significant that Philo uses the word in similar fashion (e.g. Vit. Mos. 1, 23 and passim).

2. The noun paradosis is found from Thucydides onwards meaning, actively, handing down (e.g. in Plato, Epictetus) and, passively, that which is handed down (e.g. in Corp. Herm. 13, 22b and many gnostic writings. On the gnostic view of tradition see K. Wegenast, op. cit., 123 ff. It is possible that paradosis acquired its technical sense of “tradition” only through gnosticism.

OT 1. The handing down of sagas, narratives, laws and lists of names occurred even in pre-historic Israel, but tradition properly so called, with its own terminology and self-awareness, came into being only when Judaism was confronted with aggressive Hellenism in the last two centuries B.C. and with Christianity in the 1st century A.D. Part of the new terminology was the Heb. equivalent of paradidōmi, the important word māsar, which referred to the strictly regulated process of handing down received expositions of the law (cf. Aboth 1:1 “Moses received the Law from Sinai and committed it to Joshua”; similarly Peah 2:6 and passim).

2. Philo and Josephus, in common with profane Gk., use the noun paradosis to mean both “handing down” and “that which is handed down”, and Josephus characteristically uses the term iēn paterōn paradosin, the tradition of the fathers, for the scribes’ oral exposition of the Torah (Ant. 13, 409; cf. 10, 51; 13, 297; Philo, Spec. Leg. 4, 150). The LXX, however, confines the word to its pass. sense (2 Esd. 7:26; Jer. 32[39]:4; 34[41]:2), the act. sense always being expressed by the vb. The Heb. equivalent is māsōreṭ, which occurs in the OT only in Ezek. 20:37 f. (Theodotion translates it here by paradosis), where it probably means a bond, obligation to the covenant.

In the period of the Tannaim māsōreṭ carries a double meaning: (a) the tradition which safeguards the integrity of the biblical text; (b) non-halachic tradition. Aboth 3:14 gives a characteristic description of the function of tradition in the Jewish sense: "The tradition is a fence around the Law."

NT 1. In the NT the vb. paradidōmi, besides meaning to hand over, deliver up (→ Judgment), also conveys the idea of handing down tradition.

(a) In Mk. 7:13, "you make void the word of God through your tradition which you hand on", the obj. of paradidōmi is the rabbinic halachah (exposition of the law); i.e. the vb. is used here in its normal Jewish sense. Similarly, it occurs in Acts 6:14 in the witnesses' testimony against Stephen who is alleged to have said that Jesus would change the customs which Moses had delivered. In Acts 16:4 Luke uses paradidōmi in connexion with the dogmata, decisions, of the apostolic council which Paul delivered to the churches in Lycaonia and elsewhere.

The use of paradidōmi in Lk. 1:2 is significant. Here its obj. is the oral diēgēsis or the account of those who "from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word", the account being that of the events of Jesus' life. (On the relationship between Lk. himself and the eyewitnesses, the "many", who before Lk. had undertaken to compile a narrative of these matters, see G. Klein, "Lk. 1, 1-4 als theologisches Programm", in E. Dinkler, ed., Zeit und Geschichte, 1964, 193 ff.) The historia Jesu has now taken the place of the exposition of the law as a tradition to be handed down.

(b) In Paul paradidōmi occurs 4 times in the sense of to deliver, commit (Rom. 6:17; 1 Cor. 11:2, 23; 15:3). Of these passages Rom. 6:17 is probably a gloss (cf. Wegenast, op. cit., 179); the subject of paradidōmi, here used in the pass., is not a teaching, but by contrast men who are "committed" to a form of doctrine. This use of the word has its roots in the mystery religions.

On the other hand, in 1 Cor. 11:2, 23 and 15:3 the obj. of the vb. is Christian doctrines. 1 Cor. 11:2 refers to instructions "delivered" by Paul at an earlier time, but since these instructions are not explicitly named, it is uncertain whether Paul means that he has passed on to the Corinthians instructions which he himself has received, or whether he is referring to his own commands as being particularly important and binding, in which case Paul himself would have to be regarded as the source of the tradition. In the two other Cor. passages, however, he explicitly states that he himself has received the tradition before passing it on.

In 1 Cor. 11:23 he names the "Lord" as the source of the tradition: egō gar parelabon apo tou kyriou, ho kai paredōka hymin, "for I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you." The phrase "from the Lord" is not a reference to an immediate revelation, nor an abbreviation for a continuous tradition; rather it expresses Paul's belief that as the ensuing "words of institution" of the Lord's Supper are handed down, the Lord himself speaks; and to Paul, his word is of supreme authority (cf. 1 Cor. 9:14). Any allusion here to a continuity of tradition in the rabbinic sense is unlikely, since Paul nowhere makes use of any such idea. He who can boast of a private revelation (Gal. 1:16 and passim) can appeal to a current tradition if it will help to further the gospel or if the unity of the gospel is to be stressed, but he certainly has no need to plead the authority of any continuous tradition.

In 1 Cor. 15:3 paredōka is not qualified by any reference to the source of the tradition, but linguistic evidence points to at least v. 3 ff. as stemming from the earliest church tradition (cf. H. Conzelmann in Interpretation 20, 1966, 15 ff.).

The fact that in these passages Paul not only quotes the existing tradition but in each case interprets and modifies it (cf. Wegenast, Das Verständnis der Tradition, 1962, 52 ff. 93 ff.), shows how distinct his view of tradition was from that of the rabbis, who regarded it as of fundamental importance that the received tradition be passed on unchanged. To Paul, therefore, paradidōmi does not mean “to pass on unchanged”, but to pass on in a sense which permits the tradition to be modified to meet present needs. ([Ed.] Opinions differ on Paul’s use of tradition. For fuller discussions → Proclamation, art. The Structure and Content of the Early Kerygma.)

(c) The situation is different in 2 Pet. 2:21: hē paradotheisa . . . entolē, the commandment delivered, and Jude 3: hē paradotheisa tois hagiois pistis, the faith which was delivered to the saints; here → commandment and → faith are to be seen as tradition which, being fixed once and for all, must be preserved intact.

(d) There are, then, 3 types of tradition in the NT expressed by paradidōmi; the following are said to be handed down: (i) the Jewish Halachah (Mk. 7:13; Acts 6:14; cf. Acts 16:4); (ii) early Christian narratives about Jesus (Lk. 1:2); (iii) confessions of faith and rules for the conduct of the church’s life (1 Cor. 11:2, 23; 15:3 ff.; 2 Pet. 2:21; Jude 3).

The difference between Paul’s usage and that of the rabbis (also that of 2 Pet. and Jude) is that for Paul tradition is not sacrosanct; this adj. can be applied only to the → gospel, which is anterior to all tradition and which he received by revelation (cf. Gal. 1:6 ff.). Thus the nuances in the meaning of paradidōmi reflect the development of Christianity from a charismatic movement to a church safeguarding its own tradition. An ever-increasing time-lag occurred between, on the one hand, the events which inaugurated Christianity, namely Christ’s life, death and resurrection, and, on the other hand, the actualities of the church’s life. It is of course true that preaching interpreted the past, but the church still had to face the immense problem of how to keep in touch with her origins. Hence “tradition” came to play a vital rôle, and in this context the following vbs. should also be noted: first, the vb. corresponding to paradidōmi, namely paralambanō, to receive; then keryssō, to proclaim; homologeō, to confess; didaskō, to teach; and euangelizomai, to preach the gospel.

2. The noun paradosis is used in the NT, as in the LXX, only in the sense of “that which is handed down”, i.e. teaching, doctrine. It occurs only in Mk. 7, Matt. 15 and 5 Pauline passages.

(a) In Mk. 7:3, 5 (par. Matt. 15:2), as in Josephus, the phrase paradosis tōn paterōn/presbyterōn (tradition of the fathers/elders) means the fathers’ tradition of the law which is not laid down in the Bible, and which Jesus in the same context (7:8) calls “the tradition of men” (cf. SB I 691 ff.). According to Mk. 7, this rabbinic exposition of the law is in conflict with God’s will (cf. Gal. 1:14). In 1 Cor. 11:2; 2 Thess. 2:15 Paul’s instructions are called paradoseis. Before 2 Thess. 2:15 is seen as a classic proof-text for the Roman Catholic principle of tradition (namely both written and oral tradition), it should be borne in mind that paradoseis here does not consist of a fixed canon of writings handed down and supplemented by oral tradition, but refers to the apostle’s written and oral admonitions to the church, which the church has duly accepted (cf. 2 Thess. 3:6).

(b) The passages dealt with so far probably show the influence of Jewish “tradition”-terminology, but this is not so in Col. 2:8. Here the phrase paradosis tou anthrōpou does not mean Jewish exposition of the law as in Mk. 7:8, but is a polemical way of referring to the “traditions” which his Colossian opponents regard as revelations of the elemental spirits of the universe (→ stoicheia). The Colossian believers are not to receive such “traditions”, since they have already “received” Christ Jesus (v. 6).

K. Wegenast

παιδεύω	παιδεύω (paideuō), bring up, instruct, train, educate; παιδεία (paideia), upbringing, training, instruction, discipline; παιδευτής (paideutēs), instructor, teacher; παιδαγωγός (paidagōgos), custodian, guide, the man, usually a slave, whose task it was to conduct boys and youths to and from school and superintend their conduct generally.
---------	--

CL The underlying root is pais, → child, boy. paideuō thus lit. means to be together with a child (the verbal ending -euō denotes a state); hence, to bring up, educate, instruct, teach, accustom. Derived from this is the noun paideia, which is found as early as the 6th cent. B.C. in the sense of education, and which connotes the process of education, development of culture, which the Sophists of the 5th cent. declared to be the chief aim of their work. Later the word was extended to cover adult education as well, and used generally of scientific training. Other derivatives are paidagōgos, one in charge of boys, custodian, tutor (usually referring to slaves), and paideutēs, teacher, educator.

The word paideuō is unknown to Homer, although education and ideals of education were certainly in existence, in the form of introducing the new generation, through example and imitation, to moral and legal traditions. In Homer the object is preparation for taking one’s place in the aristocratic community, which is based on competition (Il. 11, 784: “always to strive for distinction, and surpass the others”). Sparta and Athens were the two extremes. Sparta required above all, despite the idea of competition, that its citizens should be totally subordinated to the state; while the Athenians had as their aim in education the training of the individual citizen, by means of competition, to develop a physical and spiritual maturity in keeping with the ideal of the kalos kagathos (→ Good, art. kalos CL 2), who was then able to serve the state.

The Sophists were probably the first to emphasize consistently the equality and hence educability of all men. They therefore held courses of lectures, which anyone who paid might attend. In contrast to the formal principle of the Sophists, Socrates maintained the concrete principle of the agathon, the good, which can be brought to light by the individual’s study and growth in knowledge (in this respect the method is the same as that propounded by the Sophists). The didactic principle here is that of not-knowing, and the method employed is the mind-guiding conversation, which arouses knowledge and is thus able to guide a person along the way to wisdom and with it to correct behaviour. In Plato education is the only possible way to overcome present injustice and to create a true, i.e. just, state. The basis for this is education in music and gymnastics (Rep. 2, 376e ff.). School should be compulsory, since children belong to the state rather than to their parents (Laws 804d). For the élite who are fit to govern there is in addition a gradual introduction to philosophical thinking (Rep.

7, 521c–534), the object of which is to arouse in the individual the memory, already present, of the ideas, the archetypes of reality, which he has seen before his existence here on earth (Meno 81c ff.; Rep. 7, 514 ff.). Aristotle took as his aim in education the aesthetically and ethically cultured citizen (Eth. Nic. 5, 5, p. 1130b, 26 f.; cf. TDNT V 598 for further details). Exhortation and habit are both to play their part in training up the man of moderation, who is in a position to further both his own life and that of the community. Unlike the élite in Plato's state, Aristotle no longer includes the sciences as a part of education. In the Hellenism of the NT period, the Stoic ideal of the leader who is responsible to himself and to reason, standing above the people, is of crucial importance in cultured circles.

To sum up, we may say that wherever the concept of education prevailed, the central position was occupied by man, since he is a creature endowed with reason and therefore basically capable of being educated. The aim of education is the complete man, i.e. the man who exercises sensible mastery over his specific quality (aretê). Only the Sophists advocated recklessness as a programme. With the exception of Plato's state, the Greeks never understood the principle of education in a perfectionist sense. Concepts like fate, deity, and later, chance and personal freedom had too much influence on Gk. thought for that.

OT paideuō (84 times in the LXX, 52 of which render recognizable Heb. equivalents) is used 41 times in the LXX for the Heb. yāsar (mostly piel), to chastise, discipline, correct. The noun paideia (103 times in the LXX, 47 of which for recognizable Heb. equivalents), is used 37 times for mūsār, chastisement, discipline; "but it can also take on a more intellectualized sense, and stand for 'culture', in the sense of the possession of wisdom, knowledge, and discernment" (G. Bertram, TDNT V 604).

The words are found especially often in Prov. (vb. 12 times; noun 29 times), in the Pss. (vb. 13 times; noun 5 times), and in Sir. (vb. 15 times; noun 35 times), and rarely outside the prophetic and Wisdom literature.

The OT bears witness to God's self-revelation to Israel and intervention in his life. In response to his love and care for the chosen people, he expects in turn trust and obedience. The priestly nation is to be stamped with God's nature, and to become increasingly fitted for the sphere of his holiness. The trouble that God has with his people forces him to severe disciplinary measures, or chastening (yāsar/mūsār). But God does not educate in order to achieve an ideal; he watches over his people's faithfulness, which he intends should flow from trust (in inter-human relations) and from that constant readiness to hear and truly listen which arises from obedience (to the prophetic message). Originally it was Israel as a whole, as a nation, that was seen as being subject to God's discipline (Deut. 4:36; 8:5; Hos. 7:12; 10:10); but later, in proverbial wisdom, it is more a matter of God's education of the individual (Prov. 3:11; 15:33; Sir. 18:14). This education by God, which Israel is ever trying to escape, although it is for his own good, is shared equally by all members of the nation. There is no special religious education of the young. It is God who educates, and the upbringing of children takes place within the sphere of this God who instructs in love and punishes because of the recalcitrance of his own.

The Heb. expressions refer primarily to the chastisement which a father has to inflict upon his son (Deut. 21:18; Prov. 13:24; 19:18; 23:13; 29:17), and which God allows to be inflicted upon his servant for the sake of his people's salvation (Isa. 53:5). Thus in Deut. 11:2 mûsar YHWH is the guidance of God, his educational dealings with Israel in history. Because of sin he chastises (Lev. 26:18, 28), but "in just measure" (Jer. 10:24; 46:28). Man is able to accept or despise, love or hate this education (Jer. 5:3; Prov. 12:1; Ps. 50[49]:17). In the wisdom of Proverbs there is a gradual change from the process of discipline to the effect of it, viz. "instruction", which has to be learned (Prov. 1:2), bought and kept (Prov. 23:23). But it is always God, not the child, or an ideal, who is central and forms its content. The educational aim of God is to lead his people to the realization that they owe their existence to the saving will of Yahweh alone, and therefore owe obedience to their divine instructor (Deut. 8:1–6).

How then does the education of the young proceed in Israel? God commands that they obey their parents, who are next to him in importance. The father acts like a priest to the family. He hands on the tradition to the family; he does so in answer to the questions of his children (Exod. 12:26 f.), and his answer is a confession of God's saving activity towards Israel. The children are told of this not only in words, but also by means of impressive signs in the form of monumental stones (Jos. 4:6 f., 21 ff.). Education takes place in the execution of justice (Deut. 21:21), and in the teaching of the law. There is no theory of education, no special institutions; but the young become accustomed to the life of the nation, which stands under the loving discipline of God. Watching and listening, they enter into the inheritance of their forefathers. For he who hears aright will obey.

It is in the Wisdom literature that we first find a moralizing and humanizing tendency. The aim of education is now → wisdom (Prov. 1:7; 8:33), which recognizes at the bottom of things a prevailing order, to which the wise man submits. The message of the OT is seen to some extent in an educational light, or the Gk. concept of education is given a theological slant: faith and reason are united. In the LXX the vb. paideuō remains nearer in meaning to the OT "chasten"; the noun paideia tends more in the direction of the Hellenistic idea of culture, instruction. But even though here in a certain sense an educational ideal has developed in Israel, the point of reference remains, even for this human culture knowledge about God, his revelation and commandments (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 441–53). In summoning Israel to keep God's commandments, as he enters the promised land, Deut. 11:2 calls upon Israel to reflect on Yahweh's past dealings, and in so doing provides the expression (so important in Eph. 6:4), paideia kyriou, discipline of the Lord (Heb. 'et mûsar YHWH): "And consider this day (since I am not speaking to your children who have not known or seen it), consider the discipline of the LORD your God, his greatness, his mighty hand and his outstretched arm."

In Palestinian Judaism education was still very closely associated with the OT: the aim of all education was to produce the man who lived in obedience to the will of God. A deep-rooted change may however be observed in the fact that the standard by which God's will is determined is the → law. In the period following the exile, this had become more and more an absolute, standing over Israel as a timeless demand, not affected by history, and forming the basis of her relationship to God. This Judaistic concept of education had its classic expression in the rabbinic schools, where the Torah, together with its casuistic interpretation, was taught and learnt. In Hellenistic Judaism, on the other hand, education was more strongly influenced by Greek ideas. Typical of this are the philosophical schools of Alexandria with Philo as the outstanding representative.

NT Words of this group are found altogether 23 times in the NT. 8 of these occurrences are found in Heb. 12 alone, another 10 in Paul, including 5 in the Pastorals, 4 in Luke, and 1 in Rev. The OT sense prevails. Where reference is made to paidagōgos, custodian, it is impossible to be certain of the exact meaning.

1. (a) The vb. is used twice in the sense of to teach, instruct: Moses was instructed in Egyptian wisdom (Acts 7:22), and Paul was educated by Gamaliel (Acts 22:3).

(b) paideuō is used twice in the sense of scourge, whip, thrash or chastise (Lk. 23:16, 22). It is no longer possible to determine whether here, as in so many parts of the passion narrative, allusion is being made to an OT prophecy (Isa. 53:5), or whether paideuō is taken simply from popular Gk. usage in the sense of thrashing (G. Bertram, TDNT V 621).

2. The concept of education by God underwent decisive further development in Judaism, with the idea that God's teaching and therefore loving hand was to be experienced in suffering (e.g. Jud. 8:25–27; 2 Macc. 6:12–17; Pss. Sol. 3:4; 13:9). Hints of this idea are found even in the OT (e.g. Deut. 8:5; 11:2; 2 Sam. 7:14 f.). This view of chastening as God's loving action, to preserve men from the final judgment, is taken over in one or two significant passages in the NT (cf. O. Michel's excursus, Der Brief an die Hebräer, KEK 13, 1965¹², 297).

In Heb. 12:5 f. there is a citation from Prov. 3:11 f. The discipline of the Lord is a sign of his love, and not therefore any ground for losing courage. The scriptural quotation is followed by a discussion of the point in vv. 7–11. God is the one who educates his people. God's method of education is illustrated by reference to human upbringing, which is a weak reflection of the former. God is the Father; he chastens because he loves, in order to keep men in the status of being children of God, and to cause his children to turn round and come home. Man resists this discipline, defies God and doubts his fatherly love (v. 6), although in doing so he is rejecting divine sonship; for it is precisely in discipline that God's fatherly activity is experienced. If even in the bringing up of a family the status of a true son is to be recognized by the fact that his father educates and "chastens" him, how much more so with regard to God. Human fathers exercise discipline without ultimate insight, and are open to mistakes, but the Lord does so with the ultimate object of making man share in his holiness (v. 10). The aim of this discipline is peace with God (v. 11), which is also the starting point for God's educative activity, education in divine sonship. Although the Stoics talked in similar terms, the peak of their education is found in the self-perfection of man.

Heb. 12:9 uses the comparatively rare word paideutēs, instructor, teacher, one who disciplines, in opposition to fathers. The same word is also found in Rom. 2:20 of the Jew who sets himself up as a teacher of the law, oblivious to his own failings in the light of the law.

The thought, that it is precisely in chastening that God's love becomes visible, is found also in Paul, in connexion with his exhortations about the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:32). Christians are not spared illness and death as a result of their sins. Here discipline overlaps with God's judgment. But since this judgment has the nature of discipline, believers are graciously spared because of it the final judgment of God over the world, and thus saved from damnation (v. 32b; see also here Rev. 3:19). Paul knows from his experience in carrying out his apostolic commission (2 Cor. 6:9) that chastening is not a contradiction of God's love, but is rather to be understood on the basis of it.

The NT view of education through discipline is, however, fundamentally different, not only from the Gk. concept of education (i.e. towards an ideal), but also from the rabbinic teachings which accord to suffering as a result of chastening an expiatory power. In the NT discipline at God's hand is a practical necessity, in order that believers can recognize that they are in a proper position of sonship.

A different kind of education is brought about by God's word in the OT (2 Tim. 3:16). Since here too God himself is really the one who is speaking, the NT church finds in the OT Scriptures instruction as to God's will, and is thus trained up to live a life pleasing to God. Tit. 2:11–13 speaks even more directly of God's educative grace: everything flows together into the message of the cross (vv. 13 f.). Here too education is an outworking of grace; the language in both passages – 2 Tim. 3:16 and Tit. 2:11–13 – is Hellenistic, but the basic thought belongs to the OT. The words "sober, upright and pious" are ideals of the Gk. world; but what is being said here is that man is justified by grace and led by it into sanctification.

Finally, Paul also speaks of the educative function of the law (Gal. 3:24 ff.). The law is the paidagōgos, custodian or taskmaster, to lead us to Christ. The paidagōgos and the didaskalos were differentiated (Xen., Respublica Lacedaemoniorum 3, 2; Plato, Lysis 208c; cf. J. S. Callaway, "Paul's Letter to the Galatians and Plato's Lysis", JBL 67, 1948, 353 ff.; Diog. Laert., 3, 92; Philo, Leg. Gai. 53; cf. Arndt, 608). Whether Paul was thinking of the slave to whom boys were entrusted (cf. Plut., Mor. 4a, b), and who beat them, or whether he was thinking in more positive terms, can no longer be certainly determined. But in any case he means the person who keeps the boys in order. The word was common as a loanword in rabbinic writings (S. Krauss, Griechische und lateinische Lehnwörter im Talmud, II, 1899, 421). To uphold God's order, and to reveal human disobedience ("to make sin exceeding sinful") – this was the purpose of the law, which in itself was good and holy (Rom. 7:12). With the coming of Christ, who introduces and brings in the new age, this function has ended (Gal. 3:25). Through faith in Christ the child has become a mature son of God (Gal. 4:1). The apostle is here speaking in terms of salvation history. Man in his sinful state cannot keep the God-given law; when he recognizes the validity of the commandment, and thus too his own guilt, he is driven to Christ. But he who is in Christ is free from the law, for he is under the law of the love of Christ (Rom. 13:10b; cf. Rom. 10:4; → Goal, art. telos NT 1 (a)).

3. 1 Tim. 1:20 speaks of men who have been delivered to → Satan to be punished by him. What we have here is an act of church discipline (probably excommunication), in which Satan embodies the wrath of God, afflicting with illness and death those who are destroying the church of God. Even this chastening, however, is not directed towards the final destruction of the sinner, but rather towards bringing him to his senses and to repentance (v. 20b).

4. Education is also a human activity. Paul's exhortation to children, that they should respect their parents, is followed in Eph. 6:4 by a word to fathers, that they should bring up (ektrephe) their children in the discipline (paideia) and instruction of the Lord (kyriou). How should this genitive, kyriou, be taken? "Education for the Lord" (Luther) is scarcely possible. "Of the Lord", in the sense that God is behind human upbringing, is a possibility, as is the interpretation of W. Jentsch, who holds that the reference is to education which has to do with the Lord (genitive of quality; Urchristliches Erziehungsdenken, 1951). In any case the Christian who declares with Paul that "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor. 12:3) must renounce the demands of all other lords to his total allegiance. Like all other aspects of life, the sphere of education is, for the believer, under the lordship of Jesus, and can proceed in the faith which overcomes the world (1 Jn. 5:4 f.).

D. Fürst

→ Proclamation, → Prophet, → Rabbi, → Remember, → Rule, → Scribe, → Scripture, → Word

(a). P. Asveld, "Tradition", EBT III 915–23; F. A. G. Beck, Greek Education, 450–350 B.C., 1964; and "Education", OCD, 369–73; G. Bertram, paideuō etc., TDNT V 596–625; H. W. Beyer, katēcheō, TDNT III, 638 ff.; G. Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth, 1960; C. Brown, "The Teaching Office of the Church", The Churchman, 83, 1969, 184–96; F. F. Bruce, Tradition Old and New, 1970; F. F. Bruce and E. G. Rupp, eds., Holy Book and Holy Tradition, 1968; F. Büchsel, paradidōmi etc., TDNT II 169–73; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1955, 119–42; J. S. Callaway, "Paul's Letter to the Galatians and Plato's Lysis", JBL 67 1948, 353 ff.; B. S. Childs, Memory and Tradition in Israel, SBT 37, 1962; C. N. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture, 1940; H. von Campenhausen, "Tradition and Spirit in Early Christianity", in Tradition and Life in the Church: Essays and Lectures in Church History, 1968, 7–18; and Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries, 1969; Y. M.-J. Congar, Tradition and Traditions: An Historical Essay and a Theological Essay, 1966; H. Conzelmann, An Outline Theology of the New Testament, 1969; O. Cullmann, "Scripture and Tradition", in D. J. Callahan, H. O. Obermann, and D. J. O'Hanlon, eds., Christianity Divided: Protestant and Roman Catholic Theological Issues, 1962, 7–33; F. V. Filson, "The Christian Teacher in the First Century", JBL 60, 1941, 317 ff.; B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 22, 1961; and Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, Coniectanea Neotestamentica 20, 1964; J. R. Geiselman, The Meaning of Tradition, Quaestiones Disputatae 15, 1966; and "Scripture, Tradition and the Church: An Ecumenical Problem", in D. J. Callahan, H. O. Obermann and D. J. O'Hanlon, eds., op. cit., 39–72; R. P. C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church, 1962; M. D. Hooker, "Were there False Teachers in Colossae?", in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament. In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973, 315–32; D. Jenkins, Tradition and the Spirit, 1951; E. Käsemann, "The Canon of the New Testament and the Unity of the Church", in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964, 95–107; R. C. Lodge, Plato's Theory of Education, 1947; E. Lohse, rhabbi, rhabbouni, TDNT VI 961–65; H. I. Marrou, A History of Education in Antiquity, 1956; W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist, 1969; H. T. Mayer, "Scripture, Tradition and Authority in the Life of the Early Church", Concordia Theological Monthly 38, 1967, 19–23; K. Rahner, "Scripture and Tradition", in Theological Investigations, VI, 1974, 98–112; K. H. Rengstorf, didaskō etc., TDNT II 135–65; E. Schweizer, "Scripture – Tradition – Modern Interpretation", Neotestamentica, 1963, 203 ff.; D. J. Theron, Evidence of Tradition: Selected Source Material for the Study of the History of the Early Church, Introduction and Canon of the New Testament, 1957; J. J. Vincent, "Didactic Kerygma in the Synoptic Gospels", SJT 10, 1957, 262–73.

(b). G. Bertram, "Der Begriff der Erziehung in der griechischen Bibel", Imago Dei, Festschrift Gustav Krüger, 1932, 35–51; H. Bacht, "Die Rolle der Tradition in der Kanonbildung", Catholica 12, 1958, 16 ff.; W. Bacher, Tradition and Tradenten in den Schulen Palästinas und Babyioniens, 1914; P. Barth, Die Geschichte der Erziehung in soziologischer und geistesgeschichtlicher Beziehung, 1916²; H. R. Balz, Methodische Probleme der neutestamentlichen Christologie, WMANT 25, 1967, 176 ff.; R. Bohren, Kirchenzucht im Neuen Testament, 1952; P. Bonnard, "La Tradition dans le Nouveau Testament", Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 40, 1960, 20 ff.; H. von Campenhausen, "Glaube und Bildung nach dem Neuen Testament", Studium Generale 2, 1949, 182–94; and "Die Begründung kirchlicher Entscheidungen beim Apostel Paulus", Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1957, 2 (reprinted in Aus der Frühzeit des Christentums, 1963, 30 ff.);

L. Cerfaux, "Die Tradition bei Paulus", Catholica 9, 1953, 94 ff.; H. Conzelmann, "Was von Anfang war", in Neutestamentliche Studien für Rudolf Bultmann, 1954, 195 ff.; O. Cullmann, Die Tradition als exegetisches, historisches und theologisches Problem, 1954; E. Dinkler, "Tradition und Urchristentum", *RGG*³ V 970 ff.; L. Dürr, Das Erziehungswesen im Alten Testament und antiken Orient, 1932; G. Eichholz, "Verkündigung und Tradition", EvTh 24, 1964, 565 ff. (reprinted in Tradition und Interpretation. Studien zum Neuen Testament und zur Hermeneutik, ThB 29, 1965, 11 ff.); E. Fascher, "Jesus der Lehrer", TLZ 79, 1954, 324 ff.; H. Flender, "Lehre und Verkündigung in den synoptischen Evangelien", EvTh 12, 1965, 701 ff.; S. Funk, Die Entstehung des Talmud, 1919; O. Glombitza, "Die Titel didaskalos und epistatēs für Jesus bei Lukas", ZNW 49, 1958, 275 ff.; L. Goppelt, "Tradition nach Paulus", KuD 4, 1958, 213 ff.; H. Greeven, "Propheten, Lehrer, Vorsteher bei Paulus", ZNW 44, 1952–53, 1–43; W. Jaeger, Paideia, I–III, 1954; W. Kamlah, "Sokrates und die Paideia", Archiv für Philosophie 3, 1949, 277–315; W. Jentsch, Urchristliches Erziehungsdenken, BFChTh 45, 3, 1951; H.-J. Kraus, "Paedagogia Dei als theologischer Geschichtsbegriff", EvTh 8, 1948–49, 15 ff.; W. G. Kümmel, "Jesus und der jüdische Traditions-gedanke", ZNW 33, 1934, 110 ff. (reprinted in Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte, 1965, 15 ff.); P. Lengsfeld, Überlieferung, 1960; J. L. Leuba, "Der Zusammenhang zwischen Geist und Tradition nach dem Neuen Testament", KuD 4, 1958, 234 ff.; E. Liechtenstein, "Die älteste christliche Glaubensformel", Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 63, 1950, 1 ff.; E. Lohse, "Katechismus im Urchristentum", *RGG*³ III 1179 ff.; U. Luck, "Kerygma, Tradition und Geschichte Jesu bei Lukas", ZTK 57, 1960, 51 ff.; J. Mayer, Geschichte des Katechumenats und der Katechese in den ersten sechs Jahrhunderten, 1968; F. Müller, "Kerygma und Paideia", in E. Dinkler, ed., Zeit und Geschichte. Dankesgabe an Rudolf Bultmann zum 80. Geburtstag, 1964; M. P. Nilsson, Die hellenistische Schule, 1955; J. Ranft, Die Traditionsmethode als älteste theologische Methode des Christentums, 1934; H. Schlier, "Kerygma und Sophia. Zur neutestamentlichen Grundlegung des Dogmas", in Die Zeit der Kirche, 1956, 206 ff.; K. E. Skydsgaard und L. Vischer, eds., Schrift und Tradition, 1963; K. G. Steck, "Tradition", EKL III 1471 ff.; J. Stenzel, Platon, der Erzieher, 1928; F. Vogel, "Zu Lk. 1, 4", Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift 44, 1933, 203 ff.; K. Wegenast, Das Verständnis der Tradition bei Paulus und in den Deuteropaulinen, WMANT 8, 1962; O. Willmann, Aristoteles als Pädagog und Didaktiker, 1909; E. Ziebarth, Aus dem griechischen Schulwesen, 1914².

Temple

Two words are used to denote the temple, naos, which refers more specifically to the sanctuary, and to hieron, which is the neut. form of the adj. hieros, holy, used as a noun and is used to denote the collection of buildings which comprised the temple at Jerusalem. In the following article a history and description of the temple is given under to hieron, and particular aspects of the temple are discussed separately under the appropriate key words. For other related concepts → Feast, → Priest, → Reconciliation, → Redemption, → Sacrifice, → Prophet, → Tent, Tabernacle. For the attitude of the Samaritans → Samaritan.

ναός

ναός (naos), temple, shrine, sanctuary.

CL 1. The noun naos is derived from naiō, to dwell, and is attested since Mycenaean Gk. Originally it meant simply a dwelling, particularly the dwelling of a god, temple (Homer Il. 1, 39; Od. 6, 10; 12, 346), or the innermost area of such. In the Hellenistic period → heaven, as the dwelling of the gods, could also be described as naos. Originally it refers to a (magnificent) building for the gods.

naos must consequently be distinguished from the term temenos (cf. Lat. templum, Eng. temple) which is older in terms of religious history, but not found in the NT.

This latter means a space fenced in, or at least clearly marked, as being an area where a theophany has once occurred and is expected again on the ground of tradition. It is usually a place marked out by nature: the grotto of Zeus on Crete, the rock cleft at Delphi, the holy grove at Olympia, the oaks of Mamre, the rock of Zion. In the special place, not made by human hands, the god appears as the revealer, the healer, or the giver of fertility; but he does not dwell there. In many ways the temenos resembles our churchyard (cf. the archaic "God's acre").

2. For the sake of clarity naos is therefore translated temple. Such temples are found at first, in the very earliest days of human buildings, in many and varied forms, such as temple-towers (Mesopotamia, Central America), pillared temples, round temples, and even in portable form (Hdt., 2, 63; cf. O. Michel, naos TDNT V 880).

OT 1. In the LXX naos is used 55 times (out of a total of 61 instances) to translate the Heb. hēkāl, palace, temple, which in turn corresponds to the Babylonian egallu, great house. As a building constructed as a dwelling for the gods, it is used for → sacrifice, worship of the gods (idols), and oracles, and hence requires of necessity a local priesthood (in contrast to temenos, see above CL 1). In addition there are 5 instances where it is used for 'ūlām, temple porch (only in the writings of the Chronicler: 1 Chr. 28:11; 2 Chr. 8:12; 15:8; 29:7, 17). Otherwise it is used very much as a purely technical rendering of hēkāl, as may be seen from such passages as 2 Ki. 18:15 f. and 24:13, where the LXX slavishly follows variant expressions for temple which are here used for stylistic reasons, without distinguishing the actual meaning of the terms.

Even in the OT one may observe a distinct reserve in the use of the term hēkāl. Neither the tower of Babel (Gen. 11), nor the places where the Philistines sacrificed (Jdg. 16:23 ff.), nor even the shrines at Bethel and Dan, are ever called hēkāl in the OT; here we may trace no doubt the effects of the Deuteronomic reform. In any case the OT refers much more often to the temple by means of the simple Heb. term bayit (Gk. oikos), → house, than by using the Sumerian-derived word hēkāl (Gk. naos), temple. Only Solomon's edifice in Jerusalem (1 Ki. 6 f.), and before that the temple at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1 ff.), from which the ark of the covenant was finally brought to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6), are described as hēkāl. In the Pentateuch the term is never once used.

2. Whereas the OT thus uses its terminology to distinguish true worship from false, the LXX cuts out all passages where hēkāl means palace, by rendering it in such instances simply by house (e.g. 1 Ki. 21:1; 2 Ki. 20:18; Isa. 13:22). The result of this limitation is that naos becomes a purely cultic term, referring exclusively to the true temple of God. This is shown also by the fact that after the desecration of the temple in Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar it is never called naos (cf. Ezr. 6:5); indeed, the LXX sometimes even appears to avoid calling the post-exilic temple by this name (Zech. 6:9 ff.). The one exception, in Ps. 45(44):15, where the king's palace is called naos, seems to indicate that the LXX has adopted a symbolic interpretation of this ancient love-song: the community is Yahweh's bride.

Corresponding to this is a certain spiritualization (von Rad), which may be observed in the Psalms. Attention is focused on the temple not so much as a place of sacrifice and hence of the priesthood, but as the place above all others that is longed for (Ps. 27[26]:4), the place to which a cry for help (28[27]:2) or the individual's worship is directed (5:7; 138[137]:2), and hence also the place of comfort (65[64]:4), of God's response (18[17]:6), of God's might (68[67]:28 f.; cf. 29[28]:9). The term is not found in the Psalms of joy over Zion (46; 48; 76), or in those which aim at some reform of the cult (40; 50; 51), but in those which are concerned with the relationship of the individual in need to his God.

Post-exilic spiritualization clearly has as its background the realization that the prophets were right in their radical opposition to the cult (Jer. 7:4). It is to their influence that the carrying out of Josiah's cultic reforms should probably be attributed (2 Ki. 23), but it should nonetheless be noted that the prophets never used the term hêkâl (naos) in their criticism of the cult (cf. Amos 5:21 ff.; Isa. 1:10 ff.). The term occurs in Ezek. 8:16; 41:1, 4, 15, 21, 23, 25; 42:19).

3. In contrast to the pre-exilic period, when there was always a Jewish state in existence (even if a very small one), we may observe in the post-exilic and Judaistic period a considerable change in the significance of the temple. David's son → Solomon, who reigned c. 961–c. 922 B.C., had erected the first temple in close proximity to the palace, in the previously Jebusite and therefore heathen city of Jerusalem (1 Ki. 6–7; 2 Chr. 3–4), which his father had made into a political capital of the united kingdom, a location without significance in the Yahweh religion. It was primarily a national sanctuary, with priests employed by the state and royal sacrifices. The Deuteronomic reforms of Josiah (c. 639–609 B.C.; 2 Ki. 22:1–23:30; 2 Chr. 34:1–35:27), however, centralized worship of the one God of Israel with the temple as the focal point of his presence. This is why in the exile, which was seen as a catastrophe for national independence and for the Yahweh religion alike, the temple, or Zion, acquired such great importance (Ps. 137; cf. also Ezek. 40–43). Since it combined within it the ancient splendour of the nation and the new, reformed faith, it gained a new significance for the prayers of the faithful, and as the symbol of the nation's longing it became also the sign of the new thing promised by God.

It should not be supposed, however, that this development was clear-cut or unilateral. Before the exile, too, the temple was used for the prayers of the faithful, and after the exile sacrifices were offered there. And just as in pre-exilic times the temple fulfilled a complex function, so its post-exilic history was many-sided also. On the one hand, this is marked by the high estimation of the house of God, to which the design of the new temple in Ezek. 40–43, the work of Haggai and the books of Maccabees bear witness. The splendour of the new building erected by Herod the Great mainly between 19 and 9 B.C. was also an object of pride. Josephus records that "these structures seemed incredible to those who had not seen them, and were beheld with amazement by those who set eyes on them" (Ant. 15, 416).

On the other hand, as early as the 2nd cent. B.C. a group of priests separated themselves from the temple because they regarded it as being polluted by sin (CD 1:5–11). In doing so they clearly continued the prophetic tradition of criticism of the cult, and they founded in the wilderness of the Dead Sea at Qumran a community which regarded itself as the true sanctuary of God (cf. 1QS 8:5; 9:6). The place of the Jerusalem cultus was now taken by the chosen community (→ Elect; → Church), which lived in strict obedience to the Torah, awaiting the revelation of God's righteousness (cf. R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple: The Church in the New Testament, 1969, 36 ff., 46–53; B. Gärtner, The Temple and the Community in Qumran and the New Testament, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 1, 1965).

NT In the NT naos is found most frequently in Rev. (16 times) and Paul (7 times; neither use the word to hieron). The Synoptic Gospels use it almost only in the passion narrative (Mk. 3 times, Matt. 9 times, Lk. 7 times; Lk. prefers hieron, 39 times), and the Johannine writings (apart from the saying in Jn. 2:19–21, which comes from the Synoptic tradition), like the other writings of the NT, do not use it at all.

1. Paul stands quite clearly on the basis of Jewish tradition when he speaks of the naos: the redeemed community is the temple of God (1 Cor. 3:16 f.), and God's → Spirit dwells in her (1 Cor. 6:19; cf. 1 Ki. 8:16 f., where God's → name dwells in the temple). If, however, the church allows itself to be led astray, the adversary dwells within her (2 Thess. 2:4). To be the community in which God makes his dwelling implies separation from the ungodly (2 Cor. 6:16: the terminology in this section is particularly close to that of the Qumran texts e.g. 4QFlor; cf. Ezek. 37:27; Lev. 26:11 f.; Gärtner, op. cit., 52 ff.). In Eph. 2:21 this concept is developed further and in more detail (→ Rock).

In Acts 17:24 Paul declares to the Athenians that "The God who made the world and everything in it, being the Lord of heaven and earth, does not live in shrines [naois] made by man." Acts 19:24 refers to "Demetrius, a silversmith, who made silver shrines of Artemis" which brought no little business to Ephesus and who accused Paul of turning many people away "saying that gods made with hands are not gods" (v. 26).

2. The return to the language of the OT and Judaism is still more evident in the Revelation of John. Those who conquer are to be preserved and to adorn the heavenly temple (Rev. 3:12; cf. Ps. 144[143]:12); indeed just as Ezekiel's temple is measured (Ezek. 40 ff.), so the eschatological community will be (Rev. 11:1 f.). The Apocalypse speaks often of the heavenly temple (Rev. 7:15; 11:19; 14:15 ff.; 15:5–8; 16:1, 17), clearly on the basis of Ps. 11:4. Yet in Rev. 21:22 it is expressly stated that in the new Jerusalem there will no longer be a temple, since God himself will be the temple for the community. God himself is the dwelling place of his people; the community and the temple are co-extensive. "Behold, the dwelling of God is with men. He will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself will be with them" (Rev. 21:3). Thus the central idea of the covenant promise "I will be your God, and you shall be my people" will be fulfilled (→ Covenant, art. diathēkē or 5).

3. (a) In contrast to Paul and Rev., the Synoptic Gospels use naos to describe the Jerusalem temple, which they see as a matter of principle to be subject to eschatological criticism (the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70: Mk. 11:15 ff., in the setting of verses 12–25), or which is at least in need of purification (Lk. 19:45 f. and 47 f.). The synoptic writers speak mostly of the hieron, but in several passages which reveal the influence of the OT they also use naos, temple. In Mk. special importance is attached to a saying attributed to Jesus, which only Jn. records on his lips (Jn. 2:18 ff.) and which goes back to Hos. 6:1 f. (Matt. [26:61; 27:40], but not Lk., records it). In Mk. 14:58 it is used as false evidence against Jesus during his trial: his alleged disrespect for the temple, which was regarded as the expression of God's presence and holiness, is adduced in order to demonstrate his sacrilegious attitude (for discussion see D. R. Catchpole, The Trial of Jesus: A Study in the Gospels and Jewish Historiography from 1770 to the Present Day, 1971, 126 ff.). In Mk. 15:29, however, the saying is taken up by the mockers at the foot of the cross, and its secret meaning is revealed: it is not a matter of saving the physical body of Jesus, but rather of God's new creation, before which the old must pass away – a matter of → death and → resurrection. In keeping with this Matt., in his polemic against the Pharisees, attacks with particular severity the Jewish practice of swearing by the temple (Matt. 23:16 ff.; → Swear): God does not want casuistry, but honesty and obedience.

(b) Luke places the temple in the setting of the history of salvation. The period before Jesus was also a period of priestly service in the temple, as Lk. 1 illustrates with its narrative about Zechariah. It is true that Jesus repeatedly went to the temple (cf. Lk. 20–21) in order to teach there; but he kept to the outer courts which were open to all Israelites, as did also the early Christian church at first. Lk. uses naos only at Lk. 1:9, 21 f. (cf. Acts 17:24; 19:24). Elsewhere he prefers → to hieron, the general word for a holy place (as in Acts 3:1 ff. etc.). Similarly Jesus taught in the synagogue (Lk. 4:15 f., 20, 28, 33, 38, 44; 6:6; 7:5; 8:41; 11:43; 12:11; 13:10; 20:46; 21:12; cf. Matt. 4:23; 6:2, 5; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9; 13:54; 23:6, 34; Mk. 1:21, 23, 29, 39; 3:1; 6:2; 12:39; 13:9; Jn. 6:59; 18:20). It is thus Lk. among the evangelists who gives most prominence to Jesus' teaching in the synagogues. This practice was continued in Acts, in so far as the apostles always began their preaching (even outside Palestine) in the synagogue, since that is the place where the Jews meet (Acts 6:9; 9:2, 20; 13:5, 14, 43; 14:1; 15:21; 17:1, 10, 17; 18:4, 7, 19, 26; 19:8; 22:19; 24:12; 26:11). Only twice does the term naos occur there (Acts 17:24 and 19:24), in both cases in the course of polemic against heathen temple worship (see 1, above; cf. Acts 2–5). Stephen's speech stresses that "the Most High does not dwell in houses made with hands; as the prophet says, 'Heaven is my throne, and earth my footstool. What house will you build for me, says the Lord, or what is the place of my rest? Did not my hand make all these things?'" (Acts 7:48 ff.; cf. Isa. 66:1 f.; Paul's preaching at Athens in Acts 17:24; on Stephen's attitude to the cult → Sacrifice, art thyō NT 1, cf. OT 5).

W. von Meding

τὸ ἱερόν

τὸ ἱερόν (to hieron), temple.

CL The expression to hieron contains the neut. form of the adj. hieros, holy, used as a noun. In cl. Gk. to hieron and its plur. ta hiera, the holy things, can denote sacrifice (Homer, Il. 1, 147; Hdt., 8, 54; cf. Philo, Spec. Leg. 3, 40; Josephus, Ant. 2, 275; G. Schrenk, TDNT III 231). The plur. can also refer to cultic objects. to hieron (Ionic hiron) can mean the consecrated grove (Hdt., 5, 119), or any place of sacrifice, or the inner part of the place of worship, the temenos (→ naos CL). Hdt. uses hiron, nēos and temenos interchangeably (2, 170, cf. 155). Polybius uses to hieron of the Jerusalem temple, and both Jewish and Christian writers frequently use it of pagan shrines (Ezek. 27:6; 28:18 LXX of Tyre; Josephus, Ant. 6, 374 of the temple of Astarte; 1 Macc. 10:84; 11:4 of Dagon; Josephus, Ant. 18, 65; War 7, 123 of Isis; further examples in TDNT III 233).

OT 1. Terminology. In the LXX translation of the canonical writings of the OT to hieron occurs only rarely to denote the Jerusalem temple. Apart from a mistranslation in Ezek. 45:19, it occurs in this sense only in Chr. (1 Chr. 9:27; 29:4; 2 Chr. 6:13). However, it does occur in 1 Esd. 1:8; 5:43; 8:18, 64 etc.; 1 Macc. 15:9; 2 Macc. 2:9; 3 Macc. 3:16; 4 Macc. 4:3. The reason for its general absence from the canonical writings is doubtless its associations with idolatry, coupled with the fact that the Heb. OT uses more general terms to denote the temple.

The terms used by the Heb. OT for the temple include the following.

(a) bayit is the ordinary word for → house including both the family and the building. bayit can be used for the temple of a god (Dagon, 1 Sam. 5:2), the house of God (Exod. 23:19; 34:26), in Shiloh (Jdg. 18:31; 1 Sam. 1:7), and at Jerusalem (1 Ki. 6:5; 1 Chr. 9:23; Isa. 2:2; 6:1; Dan. 1:2; Mic. 3:12; Hag. 1:8; Amos 7:13; etc.), and Ezekiel's vision of the temple (Ezek. 41:7 ff.).

(b) hēkāl is derived from the Sumerian, meaning a great house, and used for a palace (e.g. 2 Ki. 20:18; Isa. 39:7; Prov. 30:28) and also the temple, the building at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3), Yahweh's abode (2 Sam. 22:7), and the temple at Jerusalem (1 Ki. 6:3, 5, 33; 7:21; 17:7, 50; 2 Ki. 18:16; 23:4; 24:13; 2 Chr. 26:16; 27:2; 29:66; Ezr. 3:6, 10; Neh. 6:18; Pss. 18:6[7]; 27:4; 29:9; 48:9[10]; 65:4[5]; 68:29[30]; Isa. 6:1; 44:28; 66; Jer. 7:4; 24:1; 50:28 MT; 51:11 MT; Hos. 8:16; Hag. 2:15, 18; Zech. 6:12–15; 8:9; Mal. 3:1). It is used of Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 41:1), of the temple buildings generally (2 Chr. 3:17; 4:7 f., 22). The expression hēkāl qodš'kā, "thy holy temple" occurs in Jon. 2:4(5), 7(8); Pss. 5:7(8); 79:1; 138:2; and hēkāl qodš'ō, "his holy temple" in Mic. 1:2; Hab. 2:20; Ps. 11:4.

(c) The word qōdēš means → holiness, and as such is used in a wide variety of connexions. In particular, it can mean the holy place, especially in the tabernacle or → tent of meeting (Exod. 26:33; 28:29, 35, 43; 29:30; 31:11; 35:19; 39:1, 41; Lev. 4:6; 6:23; 20:4, 18; 16:2 f., 16 f.; 20:23, 27; Num. 4:12, 15 f., 20; 8:19; 28:7; cf. also Exod. 36:1, 3 ff.; 38:27; Lev. 4:6; 10:17; 14:13; Num. 3:28, 31 f.; 4:15; 7:9; 18:3, 5; 31:6; 1 Ki. 8:4; 1 Chr. 9:29; 23:32; 2 Chr. 5:5). The holy place of the temple corresponds to that in the tabernacle (1 Ki. 8:8, 10; Ezek. 41:21, 23; 42:13 f.; 44:19, 27; 45:2; 46:19; Pss. 68:17[18], 24[25]; 74:3; 108:7[8]; 150:1; Dan. 8:13; 9:26; 2 Chr. 5:11; 29:5, 7; 35:5). In some of these passages and Dan. 9:24 the holy place may stand for the temple as a whole.

(d) The related word miqdāš means sacred place, sanctuary: in Moab (Isa. 16:12); Bethel (Amos 7:9, 13); Jerusalem (Lam. 1:10); the tabernacle (Exod. 25:8; Lev. 12:4; 21:12; Num. 3:38; 10:21; 18:1); the temple (Ezek. 45:3 f., 18; 47:12; Dan. 11:31; 2 Chr. 20:8; 26:18; 29:21). The expression miqdāš YHWH, "sanctuary of Yahweh", occurs at Num. 19:20; Jos. 24:26; Ezek. 48:10; 1 Chr. 22:19); miqdāš 'ādōnay, "sanctuary of the Lord" (Lam. 2:20); miqdāš 'ēlohāw, "sanctuary of his God" (Lev. 21:12); miqdāšī, "my sanctuary" (Lev. 19:30; 20:3; 21:23 plur.; 26:2; Ezek. 5:11; 8:6; 9:6, 23, 38 f.; 25:3; 27:26, 28; 44:7 ff., 11, 15 f.). Further references are given in Koehler-Baumgartner, 559.

(e) māqōm means place. In particular, it is used of God's place (Isa. 26:21; Jer. 7:12; Hos. 5:15; Mic. 1:3); Jerusalem as God's special place (1 Ki. 8:30; 2 Ki. 22:16; Jer. 7:3; 19:3); Shechem where God appeared to Abraham promising to give the land to his descendants (Gen. 12:6); holy places (Gen. 22:3 f.; 28:11, 19; 2 Sam. 7:16; pagan holy places, Deut. 12:2); the place of the name of the Lord of hosts (Isa. 18:7); the place which Yahweh chooses (Deut. 12:5; 14:23, 25; 1 Ki. 8:29); māqōm miqdāšī, "the place of my sanctuary" (Isa. 60:13); māqōm qodš'ō, "his holy place"

(Ps. 24:3; Ezr. 9:8); māqôm qādôš, “a holy place” (Exod. 29:31; Lev. 6:9, 19 f.); m^e qôm haqqōdeš, “the holy place” (Lev. 14:13).

2. Background. The OT refers to numerous holy places and shrines before the building of Solomon’s temple. The tower of Babel suggests the existence of some form of temple (Gen. 11:4). In Mesopotamia each city had a temple dedicated to its deity, the local ruler acting as a steward for the god. The patriarchs encountered Yahweh at various places, building an altar or pillar to commemorate the occasion (cf. Gen. 22:9; 28:22). During the period of wanderings the tabernacle provided a meeting-place for Yahweh and his people (Exod. 33:7–11; → Tent). In general structure and function the temples of Israel corresponded to the structure and function of the tabernacle. Various local shrines were recognized in the period of the judges, such as Shechem (Jos. 8:30 ff.; 24:1 ff.) and Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3). The Canaanite deities had their own temples, such as the “house of Dagon” (1 Sam. 5:5) and the “house of Ashtaroth” (1 Sam. 31:10).

David was conscious of a discrepancy between his own life style, having built a palace for himself, and the provision for the worship of Yahweh. He said to Nathan the prophet, “See now, I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwells in a tent” (2 Sam. 7:2). David had succeeded in consolidating the kingdom. But Yahweh told him through Nathan that it was Yahweh who had brought about the achievement. Yahweh himself does not need a building erected by men, for he is the one who enables them to do things. Nevertheless, Yahweh would provide a house (2 Sam. 7:11). Because David was a man of blood he was not permitted to build the temple; this fell to his son → Solomon (2 Sam. 7:12–17), though David collected material and treasure and bought the site, the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite (2 Sam. 24:18–25; 1 Chr. 21:25; 22:8, 3).

3. Solomon’s Temple. The building began in Solomon’s fourth year and was completed seven years later. The precise location is uncertain, though it evidently stood in the area now covered by the Moslem shrine known as the Dome of the Rock. The building and dedication of Solomon’s temple are described in 1 Ki. 6–8 and 2 Chr. 3–5. Phoenician craftsmen were employed in its building (1 Ki. 5:10, 18; 7:13 f.), and it shared architectural features common to Phoenician and Canaanite buildings. In attempting to reconstruct Solomon’s temple, scholars have drawn on Ezekiel’s vision of a new temple (Ezek. 40–43; see 4, below) which was a more elaborate building, though based on the same lines. It would seem that there was an inner and outer courtyard (cf. 1 Ki. 6:36; 7:12; 2 Ki. 23:12; 2 Chr. 4:9). The bronze altar for burnt offerings stood in the inner court (1 Ki. 8:22, 64; 9:25; → Sacrifice). It stood 20 cubits square and 10 cubits high (2 Chr. 4:1). Between this and the porch was the bronze laver or basin 10 cubits in diameter (1 Ki. 7:23–26; cf. 2 Ki. 16:17). West of the porch, behind bronze doors, stood the “holy place” (Heb. hēkal, temple; see above 1 (b), but cf. also (c)–(e)) which was 40 cubits long, 20 wide and 30 high. It was here that the ordinary rites were performed. It had latticed windows (1 Ki. 6:4) and contained the golden incense-altar, the table for the showbread, the five pairs of lampstands and the instruments of sacrifice.

The inner sanctuary was a perfect cube of 20 cubits, containing the ark of the covenant. The latter was a receptacle for the decalogue, the law, the manna and Aaron’s rod (Exod. 25:16, 21 f.; 40:20; Deut. 10:1–5; 30:9; Jos. 24:26; Heb. 9:4 f.). It served as the meeting place in the inner sanctuary where Yahweh revealed his will (Exod. 25:22; 30:36; Lev. 16:2; Jos. 7:6). It was here that the high priest appeared on behalf of the people with the sacrificial → blood in the annual day of atonement ritual (Lev. 16; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai). According to Exod. 37:1 ff., the ark was made at Sinai by Bezalel to the pattern given to Moses. It played a crucial part in the crossing of the Jordan (Jos. 3 f.), the fall of Jericho (Jos. 6), the ceremony remembering the covenant at Mt. Ebal (Jos. 8:30 f.), and subsequent history in the conquest of Canaan (Jdg. 2:1; 20:27; 1 Sam. 1:3; 3:3). Its loss to the Philistines signaled the loss of Yahweh's presence but also plagues for the Philistines (1 Sam. 4; 1 Sam. 5:1–7:2). David brought it to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6; cf. 15:24–29). It was placed in Solomon's temple with great ceremony (1 Ki. 8:1 ff.; cf. 2 Chr. 35:3). Jeremiah anticipated an age without its presence (Jer. 3:16). It was evidently destroyed with the fall of Jerusalem at the hands of the Babylonians in 587 B.C., and was not replaced in the second temple (Josephus, War 5, 5). At the dedication of Solomon's temple the shekinah glory issued from the inner sanctuary and filled the house of the Lord (1 Ki. 8:10 f.).

Shishak of Egypt plundered the temple in the reign of Solomon's son, Rehoboam (1 Ki. 14:26), and later kings, including Hezekiah who had beautified the temple (2 Ki. 18:15 f.), used its treasure to purchase allies and pay tribute to invaders (1 Ki. 15:18; 16:8). Idolatrous kings introduced the symbols of pagan deities (2 Ki. 16:17; 21:4; 23:1–12). By the time of Josiah (c. 640 B.C.) the temple had fallen into considerable disrepair (2 Ki. 22:4 ff.), and restoration was financed by collection of money from worshippers. Jeremiah warned against abuse of the temple and false reliance upon it as a guarantee of the divine presence (Jer. 7:4, 11; cf. Matt. 21:13 par. Mk. 11:17; Lk. 19:46; → Rob). It was looted and sacked by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Ki. 25:9, 13–17; cf. Dan. 5:2 ff., 23 and the judgment on Belshazzar), though Israelites continued to offer sacrifices there even after its destruction (Jer. 41:5).

4. Ezekiel's Vision of a Temple. During the exile the prophet Ezekiel received a vision of a new temple which is described in some detail in Ezek. 40–43. The dimensions are somewhat different from those of Solomon's temple, and the vision includes a description of the surrounding area with gates fortified to prevent the inclusion of non-Israelites.

5. The Second Temple. The returning exiles brought with them vessels looted by Nebuchadnezzar and authorization from Cyrus of Persia to rebuild the temple (c. 537 B.C.; cf. Ezra 1; 3:2 f., 8 ff., 12). It had store-places and priests' rooms (Neh. 13:4–9). 1 Macc. 1:21 and 4:49 ff. give details of its furnishing. There was no ark. Instead of Solomon's ten lampstands a seven-branched candelabrum stood in the holy place with the table for the showbread and incense altar. These were taken as spoil by the Seleucid king of Syria Antiochus IV Epiphanes (c. 175–164 B.C.) who set up a pagan altar or statue, the → “abomination of desolation”, on 15 December 167 B.C. (1 Macc. 1:54). Some three years later the Maccabees removed the pollution and replaced the temple furniture (1 Macc. 4:36–59). They also turned the temple into a fortress which for three months withstood the siege of Pompey in 63 B.C.

6. Herod's Temple. In an attempt to conciliate the Jews to their Idumaeen king, Herod's temple was begun in 19 B.C. The main structure was finished within ten years, but work went on until A.D. 64 (cf. Jn. 2:20). The temple area was dominated by the fortress of Antonia at the north-west corner, which formed the residence of the procurator and also housed the Roman garrison (cf. Lk. 13:1; Acts 21:31–35; Josephus, Ant. 15, 403 ff., who notes that the high priests' robes were kept there as a token of subjection). The outer court was surrounded by a portico (Josephus, Ant. 15, 410–16). Solomon's porch (Jn. 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12) was on the east side. In the colonnades the scribes held their schools and debates (Lk. 2:46; 19:47; Mk. 11:27), and the merchants and money changers had their stalls (Jn. 2:14 ff.; Lk. 19:45 f.). The inner area was surrounded by a balustrade which separated it from the Court of the Gentiles "with an inscription prohibiting the entrance of a foreigner under threat of the penalty of death" (Josephus, Ant. 15, 417; see the edition of R. Marcus and A. Wikgren, Loeb Classical Library, VIII, 1963, 202 f. n. for details of this inscription from other sources). This inner area contained three courts (Josephus, Ant. 15, 118 ff.): the Court of Women, which contained chests for gifts towards expenses of the services (Mk. 12:41–44), the Court of Israel and the Priests' Court in which stood the altar outside the temple proper (cf. Matt. 23:35). At the Feast of Tabernacles men could enter the latter. The altar was of unhewn stone. The temple was destroyed in the Jewish War in A.D. 70 (cf. Josephus, War 6, 4 ff.; cf. 5, 5 for a description of the temple). The Triumphal Arch of Titus in the Forum Romanum in Rome, erected in the time of Domitian or Trajan, bears a bas relief depicting the plundering of the golden candelabrum, the table of showbread and other objects (cf. M. Kon, "The Menorah on the Arch of Titus", Palestine Exploration Quarterly 82, 1950, 25 ff.; E. R. Goodenough, "The Menorah among the Jews in the Roman World", Hebrew Union College Annual 23, 1950–51, 449 ff.). The Mishrah tractate Middoth ("Measurements") gives a description of the proportions of the temple before its destruction.

7. Attitudes to the Temple. (a) The Samaritans had their own rival temple on Mount Gerizim (cf. Jn. 4:20; → Samaritan, Samaria).

(b) Josephus had a high regard for the temple. It embodied the worship of the one true God by the people of God (Ap. 2, 193). It was God's dwelling place, into which God had sent a portion of his Spirit (Ant. 8, 114 and 131; cf. 8, 102, 106 and 117; 3, 100, 202 and 290). Like Philo, Josephus had a cosmological interpretation of the temple (Ant. 3, 123 and 180 ff.; War 5, 212–17). The kosmos is God's eternal house (Ant. 8, 107). For discussion see G. Schrenk, TDNT III 241.

(c) Philo criticized those who adorned the temple but polluted worship and service (Det. Pot. Ins. 20; cf. Cher. 94 f.). Philo allegorized the temple, seeing it as a picture of the cosmic house of God (Vit. Mos. 2, 101–104; cf. Plant. 126). But the soul and the mind are also the divine abode (Som. 1, 149; 2, 248; Virt. 188; cf. Op. Mund. 137; Deus. Imm. 135). For further discussion see G. Schrenk, TDNT III 241 f.; R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple: The Church in the New Testament, 1969, 38 ff.

(d) For the attitude of the Essenes → naos OT 3. Eth. Enoch gives a picture of the heavenly temple (Eth. Enoch 14:16–20; 26:1 f.; 25:3; and especially chs. 37–71 and 85–90; cf. R. J. McKelvey, op. cit., 28 ff.). Other pictures are given in Test. Lev. 3:4 ff.; 5:1 f.; Syr. Bar. 4:2–6 (cf. McKelvey, op. cit., 31–34). In some instance the heavenly temple has come down to earth, and this was the view of some of the later rabbis (Bet ha-Midrash 1, 55, 23; 3, 67, 29; SB III 796; cf. McKelvey, op. cit., 34 ff.).

NT As the focal point of Jewish religion, the temple figures prominently in the NT, especially in the light of Jesus' associations with it. It is the place of God's presence, glory, revelation and meeting with his people. Jesus' actions in connexion with the temple have a parabolic character signifying the presence of God with his people for those who have eyes to see. The destruction of the temple epitomizes God's judgment on the Jewish people in their rejection of himself in the person of Jesus. At the same time it signifies the end of the old covenant and its supersession by the new.

1. The Infancy Narratives in Lk. Lk. 2:22–52 preserves two groups of stories which centre on the temple as the focal point of the divine presence. The parents of Jesus brought him to the temple to make the customary offering which, as it turned out, took the form permitted for the poorest sections of the community (Lk. 2:24; cf. Lev. 12:2–8; → Bird). In so doing, they showed as devout Jews due reverence for the law and respect for the temple. Corresponding to this, Simeon and Anna represent the godly remnant of Israel who seek Yahweh in the temple and who are granted a revelation of Christ in the temple. Simeon is described as “righteous and devout, looking for the consolation of Israel, and the Holy Spirit was upon him. And it had been revealed to him that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ” (Lk. 2:25 f.). On seeing the infant Jesus he utters the psalm known as the Nunc Dimittis (Lk. 2:29–32). Similarly the prophetess “coming up at that very hour . . . gave thanks to God, and spoke of him [i.e. Jesus] to all who were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem” (Lk. 2:38). It should also be noted that the same collection of infancy narratives preserved by Lk. contains a detailed account of the circumstances attending the birth of John the Baptist (Lk. 1:5–80). His father, Zechariah, was a priest, and the revelation of God's purposes in giving him a son came as he was burning → incense in the temple (Lk. 1:8–23). In the Lucan infancy narratives the temple is the place where the godly remnant of Israel wait upon God, and where they receive revelations of God's saving purposes first in the birth of John the Baptist and then in the birth of Jesus. (For further discussion of the narratives see R. Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I–II, 1964⁴.)

2. The Temple as the Scene of Jesus' Ministry. (a) Lk. presents the temptation to make a spectacular display by casting himself from the top of the temple as the climax of the temptations of Jesus (Lk. 4:9–12 par. Matt. 4:5 ff. which places the temptation second; → pterygion; → Tempt). The temptation is based on a perverted interpretation of Ps. 91(90):11 f., and is met with a quotation from Deut. 6:16, the negative form of the commandment to worship Yahweh alone: “You shall not tempt the Lord your God” (→ Tempt, art. peirazō OT 2, NT 4). Whether this refers to Jesus as the one being tempted (and thus implying divine claims) or whether it means putting God to the test by creating a situation aimed at forcing God's hand by rescuing his servant cannot be answered with certainty. However, the fact that Jesus answers the temptation by describing it as a temptation directed at God himself indicates that for Jesus there is no need to vindicate his divine vocation in this way. He is conscious of his divine calling, and that is sufficient. He can trust the Father to vindicate him in whatever way the Father chooses.

(b) Throughout the public ministry, the temple remains to Jesus the focal point of meeting God and worshipping him. The contrasting attitudes of Judaism are epitomized in the temple. The → Pharisee and the → tax collector both prayed in the temple, the former pleading his own → righteousness and the latter confessing his need and crying out for mercy (Lk. 18:10–14). Here again it is Lk. who preserves the story. A similar contrast in Jewish piety is exhibited in the story of the widow's mite (Mk. 12:41–44 par. Lk. 21:1–4; → gazophylakion). The two lepta are worth more than the gifts of the rich: “For they all contributed out of their abundance; but she out of her poverty has put in everything she had, her whole living” (Mk. 12:44). The incident occurs in the final week of Jesus’ ministry which is deliberately set in the temple as the place of revelation and worship; it is immediately followed by Jesus’ prophecy of the destruction of the temple which is occasioned by the disciples’ remark about the “wonderful stones” and “wonderful buildings” (Mk. 13:1 par. Matt. 24:1; Lk. 21:5).

(c) Jesus’ messianic entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1–9 par. Mk. 11:1–10, Lk. 19:28–38; Jn. 12:12–19) leads directly to Jesus’ entry into the temple and his cleansing of it (Matt. 21:10–17 par. Mk. 11:15–19; Lk. 19:45–48; cf. Jn. 2:13–17). Jesus did not go there simply because Jews happened to be gathered there or because he wanted to do things openly (G. Schrenk, TDNT III 242; cf. Jn. 18:20). This is not merely a prophetic denunciation of commercialism (Mk. 11:17 par. cf. Jer. 7:11; → Rob, art. spēlaion), or even an expression of the universal hope that the temple will be a place of prayer for all the nations (cf. Isa. 56:7 LXX; Isa. 2:2 f.). Jesus did not only speak out; he acted in judgment as God himself would act, driving out the money changers (i.e. those who changed Greek and Roman coins into temple currency) and those who sold animals and birds for sacrifice (cf. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period, 1969, 18, 33, 48 f.). It was an attempt to restore the true function of the temple as a house of prayer and place where God would be known. This last point is made clear by the fact that Jesus proceeded to teach daily in the temple (Matt. 26:55 par. Mk. 14:49, Lk. 22:53; cf. Lk. 19:47; 21:37 f.). But Jesus’ attempt to force the issue of God confronting his people, in his own person by coming to them in this way, resulted in the decision of the authorities to destroy him. Their action is thus an implicit repudiation of the summons of God.

In Jn. the cleansing of the temple is placed at the beginning of Jn.’s account of Jesus’ public ministry. Some have suggested that Jesus cleansed the temple twice. But it should be noted that in both the Synoptics and Jn. the event is located at the Passover. Apart from this, Jn. does not give a more precise indication of the timing. It seems more likely that Jn.’s placing of the story here represents a thematic ordering of his material rather than a chronological one. It is followed by a discussion of the sign of Jesus’ authority – the destruction and raising of the temple of Jesus’ body (Jn. 2:18–22), the believing response of some (Jn. 2:23 ff.), the discussion on rebirth with Nicodemus (Jn. 3:1–15), and the teaching on coming to the light so that one’s deeds may be seen to have been wrought by God (Jn. 3:16–21). It is preceded by the Johannine prologue (Jn. 1:1–18), the witness of the Baptist (Jn. 1:19–34), the call of the disciples revealing Jesus as the messianic Son of God (Jn. 1:35–51), and the miracle at Cana (Jn. 2:1–11) revealing the transforming power of Jesus. All this would suggest a thematic orientation for the narrative that follows.

(d) The Synoptic accounts of Jesus’ ministry in the temple in the last week of his life show him as challenging those who confront him with claims to Davidic sonship and lordship (Mk. 11:27; 12:35; Matt. 21:23; Lk. 20:1). In Matt. and Mk. there is a juxtaposition of the question of the great commandment (Matt. 22:34–40 par. Mk. 12:28–34; cf. Lk. 10:25–28) with the claim that there is only one Lord to be worshipped and the question of David’s son (Matt. 22:41–46 par. Mk. 12:35 ff., Lk.

20:41–44), who in the light of Ps. 110(109):1 is also David's Lord. How can he be at one and the same time David's son and Lord? Moreover, how can there be another Lord in addition to the Lord who is to be loved with all one's heart, soul and mind? All this follows Jesus' teaching on the important questions of authority (Matt. 21:23–27 par. Mk. 11:27–33, Lk. 20:1–8), tribute to Caesar (Matt. 22:23–33 par. Mk. 12:18–27, Lk. 20:27–40). In Jn. the temple is also the scene of solemn self-declarations and pronouncements (Jn. 7:14, 28; 8:20, 59; 10:23; 11:56). It is the scene of the healing of the lame man on the sabbath (Jn. 5:14), and the story of the woman taken in adultery (Jn. 8:2). Matt. 21:14 speaks of the healing of the lame and the blind in the temple. The following vv. in Matt. provide an ironic commentary on the contrast of attitudes to Jesus in the temple: "But when the chief priests and the scribes saw the wonderful things that he did, and the children crying out in the temple, 'Hosanna to the Son of David!' they were indignant; and they said to him, 'Do you hear what these are saying?' And Jesus said to them, 'Yes; have you never read, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast brought perfect praise"?' " (Matt. 21:15 f.; cf. Ps. 8:2).

(e) Earlier Jesus had described the tabernacle as "the house of God" (Matt. 12:4 par. Lk. 6:4) in answering the Pharisees on the legality of plucking ears of corn on the → sabbath (cf. 1 Sam. 21:2–7; Lev. 24:7 ff.; Num. 28:9 f.; Hos. 6:6). In the course of his reply Matt. records Jesus as saying, "I tell you, something greater than the temple is here" (Matt. 12:6). T. W. Manson suggests that this "something" is the community of the disciples who with Jesus constitute the corporate Son of man (v. 8; cf. BJRL 32, 1949–50, 191). E. Lohmeyer identifies it with the kingdom of God effectively present in the eschatological community or remnant within the historical people of God (Lord of the Temple, 1961, 67 ff.). D. Hill draws attention to the fact that Matt. says "greater than the temple" and not "greater than the law" (The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 211; cf. G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963, 35). The point of contrast is not between the authority of the law and the authority of Jesus. Rather, vv. 3–7 appeal to the law as a witness for Jesus, validating the Son of man as Lord of the sabbath.

(f) In his final week of public ministry Jesus also denounced the practice of swearing (Matt. 23:16–22; cf. 5:33–37; → Swear, art. omnyō NT 1 (a)). To swear by any part of the temple (which in rabbinic teaching was less binding than swearing by God himself) is in fact to introduce duplicity into one's dealings. On the one hand, one's word should be binding and, on the other hand, God who sanctifies the temple sanctifies its several parts. Therefore, any such oath is tantamount to swearing by God himself. G. Schrenk sees in this an allusion to the shekinah of God, located in the temple, but sanctifying everything in the temple (TDNT III 243).

(g) On the question of the temple tax (Matt. 17:24–27) → Tax, art. statēr.

3. The Destruction of the Temple. In two groups of passages Jesus speaks of the destruction of the temple. In the first group he is referring to the temple of his body (Matt. 26:61; 27:40; Mk. 14:57 f.; 15:29 f.; Jn. 2:18–22; cf. Acts 6:14; → naos). Already his own person is superseding the material temple as the dwelling place of God, where God and man meet. In the second group Jesus prophesies the destruction of the Jerusalem temple (Matt. 24:1, 15; Mk. 13:2 f., 14; cf. 11:11; Lk. 21:5 f., 20). The immediate occasion is the remark of the disciples about the impressive buildings. But the cause of the destruction is the rejection by the Jewish leaders and the people as a whole of God's summons to them in the person of Jesus. For Jesus' coming to Jerusalem and visitation of the temple has failed to find the response of penitence, faith and commitment. God's people have rejected God, and the destruction of the temple will be the judgment on the nation and at the same time visible termination of the divinely appointed covenant relationship and worship. It is anticipated by Jesus' cursing of the fig tree (Matt. 21:18 f. par. Mk. 11:12 ff.; → Fruit, art. sykē). The sign will be the → abomination of desolation (Matt. 24:15–22 par. Mk. 13:14–20, Lk. 21:20–24). For further discussion → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (a).

G. Schrenk sees two further incidents which "bear witness to the conviction that the death of Jesus makes possible a transformation of the cultus. The fact that Judas casts the rejected pieces of silver into the temple (Mt. 27:5) indicates the permanent defilement of the sanctuary by the death of Jesus. The symbolism of the rending of the temple veil on the death of Jesus (Mk. 15:38; Mt. 27:51; Lk. 23:45) shows us that access to God is now by the death of Christ and not by the former ministry" (TDNT III 245 f.).

4. The Temple in Acts. The death and resurrection of Jesus did not mean for the early church a repudiation of the temple or of Israel. The sermons of Acts addressed to Jews lay the guilt for Jesus' death squarely with the Jewish leadership (cf. Acts 2:24; 3:13 f.; 4:10 ff.; 5:30; 7:52; 10:39; 13:27 ff.), but they all hold out the invitation to repentance, faith and a return to God. God has not yet finally rejected his ancient people. Similarly, the temple is still the divinely appointed place of worship, though now in the context of Christian fellowship (Acts 2:46; 3:1–10; cf. Lk. 24:52 f.). As late as Acts 22:17 Paul has a revelation of the risen Lord while praying in the temple. The apostles taught there as Jesus did (Acts 5:12, 20 f., 25:42). As a Jew, Paul respects the rites and customs of the temple, bringing the offering of Nazirite purification (Acts 21:26; 24:6, 12, 18; 25:8; 26:21; cf. Num. 6:1–21; E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 610 ff.). In this connexion Paul was falsely accused of profaning the temple. Paul's attitude is to be understood in the context of his determination to be all things to all men, in order to save some, though not being in bondage to any (1 Cor. 9:19–23). So long as the temple stood, judgment had not fallen upon the nation which remained constituted as the people of God. Indeed, the church in the first instance was essentially Jewish Christian. Only after Peter's vision was the church opened up to Gentile believers (Acts 10). Even so, the Jewish cultus was not immediately superseded for Jewish Christians. On the other hand, a note of criticism begins to be heard in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:44–50) and indirectly in Paul's Areopagus address (Acts 17:24). With regard to the tabernacle and thus to the Jerusalem temple and citing Isa. 66:1 f., Stephen points out that the Most High does not dwell en cheiropoiētois, "in houses made with hands" (Acts 7:48). With regard to pagan shrines Paul points out that God ouk en cheiropoiētois naois katoikei, "does not live in shrines made by hand" (Acts 17:24).

5. The Temple in the Epistles. Where the community is regarded as the temple of God the word → naos is used. to hieron occurs only in 1 Cor. 9:13 in an argument which appeals to Deut. 18:1 claiming support by the church for Christian workers: "Do you not know that those who are employed in the temple service [hoi ta hiera ergazomenoi] get their food from the temple [ta ek tou hierou esthousin], and those who serve at the altar share in the sacrificial offerings? In the same way the Lord commanded that those who proclaim the gospel should get their living by the gospel” (1 Cor. 9:13 f.; cf. Matt. 10:10; Lk. 10:7 f.). Heb. uses the expression ta hagia for the sanctuary in connexion with its discussion of the day of atonement ritual as a type of Christ’s priestly work (Heb. 9:24 f.; cf. 13:11; Lev. 16; → Holy, art. hagios). oikos theou, house(hold) of God, is used in 1 Tim. 3:15; 1 Pet. 4:7; Heb. 3:6; 10:21; cf. above OT 1 (a).

 C. Brown

τὸ ἐσώτερον	τὸ ἐσώτερον (to esōteron), the inner shrine; ἐσώτερος (esōteros), inner.
-------------	--

CL & OT esōteros is an adj. in the comparative state used to describe things as being farther in the interior, more inward, or more intimate.

In the LXX esōteros is used for three different Hebrew words: mibbêl l^c (as a preposition), within, esōteros tou katapetasmatos designates the inner shrine of the tabernacle, “within the curtain” (Exod. 26:33; Lev. 16:2, 12, 15); pñîmî, (an adj.) describing doors, gates, porches, etc. in the palace-temple complex (e.g. 2 Chr. 4:22; Ezek. 8:3); b^cyark^ctê (a preposition), innermost part, the innermost part of the cave where David and his men hid (1 Sam. 24:4).

NT The substantive form with the article is used metaphorically for the heavenly holy of holies which Jesus entered for us. It corresponds to the inner shrine of the tabernacle, the place of the invisible presence of the God of Israel (Heb. 6:19). As an attributive esōteros describes the inner cell of the prison in Philippi where Paul and Silas were kept (Acts 16:24).
 D. H. Madvig

τὸ καταπέτασμα	τὸ καταπέτασμα (to katapetasma), covering, veil, curtain.
----------------	--

CL & OT katapetasma seems to have been a technical term for a temple curtain. With few exceptions katapetasma is used in the LXX for Heb. pārōket and designates the curtain which separated the holy place and the holy of holies in the tabernacle (Exod. 26:31, 33 ff.; 27:21; 30:6; 35:12; 36:35[37:3]; 38:27[39:4]; 40:3; 40:22, 26; Lev. 4:6, 17; 16:2, 12, 15; 21:23; 24:3; Num. 4:5; 18:7; 2 Chr. 3:14; Sir. 50:5). It stands for māsāk, screen, at Exod. 26:37; 35:12; 36:37[37:5]; 38:18[37:16]; 39:40[39:20]; 40:5, 21; Num. 3:26. It is without Heb. equivalent at Exod. 36:36[38:18]; Num. 3:10; 4:32; 1 Ki. 6:36; 1 Macc. 1:22; 4:51. Though katapetasma is used sometimes for the curtain at the entrance of the tabernacle, the regular word for that is kalymma which stands for 6 different Heb. words (Exod. 4:24; 15:13; 1 Sam. 1:18; 9:22; 2 Sam. 7:6; 1 Chr. 17:5; 28:12; Sir. 14:25; Jer. 25[32]:38; 33[40]:12; Ezek. 23:21; 1 Macc. 3:45).

This inner curtain was made of fine linen interwoven with blue, purple and scarlet wool; on it were the figures of two → cherubs. It was symbolic of the separation between God and man. The high priest alone could enter and only once a year to offer the atoning blood in the presence of God.

NT It is debated whether “the curtain of the temple” that was torn at the time of the crucifixion was the inner or outer curtain (Matt. 27:51; Mk. 15:38; Lk. 23:45). If it was the inner one it symbolized the reality that Jesus’ death opened the way for man to God. This, however, would not have been a public sign. The Gospel of the Nazarenes states that the upper lintel was split (Henn.-Schn., I, 153), and the early church fathers saw it as a sign prophetic of the destruction of the temple.

The writer to the Hebrews finds great assurance in knowing that Jesus, as the forerunner of all believers, entered the presence of God within the inner curtain in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 6:19, 20). He also reports that Jesus opened the way for us through this inner curtain (Heb. 10:20). This may be an allusion to the tearing of the curtain when Jesus died; no explicit reference is made to it. kalymma is used in the NT only of Moses’ veil (2 Cor. 3:7–18; cf. Exod. 34:33 ff.; → Hide, art. kalyptō NT 3).

D. H. Madvig

τὸ μεσότοιχον

τὸ μεσότοιχον (to mesotoichon), dividing-wall.

Josephus (Ant. 8, 71) uses the separate words to meson toichon to refer to the partition between the holy place and the holy of holies. mesotoichon is found only a few times outside the NT and it refers to a partition or barrier.

mesotoichon occurs in the NT only in Eph. 2:14 where it has been thought to refer to a barrier between Jew and Gentile that was removed by Jesus through his death. It is seen as an allusion to the balustrade in the temple courtyard which separated the court of the Gentiles from the more sacred precincts (→ to hieron OT 6). No document is known where mesotoichon is used to refer to that wall. Such an allusion may not have been clear to Gentile readers in Asia Minor. Another suggestion is that it refers to the wall of separation between God and man (→ Redemption, art. lyō NT 6 (b)). M. Barth suggests that it may even refer to the barrier between God and man, constituted by angels and other principalities and powers (cf. Eph. 1:21; The Broken Wall: A Study of the Epistle to the Ephesians, 1959, 36).

D. H. Madvig

στῦλος

στῦλος (stylos), pillar, support.

CL & OT stylos is a very common word used for many kinds of pillars, columns, and other supports. In the LXX stylos is used for 5 Heb. words, especially ‘ammûd, pillar (e.g. Exod. 27:10–17; 36:36; 1 Ki. 7:15–45), and qereš, an upright board or studding in the tabernacle (e.g. Exod. 26:15–29).

NT stylos is used with reference to the temple in Rev. 3:12 where the Spirit of Jesus promises the overcomer that he will become a pillar in the temple of God. This metaphor probably refers to the two pillars which adorned the porch of Solomon’s temple. It is used fig. of the leaders of the Jerusalem church, James, Cephas and John (Gal. 2:9; → Rock), and of the foundation of truth (1 Tim. 3:15).

D. H. Madvig

γαζοφυλάκιον

γαζοφυλάκιον (gazophylakion), treasure room, treasury.

OT gazophylakion is used a number of times in LXX for liškāh, a room or chamber (2 Ki. 23:11; 2 Esd. 10:6; Neh. 10:38[37], 39[38]; 13:4 f., 8 f.; Ezek. 40:17), and three times for its synonym niškāh (Neh. 3:30; 12:44; 13:7), and once for g'nāzim, royal treasury (Est. 3:9). It is without equivalent at 1 Macc. 3:28; 14:49; 2 Macc. 3:6, 24, 28, 40; 4:42; 5:18; 4 Macc. 4:3, 6. See also Josephus, War 5, 200; 6, 282; Ant. 19, 294. In the Apocrypha it refers either to the sacred or the royal treasury.

NT There are no references in the NT to the temple treasury where valuables were stored. In Mk. 12:41, 43 and Lk. 21:1 gazophylakion refers to one of the thirteen trumpet-shaped collection boxes in the temple. These were marked to indicate the use to which the funds were put. When Jesus stood teaching in the treasury (gazophylakion) in the temple precincts, he was probably standing in the Court of the Women where the collection boxes were placed (Jn. 8:20). D. H. Madvig

νεωκόρος

νεωκόρος (neōkoros), temple keeper.

neōkoros is derived from neōs the Attic form of naos, temple, and koreō, to sweep. From “temple-sweeper” it came to mean “temple-keeper” and then became a title designating cities in Asia Minor which had built a temple in honour of their patron-god or the emperor. In Acts 19:35 the title is ascribed to Ephesus where a temple was built in honour of the goddess Artemis. D. H. Madvig

πτερύγιον

πτερύγιον (pterygion), end, edge.

CL pterygion is the diminutive of pteryx, wing, and serves to designate the tip or extremity of anything. On a building pterygion may designate a turret or battlement or a pointed roof.

NT The devil took Jesus to the pterygion of the temple and urged him to jump, to demonstrate that he was protected by divine power (Matt. 4:5 ff. par. Lk. 4:9–12; → to hieron NT 1 (a)). Probably this refers to the South-East corner of the temple area where one could look straight down from the roof of Solomon’s Porch into the Kidron Valley far below. J. Jeremias suggests, however, that it was the lintel or superstructure of a gate of the temple (“Die ‘Zinne’ des Tempels (Mk. 4, 5; Lk. 4, 9)”, Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 59, 1936, 195–208). Eusebius preserves a story of Hegesippus which tells how the scribes and Pharisees set James, the brother of Jesus upon the pinnacle of the temple “that from thy lofty station thou mayest be evident, and thy words may easily be heard by all the people” (HE 2, 23, 11). The purpose was to persuade the Passover crowds not to go astray after Jesus. But when James testified to Jesus, the scribes and Pharisees cast him down and stoned him. N. Hyldal suggests that this was the place of execution from which victims were thrown down and stoned (“Die Versuchung auf der Zinne des Tempels”, StTh 15, 1961, 113–27). Perhaps this was why the woman taken in adultery was brought to the temple (Jn. 8:2).

B. Gerhardsson sees here a play on words between pterygion and the non-diminutive pteryx, both of which are used in the LXX to translate the Heb. kānāp, wing (The Testing of God's Son (Matt. 4:1–11 & Par), Coniectanea Biblica, New Testament Series 2:1, 1966, 59). The word occurs in the Psalm quoted by Satan: “he will cover you with his pinions, and under his wings you will find refuge” (Ps. 91:4). The writer of the temptation narrative “wants us to see the associations of this word. What could be a more appropriate setting for tempting the Son to misuse God’s promise of protection?” (ibid.)

D. H. Madvig

For various aspects of the temple, its cultus and furnishings → Priest, → Reconciliation, → Redemption, → Sacrifice, → Tent. Other related subjects include → Abomination of Desolation, → Animal, → Bird, → David, → Firm, → Foundation, → Jerusalem, → Prophet, → Rock.

For details of specialist studies on the archaeology and features of the various temples see the bibliographies in the reference works listed below.

(a) Y. Aharoni, “Temples, Semitic”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 874 f.; K. Baltzer, “The Meaning of the Temple in the Lukan Writings”, HTR 58, 1965, 263–77; C. K. Barrett, “Paul and the ‘Pillar’ Apostles”, in J. N. Sevenster and W. C. van Unnik, eds., Studia Paulina, 1953, 1–19; and “The Eschatology of the Epistle to the Hebrews”, in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1956, 363–92; G. A. Barrois, “Temples”, IDB IV 560–68; M. Barth, The Broken Wall: A Study of the Epistle to the Ephesians, 1959; and Ephesians, I–II, Anchor Bible, 1974; J. M. Baumgarten, “Sacrifice and Worship among the Jewish Sectarians of the Dead Sea (Qumrân) Scrolls”, HTR 46, 1953, 141–59; M. Ben-Dov, “Temple of Herod”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 870 ff.; J. Blenkinsopp, “Kiriath-jearim and the Ark”, JBL 88, 1969, 143–56; R. Brinker, The Influence of Sanctuaries in Early Israel, 1946; I. Buse, “The Cleansing of the Temple in the Synoptics and John”, ExpT 70, 1958–59, 22 ff.; A. Caldecott, “The Significance of the ‘Cleansing of the Temple’”, JTS 24, 1953, 382–86; L. Cerfaux, The Church in the Theology of St. Paul, 1959; R. E. Clements, God and Temple, 1965; A. Cody, Heavenly Sanctuary and Liturgy in the Epistle to the Hebrews: The Achievement of Salvation in the Epistle’s Perspectives, 1960; A. Cole, The New Temple: A Study of the Origins of the Catechetical ‘Form’ of the Church in the New Testament, 1960; Y. M.-J. Congar, The Mystery of the Temple, 1962; W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine, 1974; M. Delcor, “The Courts of the Church of Corinth and the Courts of Qumran”, in J. Murphy-O’Connor, Paul and Qumran: Studies in New Testament Exegesis, 1968, 69–84; W. Förster, Palestinian Judaism in New Testament Times, 1964; E. D. Freed, “The Entry into Jerusalem in the Gospel of John”, JBL 80, 1961, 329–38; B. Gärtner, The Temple and the Community in Qumran and the New Testament: A Comparative Study in the Temple Symbolism of the Qumran Texts and the New Testament, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 1, 1965; L. Gaston, “The Theology of the Temple: The New Testament Fulfilment of Old Testament Heilsgeschichte”, in Oikonomia. Festschrift O. Cullmann, 1967, 32–41; and No Stone on Another: Studies in the Significance of the Fall of Jerusalem in the Synoptic Gospels, Supplements to NovT 23, 1970; T. Hannay, “The Temple”, SJT 3, 1950, 278–87; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism, I–II, 1974; R. H. Hiers, “Purification of the Temple: Preparation for the Kingdom of God”, JBL 90, 1971, 82–90; J. E. Jennings, “Temples”, ZPEB V 656–69; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period, 1969; S. Kennard, Jesus in the Temple, (Dissertation, Strasbourg) 1935; A. F. J. Klijn, “Stephen’s Speech – Acts vii. 2–53”, NTS 4, 1957–58, 23–31; W. Kornfeld, “Temple”, EBT III 899–903; W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC 1974; H. Lignée, The Temple of Yahweh, 1966; E. Lohmeyer, Lord of the Temple, 1961; R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple: The Church in the New Testament, 1969; T. W. Manson, “The Cleansing of the Temple”, BJRL 33, 1951, 271–82; H. G. May, “The Ark – A Miniature Temple”, American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literature 52, 1936, 215–34; O. Michel, naos, TDNT IV 880–90; J. C. Meagher, “John 1:14 and the New Temple”, JBL 88, 1969, 57–68; A. R. Millard and R. J. McKelvey, “Temple”, NBD 1242–50; C. F. D. Moule, “Sanctuary and Sacrifice in the New Testament”, JTS New Series 1, 1950, 29–41; A. Parrot, The Temple of Jerusalem, Studies in Biblical Archaeology 5, 1955; R. Patai, Man and Temple in Ancient Myth and Ritual, 1947; J. Quellette, "Temples, Semitic", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 872 ff.; G. von Rad, "'Righteousness' and 'Life' in the Cultic Language of the Psalms", in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1965, 243–66; T. H. Robinson, "The Den of Thieves", The Expositor, 9, Eighth Series, 1915, 459–67; C. Schneider, katapetasma, TDNT III 628 ff.; and mesotoichon, TDNT IV 625; G. Schrenk, to hieron, TDNT III 230–47; M. Simon, "Saint Stephen and the Jerusalem Temple", Journal of Ecclesiastical History 2, 1951, 127–42; and St. Stephen and the Hellenists in the Primitive Church, 1958; R. A. Stewart, Rabbinic Theology, 1961; H. G. Stigers, "Temple, Jerusalem", ZPEB V 622–56; W. F. Stinespring, "Temple, Jerusalem", IDB IV 534–60; J. T. Townsend, The Jerusalem Temple in New Testament Thought, (Dissertation, Harvard) 1958; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 312–30; D. H. Wallace, "The Essenes and Temple Sacrifice", ThZ 13, 1957, 335–38; G. E. Wright, "The Significance of the Temple in the Ancient Near East", BA 7, 1944, 41–88 in three parts: I. H. H. Nelson, "The Egyptian Temple", 44–54; II. A. L. Oppenheim, "The Mesopotamian Temple", 54–63; III. G. E. Wright, "The Temple in Palestine-Syria", 65–88; J. C. de Young, Jerusalem in the New Testament: The Significance of the City in the History of Redemption and in Eschatology, 1960; M. Haran, Temples and Temple-Service in Ancient Israel, 1978.

(b). O. Betz, "Die Vision des Paulus im Tempel von Jerusalem – Apg. 22, 17–21 als Beitrag zur Deutung des Damaskuserlebnisses", in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Veritas. Festschrift für Gustav Stählin zum 70. Geburtstag, 1970, 113–24; G. Billerbeck, "Ein Tempelgottesdienst in Jesu Tagen", ZNW 55, 1964, 2 ff.; and "Ein Synagogengottesdienst in Jesu Tagen", ibid., 143 ff.; J. Bonsirven, Le Judaïsme palestiniens au Temps de Jésus-Christ, 1950; and Textes rabbiniques des deux premiers Siècles chrétiens, 1955; W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums im späthellenistischen Zeitalter, ed. H. Gressmann, 1926; T. A. Busch, Der Tempel von Jerusalem, 1970; J. Daniélou, Le Signe du Temple ou la Présence de Dieu, 1942; and "Le Symbolisme cosmique du Temple de Jérusalem", in Symbolisme Cosmique et Monuments Religieux, 1953, 61 ff.; J. W. Doeve, "Purification du Temple et Dessèchement du Figuier", NTS 1, 1954–55, 297–308; M. Fraeyman, "La Spiritualisation de l'Idée du Temple dans les Épîtres Pauliniennes", Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 23, 1947, 378–412; K. Galling, "Das Allerheiligste in Salomon's Tempel", Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society 12, 1932, 43–46; and "Tempel", *RGG*³ VI 681 ff.; J. Jeremias, "Die 'Zinne' des Tempels", Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 59, 1936, 195–208; W. Kornfeld, "Der Symbolismus der Tempelsäulen", ZAW 74, 1962, 50–57; E. Lohse, "Tempel und Synagoge", in H. J. Schultz, ed., Kontexte, III, 1966, 66 ff.; S. Mender, "Die Tempelreinigung", ZNW 47, 1956, 93–112; N. Poulsou, König und Tempel im Glaubenszeugnis des Alien Testaments, 1967; M. Schmidt, Prophet und Tempel. Eine Studie zum Problem der Gottesnähe im Alten Testament, 1948; M. Simon, "Le Discours de Jésus sur la Ruine du Temple", RB 56, 1949, 70–75; and "Retour du Christ et Réconstruction du Temple dans la Pensée Chrétienne Primitive", in Aux Sources de la Tradition Chrétienne. Mélanges M. Goguel, 1950, 247–57; E. Trocmé, "L'Expulsion des Marchands du Temple", NTS 15, 1968–69, 1–22; L. H. Vincent, "Le Caractère du Temple de Salomon", Mélanges A. Robert, 1957, 137–48; L. H. Vincent and A. M. Stève, Jérusalem de l'Ancien Testament, II–III, 1956, 373–610; N. Walter, "Tempelzerstörung und synoptische Apokalypse", ZNW 57, 1966, 38 ff.; H. Wenschkewitz, "Die Spiritualisierung der Kultusbegriffe Tempel, Priester und Opfer im Neuen Testament", Angelos 4, 1932, 77–230; C. Westermann, "Tempel", EKL III 1324 ff.

Tempt, Test, Approve

πειρασμός	πειρα (peira), attempt, trial, experiment; πειρασμός (peirasmos), test, trial, tempting, temptation; πειράω (peiraō), try, attempt, endeavour; πειράζω (peirazō), try, test, put on trial, tempt; ἐκπειράζω (ekpeirazō), put to the test, try, tempt; ἀπειραστός (apeirastos), without temptation, untempted.
-----------	---

CL The noun peira, attempt (Pindar), and the vb. peiraō, to test, try (Homer, Il. 8, 8), together with the intensive form (rare in cl. Gk.) peirazō, to tempt someone, put to the test (Homer, Od. 9, 281), come from the root per (cf. Lat. per). They are related to peraō, to drive across, pass through, to strive to get through or over, and express an intention which includes a certain element of resolution. Thus peiraō and peirazō convey the general meaning of to try, and in view of the effort required, to exert oneself, strive, undertake. Through the aspect of carrying through the desire, and the method of doing so, peirazō acquired the meaning of to try out, make trial of, test, investigate, look into. Referring to competition against other persons, peiraō, usually in mid. or passive, means to measure oneself against someone, to try one's luck, to strive for someone's favour, to woo someone, to lead into temptation (especially in the sense of unchastity), to venture an attack on someone; then, to get to know by experience, to experience.

Similarly to the vbs., the noun peira means attempt, trial, test, attempt at, attack, risk, experience, knowledge. peirasmos means a medical test (first used by Dioscorides, De Materia Medica, Preface 5, in the 1st cent. A.D.). ekpeirazō, to tempt, and apeirastos, untempted, are lacking in cl. Gk.

OT 1. In the LXX peirazō and peiraō stand exclusively for nasâh in the piel form of the vb. (Gen. 22:1; Exod. 15:25; 16:4; 17:2, 7; 20:20; Num. 14:22; Deut. 4:34; 8:2; 13:4[3]; 33:8; Jdg. 2:22; 3:1, 4; 6:39; 1 Sam. 17:39; 1 Ki. 10:1; 2 Chr. 9:1; 32:31; Pss. 26[25]:2; 78[77]:41, 56; 95[94]:9; 106[105]:14; Eccl. 2:1; 7:23[24]; Isa. 7:12; Dan. 1:12, 14). It also occurs in the apocryphal books and some canonical writings without Heb. equivalent (Tob. 12:14; Jud. 8:12, 25 f.; Ps. 35[34]:16; Prov. 26:18; Wis. 1:2; 2:17, 24; 3:5; 11:9; 12:26; 19:5; Sir. 18:23; 34[31]:10; 37:27; 39:4; Dan. 12:10; 1 Macc. 1:15; 12:10; 2 Macc. 2:23; 10:12; 11:19; 3 Macc. 1:25; 2:32; 4 Macc. 9:7; 12:3; 15:16). Similarly ekpeirazō stands exclusively for nâsâh in the piel (Deut. 6:16; 8:2, 16; Ps. 78[77]:18). peirasmos stands for the equivalent noun massâh (Exod. 17:7; Deut. 4:34; 6:16; 7:19; 9:22; 29:2[3]; Ps. 95[94]:8). It is also found for 'inyân, occupation, task (Eccl. 3:10; 4:8; 5:2, 13; 8:16), and without equivalent in non-canonical writings (Sir. 2:1; 27:5, 7; 33[36]:1; 1 Macc. 2:52).

2. The terms are found in their purely secular senses: to try to do something (Deut. 4:34; 28:56; Jdg. 6:39; 1 Sam. 17:39); to make a test of, try something out (Eccl. 2:1; 7:23; Dan. 1:12); to test, put to the proof (1 Ki. 10:1; 2 Chr. 9:1; Wis. 2:17); and the noun peirasmos in the sense of trial (Deut. 7:19; 29:2[3]).

3. In the OT, especially in Deut. and writings reflecting the outlook of Deut., the ideas of tempting and putting to the test become religious concepts. Unbelief and presumption, disobedience and murmuring among the people constitute a challenge to Yahweh, putting him to the test. Conversely, Yahweh may put his people to the test. B. Gerhardsson points out that the vb. nâsâh "seems to imply primarily a testing of the partner in the covenant to see whether he is keeping his side of the agreement. . . . It is important to note that JHWH is not said to test heathen people, but only his own, the people of his own possession. When the term is used of an individual, it is always a pious man, never an ungodly one. Conversely, when Israel is the subject of the verb, it is always JHWH and not the Baals who are tested. The covenant means that JHWH will be the God of his covenant people, will be 'near them', 'in their midst', 'with them' and will fulfil all the obligations that pertain to divinity; giving to his people all that belongs to the divine blessing (brkh): life, health, power, food, fertility, riches, protection, victory etc. (Exod. 6:7; 19:3 ff.; 29:49 ff.;

Lev. 26:11 f.; Deut. 28:1–14; Ezr. 37:2 ff. etc.). The people's obligations are defined in such words as to fear and love God, to worship and honour him, to be faithful to him, to listen to his voice, and to obey his word, to walk after his commandments, to live in his law etc. 'Faith' is a vital element here; faith meaning to 'treat JHWH as reliable' (h'myn, pisteuein), to trust him, to believe that he will faithfully and lovingly keep his promises and honour his 'obligations'. What is required of the people in general is also required of each member individually" (The Testing of God's Son (Matt. 4:1–11 & Par): An Analysis of an Early Christian Midrash, Coniectanea Biblica, New Testament Series 2:1, 1966, 26 f.).

Thus Gerhardsson argues that when the OT speaks of Yahweh testing his covenant son, it means that God arranges a test to find out whether his son is true to the covenant (op. cit., 27). The classic example is the testing of → Abraham by commanding him to offer the covenant son of promise, Isaac (Gen. 22). In Exod. 16:4 Yahweh tells → Moses of his decision to let → bread rain down from heaven for the people who are to gather only enough for each day "that I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law or not" (cf. Exod. 20:20). Connected with this testing or proving, Gerhardsson sees the formula that God tests "that he might know" (ld't) whether his chosen one is true or not (ibid.). Thus Deut. 8:2 gives the injunction: "And you shall remember all the way which the LORD your God has led you these forty years in the wilderness, that he might humble you, testing you to know what was in your heart, whether you would keep his commandments, or not." Deut. 13:1–5 recognizes the possibility of false prophets performing wonders in order to lead the people astray (→ Miracle; → Magic). The people are to test such men not by questioning whether the wonder has actually occurred but by asking whether their teaching agrees with the commandments that Israel has received. In all this Yahweh "is testing you, to know whether you love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul" (Deut. 13:3). In Jdg. Yahweh tests Israel that he may know "whether they will take care to walk in the way of the LORD as their fathers did, or not" (Jdg. 2:22; cf. 3:1, 4 ff.). In 2 Chr. 32:31 Yahweh tests his covenant son, king Hezekiah, "to know all that was in his heart." For other instances of testing see Deut. 33:8 (Levi); Jud. 8:26 (Isaac); Pss. 26[25]:2; 35[34]:16; Wis. 3:5; 11:9; Sir. 33:1 (the godly and righteous man).

The vb. nāsāh does not actually occur in Job, but the theme is present now making use of → Satan. "Satan has received permission from God to take away from righteous Job all that he had received from God. The test was to reveal whether Job would stand fast by his innocence, honesty and faith, or whether in such a situation he would reveal himself unrighteous by breaking out into curses against God" (B. Gerhardsson, op. cit., 28).

On the other hand, Israel, God's covenant son, is also said to tempt God. "Tempting God" is the inexplicable way for God's people to behave. Nevertheless it occurred and is described in Ps. 78(77):40 f. "How often they rebelled against him in the wilderness and grieved him in the desert! They tested him again and again, and provoked the Holy One of Israel" (cf. Num. 14:22; Ps. 106[105]:14; Isa. 7:12; Mal. 3:15). The classic instance for the tempting of God was at Massah (which the LXX translates by peirasmos, testing), a place from the period of wandering in the → wilderness (Deut. 6:16; 9:22; 33:8; Ps. 95[94]:8; in the last two instances Massah being linked with Meribah). This brings in a link with the testing of God in Exod.

17:2, 7, where the name Massah is identified with Meribah as titles of the same place. "You shall not put the LORD your God to the test" is the negative form of the commandment to worship the one God and him alone (Deut. 6:16; cf. also Sir. 18:23). God allows himself to be found by those who are obedient to this commandment (Wis. 1:2).

4. Testing is one of the means by which God carries out his saving purposes. The person concerned often does not know until afterwards whether or why God has been testing him, when he is enabled to come out of tribulation strong in faith, having been preserved, proved, purified, disciplined and taught. Abraham later became an oft-quoted example of the man kept through great testing (Apc. Abr.; Jub. 17–19). Israel also knew about defeat, when the testing caused people to be led astray and to fall away from God. God is the one who works in everything, and therefore he is the one who tests. This was required by the strongly monotheistic idea of God. In his activity within history the one God reveals himself by various attributes. The man who belongs to God's people strives to know these attributes, to acquire the knowledge of God in grace and in judgment.

This idea of God was later softened by dualistic influences, but was not removed. Permitted by God, taken into his service, let loose for a while, an opposing power comes into play, whose object is to cause man to fall away from God (Gen. 3:1 ff.; Job 1:11 f.; 2:6 f.; → Satan).

5. (a) Rabbinic literature exhibits a further development of the tendency of Satan to become independent in his rôle as tempter. He is depicted as the head of a kingdom opposed to God, which tries to frustrate God's saving purposes by leading man into sin and accusing him before God (Tanh. 40b; Deut. R. 11; Gen. R. 55 f.; Sanhedrin 89b). In this he makes use of the evil impulse already present in man, which now becomes the gate through which temptation makes its inroads (Baba Bathra 16; Num. R. 20).

(b) In the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha the independence of the evil one is still more strongly marked. Suffering and evil are now felt to be so oppressive and devilish that it is felt inappropriate to attribute them any longer to God. The Satanic tempter can even cause angels to fall away (Eth. Enoch 6 and 19), incite God against Abraham (Jub. 17), and take revenge on God by tempting his creatures (Life Adam 11–16). In Test. XII seven evil spirits are engaged in tempting. If man makes the right decision in the battle between light and darkness, he can defend himself against temptation.

(c) In the Qumran texts the world is depicted as the sphere of the dominion of Belial, the angel of darkness. Believers live here under constant temptation and trial, especially through affliction and persecution (1QS 3:24). In such contexts the terms chiefly used are tā'āh, to lead astray (hiph.) (1QpHab 10:9; 1QS 5:4, 11; 11:1; 1QH 4:12, 25; 1Q14 11:1; 4QpHos 2:5; 6QD 3:3; CD 1:15; 2:13, 17; 3:1, 4, 14; 4:1; 5:20; 12:3; and the noun form in 1QS 3:21; 1QH 2:14; 4:12, 16, 20), and kāšal, to cause to stumble (hiph.) (1QpHab 11:8; 1QS 3:24; 11:12; 1QM 14:5; 1QH 5:28, 36; 8:36; 16:5; 17:23; 4Qflor 1:8; CD 2:17).

NT In the NT the intensive form peirazō, to try, test, put on trial, tempt, is used 36 times (12 times in the Synoptic Gospels exclusively for the temptation of Jesus by Satan or Jesus' opponents, cf. Heb. 2:18; 4:15; once in Jn.; 5 times in Acts; 7 times in Paul; 6 times in Heb.; 4 times in Jas. and 3 times in Rev.). It occurs in a non-religious sense and also for the temptation of Christians. ekpeirazō is used four times in the same sense (Matt. 4:7 par. Lk. 4:12; Lk. 10:25; 1 Cor. 10:9); and once peiraomai, to try (Acts 26:21). New is the verbal adj. apeirastos, incapable of temptation (Jas. 1:13). The use of the noun peirasmōs, temptation, trial, is even more frequent (21 times) than in the LXX (6 times in Lk.; 4 in Paul; twice each in Matt., Jas. and 1 Pet.; once each in Mk., Acts, Heb., 2 Pet. and Rev.). But peira, attempt, trial, is found only in Heb. 11:29 and 36.

1. Examples of the secular sense are: to make an attempt (Heb. 11:29), to get experience of (Heb. 11:36), to attempt (Acts 9:26; 16:7; 24:6), to test (2 Cor. 13:5; Rev. 2:2), trials, hostilities (Acts 20:19). For statements about the opponents of Jesus wanting to put him to the test see 4, below. Four passages contain the OT ideas of testing God (1 Cor. 10:9; cf. Ps. 78[77]:18; Heb. 3:8 f.; cf. Ps. 95[94]:8 f.; Acts 5:9; 15:10). Matt. 4:7 par. Lk. 4:12 cite Deut. 6:16.

2. The world of ideas behind peirasmōs, temptation, trial, as it is used in the NT in the religious sense, is generally dependent on the OT. It also has much in common with the views of the Essenes, although the cosmic dualism of Qumran is not to be found in the NT. Here, as at Qumran, believers are constantly being tempted to → fall away from God. They must protect themselves with spiritual armour (Eph. 6:10–17) against the attacks of the “prince of this world” (Jn. 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; cf. Matt. 9:34; 12:24; 1 Cor. 2:6, 8; Eph. 2:2), and stand firm, sober, watchful (1 Pet. 5:8) and in prayer (Eph. 6:18 ff.). In this way the willing → spirit can keep control of the weak → flesh, so that the beleaguered entry gate for Satanic temptations may remain closed (Mk. 14:38). The weakness of the flesh is also described as → desire (epithymia), which entices man into temptation (Jas. 1:14), so that the power of the evil one closes over him like a trap (pagis, 1 Tim. 6:9). A new element, as against the OT, is the constant danger of falling into sin: Satan can use all sorts of things to lead us into temptation (1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Thess. 3:5). Anything can become a temptation (Gal. 6:1). In Gal. 4:14 two thoughts are intertwined: “and though my condition was a trial to you, you did not scorn or despise me, but received me as an angel of God, as Jesus Christ.” The meaning is: You have overcome the temptation which my illness presented to you, and have not rejected me contemptuously in my illness. The illness may have been connected with Paul’s eyes (Gal. 4:15; cf. 6:11) and may have been his “thorn in the flesh” (2 Cor. 12:7; → Fruit, art. skolops). The temptation which threatens the church at Corinth has hitherto been such as man can bear (1 Cor. 10:13). It lies in apparently innocuous association with pagans, which can however lead to idolatry and immorality (cf. vv. 7 f. and the earlier discussions of immorality in chs. 5–7 and eating meat offered to idols in ch. 8).

3. To have to suffer as a Christian is a form of testing. But it can also be a mark of true discipleship and therefore a ground for joy (1 Pet. 1:6; 4:12), especially when one knows, by looking for instance back to the great examples of Abraham and Job, that it is possible to emerge from temptation approved and preserved in → patience (Jas. 1:2). At the end of the testing God never turns out to be an enemy, but one who rewards (Jas. 1:12).

In stark contrast to any attempt to hold God responsible for human failures, Jas. maintains that God, himself apeirastos, incapable of being tempted by the evil one, tempts no one (Jas. 1:13). Rather, does he help and rescue from temptation (2 Pet.

2:9; 1 Cor. 10:13). The question of the origin of temptation is left open.

Jesus commanded his disciples to pray against temptation (Mk. 14:38), and taught them to ask the Father, "Lead us not into temptation [kai mē eisenenkēs hēmas eis peirasmon], but deliver us from evil" (Matt. 6:13). The par. in Lk. 5:4 omits the second clause. Here God, having been asked for the forgiveness of sins, is asked not to allow his church to come into the kind of Satanic temptation which would lead them to fall away, but to rescue them from the power of the evil one and so let his → kingdom come. The ultimate coming of God's rule cannot be separated from the present fight against the kingdom of the tempter. Everyday temptations (Lk. 8:13) as well as the eschatological tribulations and temptations to go astray (Mk. 13:22; Rev. 2:10), which will come upon all the inhabitants of the earth (Rev. 3:10), are summed up in the prayer: "Lead us not into temptation."

J. Jeremias argues that we are not to think of God as the source of the temptation (The Prayers of Jesus, SBT Second Series 6, 1967, 104) and that Jas. 1:13 is a rejection of this misunderstanding. He sees the petition in the light of an ancient Jewish evening prayer: "Lead my foot not into the power of sin, And bring me not into the power of iniquity, And not into the power of temptation, And not into the power of anything shameful" (b. Ber. 60b; cf. op. cit., 105). The prayer has in view God's permission which allows things to happen. It is not a prayer to be preserved from temptation but to be preserved in temptation. Jeremias finds corroboration of this in an extra-canonical saying of Jesus allegedly uttered on his last evening prior to the prayer in Gethsemane: "No one can obtain the kingdom of heaven who has not passed through temptation" (Tertullian, De Baptismo 20, 2; cf. J. Jeremias, Unknown Sayings of Jesus, 1964², 73 ff.). This accords with Jeremias's interpretation of peirasmos which "does not mean the little temptations or testings of everyday life, but the final great Testing which stands at the door and will extend over the whole earth – the disclosure of the mystery of evil, the revelation of the Antichrist, the abomination of desolation (when Satan stands in God's place), the final persecution and testing of God's saints by pseudo-prophets and false saviours. What is in danger is not moral integrity, but faith itself. The final trial at the end is apostasy! Who can escape? The concluding petition of the Lord's Prayer therefore says, 'O Lord, preserve us from falling away, from apostasy'" (op. cit., 105 f.; cf. E. Lohmeyer, The Lord's Prayer, 1965, 191–208). As such, Jeremias claims, it has no parallels in the OT (op. cit., 106). If, on the other hand, we view the petition in the light of the OT teaching on the testing of God's sons within the covenant relationship, there is a sense in which God may be said to be the one who tests (cf. above OT 3). Moreover, it could be said to be a plea to be spared the rigour of a test which could lead to apostasy (cf. Matt. 24:21 f. par. Mk. 13:19 f.; Lk. 21:24; cf. Dan. 12:1; Zech. 12:3). Perhaps the kind of temptation envisaged is that described in Lk. 22:28–34: "'You are those who have continued with me in my trials [peirasmois]; as my Father appointed a kingdom for me so do I appoint for you that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Simon, Simon, behold, Satan demanded to have you, that he might sift you like wheat, but I have prayed for you that your faith may not fail; and when you have turned again, strengthen your brethren'. . . He said, 'I tell you, Peter, the cock will not crow this day, until you three times deny that you know me'" (cf. on Peter's denial Matt. 26:30–35 par. Mk. 14:26–31; Matt. 26:57–75 par. Mk.

14:53–72; Lk. 22:54–71; Jn. 18:17, 25 ff.). Whereas Peter was spared, Judas was not, although paradoxically he sought to save his life by his betrayal (Matt. 26:20–25 par. Mk. 14:17–21, Lk. 22:14, 21 ff.; Jn. 13:2 ff.; Matt. 27:3–10; cf. B. Gärtner, Iscariot, Facet Books, Biblical Series 29, 1971). The sifting (siniasai) by → Satan may be compared with the winnowing of the wheat by Jesus foretold by John the Baptist (Matt. 3:12 par. Lk. 3:17). But in Satan's case the end is destruction, whereas in Jesus' it is the gathering of the wheat into the granary and the destruction of the chaff.

4. Jesus was the subject of temptation throughout his life. This is brought out particularly by Lk. (4:13; 22:28) and Heb. (2:18; 4:15). For this very reason he can help his disciples in their temptations. Because he is without sin, the power of Satan is constantly provoked to attack him in many forms. When his opponents tried to take him in with trick-questions, it was only a covering action (Mk. 10:2; 12:15; Matt. 22:35; Lk. 10:25; Jn. 8:6). Because of false, human expectations among the people, the Pharisees and the disciples were ever seeking to appropriate Jesus. They thus represent temptations and hindrances for the messiah, who is obedient to God (Mk. 8:11 par. Matt. 16:1; 16:22 f.; Lk. 11:16). In the struggle in Gethsemane Jesus even prays the Father to remove the cup from him (Mk. 14:35 ff.).

The nature of the constant temptations in the life of Jesus is epitomized in the story of the temptations which preceded Jesus' public ministry (Matt. 4:1–11 par. Mk. 1:12 f.; Lk. 4:1–13). All three evangelists point out that it was the → Spirit which led Jesus into the → wilderness where he was tempted by → Satan. Matt.'s infinitive clause suggests that this was the purpose of the Spirit's leading; Matt. and Lk. use the word diabolos (→ Accuse); Mk. has Satanas.

The scene of the temptation recalls the testing of Israel as God's son in the wilderness wanderings prior to entry into the promised land (cf. Deut. 6–8). Indeed, B. Gerhardsson sees the story as a Christian midrash, composed very early on by a Christian scribe versed in Pharisaic exegesis (op. cit., 79 ff.; cf. Acts 15:5). This, however, must remain a piece of speculation. On the other hand, there is a parallel between the forty years of wilderness wandering and the forty days of Jesus in the desert (cf. the forty years of wandering with the forty days of spying out the land in Num. 14:34; cf. also Deut. 8:2; 9:18; Ezek. 4:5 f.; and Elijah's forty days without food, 1 Ki. 19:8). Gerhardsson sees the forty days as "a set phrase from the traditional vocabulary of fasting" (op. cit., 43). But it may also be seen in the light of the OT precedents of testing and preparation in the service of God. Jesus' action is a recapitulation of the OT precedents and as such is a fulfilment comparable with the other instances of fulfilment noted by Matt. (→ Fullness, art. plēroō NT).

The first temptation is not merely an invitation to perform a spectacular miracle for selfish ends by turning stones into → bread. It is to be seen against the background of OT promises of how Yahweh provides food for his children (cf. Pss. 23:1; 33:18 f.; 34:10; 37:19; 104:27 f.; 145:15; 146:7; Deut. 2:7; 28:1–14; Neh. 9:21). Yahweh gave his people manna and quails, but they resented what they had been given once their immediate needs were satisfied (Exod. 16:2 ff.; Num. 11:4 ff., 33 f.; 21:4 ff.; Deut. 8:2 ff.; 9:22; 29:5; Ps. 78:18 ff., 26 ff.). Jesus' reply to this temptation is taken from a passage which recalls the wilderness wanderings and Yahweh's provision of manna: "And he humbled you and let you hunger and fed you with manna, which you did not know, nor did your fathers know; that he might make you know that man does not live by bread alone, but that man lives by everything that proceeds out of the mouth of the LORD" (Deut. 8:3; cf. Matt. 4:4 and Lk. 4:4). Gerhardsson sees the temptation as "a test designed to discipline the Son of God and to reveal what lies in his heart. Israel did not withstand this temptation; the people were seized with craving, discontent, doubt and unbelief, and grumbled because they wanted a different kind of food to the divine sustenance God was giving them. They showed that their heart was divided by craving and unbelief; the evil inclination had gained supremacy over their heart, to use the late Jewish terminology. The tempter desires to entice Jesus into this sin" (op. cit., 51). It is not without significance that the Sermon on the Mount records the saying: "Or what man of you, if his son asks him for a loaf, will give him a stone?" (Matt. 7:9).

The second temptation in Matt.'s account and the third in Lk.'s is set on the pinnacle of the temple. As its background Gerhardsson sees the promises of divine protection in the wilderness wanderings (op. cit., 54 ff.). God set before his son Israel a blessing and a curse (Deut. 11:26 ff.; 27:14–30:20; cf. 8:14 ff.). To the blessing belonged protection from all kinds of danger. If Israel kept the covenant, this protection was his. Deut. 32:10 ff. and Exod. 19:4 ff. speak of Yahweh bearing Israel on eagles' wings. His foot is said not to have swollen during the forty years (Deut. 8:4; 29:4; cf. Neh. 9:21). Yahweh is said to have borne his people as a man bears his son (Deut. 1:31; cf. Num. 11:12 f.; Isa. 46:3 f.; Hos. 11:3). But the protection was not confined to the wilderness generation. "The temple is the place par excellence where this protection is effective, for it is there that the divine presence is concentrated. We may notice here that the role played by the temple is foreshadowed in the wilderness passages, particularly in Deuteronomy. The object of all the journeyings is to reach Canaan, and in particular 'the place which JHWH your God will choose' as his resting place (cf. Deut. 12:18, 21; 14:23 ff.; 15:20; 16:2, 6, 11, 16; 17:8, 10 etc.)" (B. Gerhardsson, op. cit., 56).

The temple was an inviolable place of sanctuary (cf. M. Löhr, Das Asylwesen im Alten Testament, 1930; N. M. Nicolosky, "Das Asylrecht in Israel", ZAW 7, 1930, 146–75; M. Greenberg, "The Biblical Conception of Asylum", JBL 78, 1959, 125–32). Yahweh's protection is a recurrent theme of the Pss. (cf. Pss. 17:8; 57:2; 61:5; 63:8), and this is often expressly related to the temple as the focal point of holiness, health and power (cf. Pss. 36:8 f.; 61:5). This is particularly true of Ps. 91 which was associated with both the temple and the wilderness wanderings by the rabbis (Midrash Teh. 91; cf. Deut. 6–8). It is on the basis of Ps. 91:11 f. that Satan issues the temptation to Jesus to cast himself from the "wing" of the temple: "For he will give his angels charge of you to guard you in all your ways. On their hands they will bear you up, lest you dash your foot against a stone" (cf. Matt. 4:6; Lk. 4:10 f.). There is probably a play on words between the "wing" (pterygion) of the temple and the clause "under his wings [pterygas] you will find refuge" (Ps. 91:4; → Temple, art. pterygion). This temptation is not simply a demand, like that of the Pharisees, for a spectacular sign. "Satan wants Jesus to tempt God, i.e. demand from God a token that he is going to keep his covenantal promises. . . . Satan exhorts Jesus to endanger himself by his own act, so as to challenge God to save his life in accordance with the covenant promises" (B. Gerhardsson, op. cit., 60). But the temptation is rejected by a quotation, which like the previous one, is taken from Deut.: "You shall not tempt the Lord your God" (Matt. 4:7 par. Lk. 4:12, citing Deut. 6:16 in the sing.

instead of the MT plur.). The Deut. passage adds “as you tested him at Massah” (cf. above, OT 3). The command is in fact the negative form of the great commandment which is stated in the same chapter of Deut.: “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD; and you shall love the LORD your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might” (Deut. 6:4 f.; → Command; → Love). To have put God to the test in this way would have been to break the great commandment. On the other hand, the power of the disciples over the → demons is itself a sign that the promises of Ps. 91 are being honoured by God. Ps. 91:13 is quoted at Lk. 10:19, where the disciples’ power over the enemy is seen as a fulfilment of the Ps. and evidence of the fall of Satan. However, as Gerhardsson argues, Jesus’ reluctance to tempt God is itself the expression of the fact that “he is ready, in obedience to God, to lose his life” (op. cit., 61).

In the third temptation in Matt. “the devil took him to a very high mountain, and showed him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them; and he said to him, ‘All these I will give you, if you will fall down and worship me’ ” (Matt. 4:8 f. par. Lk. 4:5 f., where it is the second temptation). The passage is rich in OT associations. In Deut. 34:1–4 Moses went up from the plain of Moab to Mount Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, where Yahweh showed him the promised land and said: “This is the land of which I swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, ‘I will give it to your descendants.’ I have let you see it with your eyes, but you shall not go over there” (v. 4). Earlier Moses was given a similar view of the land but forbidden to go over the Jordan (Deut. 3:27). This is followed by Moses’ speech depicting the riches awaiting the Israelites in the promised land and commanding them not to allow the riches to cause them to forget Yahweh and worship other gods (Deut. 6 and 8). D. Daube has drawn attention to the ancient legal custom on conveying property, particularly land, for the vendor to take the buyer to some vantage point, to assure him of his desire to transfer it, letting the buyer see it and receive it with his eyes (Studies in Biblical Law, 1947, 24–39). In other contexts mountains could be the scene of revelation, as in the case of Sinai (Exod. 19:3 ff.; 34:2 ff.), but also the scene of idolatrous worship (Deut. 12:1 ff.).

In Deut. there is also the theme of the riches of the promised land and the warning not to forget Yahweh on this account and follow other gods. Such a warning immediately follows the Shema and precedes the command not to put Yahweh to the test (Deut. 6:16) which Jesus quoted in repulsing the temptation to cast himself from the temple and also the command by which he rejects the present temptation (Deut. 6:13). A parallel passage occurs in Deut. 8 (see especially vv. 8, 11, 14, 19). Deut. 13:1–5 warns against prophets and dreamers of dreams who perform miracles in order to lead the people away from Yahweh to worship other gods. Israel is not to be deceived by the miracles; he should keep to the commandments of Yahweh and put such men to death. Despite these warnings Israel did in fact go astray in the manner foreseen (Deut. 9:16; 31:20; 32:15 ff.; cf. Exod. 32 and 1 Cor. 10). Idolatry and demon worship are linked in Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:37 f.; Eth. Enoch 99:7; Mart. Isa. 2:3 ff.

The fact that this background lies behind the temptation is confirmed by the fact that Jesus resists it by citing a passage which is directly concerned with this danger to Israel: “Then Jesus said to him, ‘Begone, Satan! for it is written, “You shall worship the Lord your God and him only shall you serve” ’ ” (Matt 4:10 par. Lk.

4:7; cf. Deut. 6:13). Whereas Israel as the son of God had succumbed to this temptation, Jesus as the Son of God overcame it by living by God's word, just as Israel should have done. By rejecting the false promise of the riches of the promised land, Jesus could enter into his true inheritance as the Son of God, though this was by the way of the cross. In this sense Jesus was living by the third beatitude, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5:5; → Inheritance; → Humility, art. pray's NT 2). The fulfilment of the promise lay in a way very different from that envisaged by Satan. The promises of Satan are empty promises, for nothing can be secured by serving him. This may be compared with the suggestion of Peter that Jesus should not go to Jerusalem which is met with the reply, "Get behind me, Satan! You are a hindrance to me; for you are not on the side of God, but of men" (Matt. 16:23; cf. Mk. 8:33). In both cases the rejection of the temptation led to hardship and suffering. But ultimately it led to the defeat of Satan. The evangelist's comment, "The devil left him, and behold, angels came and ministered to him" (Matt. 4:11) has a parallel in Test. Naph. 8:4 (cf. also Test. Iss. 7 and Test. Ben. 5 and 6).

The temptations of Jesus recapitulate, in his individual life as the Son of God, the temptations of the nation of Israel in their corporate life as the son of God. The three forms of the temptation focus on the three areas of life which were vital to Israel as the covenant pilgrim people seeking the promised land: sustenance, protection and all that the land symbolized in terms of prosperity and security. In rejecting the temptations Jesus proved to be the true Son of God, for he not only rejected them but he did so by appealing to the word of God. In short, he lived by the word of God (cf. Matt. 4:4 with 5:17 f.). It was precisely at this point that Israel had failed (cf. Matt. 15:7 ff. with Isa. 29:13). The temptation stories thus vindicate the declaration of the "voice from heaven" heard directly after the baptism of Jesus, which immediately precedes the temptation narratives: "This is my beloved Son, with whom I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17 par. Mk. 1:11; cf. Isa. 42:1; 44:2; Lk. 3:22 cf. Ps. 2:7). By so doing Jesus gains the victory over Satan and makes it possible for his people to inherit the promises of God. By placing the temptation concerning the kingdoms of the world at the climax of the temptations, Matt. sees the victory here in the light of the triumph of the → kingdom of heaven over the kingdom of this world which in turn supersedes the promises to Israel concerning the land. His Gospel ends with the words of the risen Christ showing that Jesus now has the authority legitimately which Satan promised deceitfully: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, to the close of the age" (Matt. 28:18 ff.). In Lk. the temptation set in the temple comes at the climax. Perhaps this is to be explained in the light of the significance of the temple in the Gospel of Luke, where it is particularly prominent as the place of revelation (→ Temple, art. to hieron NT).

With regard to Mk., E. Best observes: "For Mark the Devil is defeated so far as the life of Jesus is concerned at the Temptation; in this conclusive contest Satan is bound and Jesus is thereafter able to reduce to obedience evil-spiritual powers, the demons which possess men and evil-cosmic forces met in sea storms. This encounter with the Devil in the Temptation is the decisive meeting of the forces of light and darkness, of order and chaos, of good and evil; this struggle which lay behind so much of the Old Testament and of the religion of the Near East of the period has now had its issue" (The Temptation and the Passion: The Markan Soteriology, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 2, 1965, 190).

W. Schneider, C. Brown

δόκιμος	δόκιμος (dokimos), tested, approved, genuine, esteemed; δοκιμάζω (dokimazō), test, accept as proved, approve; δοκιμασία (dokimasia), test; δοκίμιον (dokimion), testing, means of testing, adj. genuine; ἀδόκιμος (adokimos), not standing the test, worthless, disqualified, unfit, reprehensible; ἀποδοκιμάζω (apodokimazō), reject, declare useless; δοκιμή (dokimē), the quality of being approved, hence character.
---------	---

CL The root dek-, dechomai, accept, gives two verbal derivatives dokeō and dokaō.

The former means (intrans.) to appear, have the appearance, (trans.) to think, believe, consider right; the latter means expect. Derivatives of the former are: (a) dokimos, trustworthy, reliable, tested, recognized, used as a technical term for genuine, current coinage, but also applied to persons enjoying general esteem; (b) adokimos, untested, not respected; (c) indirectly also dokimion, test, probation; (d) from dokimos are also derived dokimazō, test, pronounce good, establish by trial, recognize, and apodokimazō, disapprove of, reject, blame; dokimasis and dokimasia, investigation, testing (preparatory to installing in an office); dokimē, approved character, trial.

OT The LXX uses dokimos only to recognize coins as valid currency (Prov. 25:4; Isa. 1:22 for Heb. sîg, dross). Hence worthless money or metal is called adokimos. dokimazō most often represents Heb. bāhan, test for genuineness by fire. It is transferred to God, who tests men. In the Pss. the prayer that God may test the one who is praying (17[16]:3; 26[25]:2; 139[138]:1, 23 hāqar) is an expression of complete trust. In the prophets, however, God's threat of testing becomes equivalent to judgment (Jer. 9:6[7]; Zech. 13:9, RSV "refine"). There is always a consciousness of the connexion with testing by fire. The same usage is found in the writings of late Jud. Other instances of dokimazō are Jdg. 7:4; 1 Esd. 9:40; Pss. 66(65):10; 68(67):30; 81(80):7; 95(94):9; Prov. 8:10; 17:3; 27:21; Wis. 1:3; 2:19; 3:6; 11:10; Sir. 2:5; 24:12; 27:5; 31(34):10, 26; 39:34; 42:8; Zech. 11:13; Jer. 6:27; 11:20; 12:3; 17:10; 20:12; 2 Macc. 1:34; 4:3; 3 Macc. 2:6; 4 Macc. 17:12.

NT In the NT dokimos is used mostly by Paul in the sense of recognized, approved, accepted (Rom. 14:18; 16:10; 1 Cor. 11:19; 2 Cor. 10:18); correspondingly adokimos means worthless, rejected, not in the sense of that which is seen from the first to be unsuitable (not even in Heb. 6:8), but meaning that which has not stood the test, that which has been shown to be a sham, and has therefore been rejected (Rom. 1:28; 1 Cor. 9:27; 2 Cor. 13:5; 2 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 1:16). dokimazō is used as in secular Gk. It is used, mostly by Paul, with the meaning: (a) interpret, test (Lk. 12:56; 1 Cor. 3:13), oneself (1 Cor. 11:28; 2 Cor. 13:5; Gal. 6:4), what is important (Rom. 2:18; 12:2; Eph. 5:10; Phil. 1:10), all things (1 Thess. 5:21), the spirits (1 Jn. 4:1), for the office of deacon (1 Tim. 3:10) with the same force as peirazō (2 Cor. 13:5) and epiginōskō (2 Cor. 6:9); (b) the result of testing is either dokimazō, recognize, approve (Rom. 14:22; 1 Cor. 16:3; 2 Cor. 8:22; 1 Thess. 2:4) or apodokimazō, repudiate, reject (Matt. 21:42 par. Mk. 12:10, Lk. 20:17 citing Ps. 118:22 f.; → Rock; 1 Pet. 2:4; Heb. 12:17; Mk. 8:31 par. Lk. 9:20 of the Son of Man). dokimē is found with the act. meaning of a test by means of instructions or tribulations (2 Cor. 2:9; 8:2), and with the pass. meaning of the result of the testing of faith (Rom. 5:4; 2 Cor. 9:13; 13:3; Phil. 2:22). dokimion is used for the means of testing (which is how → peirasmoi are considered) in Jas. 1:3. 1 Pet. 1:7 thinks rather of the preservation of the Christian, whose faith is purified like gold in the fire.

1. Everyone to whom God's grace has been entrusted must keep himself in it (cf. also Lk. 19:12–27). The passages of Scripture which speak of testing, trial, recognition and rejection are addressed only to members of the church. Heb. 6:8 speaks of those who by their complete falling away from God have become incapable in themselves of returning and hence of bearing the fruit of repentance and faith. They are thus adokimos, without fruit, rejected (cf. also Heb. 12:17). Hence the soil which bears thorns and thistles (Heb. 6:8) is a picture of those “who have been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, and have become partakers of the Holy Spirit and have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come”, and yet in conscious sin “have crucified the Son of God afresh and hold him up to contempt” (Heb. 6:4 ff.). The church member is adokimos, not having passed the test, unfit, unusable in God's eyes, for out of incomprehensible, irresponsible doubt and disobedience he refuses the fruit of faith which God expects. We find almost the complete reversal of this in passages like Matt. 21:42 par. Mk. 12:10, Lk. 20:17 citing Ps. 118:22 f., and 1 Pet. 2:4, in all of which apodokimazō is used. The stone (Jesus), which the builders (the people of God, the spiritual leaders) found unsuitable and rejected (crucified), in God's eyes was found worthy to become the corner-stone (→ Rock).

2. What matters in testing is that we use God's gifts aright. Timothy, to whom the word of truth had been entrusted, was to show himself as an approved worker (2 Tim. 2:15) by faithful preaching. On the other hand, those who do not honour God according to the knowledge granted them, who reject (ouk edokimasan) knowing him, are given over to a base mind (adokimon noun, Rom. 1:28) and to improper conduct as a punishment. Here we see how closely linked dokimazō is with → peirazō. Both groups of words are concerned with testing. With dokimazō the stress falls on a positive result in which that which is tested passes and is recognized as genuine, but peirazō tends to be more negative and means a temptation to evil, in which lusts (Jas. 1:14), want and affliction (1 Cor. 10:13), or Satan himself (1 Thess. 3:5) through temptation entice one to fall. Hence peirasmos is temptation rather than testing; apeirastos refers rather to the innocent than the untested, and ekpeirazō, tempt, is not used of the testing undergone by men but of the hostile intentions of Satan (Matt. 4:7) or of man (1 Cor. 10:9) to tempt God.

3. God himself tests and passes judgment on the day of judgment. Paul declares in 1 Cor. 3:13 that all service for the church and all the fruit borne by it are subjected to God's testing and verdict in the fire of judgment. The determining factors will be whether faith was created (v. 5) and the church built up (v. 16). He who has stood the test in faith (Jas. 1:12) will receive eternal life as the victor's crown.

4. This test is taking place already in this life. God even now shows himself as the tester of men's hearts (1 Thess. 2:4). So the whole of a Christian's life is subject to the testing scrutiny of God. All depends on our being found as “approved in Christ” (Rom. 16:10). Paul submitted himself to the judgment of God, not to that of man (1 Cor. 9:27; 4:3 ff.), even though men can and should recognize when someone has stood the test (2 Cor. 13:3; Phil. 2:22). The content and goal of Paul’s pastoral care of the individual and community is that they should be found obedient (2 Cor. 2:9).

5. That one has stood the test is manifested in various ways. (a) By a serious effort to know the will of God. The gift of the Holy Spirit enables a man to recognize God’s will (Rom. 12:2) and to test what is well-pleasing to God (Phil. 1:10; Eph. 5:10) and what is best (1 Thess. 5:21). The gift of testing and distinguishing of the spirits (1 Jn. 4:1) is also part of the Christian’s duty.

(b) By one’s loyalty to God. The terms peirazō, dokimazō and epiginōskō are used side by side in 2 Cor. 13:5, so as to move the Corinthians to the crucial task of testing their own faithfulness. If Christ dwells in us, we cannot and may not be adokimos; for if we are, our being Christians is futile.

(c) By one’s love to one’s neighbour. At the end of the section on the collection (2 Cor. 8:9) Paul writes that because of their “testing” in this service many praise God; thereby he shows that such service which is concerned with the needs of the brethren is part of the testing of faith working in love (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4 (a)).

(d) By holding fast to hope in the midst of tribulation. The church is exposed to attacks from within and without, from Satanic powers and godless men. It lives by faith, not by sight. In this position willed by God it maintains its living hope by remaining under God’s hand, by the “overflowing” of the riches given by God and of the goodness created by the Spirit to others (2 Cor. 8:2), by patience (Jas. 1:2 f.) and by overcoming temptations (1 Pet. 1:6 f.).

H. Haarbeck

→ Demon, → Evil, → Fall, → Lead Astray, → Offence, → Satan, → Sin, → Son, → Temple, → Wilderness

(a). J. B. Bauer, “Temptation”, EBT III 903 ff.; E. Best, The Temptation and the Passion: The Markan Soteriology, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 2, 1965; D. Bonhoeffer, Temptation, 1953; W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine, 1974; P. Doble, “Temptations”, ExpT 72, 1960–61, 91 ff.; W. J. Foxell, The Temptation of Jesus, 1920; B. Gerhardsson, The Testing of God’s Son (Matt. 4:1–11 & Par.), Coniectanea Biblica, New Testament Series 2:1, 1966; W. Grundmann, dokimos etc. TDNT II 255–60; C. B. Houk, “The Lord’s Prayer and the Massah Tradition”, SJT 19, 1966, 216–25; B. van Iersel, The Bible on the Temptations of Man, St. Norbert Abbey Series 12, 166; J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, SBT Second Series 6, 1967; J. A. Kirk, “The Messianic Role of Jesus and the Temptation Narrative: A Contemporary Perspective”, EQ 44, 1972, 11–29, 91–102; E. Lohmeyer, The Lord’s Prayer, 1965; U. W. Mauser, Christ in the Wilderness: The Wilderness Theme in the Second Gospel and its Basis in the Biblical Tradition, SBT 39, 1963; C. F. D. Moule, “An Unresolved Problem in the Temptation Clause in the Lord’s Prayer”, Reformed Theological Review 33, 1975, 65–75; P. Pokorny, “The Temptation Stories and their Intention”, NTS 20, 1973–74, 115–27; H. Riesenfeld, “The Messianic Character of the Temptation in the Wilderness”, in The Gospel Tradition, 1970, 75–94; J. A. T. Robinson, “The Temptations”, in Twelve New Testament Studies, SBT 34, 1962, 53–60; H. Seesemann, peira etc., TDNT VI 23–36; M. H. Sykes, “And Do Not Bring Us to the Test”, ExpT 73, 1961–62, 189 f.; G. H. P. Thompson, “Called – Proved – Obedient: A Study in the Baptism and Temptation Narratives of Matthew and Luke”, JTS New Series 11, 1960, 1–12.

(b). J. Carmignac, “Fais que nous n’entrions pas dans la tentation”, RB 72, 1965, 218 ff.; and Recherches sur le “Notre Père”, 1969, 236 ff.; H. Clavier, “Tentation et Anamartésie dans le Nouveau Testament”, Revue d’Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 47, 1967, 150–64; J. Dupont, “L’Arrière-fond biblique du Récit des Tentations de Jésus”, NTS 3, 1956–57, 287–304; “L’Origine du Récit des Tentations de Jésus”, RB 73, 1966, 30–76; and Les Tentations de Jésus au Désert, 1968; G. Eichholz, “Bewahren und bewähren des Evangeliums”, in Hören und Handeln, Wolf-Festschrift, 1962; E. Fascher, Jesus und der Satan. Eine Studie zur Auslegung der Versuchungsgeschichte, 1949; A. Feuillet, “Le Récit lucanien de la Tentation (Lc 4, 1–13)”, Biblica 40, 1959, 613–31; H. Hyldal, “Die Versuchung auf der Zinne des Tempels”, StudTheol 15, 1961, 113–27; A. Köberle, “Versuchung”, RG³ VI 1385 ff.; K.-P. Köppen, Die Auslegung der Versuchungsgeschichte unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der alten Kirche, 1961; J. H. Korn, PEIRASMOS. Die Versuchung des Gläubigen in der griechischen Bibel, BWANT 4. Folge 20, 1937; K. G. Kuhn, “peirasmos – hamartia – sarx im Neuen Testament und die damit zusammenhängenden Vorstellungen”, ZTK 49, 1952, 200 ff.; E. Lohmeyer, “Die Versuchung Jesu”, ZSTh 14, 1937, 619–50; A. Mayer, “Die evangelischen Berichte über die Versuchung Christi”, in Festgabe H. Blümmer, 1914, 434–68; R. Schnackenburg, “Der Sinn der Versuchung Jesu bei den Synoptikern”, ThQ 132, 1952, 297–326; M. Steiner, La Tentation de Jésus dans l'Interprétation patristique de Saint Justin à Origène, 1962; H. J. Vogels, “Die Versuchungen Jesu”, BZ 17, 1925–26, 238–55.

Tent, Tabernacle

σκηνή	σκηνή (skēnē), tent, tabernacle, dwelling; σκῆνος (skēnos), tent; σκηνώμα (skēnōma), tent, dwelling; σκηνοποιός (skēnopoios), leather-worker, tent-maker; σκηνώω (skēnoō), live, dwell, encamp.
-------	--

CL In secular Gk. skēnē originally denoted a tent-covering made of branches or poles with a matted roof and sides constructed from straw, leaves or skins. The term was also used of the raised stage of a theatre, the cover of a wagon or the cabin of a ship. Naturally it came to signify transitoriness, so that Democritus could say: “The world is a tent, and life is a passing by; one comes, sees and departs” (Diels⁸, II, 165, 7 f.).

OT 1. In the LXX skēnē and skēnōma are used synonymously, although the former word is found five times more frequently than the latter (about 430:80). Generally they render ’ohel (a pointed tent), sometimes miškān (dwelling), and on occasion sukkāh (a matted booth, shed or hut). The tabernacle (LXX, skēnē, skēnōma) is never called sukkāh but ’ohel or ’ohel mō’ēd (“tent of meeting”, the appointed place where God meets his people, cf. Exod. 36:26; Jos. 6:24) or sometimes miškān (the place where God resides). It was also called the “tent of testimony” (Heb. ’ohel ’ēdūt; Gk. skēnē tou martyriou, Acts 7:44; cf. Rev. 15:5) because it contained the covenant tablets. As a result of the LXX equation of miškān with skēnē, the Gk. word could, surprisingly, refer to what was permanent (cf. Lk. 16:9; Heb. 8:2) rather than impermanent. skēnos is found only in Wis. 9:15: “A perishable body weighs down the soul and this earthly tent oppresses the meditative mind.”

At all times in human history the tent has been the customary dwelling of nomadic or semi-nomadic peoples. The Hebrew patriarchs were tent-dwellers (e.g. Gen. 12:8; 13:3; 25:27), as were the Israelites during their wilderness wanderings (Num. 19:14). Subsequently, in celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles each year, the Israelites lived in tents for seven days to recall these journeyings from Egypt to Canaan (Lev. 23:34, 42–43). During the time of Jeremiah the simplicity and independence of the nomadic tent-life was idealized by the Rechabites (Jer. 35:6–10; but see Ps. 84[83]:10). Even when sedentary life became normative (cf. Heb. 11:9–10), tents were used by shepherds (Isa. 38:12) or herdsmen (Jdg. 6:5) and by armies (2 Ki. 7:7–8; Jer.

37:10). For Philo and Josephus see W. Michaelis, TDNT VII 373 f. The Mishnah Tractate Sukkah deals with the Feast of Tabernacles. For a description of the Feast of the Tabernacles see N. Hillyer, "First Peter and the Feast of Tabernacles", TB 21, 1970, 39–51. M. J. Harris

2. The tabernacle continued to be used long after the entry into Canaan. Under the judges it was at Shiloh (Jos. 8:1) and in Saul's reign at Nob (1 Sam. 21; cf. Mk. 2:25 f.) and Gibeon (1 Chr. 16:39). According to 1 Ki. 8:4, Solomon had it laid up in the → temple. The structure and contents are described in Exod. 25 ff. and 35–38. The two interior compartments were divided by a veil. The first called "the holy place" was 20 cubits deep; the second or "holy of holies" or "holy place" (Lev. 16:2 f.; cf. Heb. 9:12; 10:19) was entered by the high priest on the annual day of atonement (Lev. 16; → Blood; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai). In the holy place stood the ark (Heb. 'ārôn, LXX kibōtos) (Exod. 25:10–22; 27:1–8; → Temple, art. to hieron or 3), a slab of gold with a → cherub at each end resting on top. The slab was termed the kappōret (LXX hilastērion) and ET "mercy seat". It was sprinkled with blood by the high priest in the day of atonement ritual. In the holy place, in front of the veil was the altar of incense or golden altar (Exod. 30:1–10; 37:25–28) and on the north side the table of the presence bread or showbread (Exod. 25:23–30) together with various vessels and instruments. On the south side stood the lampstand (Exod. 25:31–40; 37:17–24; 40:24). The tabernacle stood in a courtyard 100 by 50 cubits with its door facing east (Exod. 27:9–19; 38:9–20). On the eastern side of the court stood the altar of burnt offering, so called after the chief sacrifice offered on it (Exod. 27:1–8; 38:1–7), and between the altar and the tabernacle door stood the laver (Exod. 30:17–21; 38:8; 40:29–32), which held water for the priests' ablutions. For details of the sacrifices and altars → Sacrifice, art. thyō or. The → temple and the tabernacle had the same essential function and structure, the chief difference being that the temple was a permanent building. C. Brown

NT 1. The Lucan writings. In Lk. 16:9 Jesus encourages the diplomatic use of wealth so that when it collapses (at the individual's death or the end of the world), God (or possibly his angels or those who have been befriended) may welcome the benefactor into the "eternal habitations" (RSV; Gk. aiōnious skēnas, which here certainly does not refer to "permanent huts") (→ Possessions, art. mamōnas). At the → Transfiguration Peter offered to construct three skēnai for Jesus and the two heavenly visitors, Moses and Elijah (Lk. 9:33 par.). What he sought to perpetuate was his experience of the unveiled glorious personal presence of God in Christ.

As he summarized the findings of the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:13–21), James appealed to Amos 9:11–12 (LXX). He recognized the rebuilding of David's fallen dwelling (skēnē, possibly alluding to a matted hut in which he lived or held audience when on military expeditions) in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ and the rise of the church as the new Israel. Precisely because of this restoration, Gentiles were seeking the Lord (Acts 15:17–18); the Gentile mission was therefore not illegitimate (Acts 15:19).

Acts 18:3 indicates that Aquila and Paul were skēnopoioi by trade. While this term originally meant "tent-maker", it came to be used of the "leather-worker" (= skytotomos) in general (cf. the use of lectarius in Latin and "saddler" in English). The articles that Paul made for sale probably included furnishings (perhaps woven from Cilician haircloth, cilicium, the principal export of Paul's native province) as well as tents (which in antiquity were often made of leather). By such manual labour Paul avoided being dependent on any congregation in which he was currently ministering.

The vb. kataskēnoō is used intrans. in the NT for live, settle, dwell, to nest (of birds; cf. Ps. 104[103]:12; Matt. 13:32; Mk. 4:32; Lk. 13:19; cf. also kataskēnōsis, a place to live, a nest in Matt. 8:20; Lk. 9:58). In Acts 2:26 it occurs in the quotation from Ps. 16(15):9c which is seen as finding its fulfilment in the → resurrection of Jesus: "moreover my flesh will dwell in hope."

2. The Johannine Literature. skēnoō is found only in the Johannine corpus. Whereas in the body of the Fourth Gospel Jesus is pictured as the new temple (Jn. 2:19–22), in the Prologue he is the tabernacle (eskēnōsen, Jn. 1:14), the locus of God's presence among men on earth (cf. Exod. 25:8–9). Where Christ is, there is God's dwelling. Rev. 7:15 pictures one of the elders before God's throne informing John that God would "encamp" (skēnōsei) over those who had come out of the great tribulation; he would "shelter them with his presence" (RSV), dwell with them continuously within his temple. With the arrival of the new Jerusalem "prepared as a bride adorned for her husband", God will dwell with men (Rev. 21:3, where both skēnē and skēnoō are used). He himself will be personally and permanently present in the midst of his people who will witness the final fulfilment of the oft-repeated promise of Yahweh to his covenant people: "I shall be their God and they shall be my people" (see Exod. 6:7; Lev. 26:12; Jer. 32:38; Ezek. 37:27; Zech. 8:8; 2 Cor. 6:16). Elsewhere in Rev. (12:12; 13:6) the vb. skēnoō is used of the permanent inhabitants of heaven.

M. J. Harris

skēnopēgia is found almost exclusively as a technical term in Jewish religion for the building of tents or booths, i.e. the Feast of Booths or Tabernacles, especially with heortē, → feast (Deut. 16:16; 31:10; Zech. 14:16, 18, 19; 1 Esd. 5:50; 2 Macc. 1:9; Josephus, Ant. 4, 209; 8, 100 and 123; 11, 154; 13, 242 and 372; 15, 50; War 2, 515). It was celebrated in the month of Tishri 15–21 (i.e. October), when booths were made from branches of trees. According to Josephus, it was the most important Jewish festival (Ant. 15, 50; cf. 8, 123). In the NT it is mentioned in Jn. 7:2: "Now the Jews' feast of Tabernacles was at hand." Jesus rejected his brothers' plea to perform works there and win popular acclaim (Jn. 7:3–9). However, he went during the middle of the feast (Jn. 7:14). His appearance caused men to think about his teaching (Jn. 7:15–36). On "the last day of the feast, the great day" Jesus stood up and issued his invitation: "If any one thirst, let him come to me and drink. He who believes in me, as the scripture has said, 'Out of his heart shall flow rivers of living water'" (Jn. 7:37 f.). In the light of Isa. 58:11; cf. Prov. 4:23; 5:15; Isa. 55:1; Ezek. 47:1 ff.; Joel 3:18; Zech. 13:1; 14:8, Leon Morris comments: "The meaning of our passage then, in accordance with such Old Testament prophecies, appears to be that when any man comes to believe in Jesus the scriptures referring to the activity of the Holy Spirit are fulfilled" (The Gospel according to John, NLC, 1971, 424). The evangelist explains: "Now this he said about the Spirit, which those who believed in him were to receive; for as yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified" (Jn. 7:39; → Pentecost).

There may have been a significant connexion between Jesus' utterances and the feast. On the seven days of the feast a golden flagon was filled with water from the pool of Siloam and used for libations (Sukkah 4:9). Although this rite is not mentioned in the OT or Josephus it was probably carried out before the destruction of the temple (cf. C. K. Barrett, The Gospel according to John, 1955, 270). Jesus may well have been contrasting this water with the living water which he gives. Similarly, his pronouncement about being the light of the world (Jn. 8:12) may be an allusion to the lights used in the feast (Sukkah 5:2–5; cf. Barrett, op. cit., 277).

C. Brown

3. Paul. The two NT uses of skēnos are in 2 Cor. 5:1, 4 where the believer's earthly body is described as a temporary tent, in contrast to his heavenly body which will form his eternal dwelling (oikētērion). Throughout 2 Cor. 5:1–7 this skēnos-concept remains in or near the foreground of the apostle's thought. As used by Paul, skēnos suggests the impermanence and frustrating limitations of mortal embodiment (2 Cor. 5:2, 4, 6) and the Christian's pilgrimage of faith to the promised land of Christ's immediate presence (2 Cor. 5:6–8). Although no deprecation of the physical body is implied (as in Wis. 9:15), Paul was painfully aware of its inadequacy as an organ for either the human spirit or the Holy Spirit when compared to the resurrection body. In 2 Cor. 12:9 Paul uses episkēnoō, take up one's abode with, in his declaration that, "I will all the more gladly boast of my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me." The passage concludes his discussion of his "thorn in the flesh" (→ Fruit, art. skolops).

4. Hebrews. Ten of the 20 NT uses of skēnē are in Heb., eight occurring in Heb. 8–9. The author contrasts the heavenly and true skēnē pitched by God (Heb. 8:1–2; 9:11) with the earthly tabernacle erected by → Moses at divine direction (Heb. 8:5; 9:24; cf. to hagion kosmikon, "the earthly sanctuary", 9:1). From Exod. 25:40 (cited in Heb. 8:5) it is clear that the earthly tabernacle was a precise model of a heavenly prototype visible to Moses. In Heb. 9:2–3, 6–8 a distinction is drawn between a front or outer ("first") skēnē and a rear or inner ("second") skēnē, between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, by which the writer highlights the severe restrictions placed on access into the Holy of Holies under the old economy.

M. J. Harris

Heb. 9:2–5 mentions various features of the tabernacle which stood in the holy place. The lampstand (lychnia) was made of gold (Exod. 25:31 ff.; 37:17 ff.); the later seven-branched ones were apparently more elaborate than the original one in the tabernacle. The table and the showbread (hē trapeza kai hē prothesis tōn artōn) is a hendiadys for the table of showbread. The latter means lit. the setting forth of the loaves. They were twelve freshly baked cakes placed there each sabbath. The Heb. expression leḥem happānīm, means "bread of the face", i.e. bread set before the face or presence of God (Exod. 25:30; 35:13; 39:36; cf. leḥem hamma "reket", "bread of setting in order", 1 Chr. 9:32). The old cakes went to the priests; no layman might eat them because they were "most holy" (Lev. 24:9; but cf. 1 Sam. 21:1–6 with Mk. 2:25 f.). The curtain separating the holy place from the outer sanctuary is here called to deuteron katapetasma, "the second curtain", distinguishing it from the screen by which one entered from the court (Exod. 26:36 f.; 36:37 f.; → Temple, art. katapetasma). On the golden altar of incense (chrysoun thymiaterion) → Sacrifice, art. thyō (on the precise meaning here see F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 184–87). Bruce observes: "On the day in the year when the holy of holies was entered the incense-altar played a significant part; not only was the holy of holies never entered without incense from the incense-altar (Lev. 16:12 f.), but the blood of the sin-offering on the Day of Atonement was sprinkled on the horns of the incense-altar as well as on the mercy-seat (Ex. 30:10; Lev. 16:15)" (op. cit., 187). The original ark of the covenant (kibōtos tēs diathēkēs) vanished from history with the destruction of Solomon's temple in 587 B.C. It was not replaced in the post-exilic temple. When Pompey forced his way into the holy of holies in 63 B.C. he found it empty (Josephus, War 1, 152 f.; Ant. 14, 71 f.; Tacitus, History 5, 9; cf. Pss. Sol. 2:1 f., 30 f.). On the golden urn holding manna see Exod. 16:33 f., on Aaron's rod Num. 17:1 ff., 10, and on the tables of the covenant, Exod. 25:16, 21 f. see Bruce, op. cit., 188 f. According to 1 Ki. 8:9 at the dedication of Solomon's temple, "There was nothing in the ark except the two tables of stone which Moses put there at Horeb, where the LORD made a covenant with the people of Israel, when they came out of the land of Egypt." On the "mercy seat" (hilastērion) (v. 5; cf. 4:16) see Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT 3 (c) and NT 4. However, as the argument of Heb. 9:6–10 goes on to show, the tabernacle and its day of atonement ritual is only temporary. It has all been superseded by Christ the "high priest of the good things that have come" (Heb. 9:11).

C. Brown

Later in the book (Heb. 11:9, 13), tent-nomadism is associated with being strangers and exiles. Finally, in Heb. 13:10 "those who serve the tabernacle" probably does not refer to Christian believers, as if their worship were focused on some figurative altar in the heavenly sanctuary, but to all the worshippers belonging to the old order to whom the sacrifice of Christ (= "an altar," by metonymy) seemed superfluous.

5. Peter. In 2 Pet. 1:13 f. mortal existence and physical embodiment are equated with dwelling in a tent (skēnōma), death with the laying aside (or perhaps dismantling) of that tent (cf. Job 4:21 MT). However, because the idea of "laying aside" or "putting off" (apothesis, v. 14) refers more appropriately to a body than to a tent or dwelling, some prefer to render skēnōma in both these verses by "body" (so RSV text). This apothesis marks departure from earthly life (v. 15) and entrance into the eternal kingdom of Jesus Christ (v. 11). Note also that in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:46) skēnōma is applied to the habitation that David wished to build for the house (or God) of Jacob.

M. J. Harris

→ Priest, → Sacrifice, → Temple

(a). C. K. Barrett, "The Eschatology of the Epistle to the Hebrews", in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1954, 363–93; J. Blenkinsopp, "Kiriath-jearim and the Ark", JBL 88, 1969, 143–56; J. O. Boyd, "What was in the Ark?", EQ 11, 1939, 164 ff.; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC 1964, 161 ff., 181 ff., 398 ff.; W. S. Caldecott, The Tabernacle: Its History and Structure, 1904; B. S. Childs, Exodus, 1974; F. M. Cross, Jr., "The Tabernacle", BA 10, 3, 1947; C. L. Feinberg, "Tabernacle", ZPEB V 572–83; G. H. Davies, "Tabernacle", IDB IV 498–506; and "The Ark in the Psalms", in F. F. Bruce, ed., Promise and Fulfilment: Essays Presented to S. H. Hooke, 1963, 51–61; D. W. Gooding, The Account of the Tabernacle, 1959; M. L. G. Guillebaud, "Tent over the Tabernacle", EQ 31, 1959, 90–96; M. Haran, "The Nature of the 'ōhel mō'ed in Pentateuchal Sources", JSS 5, 1960, 50–65; and "Shiloh and Jerusalem: the Origin of the Priestly Tradition in the Pentateuch", JBL 81, 1962, 14–24; A. H. Hillyard, The Tabernacle in the Wilderness or the Reality of God in the Physical World, 1965; J. P. Hyatt, Exodus, New Century Bible, 1971; A. Jacob, God's Tent, 1961; A. R. S. Kennedy, "Tabernacle”, HDB IV 653–68; W. Michaelis, skēnē etc. TDNT VII 368–94; G. von Rad, “The Tent and the Ark”, in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1965, 103–24; C. W. F. Smith, “Tabernacles in the Fourth Gospel and Mark”, NTS 9, 1962–63, 139–46; J. Strong, The Tabernacle of Israel in the Desert, 1888; J. Swetnam, “The Greater and More Perfect Tent: A Contribution to the Discussion of Hebrews ix, 11”, Biblica 47, 1966, 91–106.

(b). J. Bovet, “Sur le Tabernacle”, Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 21, 1933, 277–80; M. Haran, “mhwṭw šl h'hl mw'd (The Tent of Meeting)”, Tarbiz 25, 1955, 11–20 (English summary, iii–v); R. Hartmann, “Zelt und Lade”, ZAW 37, 1917–18, 209–44; M. H. Segal, “lmhwṭw šl h'hl mw'd (On the Tent of Meeting)”, Tarbiz 25, 1956, 231 ff. (English summary, viii–ix); G. Wagner, “Le Tabernacle et la Vie ‘en Christ’. Exégèse de 2 Corinthiens 5:1 à 10”, Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 41, 1961, 379 ff.

Thank, Praise, Eucharist

αἰνέω

αἰνέω (aineō), to praise; αἶνος (ainos), praise; ἐπαινέω (epaineō), praise; ἔπαινος (epainos), praise.

CL In secular Gk. aineō meant: (a) to mention, especially mention honourably, and so praise; (b) to vow, to promise, and so simply say. The noun ainos meant a saying which is particularly pregnant with meaning, cleverly phrased, or needing explanation. So it developed the meanings: (a) proverb, story, fable; (b) praise, eulogy. The compound verb epaineō meant in popular speech: (a) to approve, sanction; (b) to praise, give a public mark of esteem. The corresponding noun epainos meant praise, approval, sanction, agreement, song of praise (about a man; for a deity hymnos, → song, hymn, was used).

OT The LXX uses aineō to translate the Heb. hālāl, chiefly in the piel: Jdg. 16:24A; 1 Chr. 16:4, 10, 36; 23:5; 29:13; 2 Chr. 8:14; 20:19, 21; 23:12; 2 Esd. 3:10 f.; Neh. 5:13; 12:24; Pss. 18(17):3; 22(21):23, 26; 35(34):18; 56(55):10; 63(62):5; 69(68):30, 34; 74(73):21; 84(83):4; 102(101):18; 107(106):32; 109(108):30; 113(112):1, 3; 115:17 (113:25); 117(116):1; 119(118):164, 175; 135(134):1, 3; 145(144):2; 146(145):1 f.; 147(146):1; 147:12(1); 148:1–4, 7, 12; 149:3; 150:1–6; Prov. 31:28, 30 f.; Cant. 6:8; Joel 2:26; Isa. 62:9; Jer. 4:2; 20:13; 38:7. Other vbs. translated by aineō are: bārak, bless (Ps. 100[99]:4); yādāh, confess (Gen. 49:8; 1 Chr. 16:7, 35, 41; 23:30; 2 Chr. 5:13; 7:3; 31:2; Isa. 38:18); rūa', shout (Job 38:7); šābah, praise, laud (Ps. 117[116]:1 S; Dan. 2:23; 5:23); šār, sing (Ps. 106[105]:12). It occurs in circumlocutions at Neh. 12:37 and 2 Chr. 20:21. It is without equivalent at Neh. 12:36; Tob. 13:11, 18; Jud. 13:14; Est. 4:17; Job 33:30; 35:14; Wis. 10:20; 19:9; Sir. 17:10, 27 f.; 21:15; 24:1; 30:2; 39:9, 14; 47:6; 51:6; Jer. 31(38):5; Bar. 2:32; 3:6 f.; 1 Macc. 4:33; 3 Macc. 2:8; 5:13, 35; 6:32). The vb. epaineō also chiefly stands for hālāl: Gen. 12:15; Jdg. 6:20; Pss. 10:3 (9:24); 34(33):2; 44(43):8; 56(55):3; 63(62):11; 64(63):10; 102(101):8; 105(104):3; 106(105):5. It also stands for šābah: Pss. 63(62):3; 117(116):1; 145(144):4; 147:12(1); Eccl. 4:2; 8:15. It is without Heb. equivalent at Eccl. 8:10; Sir. prol. 3; 9:17; 27:7; Dan. 5:1; 3 Macc. 4:16; 4 Macc. 1:10; 2:2; 4:4; 13:3, 17.

The noun ainesis which is infrequent in the NT is relatively common in the LXX standing for 8 different Heb. words (e.g. Lev. 7:12–15[2–5]; Pss. 9:14; 26[25]:7).

ainos is rare (e.g. 2 Chr. 23:13; Ps. 8:2), as is epainos (e.g. 2 Chr. 16:27; Pss. 22[21]:3, 25; 35[34]:28).

The LXX uses aineō only in sense (a) above, i.e. to praise. There is, however, a striking variation as regards the Heb. We find hillēl used in secular contexts (e.g. in Gen. 12:15 of a beautiful woman and in 2 Sam. 14:25 of a handsome man; in Prov. 27:2 in condemnation of self-praise; in Ps. 10:3 of praise by the wicked; in Jdg. 16:24 of the praise of Dagon). The LXX tries as far as possible to avoid aineō in its rendering of such passages (cf. the renderings of the v.l. hymnēsan in Jdg. 16:24 B, S), and to keep it for the regular praise of God in proper worship, especially in Pss. 146; 150. Correspondingly ainos renders the infin. hallēl (cf. 2 Chr. 23:13). epaineō and epainos are used for the praise of God by his people, and also for the praise of the righteous by God and man.

NT 1. aineō is found 8 times in the NT, 6 of which are in the Lucan writings (Lk. 2:13, 20; 19:37; Acts 2:47; 3:8, 9), and in addition Rom. 15:11 (quoting Ps. 117:1) and Rev. 19:5. ainos is found only in Lk. 18:43 and Matt. 21:16 (quoting Ps. 8:2[3] according to the LXX, where strangely the Gk. translates Heb. 'ōz, strength, by ainos). We find the usage of the LXX carried through rigorously; both vb. and noun are used only of the praise of God. The compounds epaineō and epainos are used for both God and man.

2. In contrast to secular Gk., the word-group in the NT does not mean praise for a special achievement; it is applied to the whole man, and not merely to acts (cf. → Glory, arts. time, doxa). The manner in which epainos and epaineō in particular are used shows clearly that ultimately only God can give this recognition (Rom. 2:29) in his saving verdict on the day of judgment (Rom. 2:29; 1 Cor. 4:5; 1 Pet. 1:7). At the present time, however, a man may receive praise from those who have authority from God, from the church (2 Cor. 8:18), the apostle (1 Cor. 11:2, 17, 22) and from the authorities appointed by God (Rom. 13:3 f.; 1 Pet. 2:14).

3. This word-group is preferred (aineō and ainos are exclusively so used) where it is a question of the formal praise of God in thanksgivings, prayers and hymns (Matt. 21:16; cf. Ps. 8:2[3]; Lk. 2:13, 20; 18:43; 19:37 f.; Acts 2:47; 3:8, 9; Rom. 15:11; Eph. 1:3–6; Phil. 1:11). This praise is given in the present, but reaches its full development in the new creation (Phil. 1:11; Rev. 19:5). ainesis occurs in the expression “sacrifice of praise” (Heb. 13:15), where the Christian’s → sacrifice is contrasted with Jewish sacrifices (cf. Lev. 7:12 f., 18 with Heb. 13:10 ff.). H. Schultz

εὐχαριστία	εὐχαριστία (eucharistia), thanksgiving; εὐχαριστέω (eucharisteō), be thankful, thank; εὐχάριστος (eucharistos), thankful.
-------------------	---

CL The noun comes from the root chair-/char-, the main words of which express the feeling of → joy; it is a derivative of charis (everything about which one rejoices; → Grace) compounded with eu, well, rightly, properly, very (adv.). It means: (a) thankful attitude; (b) its expression in the showing of gratitude, expression of gratitude, thanksgiving (from Hippocrates, 5th cent. B.C. on). The adj. eucharistos is equally old and means: (a) pleasant, well-behaved, witty; (b) thankful. The vb.

eucharisteō is found with the meaning: (a) be thankful, owe thanks, from Dem. 4th cent. B.C. on; (b) give thanks, from Polyb., 2nd cent. B.C. on. Naturally these words are often found in inscriptions.

OT The word-group is only once represented in the canonical books of the OT, viz.

Prov. 11:16 where the adj. translates Heb. ḥēn (generally otherwise rendered), charming, graceful, well-mannered. In the apocryphal books of the LXX the verb is found 6 times (Jud. 8:25; Wis. 18:2; 2 Macc. 1:11; 10:7; 12:31; 3 Macc. 7:16), the noun 4 times (Est. 8:13; Wis. 16:28; Sir. 37:11; 2 Macc. 2:27). Both are used for thanks from man to man and from man to God.

1. In 2 Macc. 12:31 the Maccabees thank certain heathen for the kindness shown the Jews living in Scythopolis. In Ad. Est. 16:4 certain officials withhold the gratitude that they owe to their benefactor, the Persian king. In Sir. 37:11 experience shows that one should not consult with a grudging man about gratitude. The writer of 2 Macc. says that he took upon himself the task of evaluating his sources “to secure the gratitude of many” (2:27 v.l.: “for the benefit of readers in general” NEB).

2. Reasons for thankfulness to God are salvation from oppression by enemies and persecution (2 Macc. 1:11; 3 Macc. 7:16), victory won (2 Macc. 10:7 v.l. RSV), but also being put to the test, which is welcomed and accepted as an opportunity for God to work out his salvation in preservation (Jud. 8:25). Wis. 18:2 records the thanks of the holy ones for their preservation from guilt towards those who abuse them (but RSV, NEB see it as the thanks of their enemies for their forbearance). Wis. 16:28 advises men to begin the day before dawn with thanksgiving. There is hence no indication that the word received any specific theological colouring from the OT.

NT In the NT the words are most used by Paul (the vb. 24 times; noun 12 times).

Only the vb. is found in the Gospels, 11 times; Acts has the vb. twice and the noun once; Rev. has the vb. once, the noun twice. The Catholic Epistles do not use the words at all. The adj. is found only in Col. 3:15.

1. eucharisteō and eucharistia are almost exclusively reserved in the NT for thanksgiving to God. Only 3 times (Lk. 17:16; Acts 24:3; Rom. 16:4) are they used for thanks to men, but the first and last instances are to be understood in the context of spiritual action, while in Acts 24:3 we have an example of respectful Jewish speech.

2. These words are very common in the introductions to the Pauline letters. Whatever detailed admonition and criticism may follow, the apostle frequently writes in his introductory greeting of his thankfulness to God for those to whom he is writing; for their faith and its influence “in all the world” (Rom. 1:8, note the thanks through Jesus Christ; cf. also 2 Cor. 1:11); for the harmony between faith and love in action (Eph. 1:15 f.; Col. 1:3 f.; 1 Thess. 1:3, here because both gifts were growing; Phlm. 4 f.); for the grace given to the church (1 Cor. 1:4); for sharing in the gospel (Phil. 1:5); for God’s work of election (2 Thess. 2:13); for steadfastness in hope (1 Thess. 1:2 f.). We should note that Paul did not use a standard form, but moulded his thanksgiving to lead up to the theme of his letter.

3. When Paul summoned his readers to thanksgiving amidst his exhortations he normally used the noun. The term is always used absolutely; this marks out thanksgiving and the showing of gratitude as basic and lasting elements of the Christian life. This is explicit in Eph. 5:20 ("giving thanks in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ"); Col. 3:17; 1 Thess. 5:18; Col. 3:15 (the adj.). No petition and intercession can be made without simultaneous thanksgiving (Phil. 4:6; Col. 2:7; 4:2; 1 Tim. 2:1). A life based on thanksgiving (Eph. 5:4) is the converse of an evil life.

4. The vb. is found in Matt. 15:36 par. Mk. 8:6; Acts 27:35; Rom. 14:6; 1 Cor. 10:30; and the noun in 1 Tim. 4:3 (the general feeling of thankfulness is not to be excluded in the last 3) in the technical sense of the benediction before a meal, according to Jewish custom, beginning with the words, "Blessed art Thou, LORD [i.e. Yahweh], our God, King of the universe . . ." (cf. SB I 685 ff.). The vb. is found also in the words of institution of the → Lord's Supper, with both bread and wine in Lk. 22:17, 19, with the bread only in 1 Cor. 11:24 (but v. 25 "in the same way" implies it for the wine), with the wine only in Mk. 14:23; Matt. 26:27 (but the use of "blessed" with the bread is an equivalent; → Bless). Hence, during the 2nd cent., eucharistia became the general name for the whole service of the Lord's Supper, as may be seen in the minor textual variant, eucharistias instead of eulogias, in 1 Cor. 10:16. We have prayers of thanksgiving quoted in Lk. 18:11 f. (the self-satisfied Pharisee) and Jn. 11:41 f. (Jesus at the tomb of Lazarus). The term is used absolutely in 1 Cor. 14:16 f. for a prayer of thanksgiving in a tongue.

5. Apart from the introductions of his letters (see above, 2) Paul frequently mentions praise for general and specific gifts of grace, for increasing grace (2 Cor. 4:15), for a share "in the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. 1:12), for the reception of the word preached by man as the word of God (1 Thess. 2:13), for the gift of tongues (1 Cor. 14:18). For all that, in 1 Cor. 14:18 (cf. 1:14) there is a depreciatory note, when he speaks about his thanksgiving, so as to deflect the interest of his readers to the true building up and unity of the church. The collection received would awaken thanksgiving to God among those who received it (2 Cor. 9:11 f.).

6. 1 Thess. 3:9 f. shows Paul planning to put thanksgiving into practice. On 2 Thess. 1:3 see R. D. Aus, "The Liturgical Background of the Necessity and Propriety of Giving Thanks According to 2 Thes. 1:3", JBL 92, 1973, 432–38. The failure of any such activity shows the inadequate knowledge of God among the heathen (Rom. 1:21).

7. Both noun and vb. can mean the thanksgiving of the doxologies in the apocalyptic hymns (Rev. 4:9; 7:12; 11:17).

H.-H. Esser

→ Blessing, → Curse, → Grace, → Lord's Supper, → Prayer

(a). R. D. Aus, "The Liturgical Background of the Necessity and Propriety of Giving Thanks according to 2 Thes. 1:3", JBL 92, 1973, 432–38; G. H. Boobyer, "Thanksgiving" and the "Glory of God" in Paul, 1929; H. Conzelmann, eucharisteō etc., TDNT IX 407–15; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 1966²; and The Prayers of Jesus, SBT Second Series 6, 1967; B. A. Mastin, "Jesus said Grace", SJT 24, 1971, 449–56; H. Schlier, aineō, ainos, TDNT I 177 f.; P. Schubert, Form and Function of the Pauline Thanksgivings, BZNW 20, 1939; A. Stöger, "Thanksgiving", EBT III 906–10; G. P. Wiles, Paul's Intercessory Prayers: The Significance of the Intercessory Prayer Passages in the Letters of St. Paul, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 24, 1974.

(b). H. Greeven, Gebet und Eschatologie im Neuen Testament, Neutestamentliche Forschungen, 3, 1, 1931; G. Harder, Paulus und das Gebet, Neutestamentliche Forschungen, 1, 10, 1936; J. Jeremias, "Das Gebetsleben Jesu", ZNW 25, 1926, 123 ff.; P. Joüon, "Reconnaissance et Action de Grâces dans le Nouveau Testament", RSR 29, 1939, 112 ff.; E. Mocsy, "De Gratiarum Actione in Epistolis Paulinis", Verbum Domini 21, 1941, 193–201; J. M. Nielen, Gebet und Gottesdienst im Neuen Testament, 1937; T. Schermann, "eucharistia und eucharistein in ihrem Bedeutungswandel bis 200 n. Chr.," Philologus 69, 1910, 375–410; J. Wobbe, Der Charisgedanke bei Paulus, NTAbh 13, 3, 1932.

Think, Mean, Consider, Reckon

διαλογίζομαι

διαλογίζομαι (dialogizomai), ponder, consider, reason; διαλογισμός (dialogismos), thought, opinion, reasoning, consideration, argument; διαλέγομαι (dialegomai), discuss.

CL The meaning of dialegomai in cl. and Hellenistic Gk. is expressed by our loanword dialogue; it means hold a conversation, chat. It was used by the poets with a neutral sense, but in the philosophers it came to mean conversation with teaching as its object: one debates and learns in so doing. The vb. dialogizomai, calculate, consider, think through, is closely linked with it, and similarly the noun dialogismos, weighing, consideration, thought, discussion.

OT The LXX uses dialegomai, when it translates dāḅar, speak, mainly with the meanings of speak, say, both of God and man; it is also used with the meanings of negotiate with someone, make a speech, and sometimes also dispute. It translates dāḅar at Exod. 6:27; Isa. 63:1; and rīḅ, strive, contend, at Jdg. 8:1. It is also found without Heb. equivalent at 1 Esd. 8:46; Est. 5:2; and 2 Macc. 11:20. The related dialogizomai chiefly translates ḥāšab, think, account, and is found at 2 Sam. 14:14; 19:20(19); Pss. 10:3 (9:23); 21(20):11; 35(34):20; 36(35):4; 77(76):5; 119(118):59; Prov. 16:30; Jer. 50(27):45. It stands for zāmām, consider, purpose, devise at Ps. 140(139):9. It is without Heb. equivalent at Prov. 17:12; Isa. 19:10; 1 Macc. 11:8; 2 Macc. 12:43; 4 Macc. 8:11. The noun dialogismos stands chiefly for maḥ^ošāḅāḥ, thought, device, plan, purpose: Pss. 40(39):5; 56(55):5; 92(91):5; 94(93):11; Isa. 59:7; Jer. 4:14; 50(27):45; Lam. 3:60 f.; Dan. Theodotion 11:24. It stands for rēaʿ, purpose, aim at Ps. 139(138):2, and raʿyōn, longing, striving in Theodotion's version of Dan. 2:29 f.; 4:16; 5:6, 10; 7:28; 11:24. It is also found at Ps. 139(138):20 (for m^ezimmāḥ, purpose, direction, device); Ps. 146(145):4 (for eštonōt, thoughts); and at Wis. 7:20; Sir. 9:15; 13:26; 27:5; 33(26):5; 40:2, 29; Dan. 7:15; 1 Macc. 2:63.

dialogizomai is used with a neutral connotation for consider, think over (e.g. Ps. 77:5), but more often with the depreciatory sense of harbour ill designs, intrigue (Pss. 10:2; 35:20; 36:4). The noun dialogismos also often means the perverse, vain thinking which contemplates destruction (Ps. 94:11), and is turned against God (Jer. 4:14; Isa. 59:7) and against the pious (Ps. 56[55]:5). We see this particularly clearly in Ben Sira's picture of the fool's dialogismos as the cart-wheel constantly turning round its axle (Sir. 33:5). But the word is also used for God's profound (Ps. 92[91]:5) and wonderful (Ps. 40[39]:5) thoughts.

NT 1. In the NT also, dialogizomai and dialogismos are always used with a slightly depreciatory connotation. The thoughts of the human heart do not necessarily lead, as the Greeks thought, to a knowledge of the truth (cf. 1 Cor. 1:21–25), but are evil (Mk. 7:21; Matt. 15:19), full of doubt and suspicion (Mk. 2:6, 8; Lk. 5:22; 6:8), moved by the passing moment (Lk. 3:15), full of greed (Lk. 12:17; 20:14), always concerned with the superficial (Mk. 8:16 f.; Matt. 16:7 f.) and full of sly calculation (Matt. 11:25; Mk. 11:31). The decision made by men about Jesus shows what men really are and think (Lk. 2:35; cf. v. 34). Even the man who has decided for Jesus cannot be certain that he will not fall back into his old ways of thought. But Jesus unmasked the ambitious thoughts of his disciples (Lk. 9:46 f.; Mk. 9:33 f.) and brought the attitude of faith to light through the example of the child (cf. v. 48).

In Rom. 1:21 Paul says that, as a result of rejecting God, men “became futile in their thinking”; in Rom. 14:1 he speaks of “disputes over opinions” which arise from lack of faith. In 1 Cor. 3:20 we find “the thoughts of the wise are futile”; in Phil. 2:14 we have the questioning (dialogismos) which is the germ of apathy. In 1 Tim. 2:8 we find the word used without an adj. for “quarrelsome thoughts” (NEB).

2. dialegomai means in Mk. 9:33 f. and Jude 9 to argue, fight with words; but in Heb. 12:5 it is used of God’s speaking through fatherly discipline. This usage is derived from the LXX. The other examples of dialegomai in the NT are found in Acts 17–24 (17:2, 17; 18:4, 19; 19:8 f.; 20:7, 9; 24:12, 25). The word here has become a technical term for Paul’s teaching in the synagogue and approaches the meaning of give an address, preach. It refers to the reading and exposition of the OT, which were, in theory at least, permitted to every adult man in the synagogue (cf. Lk. 4:16–21). The RSV rendering “argue” is justified in so far as the audience was permitted to ask questions (→ Teach, art. didaskō). D. Fürst

δοκέω

δοκέω (dokeō), trans. think, believe, suppose, consider; intrans. seem, appear.

CL dokeō (from Homer on): 1. trans. (a) believe, accept the opinion, think, hold, assume, (b) conclude; 2. intrans. assume an appearance, appear and hence: (a) give an impression, pass for; (b) pose as, act as; 3. impersonal dokei mou, it seems to me, it seems best, I decide.

OT dokeō which occurs some 50 times in the LXX remained uninfluenced by the change of meaning given there to doxa, → glory. It stands for 8 different Heb. expressions: ’amar, say (Prov. 28:24); hāyāh k^e, it was as if (Gen. 19:14); hāšab, think, account (Gen. 38:15; Prov. 27:14); tōb, good (Est. 1:19; 3:9; 5:4; 8:5), and tōb b^e ’ēnē, good in the eyes of (Est. 8:8); yāšar, right (Jer. 27[34]:5) and yāšar b^e ’ēnē, right in the eyes of (Job 9:25); nādaḅ and nādīḅ, be willing (Exod. 25:2; 35:21 f.); nāšā’, lift up (Exod. 35:26); and š^e bā’ (Theodotion’s version of Dan. Sus. 4:14, 22, 29; 5:21). But in the majority of the references in the LXX it occurs in the non-canonical writings, especially 2 and 3 Macc., or passages where it does not translate a Heb. equivalent: 1 Esd. 8:11; Tob. 3:15; Jud. 3:8; Job 1:21; 15:21; 20:7, 22; Prov. 2:10; 14:12; 16:25; 17:28; 26:12; Wis. 3:2; 12:27; Sir. prol. 14; Dan. Sus. 5; and 4:34; 1 Macc. 8:26, 28; 15:20; 2 Macc. 1:13, 20; 2:29; 5:6; 7:16; 9:8, 10; 14:14, 40; 3 Macc. 1:26, 29; 5:5 f., 22, 40, 49; 6:30; 4 Macc. 5:6, 9; 9:30; 11:5, 16; 13:14.

The meanings are the same as in secular Gk., except that we occasionally find the sense of desire, wish (e.g. Jud. 3:8). The most usual meaning is to seem, appear. It is used by LXX to interpret the subjective element in Heb. narrative: e.g. in Gen. 38:15 Judah’s reaction is more strongly stressed, while in a passage like Job 15:21 it goes beyond the Heb. text.

NT dokeō is found 62 times in the NT. 32 instances are found in the Gospels: Matt. 3:9; 6:7; 17:25; 18:12; 21:28; 22:17, 42; 24:44; 26:53, 66; Mk. 6:49; 10:42; Lk. 1:3; 8:18; 10:36; 12:40, 51; 13:2, 4; 19:11; 22:24; 24:37; Jn. 5:39, 45; 11:13, 31, 56; 13:29; 16:2; 20:15. There are 8 instances in Acts: Acts 12:9; 15:22, 25, 28, 34; 17:18; 25:27; 26:9; 27:13. Paul uses the vb. 18 times: 1 Cor. 3:18; 4:9; 7:40; 8:2; 10:12; 11:16; 12:22 f.; 14:37; 2 Cor. 10:9; 11:16; 12:19; Gal. 2:2, 6, 9; 6:3; Phil. 3:4. It is also found in Heb. 12:11; and Jas. 1:26; 4:5. The following senses may be distinguished.

1. (a) In Lk. 8:18 Jesus warns: "Take heed then how you hear; for to him who has will more be given, and from him who has not, even what he thinks he has [ho dokei echein] will be taken away" (cf. Mk. 4:24). The phrase expresses the illusory state of the man who thought that he had a tangible and permanent security. Jn. 5:45 conveys the challenge to give up an existing opinion, while 2 Cor. 11:16 speaks of an opinion which cannot yet be reached. There is a conflict of opinion as to how mē doxēte in Matt. 3:9 is to be understood. It is generally taken to mean "do not presume", in the sense "do not think out a way to escape the wrath of God." It is more likely, however, that the passage means that John had already read the objections of his hearers in their hearts and reveals them, "Do not suppose . . ." or "Do not think that. . ." In that case mē doxēte, like mē arxēste, "Do not begin to . . ." (Lk. 3:8) are two different reproductions of Aram. 'anā (so E. Lohmeyer, Das Evangelium des Matthäus, ed. W. Schmauch, KEK 1/1, 1967⁴, ad loc.).

(b) The meaning to conclude is found especially in Acts (e.g. 15:22, 25, 28, RSV "seem good") (→ Command, art. dogma).

2. (a) In Gal. 2:2, 6, 9 Paul calls the Jerusalem apostles hoi dokountes, i.e. those who matter, the recognized authorities; in v. 9 the dokountes styloi einai, those recognized as pillars, the leaders, i.e. James, Peter, John, are specially mentioned. This is not necessarily an ironic point here against the other apostles, for this expression is often found of a recognized authority in extra-biblical literature. But on this passage see further C. K. Barrett, "Paul and the 'Pillar' Apostles", in J. N. Sevenster and W. C. van Unnik, eds., Studia Paulina, 1953, 1–19.

(b) On the other hand, in passages like 1 Cor. 8:2, "any one imagines", it means an opinion based on self-deception.

3. Noteworthy is the question formed with the impersonal dokei, i.e. ti dokei hymin, "What do you think?", found in Jn. 11:56 and various passages in Matt. (e.g. 18:12; 21:28; 22:42). It demands an answer which will commit the one questioned, unlike all mere opinions. This is also the question put by the high priest to the Sanhedrin (Matt. 26:66, where RSV gives a paraphrase) so as to provoke them to pass a judgment on Jesus.

D. Müller

λογίζομαι

λογίζομαι (logizomai), reckon, think, credit; λογισμός (logismos), thought.

CL logizomai (from Aristoph. and Thuc.) is derived from legō (→ Word), count, collect, reckon. Its root log-, put together, collect, harvest, suggests a regulated perception and an acceptance of given facts. Hence, logizomai means: (a) reckon, credit, rank with, calculate; (b) consider, deliberate, grasp, draw a logical conclusion, decide. Accordingly logismos means: (a) counting, calculation; (b) reflection, argument, thought, plan; (c) the ability to draw a logical conclusion. The concept implies an activity of the reason which, starting with ascertainable facts, draws a conclusion, especially a mathematical one or one appertaining to business, where calculations are essential. Plato uses it for thought unaffected by the emotions, which seeks to grasp objective facts and apply them (Phd. 65c; cf. H. W. Heidland, TDNT IV 284).

OT logizomai translates chiefly hāšab, think, account: Gen. 15:6; 31:15; Lev. 7:18(8); 17:4; 25:31; 27:23; Num. 18:27, 30; Deut. 2:11, 20; 1 Sam. 1:13; 18:25; 2 Sam. 4:2; 14:13 f.; 19:20(19); 1 Ki. 10:21; 2 Chr. 9:20; Neh. 6:2, 6; 13:13; Job 41:21(20), 24(23); Pss. 32(31):2; 35(34):4; 36(35):4; 41(40):7; 44(43):22; 52(51):2; 106(105):31; 140(139):2, 4; 144(143):3; Prov. 16:9(1), 30; 17:28; Hos. 7:15; 8:12; Amos 6:5; Mic. 2:1, 3; Nah. 1:9; Zech. 8:17; Isa. 5:28; 10:7; 13:17; 29:16 f.; 32:15; 33:8; 40:15; 53:3 f.; Jer. 11:19; 18:8, 11, 18; 23:27; 50(27):45; 49(29):20; 49(30):30; 48(31):2; 26(33):3; 29(36):11; 36(43):3; Lam. 4:2; Ezek. 11:2; 38:10; Dan. Theodotion 4:32; 11:24 f. The other terms which it translates are found only rarely: hāyâh, to be (2 Sam. 19:44[43]); mānâh in the niphal, to count (Isa. 53:12); qārâ', niphal, call (Deut. 3:13); and šûb, return, consider (Isa. 44:19). It is also found without Heb. equivalents, particularly in Wis. and Macc.: Tob. 3:10; 10:1; 14:4; Job 31:28; 34:37; Ps. 119(118):119; Prov. 24:7; Eccl. 10:3; Wis. 2:1, 16, 21; 3:2, 10, 17; 5:4; 7:9; 8:17; 9:6; 14:20; 15:2, 12, 15; 17:13; Sir. 29:6; 40:19; Nah. 1:11; 1 Macc. 2:52; 3:52; 4:35; 6:9, 19; 10:38; 2 Macc. 6:12; 11:2; 3 Macc. 4:4; 5:16; 4 Macc. 3:15; 8:16, 19.

logismos translates various nouns formed from hāšab: 2 Sam. 14:14; Est. 1:1; Ps. 33(32):10 f.; Prov. 6:18; 12:5; 15:22, 26; 19:21; Eccl. 7:27(28), 29(30); 9:10; Mic. 4:12; Nah. 1:11; Isa. 66:18; Jer. 4:14; 11:19; 18:11, 18; 50(27):45; 51(29):20; 49(30):30; 29(36):11; Ezek. 33:10; Dan. 11:24 f. But the vast majority of instances occur in the non-canonical books of the LXX especially Macc.: Jud. 8:14; Wis. 1:3, 5; 9:14; 11:15; 12:10; 17:12; 19:3; Sir. 27:4 f., 7; 40:29; 43:23; 1 Macc. 11:8; 2 Macc. 6:23; 7:21; 3 Macc. 5:12; 4 Macc. 1:1–35; 2:2–34; 3:1–19; 5:10, 31, 38; 6:7, 30–35; 7:1–24; 9:17, 30; 10:19; 11:25, 27; 13:1, 3, 16; 14:2, 11; 15:1, 11, 23; 16:1, 4; 18:2.

hāšab occurs in the Dead Sea Scrolls at 1QpHab 1:9; 1QS 3:1, 4; 5:11, 17 f.; 11:21; 1QM 5:5, 14; 7:11; 1QH 2:32; 3:6, 24; 4:8 f., 14, 23; 5:26, 38; 8:11, 14; 10:5; 18:26; 4Qflor 1:9; CD 19:35; 20:19 (cf. F. Nötscher, Zur theologischen Terminologie der Qumrantexte, 1956, 52 f.).

logizomai receives a new and personal slant in the LXX, for it mainly represents Heb. hāšab, regard as, reckon as, respect, think out, think, care for, plan, intend, which is also represented occasionally by eulabeomai, phrontizō, epistrepō, etc. The objective reckoning of the intellect is replaced in the meaning of this word by the feeling of the heart conditioned by individual personality (e.g. Isa. 10:7; Ps. 140:2; Zech. 8:17; Mic. 2:3; Nah. 1:9 ff.). The personal element is seen also in the reckoning of → guilt or → righteousness (e.g. Gen. 15:6; 2 Sam. 19:19), and often in the Pss. (e.g. Ps. 32:2) and in the cultic imputation of guilt or purification (e.g. Lev. 7:18; 17:4). This is clearest when the thinking is directed against another person (e.g. 2 Sam. 14:13 f.; Hos. 7:15; Jer. 11:19).

While logizomai originally denoted a non-religious, human activity, in the LXX, consistently with Heb. ḥāšab, it is sometimes used for man's relationship to God, and very often for God's purposes with men, whether they are thoughts of → peace (Jer. 29:11 [LXX 36:11]; 2 Sam. 14:14) or punitive judgments (Jer. 49:20 [LXX 30:14]; 50:45 [LXX 27:45]), or whether he will change them, if his people will only repent (Jer. 26:3 [LXX 33:3]; 36:3 [LXX 43:3]). Hence, the concept, which in Heb. expresses the emotional and personal, and in Gk. the objective understanding of calculation and evaluation, can express both sides of the biblical message. God's personal, righteous dealings with his people on the basis of his law alone enable them to believe and to count on God. God does not act in an arbitrary and incalculable fashion; he has revealed his purpose and plan of salvation through the prophetic word (→ Covenant).

NT logizomai occurs 40 times in the NT of which 34 are in Paul (Rom. 2:3, 26; 3:28; 4:3 quoting Gen. 15:6; 4:4, 5, 6, 8 quoting Ps. 32:2; 4:9 ff., 22 ff.; 6:11; 8:18, 36 quoting Ps. 44:23; 9:8; 14:14; 1 Cor. 4:1; 13:5, 11; 2 Cor. 3:5; 5:19; 10:2, 7, 11; 11:5; 12:6; Gal. 3:6 quoting Gen. 15:6; Phil. 3:13; 4:8; 2 Tim. 4:16). It also occurs in Mk. 15:28 par. Lk. 22:37 quoting Isa. 53:12; Jn. 11:50; Acts 19:27; Heb. 11:19; Jas. 2:23; 1 Pet. 5:12; logismos occurs only at Rom. 2:15 and 2 Cor. 10:5.

1. Paul uses logizomai and logismos in relating the foundation of faith to the → righteousness of God. Since he associated it with the facts of the cross and resurrection of Jesus, he never separated the concept of logizomai from the personal activity of God in Jesus Christ. For him, faith was not an objective observing from a neutral vantage point, but being conquered by the crucified and risen Lord.

(a) When Paul in Rom. 2:15 mentions the thoughts (logismoi) which bring arguments of mutual accusation, he is not thinking of unemotional, philosophical thought, but of that reckoning and deduction which separates the good from the evil in a man's conscience and in the process stands before God. Popular philosophy speaks of → conscience, but the apostle says that it is the living God who so bears testimony in the heart. For behind all the strivings of the heathen there lies a standard, which God has fixed and fixes, the work of the law written on their hearts. Failure to reach this standard is recognized as guilt by the conscience, and the thoughts of the heart reckon in practice with God's judgment, as is shown by the conflicting thoughts accusing and defending. (On this passage see C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I, 1975, 155–63; → God, art. theos NT 4 (b).)

Man, however, uses his thoughts to fortify himself against the knowledge of the true God and his claims to obedience (2 Cor. 10:4 f.). Hence, Paul was concerned in his missionary work to reveal the divine purpose and act in Christ, and in the full authority of God to take men's clever thoughts prisoner (2 Cor. 3:5), so that their proud arrogance (hypsōma) should bow to Christ in conquered and liberated freedom (cf. 2 Cor. 10:5). Even so, this obedient logismos remains partial until it is perfected in eternity (1 Cor. 13:11).

(b) When the noēma, the mind (→ Reason), is so conquered, it grasps God's purpose and action in the cross; when it grasps this, it is glad to acknowledge itself as conquered. Paul expresses this divine reckoning in 2 Cor. 5:19: "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them" (→ Reconciliation, art. katallassō NT 4). This does not mean that God does not take sin seriously. The reverse is true; but he reckons and deals with it in Christ otherwise than human reckoning would have expected. Since he does not impute it, sin has been really removed (cf. Col. 2:13), for God has entirely attributed it to Christ. Indeed, "he made him to be sin" for us (2 Cor. 5:21). God's non-attribution (mē logizomenos) and reconciliation are not a weak forbearance but his complete settlement with sin on the cross.

This completely trustworthy attitude of God, in which he acts in just this way and in no other for the sake of his → righteousness, has its background in the prophetic oracle "He [i.e. the servant of the Lord] was numbered with the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12), where the suffering of the servant of the Lord is foretold. The passive ultimately implies God and his will; he bruised or crushed him not because of his sin, but because of ours. He laid the punishment on him, that we might have peace. That is how Lk. 22:37 understands this passage. Paul understands the exchange, this strange action by God, when he writes of the non-imputation of sin.

The converse of this statement is the reckoning of faith as righteousness in the Pauline letters, linking it with Gen. 15:6 in Rom. 4:3–6, 8, 10, 22 ff., and Gal. 3:6 (cf. Jas. 2:23 with different context) (→ Righteousness, art. dikaïosynē NT 5(b), 7). The rabbis' thinking was purely human; for them faith was a merit. Paul wished to reckon as God did, who reckoned salvation and righteousness to Abraham, who trusted in him and his word. God reckons on the basis of his promise (Rom. 9:8), and what he promises he performs. This reckoning of righteousness is effected in the delivering up and resurrection of Jesus and so it is effective for us also (Rom. 4:23 ff.).

(c) Because God reckoned in the way described in Gen. 15 and Isa. 53 and proclaimed by Paul in Rom. 4 and 2 Cor. 5, the man reconciled through Christ and believing in him may and should so reckon and think. Hence, Paul draws clear theological (Rom. 3:28) and practical conclusions for himself and his readers (2 Cor. 10:7; cf. Rom. 2:3). The standard for our logizesthai is therefore, because of the cross, not a principle but a fact, to which every act and thought should conform (cf. H. W. Heidland, TDNT IV 288).

Paul, therefore, in Rom. 8:18 already reckons with the glory which at some time will be revealed, and which will reduce all present suffering with Christ to insignificance. As Christ's sufferings, death and resurrection have led to glory, so the church's suffering with him will lead to being glorified together with him. Thus we also may count confidently upon the coming → glory.

The sharing of the logizesthai through faith is not a case of merely holding something to be true but is also an inspiration and activity, as in the OT ḥāšab. Phil. 4:8 and 1 Cor. 13:5 are to be expounded in the light of Zech. 8:17, and not of 2 Tim. 4:16 (where mē logistheīē means "may it not be charged"). This kind of thinking is not solely an intellectual construction, but can arrive at factual conclusions which demand corresponding actions (Rom. 14:14), just as the word and the act are one with God. Hence, we should evaluate others and ourselves rightly, not by false standards, but as they and we stand in God's sight (1 Cor. 4:1; Phil. 3:13; 2 Cor. 10:2; 11:5; 12:6).

2. John also writes of God's act on which faith is based (1 Jn. 1:1) and of the love revealed in this act (Jn. 3:16). But his purpose was not the same as Paul's. The latter was involved in conflict with Judaism, and the unity of judgment and grace in the divine saving activity was the focus of his teaching. John's witness centres on the testimony that truth and life, about which the gnostics also spoke, are to be found in Jesus Christ, who had come in the flesh, had died and had risen. Hence, John found no use for the concept logizomai. He uses the word only in Jn. 11:50, in reporting the high priest Caiaphas's unconscious prophecy: "You do not understand [logizesthe] that it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation should not perish."

We find the term further in Lk. 22:37 (cf. Isa. 53:12; see above 1 (c)); Acts 19:27; and 1 Pet. 5:12. Heb. 11:19 uses it in its full theological sense, as does Paul in Rom. 4. Jas. 2:23 uses the quotation from Gen. about the reckoning of faith as righteousness in his own way by pointing to Abraham's active obedience (→ Righteousness, art. dikaïosynē NT 7).

J. Eichler

→ Glory, → Knowledge, → Mind, → Reason

(a). H. W. Heidland, logizomai, logismos, TDNT IV 284–92; G. Kittel, dokēō, TDNT II 232 f.; G. Schrenk, dialegomai, dialogizomai, dialogismos, TDNT II 93–98; W. H. G. Thomas, "Apostolic Arithmetic: A Pauline Word-Study", ExpT 17, 1905–6, 211–14.

(b). F. Flückiger, "Die Werke des Gesetzes bei den Heiden (nach Röm. 2, 14 ff.)", ThZ 8, 1952, 17–42; H. W. Heidland, Die Anrechnung des Glaubens zur Gerechtigkeit, BWANT IV, 18, 1936; F. Nötscher, Zur theologischen Terminologie der Qumrantexte, 1956, 52 f.; W. Schottroff, hšb, THAT I 641–46.

Time

Time and eternity are two complementary categories for comprehending the historical process. The Gk. language has a wealth of various terms with which to express the experience of time. The most extensive one is aiōn which is primarily a designation for a long period of time. When such an age refers to the past, it denotes remote antiquity, the dim and distant past; when it is directed to the on-going future aiōn can take on the meaning of eternity. Eternity is thus not necessarily a timeless concept, but the most comprehensive temporal one which the experience of time has produced. Theologically speaking, lasting time is a property of God the Creator, whereas passing time belongs to man as creature. chronos chiefly denotes the quantitative, linear expanse of time, a space or period of time, and is thus a term of the formal and scientific conception of time. In this connexion there are several terms which comprehend a particular span of time: especially eniautos, year; mēn, month, hēmera, day and hōra, hour. By contrast, the characteristic stress of kairos draws attention to the content of time, negatively as crisis and positively as opportunity. Since the adverbs nyn, now, and sēmeron, today, which relate to the present, and are also fundamentally claimed for the linear conception of time (in this case marking a present point of time) are chiefly used in the NT in a qualificatory sense, they are incorporated in the art. kairos. It is instructive for the whole NT understanding of time that it is not the formal concept of chronos, but that of kairos, qualifying the content of the time of Jesus, which stands in the foreground. For the concepts of day, maranatha and parousia → Present.

αἰών

αἰών (aiōn), aeon, age, life-span, epoch, long time, eternity; αἰώνιος (aiōnios), without beginning or end, eternal, for ever; ἀίδιος (aidios), eternal.

CL The Gk. word aīōn, which is probably derived from aei, always, is distinguished from its Indo-European parallels (Lat. aevum and Eng. aye are cognate) in that it is thought of not so much from the point of view of an abstract period of time as from the point of view of the time in which one has lived. In Hom. aīōn is often parallel with psychē, → soul, life (e.g. Il. 16, 453); in Hesiod (Frag. 161, 1) it denotes a life-span, and in Aeschylus (Sept. 742) a generation. Thence it can mean the time which one has already lived or will live, i.e. it can relate to past as to future. It thus appeared appropriate to later philosophers to use the word both for the dim and distant past, the beginning of the world, and for the far future, eternity (e.g. Plato, Tim. 37d).

In Plato the term is developed so as to represent a timeless, immeasurable and transcendent super-time, an idea of time in itself. Plutarch and the earlier Stoics appropriate this understanding, and from it the Mysteries of Aion, the god of eternity, could be celebrated in Alexandria, and gnosticism could undertake its own speculations on time.

In Hellenistic philosophy the concept of aeons contributed towards a solution of the problem of the world-order. The aeons were assumed to be mediating powers which bridge the infinite qualitative distinction between God and the world. They are an emanation of the divine plērōma, the fullness of the divine Being (→ Fullness, art. plērōō NT 5 (b)). As differing levels of being of the divinity, they rule the various world-historical periods, which follow one another in a perpetual circular movement. The thought of personal, divine aeons was widespread in the speculation of the ancient orient, e.g. in Parseeism, in the Zoroastrian religion and in Philo. In gnosticism is found the doctrine of the two ages (aeons), representing on the one hand the eternal and supratemporal, and on the other the temporal and transient world. (For literature on gnosticism → Knowledge.)

OT 1. (a) aīōn became (over 450 times, including 150 in the Apocrypha and over 100 in the Pss.) the LXX equivalent for Heb. ‘ōlām, a long time or duration, which is also used as an adv. meaning for ever, for all time. This fact is not, however, due to this later speculative development in the meaning of the word, but to the primary meaning of life-span. This is clearly shown by the way in which the LXX uses the two adjs. aīōnios (c. 160 times) and aidios, both meaning eternal. The latter word, a term of steadiness and unalterability, stemming intellectually from the syncretism of Hellenistic, Egyptian and Oriental thought, is found in the Apocrypha only in Wis. 7:26 as a predicate of wisdom, and then in 4 Macc. 10:15. By contrast with this, the frequent occurrence of aīōnios in both OT and NT shows that we are concerned here with a characteristically biblical concrete idea which must be understood in relation to the whole duration of a man's life. OT ‘ōlām, duration, is therefore always to be distinguished from moment, for which rega’ is used (→ chronos; cf. Isa. 54:7 f.). For the point of time of a unique event the word ‘ēt (→ kairos; cf. Mic. 5:3[2]) is available. If ‘ōlām/aīōn in the OT thus denotes the time of life, one cannot begin to explain it from those passages where it is remote antiquity that is regarded as ‘ōlām. Rather, it is a case, in the first instance, of an extent of time, e.g., for which a slave is obligated (Deut. 15:17; Exod. 21:6), for which Samuel is consecrated to the temple service (1 Sam. 1:22), and for the priestly service of the sons of Aaron (Exod. 29:9). In all these cases it extends throughout a man's whole life, but is also limited to it. This is so even in cases of a promise of life-long kingship (1 Sam. 13:13), of the people's trust in Moses as long as he lives (Exod. 19:19), or of a life-long vassal-relationship (1 Sam. 27:12). It goes without saying that all this comes to an end with the death of the person concerned.

(b) This is naturally also the case when such statements are made, not of individual men but of generations (e.g. Exod. 40:15; 32:13; Ps. 18[17]:51) or of the whole nation (Jos. 4:7; Jdg. 2:1). With the decline of these entities the time here indicated is also ended, without this of course appearing as a particularly noticeable break since it was indeed "their" time.

This provides us with the simplest credible means of explanation of the so-called eternity-formulae: "Praised be Yahweh the God of Israel, from eternity to eternity [MT min hā'ōlām w'ad hā'ōlām; apo tou aiōnos kai heōs tou aiōnos]" (1 Chr. 16:36). Israel is summoned to constant thanksgiving and praise (v. 34); the continuing of the praise is thus linked with the continuing of the nation in its generations. In fact, "eternal" and "for a thousand generations" stand in parallel in v. 15. The formula "from eternity to eternity" is thus best derived from the other formula "from generation to generation [MT 'ōlām l'dōrōtām; LXX eis ton aiōna eis tas geneas autōn]" (Exod. 40:15; cf. Isa. 13:20). The formula thus regains its true sense, in that even here it is not a question of an eternity conceived of in abstract and infinite terms, but of one's life and praise in relation to God. 1 Sam. 2:30 and 3:13 f. show clearly enough that the content of God's eternal promises is never an abstract unchangeability, but a mutual relationship with men: as long as it is intact it is eternal, but it can fall to pieces.

(c) Even the great → promises, which are established for ever, are not simply timelessly and irrevocably valid. They remain bound to their living point of reference in the living God (1 Ki. 9, the eternity of the → temple is bound to God's living presence; 2 Sam. 7, the eternity of the monarchy). Human life is limited (Gen. 6:3); it cannot therefore be the ground of endless duration. But because God lives (the eternal God is the living God, cf. the polemic against the dead inactive idols in Isa. 40 and 44), his action and his salvation are eternal (Isa. 45:17), his → covenant endures (Isa. 55:3), and his will is incontestable (Exod. 12:14 ff.; 27:21).

(d) This explains why 'ōlām is able not only to designate subsequent and future time (Gen. 13:15; Exod. 14:13; Deut. 13:16; 23:3, 6; 29:29; Jos. 8:28; Mic. 4:7) but also remote antiquity (Gen. 6:4; Deut. 32:7; Amos 9:11 with reference to the future day of Yahweh; Mic. 5:2[1]). All time is related to the action in history of the living God (Joel 2:1 ff.). It is true that there are tendencies in the later portions of the OT towards abstract concepts of eternity (Pss. 9:6; 21[20]:5; cf. Sir. 1:2), and there are even passages in the Apocrypha which speak of an eternity entirely removed from time (with Prov. 8:23 as the point of departure). But it remains significant that in the OT the terms 'ōlām and aiōn always retain the relatedness of time to → life. The idea that the time in which one lives is not eternity, and that eternity is the time in which God lives, does not correspond with the OT conception.

2. This sense of the word is also continued in the older apocalyptic writings of Judaism (e.g. Eth. Enoch) and into the Dead Sea Scrolls (e.g. 1QS 2:1, 3 f., 8; 2:15, 17, 25; 1QM 4:1, 3, 7 f.; 1QH 1:3, 7 f.) and after. The word 'ōlām, of course, pales increasingly until it becomes an epithet for everything connected with God and his heavenly world – → angels the final judgment, the blessings of salvation, even the pious themselves.

It is only in the rabbinic Judaism at the turn of the era and in the apocalyptic of the 1st cent. A.D. (e.g. 2 Esd.) that one finds a quite new use of 'ôlām, which exhibits a spatial significance as well as a temporal one. Clearly under the influence of Persian thought, the OT statements concerning primal and final time (Isa. 24–27; Joel 2) are here systematized into a doctrine of the two worlds (aeons), whose only remaining common factor is that God is the Lord of this world as of that, and the Lord of this age as of that. They are related antithetically, for this age is the time of unrighteousness, sin and pain. When the age to come supersedes this one, all this will come to an end, since there will then be a new earth where the → righteous will live. The NT affinity of the terms aiōn, aeon, and kosmos, world, is also based on this idea. The expected messiah either brings in the future age himself, or “the days of the messiah” are thought of as an interim period, which are followed by the new age. This is reflected in the terms “this age” (Gk. ho aiōn houtos; Heb. hā'ôlām hazzeh) and “the age to come” (Gk. ho mellōn aiōn; Heb. ha'ôlām habbā') (cf. Arndt, 27).

NT 1. In the NT the noun aiōn occurs over 100 times (29 times in the Johannine literature; 22 in the Synoptics and Acts; 19 in Paul; 13 in Heb.; 20 scattered throughout the rest of the NT letters); the adj. aiōnios, eternal, 70 times; aidios, eternal, only twice (Rom. 1:20 of the unchangeable power and deity of God; and Jude 6 of the eternal chains of the fallen angels). The noun is found with the following meanings:

(a) A long time, duration of time, where both a specifically limited period of time as well as an unlimited period can be meant; chiefly linked with a preposition. The meaning “eternity” is only appropriate with certain qualifications, in that the OT idea of time, which predominantly conditions the NT, does not regard eternity as the opposite of temporality.

(b) An age, epoch, era (of the world), especially in Matt. with reference to the end of the world (Matt. 13:39; 28:20). This denotes the course of world-events, world history. It is also used in the plural with this meaning (e.g. Heb. 9:26; 1 Cor. 10:11). The underlying idea is that the world runs its course in a series of successive ages.

(c) Occasionally there occurs the meaning of world in the spatial sense, probably going back to the influence of Jewish apocalyptic (e.g. Mk. 4:19; 1 Cor. 2:6; especially (plur.) Heb. 1:2; 11:3).

2. The simple grammatical evidence of the use of aiōn in the NT points back to two sources: OT and Judaism coloured by Parseeism. The fact that 'ôlām in the OT “only ever occurs in prepositional expressions or their grammatical equivalents” (E. Jenni, “Das Wort 'ôlām im Alten Testament”, ZAW 64, 1952, 222) is reflected in the prepositional use of aiōn, aeon (more than 60 times) in the NT.

The prepositional use of the word in the NT does not elucidate the connexion between aiōn, time, and → life for the reader quite so well as its use in the OT. It is true that even here one can scarcely deny the connexion (eis ton aiōna, “never”, in 1 Cor. 8:13 and Jn. 13:8; “from generation to generation”, Lk. 1:55; cf. Matt. 21:19), but, in so far as a preposition precedes it, one can only consider the designation of “antiquity” or the “far future” as the essential NT use of the word.

(a) The meaning of antiquity (with prepositions apo, from, pro, before, ek, from) is relatively rare. It occurs in Lk. (never in Mk. and Matt.) always in the context of statements that God has from of old spoken through the prophets (Lk. 1:70; Acts 3:21; 15:18), and – as all three passages make clear – through the primal prophet → Moses (Lk. 24:27). It is also found similarly in Jn. 9:32 in the sense of “never since the world began [ek tou aiōnos]”. In 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26 and especially in Jude 25 the meaning verges on pre-temporal eternity.

(b) The same shift of meaning is also to be seen in the far more widely attested statements about the future which are, however, uniformly linked only with eis, into (and generally with the sing. of aiōn). It is further clear that passages such as Matt. 21:19; Mk. 3:29; Lk. 1:55; Jn. 13:8; and 1 Cor. 8:13 are speaking of a future within time which is linked with the duration of that to which reference is made. On the other hand, the statements of the Johannine writings, which cannot always be pinned down with absolute certainty of meaning (Jn. 4:14; 6:51, 58; 8:35, 51 f.; 10:28; 11:26; 12:34; 13:8; 14:16; 1 Jn. 2:17; 2 Jn. 2), Heb., where the meaning is quite clear (1:8, quoting Ps. 110:4; 5:6; 6:20; cf. 1:2; 6:5; 7:17, 21, 24, 28; 9:26; 11:3; 13:8, 21) and naturally those cases where aiōn is used in the plural, all reveal a strong inclination to conceive of a timeless, because post-temporal, eternity. For these it is typical throughout that they stand in theological (Jn.), christological (Heb.) or doxological contexts (plur. statements, e.g. Rom. 1:25; 11:36). As in the OT, these statements reveal the background conviction that God’s life never ends, i.e. that everything belonging to him can also never come to an end. So it comes about that even where the conception of the age (in the doxologies of the Pauline letters and those closely related to Paul, and also those of Rev.) is intensified (eis tous aiōnas tōn aiōnōn, lit. “to the eternity of eternities”), the connexion with the basic meaning of aiōn as life-span is still not lost. What appertains to the living God is “eternal”. But one must not forget that this God is also the final Judge, so that even perdition must be called aiōnios, eternal (Matt. 18:8; 25:41, 46; Mk. 3:29; 2 Thess. 1:9; Heb. 6:2; Jude 7).

3. It is quite a different matter with the use of the word aiōn, aeon, age, epoch (occurring in this sense 40 times) as a noun. This must be seen against the background of Jewish apocalyptic. The word serves as the principal term for the NT’s understanding of its history and eschatology. If this also reaches back to Jewish apocalyptic, the apocalyptic, at any rate, is not developed along speculative lines. Used as a noun aiōn, age, occurs scattered throughout the NT but never (and this is characteristic) in the Johannine writings.

(a) For the Synoptics, the most important fact is that the kingdom of God has dawned. If details are taken over from apocalyptic, then it is only in order to say, with its linguistic and conceptual material, that the present age is approaching its end because the → kingdom of God has come.

The contrast between the two ages is scarcely discernible; it merely serves to throw into relief the different nature of the course of the world under the reign of Christ. His return and the → resurrection of the dead follow on his own resurrection. The new time, the new age has dawned with Jesus. The period until the parousia enables the Christian community to proclaim the gospel.

Matthew displays the fullest and most vivid conception of the aeons in the sense of distinguishing between two successive worlds of space and time, for here alone is found the typical distinction between the aiōn houtos, this age, and the aiōn mellōn, the age to come (Matt. 12:32). In answer to the question concerning the time of the end of the world and the signs of the messianic future (Matt. 24:3), Matt. is able to give a clear and realistic reply, not only in the subsequent apocalypse (Matt. 24 f., here without the word aion), but even more clearly in the interpretation of the parable of the wheat and the tares (Matt. 13:36–43, cf. v. 49). But this is vastly different from (e.g.) the conceptions in Qumran: there is no final battle and no dualism at all of different worlds, rulers and subjects (cf. Y. Yadin, The Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness, 1962; H. Ringgren, The Faith of Qumran: Theology of the Dead Sea Scrolls, 1963). The Son of man is Lord; the devil may well be able to bring ruin, but he is no real counterpart to the Son of man (→ Son, art. hyios tou anthrōpou). The world is not subject to the conflict between two powers; it is and remains God's → creation. All this makes it clear that the aeons are not, as in gnosticism, authorities in their own right; nor are they emanations of God or his delegates.

(b) Paul also makes use of apocalyptic concepts in his eschatology (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (c)). He uses the word aion to designate the course of the world apart from Christ and under the control of sin (Gal. 1:4, Christ "delivered us from this present evil age"; cf. Rom. 12:2). → Satan is admittedly the god of this age (2 Cor. 4:4), and the present world is dominated by evil demonic powers. But against the power of → darkness (art. skotos) is ranged the victorious kingdom of Christ (Col. 1:13).

It is clear from Paul's confrontation with his opponents in Corinth that he understands the course of the world from the perspective of Jewish apocalyptic. The enthusiast group believed that, with → baptism, i.e. through sacramental realism (similar to the Hellenistic mystery cults), they had already reached the goal of redemption and the resurrection from the dead (1 Cor. 15:12 ff.; cf. 2 Tim. 1:18). The Corinthian pneumatists replaced future eschatological expectation with a present eschatology: final salvation in its final definitiveness had already come to them. Paul, too, could stress that the fullness of time (Gal. 4:4) and the new creation has already begun (2 Cor. 5:17), in which Christ has delivered his church from the present evil age (Gal. 1:4). But in 1 Cor. 15:20 ff., by contrast, his starting-point is that the rule of Christ has not yet achieved its final goal; and later Eph. 1:21 can maintain that this age still persists and that the future one is still awaited. Thus Paul does not develop any systematic doctrine of aeons; neither does the rest of the NT. The ages are interlocked: eschatology is determined solely by the revelation of Christ: Christ is the turning-point of time. With him, and not through any inevitable historical processes, the now of salvation has arrived (cf. nyn, Col. 1:26; nyni, Rom. 3:21). For the believer, the present age (1 Cor. 1:20; 3:18; 10:11) belongs to the past. But "the correlative of 'this world', and 'this age' is properly not 'that aeon', and never 'that other world', but 'the sovereignty of God', and the 'eternal life'" (G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, 1902, 148). "The proper antithesis to this age is thus God himself, his righteousness, the kingdom of Christ, the pneuma or the eschatological blessings of salvation" (F. J. Schierse, LTK I 682).

(c) In Hebrews this age is called ho kairos ho enestēkōs, "the present time" (Heb. 9:9), and the new age kairos diorthōseōs, "the time of reformation" (Heb. 9:10) (→ kairos). The equation of aeon and cosmos (Heb. 1:2; 9:26; 11:3) probably originates in Jewish linguistic usage (cf. SB III 671 ff.), but it can also be evidenced in gnosticism. The frequent plur. aiōnes, meaning world (in the spatial rather than the temporal sense), goes back to the conception of the various layers of the world-frame or of a multiplicity of world systems, which can be understood as a gnostic interpretation of the world. Four and even seven aeons can be found in Jewish writings. Despite the adoption of many Hellenistic linguistic and conceptual elements, Heb. holds fast to the primitive Christian (Jewish-determined) eschatological proclamation. It knows the sequence of two ages (which in Heb. are christologically defined), for the end of the ages (Heb. 9:26) has come, because Christ has appeared in order to abolish sin by the sacrifice of himself. The present age is defined by sacrifice and the first → tent, while the new age is concerned with the working of God in the heavenly sanctuary. There Christ has already instituted the priestly ministry, and the Christian community is already on the way there (Heb. 9:8 ff.; cf. 10:19; 13:14). The new age reaches out from the heavenly world into the present time. Even if hidden, it is already present (Heb. 6:5).

(d) 2 Peter, by contrast, develops a distinctly futurist eschatology. Even though the mighty parousia of Jesus Christ (2 Pet. 1:16) and entrance into his eternal kingdom (2 Pet. 1:11) are expressly mentioned, interest is directed rather to the future blessings of salvation, the reward of the righteous, participation in the divine → nature (2 Pet. 1:4). The dialectic of present and future salvation, which can be found above all in Paul, here merges into a latter-day view of the future. The letter concentrates on the proclamation of the end-time, the certainty of judgment (2 Pet. 2:4–10; 3:5–10), the dissolution of the existing order (2 Pet. 3:11 f.) and the promise of “new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells” (2 Pet. 3:13). The letter closes with the doxology: “To him be the glory both now and to the day of eternity. Amen” (2 Pet. 3:18).

4. The expression “eternal life” (zōē aiōnios), corresponding to the basic meaning of aiōn, lifetime, as defined by the OT, is to be understood primarily as life which belongs to God. From the Book of Daniel onwards “eternal life” is an expression of the longed-for eschatological blessings of salvation, life in the age to come (cf. Dan. 12:2). In the major Pauline Letters (e.g. Rom. 2:7; 5:21; 6:22 f.; 16:25 f.; Gal. 6:8; cf. 2 Cor. 4:17 f.; 5:1; 2 Thess. 1:9; 2:16; Phlm. 15; Acts 13:46, 48), Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 18:8; 19:16 par. Mk. 10:17, Lk. 18:18; Matt. 19:29 par. Mk. 10:30, Lk. 18:30; Matt. 25:41, 46; cf. Mk. 3:29; Lk. 10:25; 16:9), the Pastoral Epistles (e.g. 1 Tim. 1:16; 6:12, 16; 2 Tim. 1:9; 2:10; Tit. 1:2; 3:7) and Jude 21 there is a temporal understanding of eternal → life (art. zōē NT 1 and 2). This is a life that is awaited in the future along with the → resurrection of the dead, just as the term can be used in Judaism alternately with basileia tou theou, the → kingdom of God (cf. Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 6:9 f.) to denote salvation.

John understands eternal life in relation to Christ through faith, love and in keeping the commands of Christ (Jn. 3:15 f., 36; 4:14, 36; 5:24, 39; 6:27, 40, 47, 54, 68; 10:28; 12:25, 50; 17:2 f.). The word “eternal” here indicates a definite quality: it is a different life from the old existence typified by hate, lack of love, sin, pain and death. Eternal life does not therefore just begin in the future, it is already the possession of those who have entered upon fellowship with Christ. Thus Jn. 3:15 speaks of having eternal life in the present. But there is also a temporal sense, so that eternal (aiōnios) indicates the quantity of this life: because it belongs to Christ, who himself is the Life (Jn. 14:6), it has no end. It will not even cease at death (Jn. 8:51; 11:25 f.). One must also observe that the NT does not speak of an eternal → death, because the idea of eternity is so closely connected with life that the negation of eternal life can also only be understood as the experience of ruin. Even here, eternity remains time in and through which one lives (on the other hand → chronos).

5. Surveying the usage of the word aiōn, aeon, and the connected eschatology, one can establish that, with all the varied accentuations, the NT speaks of eternity in the categories of time. Any dualism between two world-systems is thus foreign to it. The world is and remains God's creation, and Christ is the Lord of the worlds, even if his lordship is hidden. The expression ho mellōn aiōn, the future age, is used only with the greatest caution. It is the Today that stands in the centre of the statements and that which is coming is only relevant in view of the respective present. Everywhere the NT exercises conscious discretion in the face of events of which knowledge is forbidden (1 Thess. 5:1 ff.; Matt. 24:37 ff.); it does not go into rapturous speculations about the nature and time of the coming aeon. This is also a warning to every Christian today against speculating about God's mystery.

J. Guhr

καιρός	καιρός (kairos), time, especially a point of time, moment; εὐκαιρέω (eukaireō), have opportunity; εὐκαιρία (eukairia), favourable opportunity, the right moment; εὐκαιρος (eukairos), opportune; εὐκαιρως (eukairōs), when convenient; ἀκαιρέομαι (akaireomai), have no time, no opportunity; ἄκαιρος (akairos), untimely, ill-timed, inopportune; πρόσκαιρος (proskairos), temporary, transitory, passing; σήμερον (sēmeron), today; νῦν (nyn), νυνί (nynī), now; ἄρτι (arti), now, just, immediately; εὐθύς (euthys), at once, immediately; εὐθέως (eutheōs), at once, immediately.
--------	--

CL 1. (a) The noun kairos (first in Hesiod, Works 694) originally denoted right measure, correct proportion, that which is convenient, appropriate or decisive. As well as the material and temporal, lexical content, kairos can have a locative sense, meaning the right spot, the suitable place. Used in the material and temporal sense, kairos characterizes a critical situation, one which demands a decision, one into which man is perhaps led by fate. Positively, it implies opportunity (cf. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1, 4, p. 1096a) or advantage; negatively, danger (Plato, Leg. 12, 945c). Among the material meanings belongs kairos as importance, norm (e.g. Aesch., Ag. 787), wise moderation (Soph., OT 1516). In the temporal sense, kairos describes a suitable time, the right moment (e.g. Soph., El. 1292), a favourable moment. But then kairos can also appear synonymously with other temporal concepts and denote quite generally time (→ chronos), season of the year (e.g. Plato, Leg. 4, 709c), hour (→ hōra) or the present moment (like nyn, now, and sēmeron, today).

(b) The following words are derived from kairos: eukairein (e.g. Phrynichus 125), to have a good time, to have an opportunity; eukairia (e.g. Plato, Phdr. 272a), a favourable opportunity; eukairos (first in Soph., OC 32), suitable, opportune, seasonable; eukairōs (first in Xen., Agésilas 8, 3), when convenient; akairōs (Aesch. onwards) inopportune, and proskairos (e.g. Strabo 7, 3, 11), lasting only a while, passing, momentary, fickle.

(c) sēmeron (Homer onwards, e.g. Il. 11, 431), today, on this day is also included in this article dealing with words expressing points of time.

(d) Further, mention must be made of the adv. nyn (Homer onwards e.g. Od. 2, 239; Il. 2, 14, 284, 435) and the synonymous intensive form nyni (e.g. Thuc. 4, 92), now (cf. Lat. nunc), at the present moment. But the time shortly before or shortly after the immediate present can also be meant: just now, forthwith. Not infrequently nyn has a more material meaning as well as the temporal, viz. in accordance with the present situation, as matters now stand (e.g. Hom. Od. 1, 166). nyn is also frequently used adjectivally, meaning present (e.g. Plato, Rep. 6, 506d, to nyn einai, "present existence"; Aristotle, Phys. 6, 6 p. 237a, ho nyn chronos, "the present time") or substantivally, as in to nyn, "the present time" (e.g. Aristotle, Phys. 4, 10 p. 218a) or as plur. ta nyn "present-day events" (Tragedians, Plato).

(e) Synonymous with nyn is the temporal adv. arti (Pindar onwards; root ar; cf. Lat. artus, tight, close), now, just, forthwith (e.g. Hippocrates, Epidemiae 9, 2). With the prepositions heōs, until, and apo, away from, arti turns the attention from the present moment to the past or future (e.g. Plut., 388).

(f) Finally, reference must be made to the adj. euthys (in Hom. ithys), straight, direct (e.g. Thuc., 2, 100, 2 of a road) which, in both the adv. forms euthys (Pindar onwards) and eutheōs (Soph. onwards) has the temporal meaning of straightaway, forthwith.

2. The presence of the two etymological groups, associated respectively with chronos and kairos for the concept of time, suggests that the Greeks distinguished individual periods or points of time which can be effected by human decisions (kairos) from the stream of time, whose progress is independent of any possible human influence (chronos).

The will to seize the moment, which can naturally also grasp the wrong thing (kairos-thinking), counteracts the danger of fatalism, which could grow out of chronos-thinking. "chronos encompasses . . . all possible kairoi, and, being the larger, more exclusive term, may often be used where kairos would have been equally suitable, though not the converse. . . . Thus it is possible to speak of the kairos chronou, and Sophocles (Elect. 1292) does so . . . but not of the chronos kairou" (R. C. Trench Synonyms of the New Testament, [1880⁹] 1953, 210; cf. Lk. 1:57; Gal. 4:4).

(a) kairos, nyn and sēmeron mark for the Greek those points of time which were of the greatest importance for his individual life in the infinite onward flow of the stream of macrocosmic time (→ chronos). Where there was an interest, like that of Aristotle in his Physics, in the exploration of tangible reality, reflection on time led to particular prominence being given to smaller units of time. Thus, for instance, the Now is defined: "The Now [nyn] is the limiting factor: that which lies between the respective points of Now is time [chronos]" (Phys. 6, 6 p. 237a). Eth. Nic. 1, 4 p. 1096a indicates the high estimation of kairos: "that which is good in time is called kairos."

(b) It is against the background of the swift passing of time (→ chronos) that the point of time which demands action, whether it is given by gods or by fate, gains its importance. In later times Kairos could even temporarily be worshipped as a god. It is the space of time in which many decisions are made for the individual and which one must dare to exploit. "Today [sēmeron] is either your day of glory . . . or else you lose your life transfixed by my spear" (Homer, Il. 11, 431; cf. also Eur., Fragment 745). Anyone who misses or evades his kairos destroys himself: "Can there be any doubt that a work is spoilt when it is not done at the right time?" (Plato, Rep. 2, p. 370b). That which has been received para kairon, inopportunately, also has unhappy consequences in the end (Theognis in Griechische Lyrik, 108/115). It is therefore important to take to heart the call kairon gnōthi, recognize the moment (Pittacus, Diels-Kranz, I, 64), and in all one's activity to find the right moment (in public speaking Democ., Frag. 226; in charitable acts, Frag. 94).

(c) Seizing the right moment (kairon lambanein or chrēsthai) plays an important rôle in Stoic ethics (Epictetus and later Seneca). In active obedience to what is perceived to be rational (Epictetus, Dissertationes 1, 1, 6) moral necessity (cf. Dissertationes 2, 7, 3) one seeks to get hold of time and so to escape from its oppressive imprisonment. "The Stoics live only for those present duties which develop out of man's timeless destiny. They have as little concern for historical sense as they do for worry about a far-off future" (M. Pohlenz, Die Stoa, I, 1954², 47). For the Stoic, who looks upon time (chronos) as a matter of entirely secondary importance (adiaphoron), the historical viewpoint of the kairos ultimately disappears; there is only the kairos as a timeless moment (cf. R. Bultmann, Primitive Christianity in its Contemporary Setting, 1956, 144 f., 153, 180–88).

OT In the OT, where time is essentially understood qualitatively from the point of view of the encounter between God and man, the use of a term to denote the right moment was important. It is therefore not surprising that kairos with c. 300 occurrences in the LXX occurs about three times as often as chronos. It is primarily used to render the Heb. word for time ʿet (198 times). 31 times it stands for mô'ed, point of time, six times for qēs, and three times for yôm, day. kairos often appears more or less synonymously with other words for time (with chronos, e.g. Dan. 2:21; 7:12; Eccl. 3:1; Wis. 7:18; 8:8; with hēmera, e.g. Jer. 50:27, 30; Ps. 37:19; with hōra, e.g. Num. 9:2 in comparison with 9:7, 13).

1. While kairos frequently serves simply for precise (e.g. Gen. 17:23, 26; 18:10, 14; 21:22; 29:34; 2 Chr. 9:25) or more general (e.g. Jdg. 11:26; 14:4; 1 Ki. 11:4; Ps. 71[70]:9; 2 Chr. 15:5) temporal designations, in other passages it helps to illustrate particularly well the characteristic aspect of the OT understanding of time. For time is not an anonymous destiny. The creator, Yahweh, has created the whole of time and fills it in accordance with his will, and also fixes the individual kairoi (cf. Gen. 1:14). He does this as the Lord of nature who guides the heavenly bodies (Job 38:32; Ps. 104[103]:19), directs the → weather (Lev. 26:4; Deut. 28:12, rain) and allots times and seasons for the biological growth of plants (Job 5:26; Ps. 1:3; cf. Hos. 2:9) and animals (Job 39:1; Jer. 8:7; cf. Gen. 30:41). The → feasts and festivals in the context of the yearly cycle are special times and moments of joy and rest given by Yahweh (Exod. 23:14 ff.; cf. Exod. 34:18 ff.; Num. 9:3, 7, 13; Deut. 16:16), which are of course "not only stamped by the events of agriculture. . . , but increasingly by the especial dealings of God with his people" (G. Dellings, Das Zeitverständnis des Neuen Testaments, 1940, 16).

As Lord of man, God also apportions his life-span (Sir. 17:2), in that he determines the hour of birth (Mic. 5:3; Eccl. 3:2) and of death (Eccl. 7:17). All the elements of human existence in their tension-laden diversity are times from and in God's hands (Ps. 31[30]:15), as the "song in praise of time" (Eccl. 3:1 ff.) stresses.

In times of affliction it is not easy to hold to this confession of Yahweh as the giver of times, but even then the Israelite who remains with the covenant does not allow his relationship with God to be broken (cf. Pss. 32[31]:6; 37[36]:19, 39). It is precisely in times of distress that he hopes for a time of pardon (Ps. 102[101]:4), for the kairos of God's help and redemption (cf. Jud. 13:5 "now is the time to recover your heritage" [JB]; Isa. 33:2; Jer. 14:8, 19; 15:11).

2. Such a trust in the particular moment (kairos) of a saving act of Yahweh is founded on the historical experiences of the people of Israel. Again and again in the stereotyped phrase en tō kairō ekeinō, "at that time", attention is directed to the events of salvation history in the past, in the first instance to the time of → Moses and the exodus from Egypt (cf. Deut. 1:9, 16, 18; 2:33 f.; 3:3; 4:14; 6:6; 9:19), but also to the prophetess Deborah (Jdg. 4:4), the reign of → David (1 Chr. 21:28 f.) or the time of the building of → Solomon's → temple (2 Chr. 7:8). Especially in the historical books of the OT, the term kairos is frequently found with this function of drawing attention to God's activity in the history of the Israelite nation. The strong historical interest is also shown in the fact that in the same writings great store is laid by chronological details (cf. G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 99–125).

3. "Within the OT a unique attitude to the reality of time may be seen in classical prophecy" (G. Delling, op. cit., 58). Here and in later apocalyptic circles of Judaism, there is a change from the thought of the fulfilled time of earlier generations and the patriarchal traditions to the expectation and hope of judgment and fulfilment in the future, which now achieves the same significance for life in the present as past history had done before, and even replaces it. Since the prophets see an unjustified assurance of salvation as having arisen out of a trust in the past, they speak emphatically of the judging but also redeeming future of God. The phrase en tō kairō ekeinō, "in that time", now takes on a future reference (Isa. 18:1; Jer. 3:17; 4:11; 8:1; 27[50]:20; Dan. 12:1; Joel 3:1; Amos 5:13; Mic. 3:4; Zeph. 3:16, 19 f.) and points to an intervention by God in the near or far-off future which will have the character of a comprehensive judgment. For the godless in and around Israel, the time of the end (kairos peras, Dan. 11:27; 12:9; kairos synteleias, Dan. 12:1) or "the day of the Lord" will be a time of visitation (kairos episkopēs, Jer. 6:15; 10:15; 27[50]:27; 28[51]:6; Wis. 3:7), of wrath (kairos orgēs, Sir. 44:17; cf. Ezek. 7:7, 12; Jer. 18:23) and of punishment (kairos ekdikeseōs, Jer. 26[46]:21; Sir. 5:7; 18:24). But Zion and those who remain obedient (cf. Ps. 81[80]:16) and practise righteousness (cf. Ps. 106[105]:3) await everlasting salvation (Zeph. 3:16, 19 f.; cf. Isa. 60:20 ff.; Jer. 27[50]:4, 20; Dan. 12:1 f.). Right up to the final day of judgment, however, Yahweh gives time for repentance (cf. Sir. 18:21) and for acting uprightly. This comes about by a right use of the present kairos at any given time (cf. Sir. 51:30).

4. (a) In later Judaism both the chronological interest (especially Jub.) and the expectation of an eschatos kairos, a final space of time, are powerfully elaborated. The Israelite prepared for an early end to the present time, and hoped for a new age, conceived – apart from exceptions like Enoch (Sl.) 65:7 f. – in temporal terms.

(b) The conception of time in the Dead Sea Scrolls has the strong imprint of deterministic thought. The command of the present "ordering of time" guaranteed by Yahweh is obedience to God's will (1QS 9:12 ff.), which consists in being separate from men in order to prepare the way for the last days (1QS 9:18 ff.). For God has preordained the moment of visitation (1QS 3:18), when an end will be put to wickedness and truth will come to light in the world for ever (1QS 4:18 ff.).

NT The terms of the word-group are found in the NT as follows: kairos 85 times (30 times in Paul; 22 times in the Lucan historical writings); eukaireō 3 times; eukairia twice (in the Gospels); eukairos, eukairōs and akairōs twice each; proskairos four times; sēmeron 41 times (Lk. and Acts 20 times; Heb. 8 times); nyn 148 times (Paul 52 times; Lk. and Acts 39 times; Jn. 28 times); nyni 18 times (Paul 15 times); arti 36 times (Jn. and Paul 12 times each, Matt. 7 times); euthys as adj. 8 times, as adv. 54 times (Mk. 42 times; other Gospels 11 times); and eutheōs 33 times (Lk. and Acts 15 times; Matt. 11 times). The main emphasis of the word-group thus falls on the one hand in Paul, and on the other in the Lucan historical writings.

1. The OT understanding of time also stamps the NT use of the word-group. In a whole range of passages kairos is used to mean the same or nearly the same as other terms for time, denoting quite generally a particular time (e.g. in the phrase "at that time", Matt. 11:25; 12:1; Lk. 13:1; Acts 7:20; 12:1; 19:23). This should not be understood merely as a short point or moment of time (except in Lk. 8:13). kairos clearly often means a longer or shorter time-span (e.g. Mk. 10:30; Lk. 18:10; 21:24, "the times of the Gentiles"; Eph. 2:12; Rom. 8:18; 11:5; 2 Cor. 8:14; 1 Thess. 2:17; 1 Cor. 7:5, a limited time of sexual abstinence). Frequently it means the times in the life of nature established in creation (Matt. 13:20; 21:34; Mk. 12:2; Lk. 20:10; Mk. 11:13), but any kind of nature-idolatry is specifically repudiated (Gal. 4:9 ff.) and the confession of God as the giver of fruitful times is given added strength (Acts 14:17; cf. Matt. 24:45).

2. The decisively new and constitutive factor for any Christian conception of time is the conviction that, with the coming of Jesus, a unique kairos has dawned, one by which all other time is qualified. Mk. 1:15 makes this clear in programmatic fashion. The keynote of Jesus' proclamation is, "the hour of fulfilment has dawned, the reign of God is already being manifested here and now; soon the catastrophe introducing its definitive coming will arrive. Make use of the time before it is too late: it is a matter of life or death" (J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology I, 1971, 139). The time of grace for which the prophets hoped has now been realized with Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 3:21; 1 Pet. 1:10 ff.; Rom. 16:25 f.; Eph. 3:8 ff.; Col. 1:26). Anyone who listens to him now in faith and obedience will have eternal life (Jn. 5:25; cf. 3:36; 10:27 f.). With the life and especially the suffering and death of Jesus, the old age has passed away, and with the nyn kairos, the present time of true divine righteousness (Rom. 3:26), a new epoch, the fulfilment of the times, has dawned (for kairos used to denote the time of suffering cf. Matt. 26:18; Jn. 7:6 f.; Rom. 5:6, "at his appointed moment Christ died for sinful men", JB). "Salvation has sought out its own time and its own place in the world, in order from there to transform time and space, the essential characteristics of the world, by qualifying them anew as the time and the space of Jesus" (E. Fuchs, Gesammelte Aufsätze, I, 1959, 19). But time also presents the church with the opportunity to serve one another, as may be seen in Paul's use of the vb. akaireomai, have no time, no opportunity. "I rejoice in the Lord greatly that now at length you have revived your concern for me; you were indeed concerned for me, but you had no opportunity" (Phil. 4:10).

3. (a) As the physical presence of Jesus plunged every concrete Today into the light of divine salvation (Lk. 13:32; 19:5, 9; 23:43; cf. 2:11), so his redeeming power can become effective in men's lives from now on through their relationship of faith with the Exalted One (cf. Lk. 22:69). Jesus' suffering and death is no mere fact of the past; it is present time (cf. R. Bultmann, Faith and Understanding, 1969, 174 f., 202; similarly G. Delling, op. cit., 35). From Easter onwards, it is proclamation that counts: "Behold, now is the acceptable time [kairos eupsodektos]; behold, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2; cf. Isa. 49:8). This gospel the church of Jesus Christ has to proclaim without any false deference, whether "convenient or inconvenient [eukairōs akairōs]" (2 Tim. 4:2 NEB). By passing on Jesus' "message of the kairos" (Stauffer), the Now of the offer of salvation keeps on becoming afresh the reality which demands a decision. "Thus to the now of the coming of the Revealer there corresponds exactly the now of the proclamation of the Word, as the now of a historical fact of a definite time, the now of the opportunity, the moment . . . Jesus is the Revealer in the preaching of the Word as a concrete event at a given time" (Bultmann, op. cit., 175). As once the disciples obeyed when Jesus called them (Matt. 4:20, 22; Mk. 1:18), so each person is summoned to respond to the missionary proclamation without delay, and to begin to follow Jesus. All are asked whether they "believe that the time and place of man's encounter with God is the time of love and the place of the suffering of this love" (Fuchs, op. cit., 21). They are not to evade the decision by delaying the Today until Tomorrow (cf. Philo, Sacr. 69), and certainly not to "harden" their hearts, i.e. to reinforce their will for an existence without God (cf. Heb. 4:7; 3:7, 15), lest they find themselves, like Jerusalem, standing under the verdict of a "Woe" (cf. Lk. 19:44).

(b) If, therefore, kairos must be used initially for the fundamental decision of faith, those who are now reconciled (cf. Rom. 5:11; 13:11) must henceforth live by faith. The Then of idolatry is to be superseded by the Now of true worship of God (Eph. 5:8 f.; Gal. 4:8 f.; cf. Rom. 12:1). Faith brings release from being the servile victim of time; it brings freedom from the burdensome past through the acceptance of the gift of forgiveness; but it does not absolve one from the ethical responsibility to make sensible use of the time at one's disposal (Gal. 6:10; Col. 4:5). Indeed, the opposite is true. Believers are assigned historical time with the imperative to "buy up the time" (Eph. 5:16). The new life of faith is not, of course, without affliction. This time (ho kairos houtos, Mk. 10:30; Lk. 12:56), and therefore also the time of the church, is not a time of blessedness free from temptation but a time of struggle (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24 ff.; Eph. 6:12; 1 Tim. 6:11 ff.; cf. H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke, 1960, 231–34) and of suffering (Rom. 8:18). In this time, Christians must encourage each other to prevent a falling away (Heb. 3:12 f.; cf. 1 Tim. 4:1) in the moment of temptation (Lk. 8:13).

4. The → fullness of divine glory will dawn only with the kairos eschatos, the last time (1 Pet. 1:5), the precise date of which is unknown (Mk. 13:33; Acts 1:7; 1 Thess. 5:1 ff.) and which is sometimes expected as imminent (1 Cor. 7:29; Rev. 1:3; 22:10) and sometimes as possibly remote (2 Thess. 2:1 ff.; cf. Lk. 21:8). The NT is always pointing to this telos of final time (→ Goal; → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT). By contrast with the apocalyptic expectations of Judaism, the eschatological kairos is now understood christologically as the time of Christ's return in glory (1 Tim. 6:14) and as the time of the last and final judgment (1 Cor.

4:5; 1 Pet. 4:17 f.; Rev. 11:18; cf. Jn. 5:28 f.), when the godless are punished and those who trust in God are rewarded (cf. Mk. 10:30; Gal. 6:9).

Thus with the pattern “once” (pagans in vice and darkness) and “now” (Christians and sons of light: cf. Rom. 7:5 f.; Gal. 4:3 ff.; Eph. 5:8) there corresponds the other, viz. “already” (confident in faith and hope) and “not yet” (full blessedness, 1 Pet. 1:5 f.; cf. 5:6; Rom. 8:18; Heb. 11:25 f.). Jesus’ lordship is still not completely visible or perceptible (Heb. 2:8). Satan is still allowed a period of time for his diabolical intrigues (Rev. 12:12). The Christian still comes up against the harsh realities of life (cf. 2 Cor. 4:18), especially those of bad times (cf. Eph. 5:16; 2 Tim. 3:1; 4:3). The time between the appearance of the earthly Jesus and the parousia therefore remains a tension-laden time, which requires vigilant concentration (cf. Lk. 21:36; Eph. 6:18, by prayer) on the part of Christians for their apostolic (cf. Tit. 1:3) and diaconal duties (cf. Rom. 13:11). Such a time of probation, of course, stands clearly within the sign of the promise which embraces all times: “Jesus Christ is yesterday and today and for ever the same” (Heb. 13:8; cf. Rev. 1:17). “Openness to the future is what quite simply and necessarily characterizes the understanding of time in the NT. The goal of the eschatological event is God ‘all in all’ (1 Cor. 15:28). In him is described the goal of all times. The time which follows the final predictable event is necessarily unlimited on the basis of that which is said about its content – that from which it gains its quality and by which it is defined: it is simply and solely filled by God (‘God all in all’ can have no temporal limits). It alone is thus utterly and completely filled time, utterly and completely God’s time and thus – eternity” (G. Dellling, op. cit., 56).

H.-C. Hahn

χρόνος

χρόνος (chronos), time, period of time; χρονίζω (chronizō), take time, linger, delay; χρονοτριβέω (chronotribeō), spend, lose or waste time.

CL 1. (a) The noun chronos denotes from Homer onwards a space of time, whose duration is not as a rule precisely determined, but at most is characterized by additional adjs. as longer (e.g. polys, much; hikanos, sufficient) or shorter (e.g. oligos, little; mikros, small, thus Odysseus is to wait a little while for Nausicaa, Hom. Od. 6, 295). On the other hand, the amount of time that the hero spends during his wanderings while kept far from his homeland may be considerable (Od. 11, 161; 14, 218).

In the face of wasted time, chronos takes on the meaning of loss of time. Time which others are allowed is translated by “period” (e.g. Josephus, War 4, 188). With reference to people, chronos often means age, years, time of life and thus comes quite close to bios, → life.

chronos is also frequently used adverbially. In the gen. it means for some considerable time; in the dat. in (the course of) time, gradually, late; in the acc. for a set time (e.g. in the phrase, ton aei chronon, for ever). chronos is also often found with preps. such as dia, through; en, in; eis, into; ek, out of; epi, towards, etc.

(b) The older vb. chronizō, derived from chronos and used from Aeschylus onwards, means (i) not to come for a long time, be a long time coming, fail to appear (e.g. Thuc., 8, 16, 3); (ii) to linger, remain (Hdt., 3, 61); and (iii) (with infin.) to hesitate, fail, put off doing something.

Later, via the contraction of chronos and tribō, to rub, wear away, expend, the rare vb. chronotribeō (Aristot., Rhet. 3, 3, 3p 1406a) was formed, meaning spend, lose or waste time (also used with negative undertones).

2. (a) Gk. man experienced time as a power which inescapably determined his life. On the one hand, time appeared to him to be an endless quantity, which “in its course . . . gives birth to endless nights and days” (Soph., OC 617 f.). On the other hand, he was painfully aware that the time allotted to the individual was only all too short (Simonides, Athen. 10, 456). One felt the advance of time (Soph., Phil. 285), whose “omnipotence” overthrows all but the gods (Soph., OC 609), to be always threatening to life. Time’s growing old as quickly as a shadow (Critias, Frag. 26 in Diels-Kranz, II, 389, 7) warned man of his transience. If youth was able to overlook this, man knew as he grew old that “fair youth disappears; life’s sweet joy endures but a short time” (Anacreon, Griechische Lyrik, RK, 140–142; 142/139; cf. Mimnermos, op. cit., 84 f.; Simonides, op. cit., 44, 47 f.).

(b) “All-seeing time” was further felt to be a kind of judge, bringing everything to light (Soph., Aj. 648 f.; Frag. 832). Time reveals the truth (Pindar, Ol. 10, 55), particularly in respect of a man’s real worth (Soph., OT 606 ff.). If there are already echoes here of positive functions of time, this is even more clearly the case where time is spoken of as that which gives healing forgetfulness (Soph., Aj. 714, it erases everything; cf. Frag. 868a; Pindar, Pyth. 1, 46).

(c) But even time, the healer of wounds, cannot save anyone from → death. In various ways, the Greek sought to take up a position with regard to the knowledge, given with his temporality, of the necessity of his own death. One way was the intensive aspiration to make the fullest possible use of time (cf. Bacchylides in Griechische Lyrik, op. cit. 162/158) as “the most costly commodity for consumption” (Antipho, Frag. 77 in Diels-Kranz II, 367, 14; also RK 10, 139). Another way of breaking through the limitations of time and achieving an existence which would transcend death was the hope of posthumous fame – the popular expectation, for instance, of the doctor because of his profession of the Hippocratic Oath (→ Swear, art. omnyō CL). Memorials to heroes like that at Thermopylae, cannot be eradicated by “all-destroying time” (Simonides, op. cit., 133/129; cf. Theognis, 112/119).

3. Particularly meaningful for the Greeks, as later for the Romans, was the endeavour to surmount the problems posed by time by means of intellectual schematization.

(a) Thus the thought of the Pre-Socratics continually circles around the phenomenon of time, which Democritus, for example, views as an eternal, uncreated entity (Diels-Kranz II, 102, 3). Time also appears as infinite (apeiros) in Anaximander (ibid. I, 85, 22) and Zeno (ibid. I, 253, 25).

(b) Reflection on the nature and origin of time reached its first great peak in Plato. chronos was created at the same time as the starry heavens, and time will also pass away again, together with them (Tim. 38b). In the world of finitude it became “an image of the eternal and infinite One in the form of a ceaseless sequence of particulars” (Tim. 37d). Whereas immutable Being can grow neither older nor younger, temporal concepts such as past, present and future help to describe sequences of movement which present an image of imperishability. In having come to be, being and becoming, time corresponds to the incessant circular movement of the planets. It thus describes in turn cycles of natural becoming and passing. In accordance with this cosmological point of view, the year is called "the perfect round of times" (Tim. 39d). Corresponding with this image-thinking, "the arrangement of the seasons so beautifully divided into years and months" can be adduced in Leg. 886a as a kind of proof of the existence of God.

(c) Aristotle's analytic formulation of the question, conditioned by the extraordinary force of his own personal gifts and by his recognition that Plato's thought assumed a strong speculative character, shifted the interest from the problem of Being to the analysis of existents, i.e. reality. Aristotle saw in change (perceptible as movement) the sole possibility of discovering reality. The sequence of movement can be measured by \rightarrow number. He could thus define time as the continuous quantity of successive movement (Phys. 4, 20a, 25 f.), i.e. time is deduced from place and movement, a process typical of the Greek way of expressing things visually.

Thus in Aristotle, as in Plato, time is regarded "as something vastly inferior to space. . . . This contempt for time . . . tells us more about the difference between Greek and Hebrew conceptions of time than all attempts to understand the Greek concept of time philosophically. For this reason, too, everything pertaining only to space, e.g. geometry, was so highly regarded, and the Greek gods and the divine world had to be conceived as exempt from all time, transitoriness, and change because time, change and transitoriness are all synonymous terms" (T. Boman, Hebrew Thought Compared with Greek, 1960, 128).

OT The Bible, unlike philosophy since Plato and Aristotle at the latest, has scarcely reflected on time. There is therefore no unified biblical word or term for time, but instead several conceptions which are expressed in the Heb. (or Gk. equivalents of) words such as day, hour, eternity, age, end, instant, decisive moment, now, today, festival time etc. (cf. P. Neuenzeit, EBT II 911 ff.). After words for time such as hēmera, day (some 1600 times), nyn, now (some 400 times), aiōn, age, kairos, point of time (each some 300 times), sēmeron, today (some 150 times), comes chronos, time, but relatively rarely in the LXX (about 100 instances; eniautos, year, is found equally often). Most often it serves to render yōm, day (29 times), whereas it is only found four times for ʿēt. Distributed through the books of the LXX, the instances of chronos are especially concentrated in Macc., Isa., Dan. and Job.

chronos may sometimes be used synonymously with hōra and kairos, and denote a point of time (e.g. Jer. 45[38]:28; cf. Neh. 10:34; 13:31). In general, however, it means a greater expanse of time, a span or course of time. This is shown in the frequent combination of pas, whole, with chronos (e.g. Deut. 12:19; 22:19, 29) and especially in the formula eis ton aiōna chronon, into eternal time (e.g. Exod. 14:13; Isa. 9:7). The thought is here partly of the whole human life-span, partly of an inconceivably long period of time, but never of a timeless, other-worldly eternity.

1. (a) For the Israelite, time and history were inseparably connected. Time interested him only in so far as it was qualified by a particular event. This is the case above all with regard to Yahweh's dealings with his people or their representatives. Certain periods of salvation history are accordingly described as the time of the fathers (1 Esd. 8:76), or the time of \rightarrow Noah (Isa. 54:9), of \rightarrow Abraham (Gen. 25:1, 15), of Joshua (2 Macc. 12:15) or of Samuel (1 Esd. 1:20).

Fundamental is the faith that the eternal, i.e. the "lasting" God (cf. Exod. 15:18; Ps. 90[89]:1; Isa. 40:28; Dan. 12:7) is the Lord of time and that he gives all human time its content and meaning. If it was customary in ancient Israel to look more to the saving occasions of the past, the prophets fixed their eyes on future times. In Isa. this occurs through the use of the concept of chronos. Isaiah saw that for long periods of time the enemies of Zion would be exposed to divine → punishment (→ 13:20; 14:20; cf. 23:15; 34:10). Zion on the other hand, without being spared “times of visitation” (a notion derived from Jer. 29[49]:8; Isa. 54:7), will stand firm for all time (Isa. 33:20; cf. 34:17; 51:8). For Yahweh will establish an everlasting kingdom of peace (Isa. 9:7; cf. Bar. 3:13).

(b) The whole problematic of the elapse of man’s life-span, which so oppressed the Greeks, also comes up in the later strata of the OT. In Job, for example, the fact that man has only a short life (Job 14:1; cf. 10:20), although he would like to live for a long time (Job 29:18), becomes a real source of temptation. But he and others find comfort in the knowledge that God prescribes the individual’s allotted times (Job 14:5; cf. 14:13). Hence, even one who dies early can fill long spaces of time in a way that pleases the Lord (Wis. 4:13). All the same, from the perspective of this outlook, an extension of one’s life-span is regarded as a particular grace of God (Isa. 38:5; cf. 65:20; Prov. 9:11, 18; 28:16).

(c) In the Wisdom literature one finds the beginnings of a philosophical treatment of the question of time. But it is supported by the belief that it is God who, through → wisdom (Eccl. 8:8), amongst other things, gives insight into “the beginning, end and middle of the times.” Therefore, the net result here, too, is that God, who prepared the earth for eternal times (Bar. 3:12) and created the constellations to mark the time (Sir. 43:6), allots everything its time in nature, individual life and national history (Eccl. 3:1). This is particularly true of times and opportunities for repentance (Wis. 12:20), which are to be used to prevent the eschatological “day of the Lord” leading to disaster (→ Present, art. hēmera OT).

2. Times of repentance with clearly defined limits played an important rôle in the Qumran community (1QS 7), whose consciousness of time was clearly formed by eschatological and apocalyptic ideas. Great emphasis was laid on the observance of special festive seasons (1QS 1:14 f.; 10:1 ff.). In every period of time members of their fellowship were “to praise their Creator” (1QS 9:26). For it is only thus that they would survive the fires of wrath of the last days (1QH 3:36; cf. 1QS 3:1) and the raging of the angel of darkness (1QS 3:23; cf. 4:12 f.) as times of purification, before “the day of judgment” (1QpHab 12:14; 13:2 ff.) and the “consummation of time” (1QpHab 7:2, 13) breaks and God “creates the new” (1QS 4:25).

3. In his reflections on the nature of time, Philo takes over Plato’s cosmic understanding of time (see above CL 3 (b)). He thus concludes: “For since time [chronos] is the measured space determined by the world’s movement, and since movement cannot be prior to the object moving, but must of necessity arise after it or simultaneously with it, it follows of necessity that time also is either coeval with or later born than the world” (Op. Mund. 26).

Philo seeks to combine a philosophical view of the origin of time (one of the ten categories in Decal. 30 f.) with OT faith in God the Creator. It is he who has created (Leg. All. 3, 98 f.) out of nothing (cf. Vit. Mos. 267), the heavenly bodies with their harmonic movement without thereby standing in need of time (Decal. 101; Leg. All. 1, 20). Everything goes back to his creativity, including the cycle of the four seasons, which can be worked out from the constellations (cf. Cher. 88). In this connexion

Philo uses the concept of → kairos with emphasis, meaning “nothing other than the time of happy execution.” Also important for the Alexandrines is the fact that, with the creation of the constellations and the yearly cycle, the concept of number made its appearance, as time revealed it (Op. Mund. 60). Thus in Philo Platonic, OT and Pythagorean thought merge together.

NT In the NT chronos occurs 54 times (24 in the Lucan historical writings and 9 in Paul). The derivatives chronizō and chronotribēō are found respectively 5 times (Matt. 24:48; 25:5; Lk. 1:21; 12:45; Heb. 10:37 = Isa. 26:20) and once (Acts 20:16).

1. Like the other temporal terms, chronos serves initially for the formal designation of a space or point of time. Thus the longer or shorter duration of a condition or an activity is frequently described by phrases with chronos (cf. Jn. 5:6; Lk. 8:27, 29, a long illness; Matt. 25:19; Lk. 20:9 f., long absence; Lk. 23:8, a long-entertained wish; Heb. 11:32, a considerable amount of time for recounting). Often, especially in Acts, the details of any actual or projected length of stay at various places are given by chronos (Acts 19:22, “he himself stayed in Asia for a while”; cf. Acts 14:3; 15:33; 18:20, 23; 20:18; 27:9; 1 Cor. 16:7). chronos is found in Acts 13:18 to denote a period of forty years of salvation history. As in the OT, chronos can also denote a man’s life-time (Acts 1:21; 1 Cor. 7:39). Parts of one’s life-time can also be envisaged (Gal. 4:1; cf. Acts 7:23). Finally, chronos can also describe a short time-span (Jn. 7:33; 12:25), and it can even be found with the meaning of kairos and nyn, in a moment (Lk. 4:5).

2. Theologically more significant than the general indications of time are those passages which speak of chronos in connexion with a specific event. Such passages occur particularly in the Lucan historical writings. Lk. 1:57 mentions the chronos of Elizabeth’s delivery. chronos occurs again in the salvation-history formula describing God’s forty years of bearing his people in the wilderness (Acts 13:18; cf. Exod. 16:35; Num. 14:34; Deut. 1:31). The climax of the chronos-pronouncements is reached in a whole series of christological statements. For with Jesus Christ, something new and unique has happened in time. Nevertheless, the NT writers are not interested in speculative questions about the origin and nature of time. Their thoughts centre on Jesus Christ who has given time and history a new significance. This is expressed by Paul in the following terms: “But when the time had fully come [hote de ēlthen to plērōma tou chronou], God sent forth his Son, born of woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons” (Gal. 4:4 f.). H. Schlier interprets the phrase to plērōma tou chronou (lit. “the fullness of time”) as meaning “the moment in which the chronos is complete, in which time (in the sense of the passing of time) reached its full measure, i.e. came to its end” (Der Brief an die Galater, KEK 7, 1965¹³, 194).

(a) One can of course speak of an end of time only against the background of the eschatological and apocalyptic messianic expectations of contemporary Judaism. With the coming of Christ this time of expectation has come to an end for the NT (cf. 1 Pet. 1:20). His appearance means the end of the old age (→ Goal).

(b) On the other hand, Jesus opens up a new epoch, for with him begins the christocratic reign of God over the world. In the light of the incarnation of God in his son, and his entering into historical time, several theologians speak of the “centre of time" in relation to the Lucan perspective. Of course the term "centre" must not be related in the quantitative sense to two equally long halves, but is rather to be apprehended in the sense of a decisive incision (cf. O. Cullmann, Christ and Time: The Primitive Christian Conception of Time and History, 1951, 131 ff.; cf. H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke, 1960; → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 1(e), 2(b)). For with the appearance of Jesus, the → kingdom of God has come among men (Lk. 17:21). The Christ-event becomes the criterion of all historical time, both backwards and forwards. Now that "the times of ignorance" are past (Acts 17:30), one can accordingly, in the light of "the revelation of the mystery which was left secret for long ages" (Rom. 16:25), understand the past as a time of preparation. In retrospect it can be seen as standing under the sign of the promise and the "grace which he gave us in Christ Jesus ages ago [pro chronōn aiōniōn]" (2 Tim. 1:9; cf. Tit. 1:2; 1 Pet. 1:20).

The centre is above all the time in which the "bridegroom" lingered among his own people (Mk. 2:19), in which Jesus "went in and out" (Acts 1:21) among them, and in which the Now and the Today, the kairos and the hour were qualified by his physical presence.

3. (a) But with the death of Jesus the time of salvation was by no means past. Jesus himself had spoken clearly of the coming end of the world (e.g. Mk. 13; Matt. 24 f.) and thus assigned the believers into an interim period which would stretch from Easter to the parousia (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (a)). Again and again the authors of the NT concerned themselves with the remainder of the time (1 Pet. 4:2) and the events of the end. It is characteristic of the Christian understanding of time that astrological calculations, in the sense for example of Matt. 2:7, 16, were excluded a priori (→ Magic, art. mageia NT 2 (b)). Certain "signs of the time", such as the appearance of heretics and scoffers (Jude 18), are mentioned, but this was doubtless intended to serve as an encouragement to Christians to be watchful rather than as an invitation to speculate about dates. God is the Lord of time; it is his privilege to decide on the final hour for the consummation of his kingdom (cf. Acts 1:6 f.). Neither the angels nor Jesus himself knew when the eschatological day of the Lord would break (Mk. 13:32). It will come suddenly, like a thief in the night (1 Thess. 5:1 ff.). Many early Christians were initially of the opinion that it would probably be only a short while until the parousia; gradually, however, they adjusted themselves to a longer expanse of time.

(b) For all those who have not yet encountered God in Christ, who avoid him or who – like the false prophetess Jezebel – resist him, this interim period is a "time to repent" (Rev. 2:20 f.). But this time of decision, declares John the seer, will not be prolonged indefinitely. At the consummation of the divine mysteries time will cease to exist (Rev. 10:6). Those who in faith recognize Christ as Lord are to use the time given them in the interim period for growing and maturing in their knowledge of the faith (cf. Heb. 5:12 f.). 1 Pet. stresses further the ethical accountability of Christians, who are no longer to behave as they used to in earlier times in the manner of the heathen, but "to live for the rest of the time in the flesh no longer by human passions but by the will of God" (1 Pet. 4:2; cf. the example of Paul, who, throughout the whole length of his stay in Asia Minor, sought to serve the Lord in many different ways, Acts 20:18 ff.). Finally, in 1 Pet. 1:17, the interim period is defined as a "time of exile" (chronos tēs paroikias), which leads through much darkness, hours of temptation and persecution. Comfort in this time of exile is granted, for example, by the hope of God's future, from which one awaits the final fulfilment of all movements of time and thus "a restoration of the original order of creation" (E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 208).

H.-C. Hahn

ῥα

ῥα (hōra), hour, time, point of time; ῥαῖος (hōraios), at the right time, seasonable, ripe, hence beautiful, fair, pleasant.

CL 1. The noun hōra occurs in Homer and others in the Ionic form hōrē. It denotes a particular division of time, especially an hour. But hōra can also mean year, day and moment, or designate a season, or also (of human beings) a stage of life, such as youth (cf. Mimnermos in Griechische Lyrik, RK 140–142, 84). In Homer and other poets hōra marks the customarily appropriate time for certain activities, e.g. the evening meal (Homer, Od. 21, 428), going to sleep (Homer, Od. 11, 330 and 373) or sexual enjoyment (Orpheus, Frag. 5a, Diels-Kranz, I, 8).

hōra is readily used to describe the seasons (e.g. Heraclitus, Frag. 100, Diels-Kranz, I, 173; Diog. Laert. 9, 10; Plato, Leg. 889b), above all spring (Homer, Il. 2, 468 and 471; 6, 148) and summer (Simonides in Griechische Lyrik, RK 140–142, 45), but also winter (Xen., Frag. 22, Diels-Kranz, I, 134). Finally, there is the personification of the Horae, the goddesses of the seasons, who guard the heavenly gates of Olympus (Homer, Il. 5, 749; 7, 393 and 433; 21, 450).

Contemplation of nature and specifically of spring can arouse one's consciousness of transience and direct one's thoughts to "the last hour" (cf. Soph., OC 103; cf. Mimnermos in Griechische Lyrik, RK 85, "Like the leaves on the trees matured by the bloom of spring . . . we too are only permitted the blossoms of youthful joy for a short time"). In contrast to this, there is the summons to act in conformity with one's age and so to make use of the given "hour" (cf. Timon of Phlius: hōrē erān, hōrē de gamein, hōrē de pepausthai, "kiss in good time, marry in good time and give up in good time," Anthologia Graeca, X, 38).

hōra comes relatively near our notion of hour, when the cock which announces the hour is spoken of (Diog. Laert., 8, 34). On the whole, however, the "hour" (in the sense of a measurement of chronological time) does not play any part in early Greek thought.

With the prepositions en and eis, hōra means at the right time, early, in good time (cf. e.g. Pindar, Ol. 6, 28: "I must come to Pitana today in good time").

2. The adj. hōraios, belonging to hōra, and used since Hesiod, means appropriate to the season, at the right time (Hdt., 4, 28). In connexion with the timely occurrence of happy events, hōraios can take on the meaning of agreeable, lovely and finally beautifully formed (cf. LXX Deut. 33:13 f., 16 with hōra in this meaning of hōraios).

OT The noun hōra is found some 50 times in the LXX, chiefly for the noun ἔτ. time, but also for 5 other Heb. nouns; hōraios some 25 times for 8 different Heb. expressions.

1. hōra serves initially to indicate a somewhat indeterminate period of time (as well as hēmera, day, e.g. Dan. 12:13). Even where, as in Dan. 4:16 (Theodotion) hōra is accompanied by an ordinal number it could scarcely be an hour of 60 minutes that is in question. Rather, Belshazzar was numb with terror for some while. "A division of day and night into hours was not known in ancient times . . . only general designations such as 'in the morning', 'at midday', 'in the evening' (Gen. 3:8; 18:1; 1 Sam. 11:11); a sundial is mentioned for the first time in Isa. 38:8 (2 Ki. 20:9–11)" (W. Rordorf, BHHW II 1275). In Neh. 8:3 the morning hour is mentioned. Exod. 18:22, 26 is concerned with longer periods of time. At all hours, i.e. at any time, the elected judges were to give judgment.

More frequently than periods of time hōra denotes a more or less restricted point of time. Where it is a matter of the prompt "execution of official, and especially of police measures" the prepositional phrase en ekeinē tē hōrā or (en autē tē hōrā acquired the meaning of immediately, on the spot (J. Jeremias, ZNW 42, 1949, 215; Dan. [Theod.] 3:6; 3:15; 1 Esd. 8:62; cf. Lk. 20:19). Similarly, this formula can express temporal connexion (Est. 8:1, immediately thereupon; cf. Matt. 26:55; Lk. 2:38, of immediate effect (Dan. [Theod.] 4:30; cf. Acts 16:18; 22:13; Matt. 9:22; 15:28; 17:18) or action following without delay (Est. 9:2; cf. Lk. 24:33; Jn. 19:27; cf. Jeremias, ad loc.). Various formulae express details of time: "tomorrow at this hour" (e.g. Exod. 9:18; 10:4; Jos. 11:6; 1 Ki. 19:2; 21:6) and "a year ahead at this time" (2 Ki. 4:16 f.; Gen. 18:10, 14). In Rom. 9:9, where this passage is quoted, hōra is replaced by the materially synonymous kairos.

2. Characteristic for the OT understanding of time and thus for the use of hōra is faith in God as the Creator and Lord of time in all its dimensions. "Time belongs to created reality" (M. Rissi, BHHW III 2210). It is Yahweh who sees to it in nature that everything takes place at its appointed hour, e.g., that rain comes at the proper season (Deut. 11:14; Job 36:28; Zech. 10:1), and that the corn is ripe for harvest (Job 5:26; cf. Hos. 2:9). Even the times for driving the cattle home (Gen. 29:7) and for regular eating of meals (Ruth 2:14) are part of God's creation. He is Lord of the hour of birth (cf. Gen. 18:10, 14; 2 Ki. 4:16 f.). It is he who determines the hour of death (cf. 2 Sam. 24:15; Job 5:25), not human beings like Jezebel (1 Ki. 19:2). The praise of the divine apportionment of time for the natural processes sounds out over and over again: "The works of God are all good, they supply every need in its season [en hōra autēs]. None may say: This is inferior to that. For everything avails in its season [en kairō]" (Sir. 39:33 f.).

3. Especially important for the Israelites are God's mighty acts in history, such as when he strikes the enemies of his people at some particular hour (Jos. 11:6; Egypt with hail in Exod. 9:18 [cf. Job 38:22 f.], or with locusts in Exod. 10:4), or when he suddenly strikes terror into Belshazzar with the mysterious writing on the wall (Dan. [Theodotion] 5:5). God's word is accomplished at a stroke (Dan. [Theodotion] 4:30; cf. Dan. LXX 4:23 eis kairon kai hōran) or is fulfilled punctually at the predetermined hour (Gen. 21:1 ff. with reference to Gen. 18:10, 14; and 2 Ki. 4:16 ff.). When some hoped-for intervention by God is still outstanding, temptation can arise, as in Job 24:1: "Why are not times of judgment kept by the Almighty, and why do those who know him never see his days?"

The remembrance of God's saving activity in history is to be kept alive at fixed festal hours in the cult (Exod. 13:10). The children of Israel are thus to keep the Passover at the appointed "hour" (Num. 9:2). The chronological concept of hours, which later played such a large rôle in Christian liturgy, is approached most closely by the mention of “the hour of the evening sacrifice” in Dan. [Theodotus] 9:21. But in the OT as a whole, the temporal sense of hōra recedes behind that fullness of content which is effected by Yahweh or related to God in the cult.

4. In later Jewish writings hōra, like other temporal concepts, acquired a strong eschatological and apocalyptic stress. Like the “day of the Lord”, so the hōra kairou, “hour of time”, (Dan. LXX 8:17, 19) or the hōra synteleias “hour of consummation” (Dan. LXX 11:40, 45) refers to the events of the last days when God will come with accompanying cosmic phenomena, in order to punish the godless in the judgment and to lead the righteous to everlasting salvation. Therefore Sirach urges: “Before judgment examine thyself, and in the hour of visitation [en hōra episkopēs] thou shalt find forgiveness” (Sir. 18:20). For the individual’s hour of death there is the promise of Sir. 11:22: “The blessing of God is the portion of the righteous; in a speedy time [en hōra tachinē] his hope shall flourish.” With regard to the godless Sir. 11:27 states: “An evil time [kakōsis hōras] causeth forgetfulness of delights.”

NT By comparison with the LXX hōra is used almost twice as often in the NT. The instances accumulate in the Gospels (76 times, including 26 in Jn.) and Rev. (20 times). hōra occurs seven times in Paul. The adj. hōraios is found 4 times.

1. (a) Linked with ordinal numbers hōra serves to fix any events chronologically in the course of the day (e.g. Matt. 20:3, 5 f., 9; Jn. 1:39; 4:6; Acts 2:15). This is especially true of particular points of time within the Passion narrative of Jesus (Jn. 19:14; Mk. 15:25, 33 f.; Matt. 27:45; Lk. 23:44) and in connexion with Jewish times of prayer in the prayer-life of the pious man (Acts 3:1; 10:3, 9, 30; for specific cultic actions; cf. also Lk. 1:10, the hour of → incense). Alongside precise indications of time of this sort, hōra can also be used in accord with the ancient division of the day for more imprecise designations such as “at a late hour [of the evening]” (Matt. 14:15; Mk. 6:35; 11:11). More generally still, hōra is used where in phrases like “up to this hour” (1 Cor. 4:11), “in that [or this] hour” (e.g. Matt. 8:13; 18:1; Lk. 7:21; 10:21; 13:31; 20:19) or “from that hour onwards” (e.g. Matt. 9:22; 15:28; 17:18) it places a particular event in a temporal relationship to something anterior, simultaneous or subsequent. The allusions to the point in time of the parousia of the Son of man are similarly generalizing (cf. Matt. 24:36; 25:13; Mk. 13:32; also in the parousia-parables Matt. 24:50; Lk. 12:46, “the master of that servant will come on a day when he does not expect him, and at an hour he does not know”). Especially vivid is the contraction of time (proposed by the use of the word hōra) to a single moment, embedded in greater periods of time, in the apocalyptic vision of Rev. 9:15: “So the four angels were released, who had been held ready for the hour, the day, the month, and the year, to kill a third of mankind.”

(b) So far we have been dealing with more or less exact indications of time which are given by the word hōra, partly in the sense of → kairos. In another group of passages the word serves to describe limited time-spans. Analogously with temporal concepts such as year, month and day, hōra also means the length of time of a measurable hour. “Are there not twelve hours in the day?” (Jn. 11:9; cf. Josephus, War 6, 1, 7). The last of the labourers to be hired worked only one hour (Matt. 20:3, 5, 6, 12). The disciples could not stay awake one hour (Matt. 26:40; cf. Lk. 23:44; Acts 5:7; 10:30; 19:34, two hours). In general, an hour is felt to be relatively short.

This is also shown in those places where the thought is obviously not simply of a space of time of sixty minutes (Jn. 5:35; 1 Thess. 2:17; Phlm. 15; cf. also Rev. 18:10, 17, 19, of Babylon's judgment which comes very quickly). Now and then in connexion with hōra longer periods of time can be in mind (cf. 1 Cor. 15:30).

2. (a) Like other biblical temporal concepts, hōra also acquires its decisive importance from its content, from the event which has been, is being or will be enacted at a particular hour. Admittedly, it is by no means irrelevant to the authors of the NT when something took place, but even more significant for them is what invests the particular unit of time with its essential quality. This is already the case in the general human context. In a woman's life it is the sudden change from pain to joy which gives its own value to the hour in which she gives birth to a child (Jn. 16:21).

(b) Much more far-reaching in their force of statement are the individual hours within Jesus' life-time. Again and again the evangelists point to particular periods of time in which things happen to or through Jesus which reveal his incomparable majesty and authority. There is, for instance, the hour in which God's messenger, as it were, legitimates himself for the benefit of the doubting John the Baptist by means of healing miracles (Lk. 7:21 ff.; for further hours of the Saviour cf. Matt. 8:13; 9:22; 15:28; 17:18; Jn. 4:52 f.). It is Jn. above all who stresses over and over again that such miraculous → signs are not intended to serve Jesus' self-glorification but to point to God the Father. For the → glory of God (doxa tou theou) to shine out, Jesus must wait for the right hour, the kairos. This is true of Jesus' miraculous actions (cf. Jn. 2:4) as it is of his suffering (cf. Jn. 7:30; 8:20; 13:1). When the "hour" of his arrest, his death and his return to the Father is impending (Jn. 13:1), Jesus uses the remaining time (according to Jn.'s account) for table-fellowship with his disciples in order – yet again and as it were by way of summary – to express his love in the symbolic action of the foot-washing and the farewell discourse.

The degree to which all the prominent hours of Jesus' life aim to manifest God's glory is perhaps shown most clearly in the Johannine account of the → transfiguration. The "hour" of suffering, which Jesus dreads and yet recognizes to be in accord with the will of the Father (Jn. 12:27), is illuminated by God in a unique way. In answer to Jesus' prayer that the Father will glorify his name, a voice from heaven declares: "I have glorified it, and I will glorify it again" (Jn. 12:28). This means that Jesus is confirmed as the Lord, the One over whom the spirits will divide in the future, as during his life-time (Jn. 5:24 ff.). "This is why the coming of Jesus is the judgment: it is precisely the historical figure of Jesus, precisely his human history that has become the eschatological event by means of the hōra of doxasthēnai" (R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 493 f.).

3. As well as the general temporal and christological passages, eschatological conceptions of time play an important part in the NT. From the Gospels to Rev. there becomes apparent, alongside belief in the hour which is filled with meaning by Christ, the expectation of a still-awaited hōra eschatē, a last hour, which, after a while of eschatological terrors (cf. Jn. 16:2, 32; Rev. 3:10) will run into the final hour of → judgment (Rev. 14:7; cf. 14:15; Jn. 5:24 ff.). Nobody, not even Jesus, is able to give exact indications of "day and hour" (Mk. 13:32; Matt. 24:36, 44, 50; 25:13), for the "last hour" will break in suddenly like a thief (Lk. 12:39 f., 46; Rev. 3:3). But for this very reason one must stay awake and ready (Rom. 13:11) and be careful to increase one's vigilance for the "signs of the times" (Matt. 16:3; cf. Lk. 12:56).

1 Jn. 2:18 can even say that the “last hour [eschatē hōra]” has come. When it became clear that the parousia was being delayed, there still remained the task of handling every particular present hour (the Now) in the right way, grasping it as time given by God and realizing the possibilities that lay within it. This was the case both in the ethical responsibility of every-day life (cf. Rom. 13:11 ff.) and in the testing of times of persecution, for which Jesus had already sought to prepare his disciples (Jn. 16:1 ff.). To those who have to answer for their faith in court Jesus promised in particular the assistance of his Spirit (Matt. 10:19; cf. Mk. 13:11; Lk. 12:12), so that even the “hour” of their trial can serve to glorify God.

To sum up, hōra, like other units of time, is understood in the NT as time which is given and filled by God. Thus right up to the “final hour” (eschatē hōra), the “hour of Jesus” gives all men’s hours their sense and their definition as hours of decision in the realm of faith and of testing in the realm of ethics.

H.-C. Hahn

→ Darkness, Night, → Fullness, → Goal, → Present, Day, → Promise, → Sabbath

(a). J. Barr, Biblical Words for Time, SBT 33, 1962; K. Barth, CD I, 2, 45–121; II, 1, 409 ff., 417 ff., 465 ff., 592 ff., 625 ff.; CD III, 2, 437–640; CD IV, 1, 286 ff., 318 ff., 725–39; E. Bickerman, Chronology of the Ancient World, 1968; T. Boman, Hebrew Thought Compared with Greek, 1960; S. G. F. Brandon, Time and Mankind: An Historical and Philosophical Study of Man’s Attitude to the Phenomena of Change, 1951; and History, Time and Deity, 1965; H. E. Brunner, “The Christian Understanding of Time”, SJT 4, 1951, 1–12; J. E. Bruns, “The Use of Time in the Fourth Gospel”, NTS 13, 1966–67, 285–90; R. Bultmann, History and Eschatology: The Presence of Eternity, Gifford Lectures 1955, 1957; H. J. Cadbury, “Some Lucan Expressions of Time”, JBL 82, 1963, 276 ff.; F. W. Camfield, “Man in his Time”, SJT 3, 1950, 127–48; G. I. Capaldi, “The Fullness of Time”, SJT 25, 1972, 197–216; J. V. L. Casserley, Toward a Theology of History, 1965; H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke, 1960; O. Cullmann, Christ and Time: The Primitive Conception of Time and History, 1951; and Salvation in History, 1967; D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, Jordan Lectures, 1956, 406–17; G. Dellings, kairos, etc., TDNT III 455–64; and hōra, TDNT IX 675–81; R. C. Dentan, ed., The Idea of History in the Ancient Near East, 1965; F. W. Dillistone, “The Church and Time”, SJT 6, 1953, 156–64; G. Ebeling, “Time and Word”, in J. M. Robinson, ed., The Future of Our Religious Past: Essays in Honour of Rudolf Bultmann, 1971, 247–66 (partial ET of E. Dinkler, ed., op. cit. under (b)); F. V. Filson, “Yesterday”: A Study of Hebrews in the Light of Chapter 13, SBT Second Series 4, 1967; J. Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology: Principles of Time Reckoning in the East and Problems of Chronology in the Bible, 1964; E. Fuchs, šemerōn, TDNT VI 269–75; and “Jesus’ Understanding of Time”, in Studies of the Historical Jesus, SBT 42, 1964, 104–66; M. Heidegger, Being and Time, 1962; and On Time and Being, 1972; E. Jenni, “Time”, IDB IV 643–49; E. Käsemann, “An Apologia for Primitive Christian Eschatology”, in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964, 169–95; and “On the Subject of Primitive Christian Apocalyptic”, in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 108–37; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfilment: The Eschatological Message of Jesus, SBT 23, 1961²; J. McIntyre, The Christian Doctrine of History, 1957; J. Manek, “The Biblical Concept of Time and our Gospels”, NTS 6, 1959–60, 45–51; J. Marsh, The Fulness of Time, 1952; and “Time”, in A. Richardson, ed., A Theological Word Book of the Bible, 1950, 258–67; P. S. Minear, “The Time of Hope in the New Testament”, SJT 6, 1953, 337–51; and Eyes of Faith, 1946; J. Mole, “‘Time’ as a New Apologetic”, SJT 11, 1958, 150–57; C. F. D. Moule, “The Influence of Circumstances on Eschatological Terms”, JTS New Series 15, 1964, 1–15; J. Muilenburg, “The Biblical View of Time”, HTR 54, 1961, 225–71; A. Murtonen, “The Chronology of the Old Testament”, StTh 8, 1954, 133–37; P. Neuenzeit, “Time”, EBT III 911–15; D. E. Nineham, et al., Historicity and Chronology in the New Testament, SPCK Theological Collections 6, 1965; M. P. Nilsson, Primitive Time Reckoning, 1920; M. Noth, “History and the Word of God in the Old Testament”, in The Laws in the Pentateuch and Other Studies, 1966, 179–93; and “The Understanding of History in Old Testament Apocalyptic”, ibid., 194–214; G. Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus, 1940; and The Chronology of the Life of Paul, 1968; W. Pannenberg, ed., Revelation as History, 1969; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 99–125; M. Rissi, The Future of the World: An Exegetical Study of Revelation 19.11–22.15, SBT Second Series 23, 1972; J. A. T. Robinson, In the End God . . ., (1950) 1968²; and The Redating of the New Testament, 1976; J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb, eds., Theology as History, New Frontiers in Theology, III, 1967; H. J. Rose, "Time-Reckoning", OCD, 1075 f.; H. Sasse, aiōn, aiōnios, TDNT I 195–209; N. H. Snaith, "Time in the Old Testament", in F. F. Bruce, ed., Promise and Fulfilment: Essays Presented to S. H. Hooke, 1963, 175–86; G. Stählin, nyn (arti), TDNT IV 1106–23; P. Tillich, The Eternal Now, 1963; T. F. Torrance, Space, Time and Incarnation, 1969; S. J. De Vries, Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow: Time and History in the Old Testament, 1975; J. Wilch, Time and Event: An Exegetical Study of 'eth in the Old Testament in Comparison to Other Experiences in Clarification of the Concept of Time, 1969; A. Willingale, "Time in the Bible", Faith and Thought 96, 1967, 25–53.

(b). W. Anz, "Zeit", *RGG*³ VI 1880 ff.; G. Bilfinger, Die antiken Stundenangaben, 1888; H. Blauert, Die Bedeutung der Zeit in der johanneischen Theologie, (Dissertation, Tübingen) 1953; K. Bornhäuser, Tage und Stunden im Neuen Testament, 1937; P. Brunner, "Die Zeit im christlichen Glauben", in Pro Ecclesia, II, 1966, 50–59; G. Dellings, Das Zeitverständnis des Neuen Testaments, 1940; and Zeit und Endzeit, BSt 58, 1970; E. Dinkler and H. Thyen, eds., Zeit und Geschichte. Dankesgabe an Rudolf Bultmann zum 80. Geburtstag, 1964 (extracts translated in J. M. Robinson, ed., op. cit. under (a)); E. von Dobschütz, Zeit und Raum im Denken des Urchristentums, JBL 41, 1922, 212–23; U. Duchrow, "Der sogenannte psychologische Zeitbegriff Augustins im Verhältnis zur physikalischen und geschichtlichen Zeit", ZTK 63, 1966, 267 ff.; H. Eibl, "Das Problem der Zeit bei den alten Denkern", Archiv für systematische Philosophie, 1923, 67 ff., 153 ff.; W. Eichrodt, "Offenbarung und Geschichte im Alten Testament", ThZ 4, 1948, 321–31; and "Heilserfahrung und Zeitverständnis im Alten Testament", ThZ 12, 1956, 103 ff.; K. Gallings, "Das Rätsel der Zeit im Urteil Kohelets (Koh. 3, 1–15)", ZTK 58, 1961, 1 ff.; K. Goldammer and W. Anz, "Ewigkeit", *RGG*³ II 810 ff.; E. Jenni, "Das Wort 'ōlām im Alten Testament", ZAW 64, 1952, 197–248; ibid. 65, 1953, 1–35; 'ōlām, THAT II 228–43; and 'et, THAT II 370–86; J. Jeremias, "En ekeinē tē hora, (en) autē tē hora", ZNW 42, 1949, 214–17; M. Kähler, "Zeit und Ewigkeit", Dogmatische Zeitfragen, III, 1913; G. Klein, "Die Prüfung der Zeit (Lc. 12, 54–56)", ZTK 61, 1964, 373 ff.; F. Kümmel, Über den Begriff der Zeit, 1962; C. Lackett, Aion, Zeit und Ewigkeit in Sprache und Religion der Griechen, (Dissertation, Königsberg) 1916; J. Lebram, "Die Weltreiche der jüdischen Apokalyphtik", ZNW 55, 1964, 143 ff.; W. Michaelis, "Reich Gottes und Äonenwende in der Verkündigung Jesu", in Neutestamentliche Aufsätze, Festschrift J. Schmid, 1963, 161 ff.; J. Mouroux, Eine Theologie der Zeit, 1965; C. Mugler, "Le Retour éternel et le Temps linéaire dans la Pensée Grecque", Bulletin de l'Association G. Buddé 25, 1966, 405–19; P. Neuenzeit, "Biblische Zeitvorstellungen", in V. Berning, P. Neuenzeit and H. R. Schlette, eds., Geschichtlichkeit und Offenbarungswahrheit, 1964, 37–65; C. von Orelli, Die hebräischen Synonyma der Zeit und Ewigkeit genetisch und sprachvergleichend dargestellt, 1871; E. Otto, "Altägyptische Zeitvorstellungen und Zeitbegriffe", Die Welt als Geschichte 14, 1954, 135–48; F. Pfister, "Kairos und Symmetrie", Festgabe für H. Bulle, Würzburger Studien zur Altertumswissenschaft 13, 1938, 131–50; G. Pidoux, "À Propos de la Notion biblique du Temps", Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 3, 1952, 120–25; G. Quispel, "Zeit und Geschichte im antiken Christentum", Eranos-Jahrbuch, 1951, 115 ff.; C. H. Ratschow, "Anmerkungen zur theologischen Auffassung des Zeitproblems", ZTK 51, 1954, 360–87; R. Rendtorff, "Geschichte und Wort im Alten Testament", EvTh 22, 1962, 621 ff.; M. Rissi, Zeit und Geschichte in der Offenbarung des Johannes, 1952; and "Zeit", BHHW III 2210 ff.; G. Rosenkranz, "Fernöstliches und christliches Zeit- und Geschichtsverständnis", in Religionswissenschaft und Theologie, 1964, 162 ff.; H. Sasse, aiōn erchomenos, (Dissertation, Berlin) 1923; G. Sauter, Zukunft und Verheissung. Das Problem der Zukunft in der gegenwärtigen theologischen und philosophischen Diskussion, 1965; J. Schmidt, Der Ewigkeitsbegriff im Alten Testament, 1940; W. H. Schütte, "Tod Gottes und Fülle der Zeit", ZTK 66, 1969, 62 ff.; M. Sekine, "Erwägungen zur hebräischen Zeitauffassung", Supplements to VT 9, 1963, 66–82; A. Strobel, Kerygma und Apokalyphtik, 1967; M. Vereno, "Zeit", in M. Schmaus and A. Läpple, eds., Wahrheit und Zeugnis, 1964, 860 ff.; A. Vögtle, "Zeit und Zeitüberlegenheit im biblischen Verständnis", in Zeit und Zeitlichkeit, 1961, 99 f. (reprinted in J. B. Bauer, ed., Weltverständnis im Glauben, 1965, 224–53); W. Vollborn, Studien zum Zeitverständnis des Alten Testaments, 1951; O. Weber, "Zeit und Ewigkeit", EKL III 1888 ff.; H.-D. Wendland, Geschichtsanschauung und Geschichtsbewusstsein im Neuen Testament, 1938.

Tithe

δεκάτη

ἀποδεκατεύω (apodekateuō), give a tithe, give one tenth; ἀποδεκατόω (apodekatoō), give a tithe or tenth, collect a tithe; δέκατος (dekatos), tenth; δεκατόω (dekatoō), collect or pay a tithe, tenth; δεκάτη (dekate), tenth, tithe.

OT 1. Definition. “Tithe” translates Hebrew and Greek words that mean “a tenth,” or “to take or give a tenth” of something (Heb. ma'asēr, a tithe; cf. 'ešer, ten; Gk. deka, ten; → Number). The tenth was usually of the produce of the ground and was considered that part of the whole due from a worshipper to his God for the support of the God's sanctuary and its priests.

2. Origin. When and why the fraction, one tenth, was chosen for the sacred “tax” is unclear. All that can be said as to when is that the custom is very old and widespread, possibly antedating Israel's history, not confined to Semitic peoples but including Indo-Germanic peoples as well.

The apparent reason why a tenth was adopted may have to do with the ancient system of counting by tens, a system made easy by the ten fingers and toes common to mankind. But the tithe may also have been selected because of the views about number that the ancients had. Not only was ten a favourite round number that could be greater or less according to the circumstances (Gen. 31:7), but seemingly it was also a sacred number made up of two other specially sacred numbers – three and seven. Note how many times in the OT the number ten figures in holy matters: the clauses, “and God said”, “and God saw”, “and God blessed”, in Gen. 1 occur ten, seven and three times respectively, hardly by coincidence; there are ten patriarchs mentioned before the flood (Gen. 5) and ten mentioned after it (Gen. 11:10–30); ten was used in measuring Noah's ark (Gen. 6:15) and frequently in measuring and furnishing the tabernacle (Exod. 26; → Tent); ten is also prominent in apocalyptic symbolism (Dan., Rev.), and Matthew sees Jesus' messianic power proven by ten miracles (Matt. 8–9).

3. The Tithe in Secular Literature. Although the tithe formed an important part of Israelite culture, it was nevertheless not unique to that culture. Extra-biblical literature indicates that the tithe was employed in many places. Sometimes it was a strictly political matter, a tax paid by the people to their king or one imposed on conquered nations by the conqueror (Diod. Sic., 20, 14).

More often, however, it was a combination of the secular with the sacred. In Babylon during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar II, a tithe from the land was paid to the temple by all, including the king, while at the same time Babylonian kings took a tithe of all imports (C. H. W. Johns, Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts and Letters, 1904, xi, 205–206). Persian satraps also demanded a tithe of imports (Aristot., Oecon. 134b; 135b). Yet Cyrus, the Persian, made his soldiers give a tenth of their spoils to Zeus (Hdt., 1, 89). Pausanias (2nd century A.D.) gives many examples from Greece and Rome of a tithe as a tax on land which occasionally was dedicated to the gods.

There are also numerous examples in secular literature of the tithe being solely a sacred matter, a sacrifice due to the deity alone: Agamemnon conquered Mycenae and dedicated a tenth to the gods (Diod. Sic., 11, 65). On conquering the Etruscans, the Liparians were said to have dedicated a tithe of the spoils at Delphi (ibid. 5, 9; Hdt., 7, 132; see W. H. D. Rouse, "Tithes (Greek)", ERE XII 350–51, for abundant additional evidence of tithing among the Greeks).

4. Tithing in the OT. The concept of the tithe in the OT seems to have developed as time went on and as Israelite society became more complex. Very early in the record Abram gave → Melchizedek a tenth of everything (Gen. 14:20), but this was of the spoils of war, not the produce of the land, and there is no mention of any law demanding this of Abram, nor is there any explanation as to why he gave it. Jacob, too, vowed to give a tithe to God (Gen. 28:22). Again, Jacob's tithe apparently was a spontaneous thought, a promise to thank God conditional on God's prospering him and bringing him back home again safely. But there are no details as to why it was a tenth or how this tithe would be given or who would receive it in God's behalf.

It is strange that there is no mention of the tithe in the great law code contained in Exodus, but laws governing the giving of the first fruits of the land are (Exod. 23:16, 19; 34:22–26). The first of the crop, etc., and presumably the best, was sacrificed to God, probably in recognition that all things belong primarily to him (Deut. 26:10). It is possible, then, that the gift of first fruits was the forerunner of the tithe, and that the term "tithe" was introduced because it was necessary to fix precisely the amount of first fruits to be brought. But this question about the relation of the first fruits to the tithe cannot be answered unequivocally because the biblical texts seem both to equate them (Deut. 26:1–15) and to distinguish between them (Neh. 12:44).

It is difficult also to reconstruct precisely the history surrounding the term tithe. Presumably, however, it could be as follows.

(a) From the beginning the tithe of the land's produce – seed, fruit trees, etc. – was recognized as belonging in some unique way to the Lord. It was "holy to the LORD" (Lev. 27:30–32). At first it was treated as a personal offering of grain, wine, oil, etc. Annually a person was required to bring his tithe to some designated place and eat it there in company with his sons, daughters, servants and the Levites who happened to be present (Deut. 12:6, 11, 17). If the journey to this designated place was too far, the tithe could be turned into money and the money brought to be spent there on whatever the appetite craved. There the offerer with his household and the → Levite was to eat before the Lord and rejoice (Deut. 14:22–29; 15:19–23). Note that the Levite was included in this annual tithe-feast, but nowhere is there a hint in these texts that the tithe was exclusively for him. Rather it was primarily for the enjoyment of the landowner and his family.

(b) As time passed, Israelite society developed and its social problems increased. To help solve these problems laws governing the tithe were modified. Now the tithe of the land's produce was offered to God in a new way. Every third year the tithe, instead of being taken away from home and consumed by the offerer himself in some distant place, was stored up within local communities and used to meet the material needs of Levite, sojourner, orphan and widow in and around that community (Deut. 14:28; 26:12).

(c) Gradually Israel's cultus grew. The number of Levites and priests multiplied. Since these people had been given no land by which to support themselves, maintenance of them and the sanctuary had to come from the gifts of the people. As the number of Levites and priests increased as well as that of the accoutrements of the sanctuary, a tithe only every three years was insufficient. Hence, the law of the tithe appears like this: God has given to the sons of Levi every tithe in Israel for an inheritance (Num. 18:21). It now seems that annual tithing was strictly for the support of the Levites, the priests and the house of God. The Levites themselves saw to the collection of the tithes from all the rural towns and the priest, Aaron's descendant, accompanied them on their rounds. From the tithe that the Levites collected they gave a tenth to the priest (Num. 18:28; Neh. 10:32–39) and in return the Levites and the priest served in the sanctuary.

On more than one occasion Israel neglected its obligation with regard to the tithe. Consequently the Levites had to leave the sanctuary for the fields in order to support themselves by tilling the soil, and the sanctuary fell into disrepair. Reforms took place under Hezekiah (2 Chr. 31:5 f.), Nehemiah (Neh. 13:12) and Malachi (Mal. 3:8, 10) so that the people once more gave their proper tithe, the sanctuary was restored and the priests and Levites were able to give themselves wholly to the Law of the Lord once again.

5. The Tithe in Hellenistic and later Judaism. The tithe in the period of Hellenistic Judaism was still the chief source of income for the priests and Levites though, as in the OT, left to the conscience of the tax payer, the tithe often was not paid. On occasion, therefore, greedy high priests made sure they received their due by sending bands of desperados to take the tithe on the threshing floors. The peasant was considered untrustworthy to discharge this important religious responsibility (Josephus, Ant. 20, 181; 20, 206 f.). In the late pre-Christian and early Christian centuries the tithe was augmented by a kind of poll tax for the support of the temple and its ministers – an annual half shekel (Matt. 17:24; Josephus, Ant. 18, 9, 1; Mishnah tractate Shekalim, but cf. also Exod. 30:11–16) – was collected not only from the Jews in Palestine but from those of the Diaspora as well. (This latter extension of the tax to include people outside of Palestine was a rabbinical innovation.) After the destruction of the temple the rabbis still stressed the importance of tithing. They viewed it as one of the three elements through whose merit the world was created (Gen. R. 1, 6), and as the means by which Israelites escape the lot of the wicked (Jewish Encyclopedia, XII, 151b).

6. Meaning of the Tithe. Underlying the giving of the tithe was the basic idea that “the earth is the LORD’s and all that is in it” (Ps. 24:1). To give a tenth, therefore, meant to acknowledge in a tangible way the Lord’s ownership of the land and its produce. Hence, Judah’s failure to do this was tantamount to robbing God (Mal. 3:8, 10), not of the material things themselves – these already belonged to God (Ps. 50:10) – but of the recognition that these material things belonged to him and were exclusively his. Man’s possessions were seen as gifts given by God, the proper response to which was gratitude. Tithing, then, came to mean also an expression of thanks to God for his generosity (cf. Gen. 28:20–22). Finally, the effect of tithing meant that the Levites and priests could be supported and the poor provided with food. Tithing was viewed, therefore, as God’s way of involving his people in his own redemptive activity, in his own immense concern for the poor and destitute. Just as God had shared his blessings with his people, so they who received them must share them with people less fortunate. Hence, religious leaders repeatedly reminded the Israelites of the importance of tithing: to give the tithe would bring divine blessing; to withhold it, divine cursing (Ezek. 44:30 ff.; Mal. 3:8, 10).

NT 1. The Tithe in the NT. Since the tithe played such an important part in the OT and in Judaism contemporary with early Christianity, it is surprising to discover that never once is tithing mentioned in any of the instructions given to the church. Jesus mentions → scribes and → Pharisees who tithe (Matt. 23:33 par. Lk. 11:42; 18:12), but he never commanded his disciples to tithe. The writer to the Hebrews refers to Abraham paying tithes to → Melchizedek and Levi paying his tithe to Melchizedek through Abraham (Heb. 7:2, 5), but he never taught his readers to follow their example. Paul writes about sharing material → possessions to care for the needs of the → poor (1 Cor. 16:1–3; 2 Cor. 8–9; Eph. 4:28) and to sustain the Christian ministry (1 Cor. 9). He urges and commends generosity (2 Cor. 9:6; 8:1–5) but never once does he demand, as a command from God, that any specific amount be given.

Paul, however, did demand (diatassein) of his churches that collections (logeiai) be taken for the saints, i.e. for the Christians in the mother church at Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1–3; 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1, 12). Since the word logeia, used here, can mean a collection of → taxes as well as voluntary contributions collected at worship for charity (Liddell-Scott, 1055; A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 1927³, 105), it might be assumed that Paul's choice of this unusual word implies an official tax paid by the Pauline churches to the poor (a technical term for "the saints") in Jerusalem in recognition of Jerusalem's status as headquarters for the church universal (see K. Holl, "Der Kirchenbegriff des Paulus in seinem Verhältnis zu der Urgemeinde", Neue Jahrbücher des klassischen Altertums, 33, 1914, 521–56). This would be similar to the poll tax paid annually to the temple by faithful Jews who lived outside as well as inside of Palestine, and very like the tithe in concept.

Yet the fact that Paul uses logeia only twice (1 Cor. 16:1 f.), a word that could be construed as a technical fiscal term, and quickly substitutes for it a devotional expression (charis, 1 Cor. 16:3), and the fact that the collection Paul was concerned with was actually for the support of the socially poor in Jerusalem (cf. Rom. 15:26) argues against such an assumption. All of Paul's special vocabulary about giving (charis, → grace, 1 Cor. 16:3; koinōnia, → fellowship, 2 Cor. 8:4; diakonia, service, 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:1; eulogia, praise, blessing, 2 Cor. 9:5), and his explicit teaching on the subject (Rom. 15:25–28; 1 Cor. 9:8–18; 2 Cor. 8–9) indicate that for the Christian giving is voluntary, an act of free will, a non-compulsory sharing of his material possessions with no stipulated amount, such as a tax or tithe, demanded of him. The Christian gives as he has made up his mind to give (2 Cor. 9:7) and as God has prospered him (1 Cor. 16:2). He gives because he is aware that he is God's (Christ's) → slave (doulos, Rom. 6:16; 1 Cor. 7:22; Eph. 6:6; 1 Pet. 2:16); that neither he nor his possessions are really his own to use as he likes (1 Cor. 6:20); that essentially he is a steward charged with the responsible handling of his master's goods (1 Pet. 4:10) and that eventually he must account for what he has done with these goods (Rom. 14:12). He gives because he has the generosity of Christ as his model (2 Cor. 8:9) and the impelling power of God's Spirit within him as his motivation. Hence, the Christian's giving, in contrast to that of the OT saint, is not done with reluctance or compulsion (2 Cor. 9:7), nor is it limited to a tithe of each year's income. Rather it is done cheerfully, voluntarily, systematically and with open-ended generosity (1 Cor. 16:1 f.; 2 Cor. 9:6–9).

2. Tithing in the Early Church. In the writings of the Apostolic Fathers and the Apologists the common words for tithing do not appear. Nevertheless, giving still continued to be an important part of early Christian worship. Justin Martyr observes that every Sunday “those who prosper and so wish, contribute, each one as much as he chooses. What is collected is deposited with the president, and he takes care of orphans and widows and those who are in want . . . and those who are in bonds and the strangers who are sojourners among us” (I Apol. 67; cf. also Apost. Const. 2, 27). Irenaeus considered tithing to be a Jewish law not required of Christians for Christians had received “liberty” and should consequently give without external constraint (Haer. 4, 18, 2). Origen viewed tithes as something to be far exceeded by Christians in their giving (In Num. hom. 11). Hence, for the early Fathers of the Church, as for the writers of the NT, the tithe was a thing of the past; a new principle for giving was guiding them now and propelling them to share – the goodness of God and the inward compulsion of the Holy Spirit.

Note that in this primitive period of the church’s history, giving was still voluntary, was directly related to whether God had prospered a person or not and was chiefly for the aiding of the poor. Little or nothing is said about how the clergy and the church were sustained. Presumably they were kept going by the free will gifts of the people to whom they ministered. Later, however, tithing was reintroduced as a means of supporting the church. It was reintroduced first by instruction with the aid of such NT passages as Matt. 10:10; Lk. 10:7; 1 Cor. 9:3 f., etc., and on a voluntary basis. Eventually, however, the power of civil law was required to effect what instruction failed to accomplish. The renowned decree of Charlemagne (A.D. 785) no longer gave the people an option – they were taxed for the support of the church whether they liked it or not.

G. F. Hawthorne

→ First, → Fruit, → Gift, → Number, → Poor, → Possessions, → Sacrifice, → Tax

H. Conzelmann, First Corinthians, Hermeneia, 1975, 294–96; A. Deissmann, Light From the Ancient East, 1927³; C. L. Feinberg, “Tithe”, ZPEB V 756 ff.; M. Jastrow, The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 1898; C. H. W. Johns, Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts and Letters, 1904; H. Landsell, The Sacred Tenth; Studies in the Tithe-Giving Ancient and Modern, 1906; J. A. MacCulloch and W. H. D. Rouse, “Tithes”, ERE XII 347–51; G. F. Moore, Judaism II 70 ff.; E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, 1, 2, 181, 189 (new edition, 1, 1973, 465, 469); 2, 1, 233–48; W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, 1927³.

Torment

βάσανος βάσανος (basanos), torture, torment; βασανίζω (basanizō), to torture, torment; βασανισμός (basanismos), torturing, torment; βασανιστής (basanistēs), torturer.

CL basanos comes from the Egyptian word for a touchstone for gold (lydia lithos, Bacchyl. Frag. 14). Attested since Theognis and Pindar in cl. Gk. usage, it signifies originally a means of testing; then torture, as a means of examination; and finally, torment generally.

OT In the LXX the word-group is found mainly in 4 Macc. (20 out of 30 uses of the vb., 41 out of 61 occurrences of the noun) and in the Wisdom literature; that is to say, it is a typical word-formation of the Hellenistic epoch. Only basanos is found in scattered references for Heb. words, such as 'āšām, denoting a means of reparation for guilt, four times in 1 Sam. 6:3 f. 8, 17, which elsewhere means a guilt-offering (→ Sacrifice); k'limmâh, shame, disgrace, in Ezek. 16:52, 54; 32:24, 30; and mikšôl, a cause of sin or misfortune, in Ezek. 3:20 and 7:19. basanos is used concretely in Ezek. 16:52 and 54 of God's punishments of → Jerusalem, and in Ezek. 32:24, 30 of his punishment of the heathen nations. On the other hand, Wis. 3:1 says of the righteous that they are untouched by any torment.

In 2 Macc. 7:13 and often in 4 Macc. (where basanismos, torturing, also occurs, 9:6; 11:2) both noun and vb. are used of the tortures of Jewish martyrs (basanos in 4:26; 5:6; 6:27, 30; 7:2, 16; 8:9, 19; 9:5 f. 9, 16, 18; 10:11, 16; 11:1, 6, 23; 12:12; 13:15; 14:5, 8, 11; 15:11, 18–22, 32; 16:1 f., 17; 17:3, 7, 10, 23; 18:20; basanizō in 6:5, 10 f.; 8:2, 5, 27; 9:7, 15, 27, 30, 32; 11:16, 20; 12:4, 13; 13:27; 15:22; 16:3, 15). In Christian literature it is used of the torture of Christian martyrs (1 Clem. 6:1; 2 Clem. 17:7; Eusebius, H.E. 5, 1, 20 and 24). In the Christian acts of the martyrs the derivative basanistēs, torturer, is also found (Mart. Poly. 2, 3; cf. Eusebius, H.E. 5, 1, 24).

NT 1. In the NT the words are rare. basanos is found once in Matt. and twice in Lk.; basanistēs only in Matt. 18:34 for a torturer; basanizō 6 times in the Synoptics, 5 times in Rev., and 2 Pet. 2:8; basanismos only in Rev. (5 times).

(a) basanos in Matt. 4:24 is the physical afflictions of the sick which Jesus healed; in Lk. 16:23, 28 it is the torments which the rich man must suffer in Hades, the topos tēs basanou, the place of torment (on the parable see J. D. M. Derrett, "Dives and Lazarus and the Preceding Sayings", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 78–99; → Judgment; → Punishment).

(b) The vb. basanizō (used as basanos) has in the NT the general meaning of to torment, to oppress; the servant of the centurion from Capernaum was tormented by his sickness (Matt. 8:6); the demons were afraid that Jesus would torment them (Matt. 8:29 par. Mk. 5:7; Lk. 8:28); the disciples on the sea were hard pressed by the wind and waves (Matt. 14:24; Mk. 6:48). 2 Pet. 2:8 depicts how righteous Lot felt his soul tortured by his observation of the dissolute activities of the people of Sodom. The vision of Rev. 12:2 mentions the labour-pains (basanizomenē tekein) of the mother of the Christ child. Only in Rev. is basanizō used of the torments which are the consequence of the divine → judgment (Rev. 9:5; 11:10; 14:10); in particular, Rev. 20:10 describes the eternal torments which the divine judgment brings to the anti-Christian powers, to → Satan, the beast (→ Animal, art. thērion) and the false → prophet.

2. The word basanismos is found five times in Rev. In the active sense it is used of the torments which are occasioned after the fifth trumpet by the eschatological locusts (Rev. 9:5); it has a passive sense in Rev. 14:11 and 18:7 ff. In Rev. 14:11 those who worship the beast are threatened by the angel with eternal torment. Rev. 18:7, 10, 15 deal with the basanismos which → "Babylon the harlot", i.e. the anti-Christian metropolis under judgment, must undergo. The connexion with the judgments which God issues at the end of time is everywhere clear.

W. Mundle

κολαφίζω

κολαφίζω (kolaphizō), strike with the fist; πληγή (plēgē), beating.

The word kolaphizō, to strike with the fist, is found neither in cl. Gk. nor in the LXX. It is found only in Christian literature, and only 5 times in the NT (Matt., Mk., 1 Cor., and 1 Pet.). It is derived from kolaphos, a blow with the fist, which, though attested from Hippocrates onwards, does not occur in the NT.

1. (a) In the passion narrative at Matt. 26:27 and Mk. 14:65 kolaphizō is to be understood literally; in a more general sense the word refers to the blows and maltreatments to which not only the apostle Paul was often subjected during his missionary work, but also other Christians, in times of persecution (1 Cor. 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:20). Paul mentions plēgai, beatings, of this kind in his career as an apostle (2 Cor. 6:5; 11:23). kolaphizō accordingly means the same as epitithēmi plēgas (Acts 16:23; cf. Lk. 10:30), to inflict blows.

(b) The word plēgē which is more commonly used in secular Gk. and the LXX can also denote the wound which results from a blow (Isa. 1:6; Jer. 10:19; Rev. 13:3, 14), and also the blows which come from God, i.e. his punishments (Exod. 11:1; 13:13). In 1 Sam. 4:8 plēgē denotes the plagues in → Egypt; Rev. 9:18, 20; 11:16; 15:1, 6, 8; 16:9, 21; 18:4, 8; 21:9; 22:18 refer to the punishments in the events of the end in which the divine wrath is consummated.

2. 2 Cor. 12:7 demands particular attention. Here the apostle is speaking, in connexion with the thorn (skolops) which he was given in the flesh, of the “messenger of Satan” who buffets him. In these words Paul hints at his lot of suffering which torments him painfully, but to which he was subjected in the will of God. To his prayer for release from this suffering he received from the Lord the comforting reply which we read in 2 Cor. 12:9: “My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness.”

The question as to the nature of this suffering has received much attention from commentators. The older interpretation, in particular, thought of persecutions, spiritual temptations and painful hindrances to his missionary work which struck the apostle. More recent exegesis suggests some event or sickness which (cf. Job 2:6; Lk. 13:16) could have been understood by Paul as the work of a Satanic power. The diagnoses which have been suggested vary widely. At the beginning of the century the opinion was widely held that Paul was thinking here of epileptic attacks. But many other possibilities were also considered, such as hysteria, malaria, and migraine of the eyes (Gal. 4:15), to name but a few (cf. Arndt, 763 f. for details of various views and relevant literature). H. Lietzmann was strongly inclined to the view of the psychiatrist K. Bonhoeffer that Paul suffered from periodic, endogenous depressive states (An die Korinther I–II, HNT 9, 1969³, enlarged by W. G. Kümmel, 157). However that may be, Paul’s statements are not exact enough to allow definite conclusions. For further discussion → Fruit, art. skolops. W. Mundle

ὠδίνω

ὠδίνω (ōdinō), to travail as in giving birth; ὠδίν (ōdin), pain of labour.

CL The cl. authors used ōdinō to describe the throes of parturition, and also occasionally of animals giving birth to their young. The term claimed a wide metaphorical usage, being employed of any great anguish, hard physical work, emotional or mental strain, or ardent frustrated longing. Occasional references in the papyri reflect a general figurative usage. The noun ōdin constitutes a late literary form of ōdis, and occurs only in the LXX, the NT and one or two places in the papyri. Cl. Gk. authors used the earlier form ōdis to describe the pains associated with giving birth, whether among humans or animals, as well as in a metaphorical sense to refer to any kind of anguish or travail.

OT ōdinō occurs in the LXX, especially in Isa. (e.g. 23:4; 45:10; 51:2) to describe the pangs of childbirth. It translates the MT hūl, hīl, to writhe in childbirth, and also the intensive form of the vb. hābal, to be pregnant with (Ps. 7:15), be in travail with (Can. 8:5). All these terms were employed predominantly in a literal sense. ōdin occurs frequently in the LXX (e.g. Isa. 13:8; 37:3; Jer. 6:24), sometimes describing the agonies of death (e.g. 2 Ki. 22:6; Ps. 17:4 [MT 18:4]), but often in the literal context of childbirth. As such it was the equivalent of several Heb. words: hīl, labour pains; hūl, to experience labour pains; yālad, to bear, bring forth a child; hebel, labour pains; halhālāh, anguish; mašber, literally cervix uteri; and šīr, pains, convulsions. While the Heb. words were sometimes used figuratively, the literal interpretation was always strongly represented.

NT The vb. ōdinō is used literally in the NT at Gal. 4:27, citing LXX Isa. 54:1, and at Rev. 12:2. The only metaphorical sense is found in Gal. 4:19. ōdin occurs in 1 Thess. 5:3, where the inevitable fact of labour under normal circumstances in a pregnant woman is used as a figure of the inescapable prospect of Christ's return. In both cases, even when it is expected, it is sudden in its incidence. As a metaphor of intense suffering, ōdin occurs in Matt. 24:8 and Mk. 13:8. In Acts 2:24 the pains of travail are associated with death (thanatos), reflecting the phraseology of LXX Ps. 17:5 (ōdines thanatou, "cords of death" RSV) and 17:6 (ōdines hadou, "cords of Sheol" RSV). The very thought that the messiah could remain in the grip of death is inconceivable (→ Resurrection).

R. K. Harrison

ταλαιπωρέω

ταλαιπωρέω (talaipōreō), experience distress, endure hard labour; ταλαιπωρία (talaipōria), strenuous work, suffering, hardship; ταλαίπωρος (talaipōros), wretched, distress. The basic meaning of these terms is that of a miserable, distressed condition, whether of the body, mind or the environment.

CL Cl. authors used the vb. talaipōreō to describe those who endured hard work or who suffered distress or hardship, perhaps to the point of being worn out physically or emotionally. As can be imagined, the word lent itself readily to figurative usage. The meaning of the noun talaipōria varied from the concept of regular exercise or normal usage to that of hard work, hardship, or suffering, the latter including pain caused by physical diseases. The few references in the papyri refer to difficult social or environmental conditions. Cl. authors employed the adj.

talaipōros to describe people and circumstances that were wretched, unhappy and miserable, a sense which is also found in the papyri.

OT In the LXX the vb. talaipōreō is found principally in the prophetic literature (e.g. Isa. 33:1; Jer. 4:13, 20; 10:20), usually in its ordinary physical sense, as the equivalent of the Heb. ʾāwāh, do wrong, pervert the right, and šādaq, deal violently with, despoil. Devastation of a serious nature was generally envisioned in the MT, and the passive voice was used on occasions. In LXX Ps. 16:9 and Isa. 33:1 talaipōreō occurs in the active voice and means to distress, make weary. The noun talaipōria is common in the LXX (e.g. Job 5:21; Hos. 9:6; Mic. 2:4), though with rather less emphasis on the nature and extent of the destruction than the MT indicates. It renders several Heb. words: maḥšāk, lit. a dark place; nūš, be ill, sick; šāʾon, desolate territory; šōʾāh, trouble, mʾšoʾāh, desolation; šeker, to drink, be intoxicated; šod, violence, devastation; šādaq, to despoil, treat violently. Consistently in the MT the troubles and difficulties, whether literal or figurative, are of a serious nature. The adj. talaipōros occurs in the LXX predominantly in the apocryphal writings to describe the persecutions of the Maccabean period (e.g. 2 Macc. 4:47). The MT counterpart is šādaq, to deal violently with, devastate, which in LXX Isa. 33:1 is rendered by poiein talaipōrous, to make wretched. In LXX Ps. 136:8 the related form šdūdāh, the devastated one (“destroyer” NEB) occurs.

NT The vb. talaipōreō occurs only once in the NT (Jas. 4:9) in the middle voice, distress yourselves (“be wretched” RSV), in a call to penitence and humility. The noun talaipōria occurs only twice in the NT, first in Rom. 3:16, where LXX Isa. 59:7 is quoted in a section in which numerous hapax legomena occur, and secondly in Jas. 5:1, where the plur. form (“miserics” RSV) is used. The adj. talaipōros is utilized only twice (Rom. 7:24; Rev. 3:17), both instances describing a miserable, wretched condition of humanity.

R. K. Harrison

(a). G. Bertram, ōdin, ōdinō, TDNT IX 667–74; J. D. M. Derrett, “Dives and Lazarus and the Preceding Sayings”, in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 78–99; K. L. Schmidt, kolaphizō, TDNT III 818–21; J. Schneider, basanos etc., TDNT I 561 ff.

(b). J. Scharbert, Der Schmerz im Alten Testament, Bonner Biblischer Beiträge 8, 1955.

Touch

ἅπτω

ἅπτω/ἅπτομαι (haptō/haptomai), to touch.

CL In Homer the act. haptō has basically the meaning to fasten to, then to take hold of, kindle (i.e. to take hold of with fire). It is far more frequently found in the middle haptomai, touch, eat (i.e. touch food), attack (i.e. touch with hostility). In the classical writers of the 5th cent. it is used also for sexual relationships with women, and also means to seize, attack, concern oneself with (a work or philosophy) and finally to understand. Aristophanes tells ironically how the god of healing, Asclepius, healed miraculously by a touch. Other stories of healing by touch, whether by Asclepius, Serapis or other gods, come mostly from the 2nd and 3rd cent. A.D.

OT Occasionally the LXX uses haptō to render the Heb. ʿālāh, to cause to mount up (e.g. a light, Exod. 30:8; cf. Tob. 8:13; or a fire, Jud. 13:13). The middle renders once each ʾāhaz, hold fast (Ezek. 41:6), šālah yād, stretch out the hand (Job 1:12), and the Aram. š-lēt, to have power over (Dan. 3:27). Normally, however, haptomai translates qārab, draw near, set about, go after (5 times, e.g. Num. 3:10, 38; Job 31:7) and especially nāgaʿ, touch, meet (98 times). It is found:

1. For the touching of persons and things that have been made particularly sacred, e.g. the tree of knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 3:3), Mt. Sinai (Exod. 19:12), or in contrast the things through which one became cultically unclean, e.g. unclean animals (Lev. 11:8), corpses (Num. 19:11), tombs (Num. 19:16). More than merely external and superficial contact is implied in Gen. 20:6, which is dealing with sexual intimacy. In 2 Sam. 5:8 (where the Heb. text is questionable) and Zech. 2:8(12) it means kill or attack.

2. For the → angel's touch which lamed Jacob's thigh (Gen. 32:25) and raised Daniel up from his deep sleep (Dan. 8:18).

3. God himself touches men either to change their heart (1 Sam. 10:26) or to afflict them with illness (2 Ki. 15:5) or distress (Job 19:21).

NT 1. In the NT the active haptō is found 4 times and only in Luke for the kindling of light (Lk. 8:16; 11:33; 15:8) and of fire (Acts 28:2). The middle haptomai is used of sexual relations in 1 Cor. 7:1, of the touching of "unclean" foods in Col. 2:21 (cf. Matt. 15:11) and of demonic heathen impurity in 2 Cor. 6:17, quoting Isa. 52:11. In Lk. 7:39 we see the difference between Jesus and his host, for he does not shrink from the touch of an "unclean" woman. After his resurrection Jesus forbade Mary to touch him (Jn. 20:17). The RSV "do not hold me" and NEB "do not cling to me" are probably preferable.

2. The most frequent use of haptomai (30 times in all) is in the Synoptic reports of Jesus' acts of healing (→ Heal). They give a completely new connotation to the word. Isa. 6:5 ff. was fulfilled in Jesus once for all. The Lord touched, for example, the → leper so deeply and invisibly by the visible touch of his human hand, that he blotted out his impurity (Mk. 1:40 ff.). Both the form of the story and the choice of vocabulary have been assimilated to 2 Ki. 5:11–15 LXX. In healing the deaf man with an impediment in his speech, Jesus put his fingers into his ears, spat, touched his tongue and said to him "Ephphatha" (Mk. 7:33 f.); → Magic, art. mageia NT5. "This sequence of actions indicated to the man that he was to expect healing from the one who stood before him. The act of healing itself was accomplished with the word of liberation addressed not to the defective organs but to the man as a whole person: 'Be opened' " (W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 267).

3. The second and third of the three great stories of healing in Mk. 1:34; 3:10 f.; 6:56 are → miracles involving touch. Because they realized that "power came forth from him" (Lk. 6:19), the sick "pressed upon him to touch him" (Mk. 3:10) or his garment ((Matt. 9:20 f. par. Mk. 5:27–30, Lk. 8:44 f.), or even its fringe (Mk. 6:56; Matt. 14:36). Those who in faith touched even his clothes, like the one suffering from an "unclean" disease (Mk. 5:27), or those of Galilee whose diseases rendered them incapable of walking (Mk. 6:55), became well and were made whole (lit. "passed through to salvation" diesōthēsan, Matt. 14:36), for whether they knew it or not they had touched the form of glory and life. According to Mk. 5:30 and Lk. 8:45 f.

Jesus did not even know who had touched him, but only that “power has gone forth from me”. For all that, his divine power lay open without restriction for the woman who had wanted to “steal” her cure, for she had acted in true and simple faith: “your faith” – not your touch – “has made you well” (Mk. 5:34). It should be remembered that a woman’s menstrual flow was regarded as a source of uncleanness (Lev. 15:19–24; 2 Sam. 11:4), which precluded sexual intercourse (Lev. 15:19, 24; 18:19; Ezek. 22:10). A discharge of longer duration caused things which the woman touched to be unclean (Lev. 15:25–30). Hence, the woman was not only physically ill but debarred from normal human relationships. Her desire to touch the garment of Jesus may have been motivated by the thought that to touch his person under these circumstances was out of the question. Mk. and Lk. proclaim something offensive to modern thought, i.e. the power inherent in touching the Lord in faith. He alone acts and awakens in the sick person the faith to touch him. The one who does not believe touches him only superficially (Mk. 5:31) and does not experience his power. He whom Jesus touches of his own volition shares in his divine power (Mk. 9:27) and God himself turns to him.

Did the women have a presentiment of this, when, following an old Jewish custom, they brought their children to Jesus that he might – as did the scribes – bless them and pray over them (Matt. 19:13 ff. par. Mk. 10:13–16; Lk. 18:15 ff.)? Be that as it may, the account leaves no room for the concept of a magical power in a touch so often found in popular beliefs.

R. Grob

→ Baptism, → Blood, → Heal

Transfigure, Transfiguration, Transform

μεταμορφόω

μεταμορφόω (metamorphōō), change into another form or image, transform.

CL The idea of transformation from one appearance or form into another is common in both Gk. and Lat. literature. Two famous Lat. works, by Ovid and by Apuleius, are called Metamorphoses (a transliteration from the Gk.). The former is a series of tales involving supernatural beings as well as humans, who experience different kinds of transformations. Apuleius describes, in autobiographic style, being transformed into an ass and finally being restored by the power of the goddess Isis. The latter experience illustrates the concept of religious change and release which was idealized in Hellenistic religion. It differs significantly from the NT experience of 2 Cor. 3:18 as well from that of Christ in his transfiguration.

OT There are no useful linguistic data in the OT, but two passages provide some background. In Exod. 34:29–35 the skin of Moses’ face shone after his conversation with God on Mount Sinai. This experience underlies 2 Cor. 3:12–18. The vision of Dan. 10:5 f. does not involve a transformation, but does provide an apocalyptic imagery useful in the study of the description of Jesus’ transfiguration. Dan. 12:3 describes the shining of the “wise” in the future resurrection. That theme is found later in the Pseudepigrapha (cf. Syr. Bar. 51:1–12).

NT The word is used four times (Matt. 17:2; Mk. 9:2; Rom. 12:2; 2 Cor. 3:18) and is apparently deliberately avoided once. This omission is in the Lucan account of the transfiguration of Jesus, possibly because Luke did not want to use a term which could invite comparison with the pagan ideas of transformation.

1. In Matt. 17:2 and Mk. 9:2 the word is used to describe the transformation of the features (Matt. only) and clothing (Matt. and Mk.) of Christ during the transfiguration event. To understand its meaning and significance, we shall draw not only upon these two passages but also the account in Lk. 9 and the description in 2 Pet. 2. Matthew and Luke use differing terminology to express the transfigured radiance of Jesus' face. Matt. 17:2 uses the image of the shining sun. Lk. 9:29 incorporates the concept of transfiguration without using the term, by saying that "the appearance of his face changed." Thus far a comparison may be drawn with the radiance of Moses' face in Exod. 34, although it must be remembered that the LXX terminology, except for the single word "face", is different. In Jesus' transfiguration, moreover, his clothing also was rendered brilliant: "white as the light" (Matt.), more dazzling than bleached cloth (Mk.) and "bright as a flash of lightning" (Lk., New International Version). Jesus' total appearance was thus transformed.

2. This experience was clearly understood and related by the apostles as an actual event. It was also called a "vision" (horama, Matt. 17:9), a word which often refers to something observable which partakes of a supernatural quality or origin (elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 7:31; 9:10, 12; 10:3, 17, 19; 11:5; 12:9; 16:9, 10; 18:9). The Marcan account, which is usually considered primary, simply calls it "what they saw" (9:9). All three Synoptic Gospels link the event with the foregoing narrative sequence. While the temporal indicator, "after six days" (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2; "about eight days after," Lk. 9:28), may have some further significance, it at least serves to connect this happening with a cohesive context. The following episode occurs, at least according to Lk. 9:37, as they are descending from the mountain. Theories which see this as a displaced post-resurrection story (R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, 1954, I, 26) must be judged as incapable of proof. In addition to this, 2 Pet. 1:16–18 employs the transfiguration as an evidence of the reliability of the Christian gospel. The writer obviously considered it a historical event which had convincing apologetic value and claimed that he himself was an eyewitness. The transfiguration is thereby ascribed a reality beyond that sometimes implied in the word "vision."

3. The assumption that the transfiguration is to be understood on the analogy of Hellenistic epiphany stories and, by implication, of no more historical value than they, has been properly challenged by recent scholarship. The eminent proponent of the former view, E. Lohmeyer, changed his view between 1922 and 1938 (E. Lohmeyer, "Die Verklärung Jesu nach dem Markus-Evangelium," ZNW 21, 1922, 185–215; Das Evangelium des Markus, KEK 1, 2, 1938, 174 f.). While some have still held to the Hellenistic epiphany model (e.g. S. Schulz, Die Stunde der Botschaft, 1970, 58; W. G. Kümmel, The Theology of the New Testament, 1973, 121–23; H. Conzelmann, An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament, 1969, 128), others have recognized the relevance of biblical and extra-biblical apocalyptic parallels (e.g. W. Gerber, "Die Metamorphose Jesu, Mark 9, 2 f. par.," ThZ 23, 1967, 385–95; M. Sabbe, "Le Rédaction du Récit de la Transfiguration," La Venue du Messie. Messianisme et Eschatologie, 1962, 65–100; H. C. Kee, "The Transfiguration in Mark: Epiphany or Apocalyptic Version?," in Understanding the Sacred Text: Essays in Honor of Morton S. Enslin on the Hebrew Bible and Christian Beginnings, ed. J. Reumann, 1972). The issue is complex, involving assumptions about Hellenistic influence upon early Christian thought and categories. It is important to allow the whole biblical context and world-view to be the primary guide in such matters. Thus the comment in 2 Pet. 1:17 that Jesus "received honour and glory from God the Father" when God declared him to be the Son shows Jesus to be the worthy object of glorification. This is different from the manifestation of a divine essence through the miraculous transformation of some semi-mythical Hellenistic figure. Many earlier devout theologians thought that the transfiguration was a manifestation of the inner essential glory of Christ (though not in the Hel. sense). While this viewpoint has validity, 2 Pet. 1:17 would indicate otherwise. Another unique characteristic of the transfiguration of Jesus is that all three Synoptic Gospels mention radiant clothes. While the face might show forth inner glory, this would not seem to be the case with clothing.

4. The meaning of the transfiguration is likewise to be found in the biblical context and commentary. Among the many treatments of the subjects, the study by G. H. Boobyer which saw the transfiguration as a foreshadowing of the parousia (G. H. Boobyer, St. Mark and the Transfiguration Story, 1942), and that by H. Riesenfeld, which viewed the event as representing the enthronement of Jesus as messiah (H. Riesenfeld, Jésus Transfiguré. L'Arrière-Plan du Récit Évangélique de la Transfiguration de Notre Seigneur, 1947) have probably had, apart from Bultmann's resurrection-appearance theory, the widest influence.

If the introductory words of Matt. 16:28, Mk. 9:1 and Lk. 9:27 are understood as applying primarily to the transfiguration, their most natural point of reference, the imagery, is definitely that of Dan. 7:13 f. The word "power" found in Mk. 9:1, also occurs in the Petrine description (2 Pet. 1:16), where the word parousia, "coming" or "presence", is also found (cf. the idea of coming in Matt. 17:28 and Mk. 9:1). Several of the elements in the ensuing narrative also suggest a glorified Son of man motif, most notably the cloud. This point of reference does not exhaust the meaning of the transfiguration, however. Not only are there messianic motifs, but also the imagery of the biblical exodus is prominent. In that OT event, for example, God also made his presence known in a cloud. The six-day interval of Matt. 17:1 and Mk. 9:2 may recall the period of waiting when Moses ascended a mountain, also with three companions, to receive God's commandments (Exod. 24:9-16). A cloud was present there also, both as a covering and as a vehicle for the manifestation of God's glory. The very fact that Moses appears on the Mount of Transfiguration suggests that the exodus motif is prominent. Luke further records that → Moses and → Elijah were discussing the "departure" (Gk. exodos) which Jesus was about to accomplish at Jerusalem (Lk. 9:31).

Rather than limiting the imagery of the transfiguration scene to one point of reference, it is better to see it from both a typological (exodus) and an eschatological (parousia) perspective. The latter is reinforced by the presence of that great Jewish figure of eschatological significance, Elijah (cf. Mal. 4:5; on Elijah as an eschatological figure, see J. Jeremias, Hēl(e)ias, TDNT II 939 ff.). The essential meaning is, however, not centred in either a past or future event, but in the person of the one transfigured. This is made clear by the voice from heaven, which employs terminology recalling four christologically important passages: Ps. 2:7 about the royal son; Gen. 22:2 about the beloved only son (where the wording of the LXX is very similar to Matt. 17:5 and Mk. 9:7); Isa. 42:1 about the chosen servant; and Deut. 18:15 (“listen to him”) about the prophet Moses. The transfiguration is to be understood, therefore, as an affirmation by God of the messiahship and unique sonship of Jesus, who would indeed fulfill his mission as the suffering servant in accordance with the declarations in the preceding narrative in Mk. 8:27–9:1 and parallels.

5. The other two occurrences of the word metamorphoō are related to the experience of Christians. In Rom. 12:2 a continuing process of transformation is to characterize the believer. This is accomplished by an inner renewal of the mind and by a resistance to the influence of the world (or “age,” aiōn). A more detailed explanation of the Christian’s transformation is given in 2 Cor. 3:18, where the experience of Moses in Exod. 34:29–35 serves as an imperfect model. The glory brought by the gospel is not temporary, like the radiance of Moses’ face, but is enduring. The Christian believer has an open relationship with the Lord of glory, which has a transforming effect.

W. L. Liefeld

μετασχηματίζω

μετασχηματίζω (metaschēmatizō), change the form of a person or thing.

This word is used in 1 Cor. 4:6; 2 Cor. 11:13, 14, 15; Phil. 3:21. In the context of 2 Cor. it has the meaning of taking on a disguise, or “masquerading”. It pictures Satan appearing as an angel of light and false teachers pretending to be genuine. In a totally different application, Paul employs it in Phil. 3:21 to describe the future transformation of our “lowly” bodies by the power of God. No detail is given there of the exact nature of this transformation. (→ Form, art. schēma.)

W. L. Liefeld

→ Elijah, → Form, → Jesus Christ, → Moses, → Son

(a). B. W. Bacon, “The Transfiguration Story: A Study of the Problem of the Sources of our Synoptic Gospels”, American Journal of Theology 6, 1902, 236–65; J. B. Bernardin, “The Transfiguration”, JBL 52, 1933, 181–89; G. H. Boobyer, St. Mark and the Transfiguration Story, 1942; G. B. Caird, “The Transfiguration”, ExpT 67, 1955–6, 291–94; C. E. Carlston, “Transfiguration and Resurrection”, JBL 80, 1961, 233–40; H. Conzelmann, An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament, 1969, 128; E. F. Harrison, A Short Life of Christ, 1968, 150–64; J. Jeremias, Hēl(e)ias, TDNT II 939 ff.; S. L. Johnson, “Transfiguration of Christ”, Bibliotheca Sacra 124, 1967, 133–43; H. C. Kee, “The Transfiguration in Mark: Epiphany or Apocalyptic Vision?”, in J. Reumann, ed., Understanding the Sacred Text: Essays in Honor of Morton S. Enslin on the Hebrew Bible and Christian Beginnings, 1972; W. G. Kümmel, The Theology of the New Testament, 1973, 121–23; W. L. Liefeld, “Theological Motifs in the Transfiguration Narrative”, R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney, eds., New Dimensions in New Testament Study, 1974, 162–79; W. F. Moulton, “The Significance of the Transfiguration”, in Biblical and Semitic Studies, 1902; A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ, 1967; M. E. Thrall, “Elijah and Moses in Mark’s Account of the Transfiguration”, NTS 16, 1969–70, 305–17; T. Torrance, “The Transfiguration of Jesus”, EQ 14, 1942, 214–29.

(b). H. Baltensweiler, Die Verklärung Jesu, 1959; J. Blinzler, Die neutestamentlichen Berichte über die Verklärung Jesu, 1937; W. Gerber, “Die Metamorphose Jesu, Mark 9, 2 f. par.”, ThZ 23, 1967, 385–95; S. Hirsch, “Taufe, Versuchung und Verklärung Jesu”, Religionswissenschaftliche Studien 1, 1932, 5–98; M. Horstmann, Studien zur markinischen Christologie, 1969, 72–103; E. Lohmeyer, “Die Verklärung Jesu nach dem Markus-Evangelium”, ZNW 21, 1922, 185–215; and Das Evangelium des Markus, KEK 1, 2, 1938, 174 f.; C. Masson, “La Transfiguration de Jésus”, Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 14, 1964, 1–14; H. P. Müller, “Die Verklärung Jesu”, ZNW 51, 1960, 56–64; H. Riesefeld, Jésus Transfiguré. L’Arrière-Plan du Récit Évangélique de la Transfiguration de Notre Seigneur, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 16, 1947; M. Sabbe, "Le Rédaction du Récit de la Transfiguration", La Venue du Messie. Messianisme et Eschatologie, 1962, 65–100; S. Schulz, Die Stunde der Botschaft, 1970.

Tree, Plant, Root, Branch

δένδρον	δένδρον (dendron), tree; ξύλον (xylon), tree, wood, → cross; φυτεία (phyteia), plant; φυτεύω (phyteuō), to plant; ἐμφυτος (emphytos), implanted; βλαστάνω (blastanō), sprout, shoot forth; ρίζα (rhiza), root; ριζόω (rhizoō), take root; ἐκριζόω (ekrhizoō), uproot; κλάδος (klados), branch; κλήμα (klēma), branch; φύλλον (phyllon), leaf; ἐνκεντριζώ (enkentrizō), to graft.
---------	---

CL In secular Gk. many of these words, apart from their literal use in agricultural contexts, carry a metaphorical and sometimes even a philosophical or cosmological sense. They are often associated with people or families. phyteuō is used of a father begetting children (e.g. Hdt., 4, 145; Eur., Alcestis 662); blastanō of children being born (Soph., Aj. 761). Demosthenes speaks of the branches (klēma) of a people (ap. Aeschin. 77, 27).

rhiza, in particular, has a wide range of meanings. It is used for the foundation of the earth (Hesiod, Works 19) and the foot of a mountain (Aesch., PV 365). It is also regularly used for that from which other things spring, i.e. the root of evil or good (Eur., Frag. 912, 11 (anap.); Epicurus, Frag. 409), and the stock of a race or family (Aesch., Ag. 966). The soul is the head or origin (Plato, Tim. 90a). The earth is the origin of all things (Tim. Loc. 97e). enkentrizō is used of grafting plants. The nouns enkentris and enkentrisis mean respectively a sting, spike, stylus for writing, and inoculation or grafting.

OT This group of words will be considered as a whole, rather than separately, because of the frequency with which they are combined. The subject is best approached by way of the separate, but related ideas which these words are used to convey. The main emphasis will be upon the application of the word-group to people and nations, but mention may be made of other uses.

1. Miscellaneous Uses. (a) dendron and xylon are regularly used to denote idolatrous worship (e.g. Isa. 57:5; Jer. 2:27; Ezek. 6:13). In Isa. 27:9 and elsewhere dendron is employed for the Heb. ^{ʾāšērîm}, Asheras or sacred poles (cf. Deut. 16:21). xylon carries a much wider range of meanings in the LXX than in the NT and is often used as a synonym for dendron. For its use in connexion with execution → Cross, art. xylon.

(b) The words are regularly used symbolically to denote promises of God's blessing, God's wrath and God's providence. Through Ezekiel comes the promise that there will grow all kinds of trees for food; their leaves will not wither nor fail (Ezek. 47:12 f.; LXX dendron; Heb. ^{ʿēš}; cf. Ps. 1). "Then shall the trees of the wood sing for joy before the LORD, for he comes to judge the earth" (1 Chr. 16:33; LXX xylon; Heb. ^{ʿēš}; cf. Pss. 96[95]:13; 104[103]:10 f.; Joel 1:19; 2:22). In this context the → vine and the fig tree (→ Fruit, art. sykē) represent a man's personal security. There is personal disaster when Yahweh smites "their vines and fig trees" (Ps. 105[104]:33; cf. Jer. 5:17; Hos. 2:12). "Every man under his vine and under his fig tree" symbolizes personal peace and prosperity (Mic. 4:4; cf. 1 Ki. 4:25; 2 Ki. 18:13; Zech. 3:10).

(c) Both dendron and xylon are used in the expression “the tree of life” (→ Cross, art. xylon). Apart from Gen. 3:22, 24 (xylon), however, references are confined to the Book of Proverbs. The fruit of the righteous is the tree of life (Prov. 11:30; LXX dendron). A desire fulfilled is a tree of life (Prov. 13:12; LXX dendron). A gentle tongue is a tree of life (Prov. 15:4; LXX dendron). Wisdom is the tree of life (Prov. 3:18; LXX xylon). Life is depicted as the fruit of a tree, and the trees are variously described.

2. Trees and Plants as Parables of People. Several recurring themes are found in passages where trees and plants are used as parables of people.

(a) Israel is a tree of God’s planting. Sometimes the tree or plant is a picture of the individual: men looking for a ruler (Jdg. 9:8; xylon); the godly man (Ps. 1:3; Jer. 17:7; xylon); Job (Job 19:10; dendron); a → eunuch (Isa. 56:3). The tree may represent that which is lofty, the proud and arrogant man (Isa. 2:23, the cedar and oak).

Sometimes the tree represents mighty nations other than Israel: Pharaoh and hence his kingdom (Ezek. 31:3 f.; a cedar, xylon); Nebuchadnezzar and → Babylon (Dan. 4:10 f.; dendron); Moab (Jer. 48:32; a vine). All these trees are under the control of God (Ezek. 17:24).

But most frequently it is Israel which is pictured as a tree. Although the vine is the most common, other trees are employed, too. In Ezek. 17:5 ff. Israel is a vine planted by the king of Babylon, a theme which takes over the earlier theme of the vine setting it in the context of the exile. But in the last analysis Israel is God’s own planting: a vine (Isa. 5:1; Ezek. 19:10; Ps. 80[79]:8 f.); the shoot of God’s own planting (Isa. 60:21; phyteuma); a tree (Isa. 65:22; xylon); a poplar, olive, cedar and vine (Hos. 14:5 f.).

Three further observations may be made here. (i) In Hos. 14:8 the picture changes. God himself is the tree (a cypress). Whatever fruit Israel produces comes ultimately from him. (ii) Nowhere in the OT is Israel pictured directly as a fig, though this is implicit, since God requires good figs as well as good grapes (Jer. 24:1 f.; 8:13; cf. Mic. 7:1). (iii) Men of God may be called to represent Yahweh in the work of planting. Thus Jeremiah’s prophetic ministry is described as one of uprooting (ekrhizōō) and planting (kataphyteuō).

(b) Israel is a people planted in good soil. The importance of the ground where a tree is planted is a frequent thought. Water is necessary (Job 14:7) and fertile soil (Ezek. 17:6, 8). Yahweh has provided the right ground (2 Sam. 7:10; Ezek. 19:10; Isa. 5:1 f.). It is described as his own mountain (Exod. 15:17), the law of Yahweh (Ps. 1:2; Isa. 5:24), and the remembrance of God himself (Deut. 29:18; Job 8:11; Jer. 17:8). God himself is the soil. If the root is not planted in him, the fruit fails or is poisonous.

(c) Where there is a root, there is hope of a new beginning after catastrophe. With this thought Job contrasts the life of a man with that of a tree (Job 14:7 ff.). The expressions “root and fruit” and “root and branch” signify totality, and usually in the context of totality of destruction (cf. Job 18:16; Amos 2:9). Nebuchadnezzar is reassured that, despite his coming downfall, the stump of the roots (rhizān mian or tēn phyēn tōn rhizōn) will be left in the earth (Dan. 4:15, 26).

rhiza is occasionally related to the future hope in the OT. (i) It is used in connexion with the holy → remnant. The “surviving remnant shall take root downwards” (2 Ki. 19:30). The Servant of the Lord is seen as a young plant and “like a root out of dry ground” (Isa. 53:2). Isa. 6:13 refers to the remaining “stump” (MT maššebet; LXX thēkē), when the tree is felled, but the explanation of this as “the holy seed” is not in the LXX. (ii) rhiza is also found in connexion with the messianic hope. In Isa. 11:1 the root (Heb. geza' and šōreš which are synonymous) refers to the house of Jesse itself. Hope lies in the shoot or branch (Heb. hōter and nēser; LXX rhabdos and anthos; cf. Isa. 60:21; O. Kaiser, Isaiah 1–12, 1972, 157 ff.). In Isa. 11:10, however, it is the rhiza which springs from the house of Jesse and is therefore identified with the messiah. The thought of the messiah as the root continued into Judaism and synagogue teaching but with the recognition that šōreš should be understood as “shoot” (Tg. Pro. Isa. on 11:1) and with the observation that there is preference elsewhere to speak of the messiah as the šemah, branch (Isa. 4:2; Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12). It is interesting that in all these latter examples the LXX changes the imagery. At Isa. 4:2 it substitutes epilampsei ho theos, “God will shine”, and in Jer. and Zech. it employs the word anatolē, rising. Two further points may be noticed. On the one hand, rhabdos can mean “sceptre”, and there is a play on these two meanings (Ezek. 19:11, 14). On the other hand, Joshua and Zerubbabel, the Lord’s anointed, are called branches (Heb. šibbōlet; LXX kladoi). (iii) In the later writings → Abraham is thought of as a root. It is said that “he knew that the plants of righteousness would go forth from him” (Jub. 16:26). There is the belief that there is blessing for all those identified with him. The OT never speaks of Abraham as the root, but the thought is implicit (Isa. 41:8; 51:2; Ps. 105[104]:6).

(d) The vitality of the tree is evidenced by the growth of leaves, fruit and spreading branches (Pss. 1:3; 80[79]:10 f.; Ezek. 31:5; Hos. 14:6).

(e) The branches sheltering the birds and beasts are a metaphor for a mighty kingdom offering protection to its vassals (Dan. 4:21 f.; Ezek. 17:23; 31:6).

(f) The tree is assessed by its fruit and its fate is often a picture of Yahweh’s judgment. Despite assiduous care the vine, representing Israel, brought forth only wild grapes (Isa. 5:4). When Yahweh would gather them, there are no grapes on the vine or figs on the fig tree (Jer. 8:13). The cedar (Pharaoh) is cut down (Ezek. 31:12). The forest (Assyria) is cut down (Isa. 10:34). The vineyard (Israel) is made a waste (Isa. 5:6). The oak (Israel) is felled (Isa. 6:13). The olive tree (Israel) is stripped apart from a few gleanings (Isa. 17:6), and under the influence of the exile the vine (Judah) is plucked up and transplanted (Ezek. 19:12 f.).

(g) The vb. enkentrizō is used only once in the LXX with the meaning of to goad or spur on (Wis. 16:11). But the thought of grafting into the tree of Israel is found in the teaching of the rabbis (Yeb. 63a). God engrafted two sprigs into Abraham, Ruth and Naamah. Hence, Jewish proselytes were regarded as grafted into the tree whose root was Abraham (Philo, Exsec. 6; cf. SB III 291).

NT 1. Miscellaneous Uses. (a) The NT frequently draws on illustrations from nature.

Jesus did this in the cursing of the fig tree. Leaves on the branches indicate that there will presently be fruit (Matt. 24:32 par. Mk. 13:28; Lk. 21:29). The lesson is: Why can you not read the signs of the times as well as the signs of nature? (cf. Matt. 16:1–4). But there is also the implication that the time of reckoning is drawing near and that Israel will be judged shortly on how the nation has responded to the mission and message of Jesus (→ Fruit, art. sykē NT).

(b) In the Book of Revelation the natural world shares with mankind the results of God's blessing or wrath (Rev. 7:1, 3; 8:7; 9:4).

(c) There is reference to the tree of life (xylon) in Rev. 2:7; 22:2, 14, 19) and to the tree, i.e. the cross (xylon) in Acts 5:30; 1 Pet. 2:24; Acts 10:39; Gal. 3:13. But everywhere else the word for tree is dendron.

2. Trees and Plants as Parables of People. These terms are particularly significant, when they are applied to people, and the OT concepts referred to above provide a framework for understanding.

(a) Range of application. (i) Individuals are pictured as trees, though the references are largely to Jewish opponents: the → Pharisees (Matt. 3:10; 12:33; Lk. 6:43 ff.); false prophets (Matt. 7:17); ungodly men and scoffers (Jude 12). In Matt. 15:13 the Pharisees are called plants (phyteia) which God has not planted, reminiscent of the parable in Matt. 13:24 f. and the weeds sown by the enemy. (ii) The old Israel is still pictured as a tree. In Matt. 21:33 f. par. Mk. 12:1 f., Lk. 20:9 f. there is the picture of the vineyard with God as the planter (phyteuō). The fig tree in Mk. 11:12 f. (cf. par. Matt. 21:18 f.) is probably to be understood as Israel (cf. W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 399 f.), as is also the fig tree in Lk. 13:6–9. (iii) But the tree also symbolizes the new community of Israel. The kingdom is like a mustard seed becoming a tree (Matt. 13:32 par. Mk. 4:30, Lk. 13:18 f.). It has apparently insignificant origins, but like the kingdoms in the same picture in the OT its branches extend far and wide offering protection for all who live in it (cf. Dan. 4:21 f.; Ezek. 17:23; 31:6). The church is like the branches of a vine which is Christ (Jn. 15:1 f.). (iv) The new tree is still in the process of growth. (v) There is a strong organic connexion between the old and the new trees. In Mk. 12:1 f. God is still the planter of the vineyard, but he does not destroy it. He replaces one set of tenants by another. In Rom. 11:17 f. the olive tree stands for both the old and the new communities and there is the same root. According to E. Schürer, there was a Roman synagogue called the synagōgē elaias, the Synagogue of the Olive Tree (Schürer, II, ii, 74, 248). It may be that the Christian congregation in Rome was an offshoot (cf. M. Black, Romans, New Century Bible, 1973, 22, 145). (vi) Jesus Christ himself is also the one who plants. He is the sower (ho speirōn; cf. Matt. 13:37), and his followers are called to do the same (1 Cor. 3:6; 9:7). The gospel preached is “the implanted word [ton emphyton logon], which is able to save your souls” (Jas. 1:21). But whereas the apostles plant the word, the Son of man also plants people (Matt. 13:38; cf. the terms of application of the parables in Matt. 13:18–23 par. Mk. 4:13–20, Lk. 8:11–15). Thus, “the word is sown [speiretai ho logos]” (Mk. 4:15), but vv. 16–20 can speak of “the ones sown [hoi speiromenoi].”

(b) The necessity of good soil. Mk. 12:1 f. and Lk. 13:6 f. speak of the care given by God to ensure the right soil. The new Israel too is planted in good soil, rooted (errhizōmenoi) in the love of Christ (Eph. 3:17; Col. 2:7). But in the teaching of Jesus the hearts of men also represent the soil. Good soil is the heart which hears, understands, holds fast and yields fruit (Matt. 13:23 par. Mk. 4:20, Lk. 8:15; cf. Jas. 1:21).

(c) rhiza is used in a variety of contexts. (i) It is used as a metaphor for source or origin. The love of money is the root of all (kinds of) evil (1 Tim. 6:10). Heb. 12:15 warns against allowing a root of bitterness to spring up, preventing believers from attaining to the grace of God, causing trouble and defilement, as Esau did in selling his birthright (cf. Heb. 12:16 with Gen. 25:29–34). (ii) The root guarantees the life of the tree (Rom. 11:16, 18). Without roots a plant dies (Mk. 4:16 f. par.). John the Baptist prophesied total destruction (Matt. 3:10 par. Lk. 3:9): the axe is laid at the root of the tree. (iii) Jesus Christ is described as the root three times (Rom. 15:12; Rev. 5:5; 22:16). Isa. 11:1, 10 is clearly in mind, but perhaps the thought is implicit elsewhere. In Rom. 11:17 f. Paul probably adopts the Jewish thought of Abraham as the root of Israel, but this passage is to be understood in the light of Gal. 3:6 f., where sharing Abraham's faith determines one's kinship to him, and to be in Christ is to be a child of Abraham (Gal. 3:29). It would be wrong to regard the "holy root" (v. 16) as Christ as some of the early fathers did.

(d) The fruit evidences the quality of the tree. Character may be gauged from conduct (Matt. 3:8 par. Lk. 3:8; Matt. 7:16 f. par. Lk. 6:43 f.; → Evil; → Good). In Matt. 12:33 f. the fruit is the Pharisees' words of condemnation of Jesus (cf. v. 24). In Matt. 21:33–46 (par. Mk. 12:1–12, Lk. 20:9–19) the parable of the wicked husbandmen in the vineyard is accompanied by two other parables, the two sons (Matt. 21:28–32) and the marriage feast (Matt. 22:1–14). All three follow the question concerning Jesus' authority (Matt. 21:23). The fruit required is the acceptance of Jesus' authority and invitation (cf. H. B. Green. The Gospel according to Matthew, 1975, 178). In Jn. 15:1 f. the fruit required from the branches (klēma) is love, obedience and prayer. It cannot be produced without complete dependence on the vine which is Jesus Christ himself.

(e) The branches (kladoi) offer protection (Matt. 13:32 par. Mk. 4:32, Lk. 13:19). J. Jeremias claims that this came to be a technical expression for the incorporation of the Gentiles (The Parables of Jesus, 1962², 147).

(f) Fruitlessness leads to destruction. The trees are cut down (ekkoptetai, Matt. 7:19). The plants are uprooted (ekrhizōthēsetai, Matt. 15:13; cf. Jude 12). In Rom. 11:19 branches are broken off (exeklasthēsan). On the withering of the fig tree cursed by Jesus (Matt. 21:18 f. par. Mk. 11:12 f.) → Fruit, art. sykē NT. In Mk.'s account it is seen as a comment on the cleansing of the temple and hence a picture of judgment on Israel. In Matt. 3:10 par. Lk. 3:10 John the Baptist speaks of this judgment as imminent: the axe is laid now (ēdē) at the root of the tree. But in the parable of the fig tree in Lk. 13:6–9 there is a temporary stay of execution to allow one final chance for the nation of Israel to bear the fruit of repentance (cf. v. 5).

(g) In Rom. 11:16 f. Paul uses the picture of grafting (enkentrizō). The process referred to is sometimes said to be untrue to actual practice, where a wild olive (agrielaios) becomes a cultivated olive (kallielaios) by the engrafting on it of a cutting from a cultivated olive. However, the agrielaios may have been an oleaster, and the practice of such grafting in order to rejuvenate an unproductive olive was not unknown in the ancient world (Philo, Exsec. 6; cf. M. Black, op. cit., 145; SB III 291; → Oil, art. elaion NT 4). In order to make the picture applicable, the Gentiles who are now in Christ members of the people of God have to be the agrielaios. Perhaps the tension between Paul's picture and approved horticultural practice is intended to underline the miraculous nature of this work of God which is contrary to nature (para physin, v. 24; cf. A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 1927³, 274).

For Paul the grafted branches are not proselytes but Gentile Christians as a body.

The thrust of the passage is to illustrate what God has done by incorporating the Gentiles into his covenant people through Christ. But the passage also contains a warning to the Gentiles, lest they fall into arrogance. They should acknowledge their humble dependence. They are supported by the root (v. 18). It may be noted that in v. 17 the reading “sharers in the rich root of the olive [tēs rhizēs tēs piotētos tēs elaias]” is perhaps better attested. The Gentiles should not write off unbelieving Jews, because (i) if the root is holy, so are the branches (v. 16), and Israel is consecrated by its connexion with the patriarchs, and (ii) God has power to graft in again the natural branches.

E. M. Embry

→ Cross, → Fruit, → Grow, → Oil, → Seed

(a). J. G. Baldwin, “Šemaḥ as a Technical Term in the Prophets”, VT 14, 1964, 93–97; M. M. Bourke, A Study of the Metaphor of the Olive Tree in Romans 11, 1947; I. Engnell, “‘Knowledge’ and ‘Life’ in the Creation Story”, Supplements to VT 3, 1955, 103–119; A. Goor and M. Nurock, The Fruits of the Holy Land, 1968, 89–120; F. N. Hepper, Plants of the Bible, forthcoming; E. O. James, The Tree of Life: An Archaeological Study, 1966; C. Maurer, rhiza etc., TDNT VI 985–91; H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible, 1952; G. E. Post, Flora of Syria, Palestine and Sinai, I–II, 1932–33²; J. Schneider, kladōs, TDNT III 720 ff.; and xylon, TDNT V 37–41; J. Smith, Bible Plants, Their History, 1878; R. A. Stewart, “Engrafting”, EQ 50, 1978, 8 ff.; G. Widengren, The King and the Tree of Life in Ancient Near Eastern Religion, 1951; M. Zohary, “Flora”, IDB II 284–302.

(b). M. Buber, “Der Baum der Erkenntnis”, ThZ 7, 1951, 1–8; G. Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte in Palaestina, I–II, 1928; P. Humbert, Études sur le Récit du Paradis et de la Chute dans la Genèse, 1940; I. Loew, Die Flora der Juden, I–IV, 1928–34; G. Pidoux, “Encore les deux Arbres de Genèse 3”, ZAW 66, 1954, 37–43; J. A. Soggin, ‘ēs, THAT II 356–59.

Tribe

φυλή

φυλή (phylē), tribe, clan, nation.

CL phylē derives from phyō, to bring forth, produce, grow, be born. As applied, e.g. to the old Doric and Ionic tribes, the Gk. phylē became in the Athenian state a highly important, if artificially constructed, unit of political organization. At first, phylē was limited in meaning to a group bound together by common descent, but the element of blood-relationship almost disappears. The original inhabitants of conquered territories were absorbed into the phylai, and phylē came to mean simply a political sub-division of the people. The corresponding Lat. tribus denoted in the historical period a local administrative district.

OT In the LXX phylē occurs over 400 times, most frequently in translating the Heb. matteh (169), šēbet or šebet (118), and mišpāḥāh (42). Of these terms, matteh basically means twig, branch, from nāṭāh, stretch out; šēbet means rod, staff, sceptre; hence tribe, from the sceptre of the prince of the tribe. Pal. Jud. almost always uses šēbet, not matteh. Apart from Isa. 19:13, where the reference is to the tribes of Egypt, these two Heb. nouns apply only to Israelite tribes. The other Heb. term which phylē sometimes translates is the very common word for clan, mišpāḥāh (from šāpāḥ, spread out). The AV and (sometimes) RSV can mislead in rendering mišpāḥāh as family, which today implies too small a unit. The tribe (matteh, šēbet) was divided into a number of clans (mišpāḥāh) and the clans into families (bēt ʿāb, house of a father), as in Jos. 7:14 NEB: "In the morning come forward tribe by tribe . . . clan by clan . . . family by family." Most frequently the LXX translates mišpāhâh by dēmos, but where it uses phylē the reference is almost always to a blood-group, e.g. Abraham's kin, Gen. 24:38; the Edomite tribes, Gen. 36:40. The general meaning of phylē is a body of people united by kinship or habitation. In the OT phylē is used not only as a tech. term for the twelve tribes of Israel (Num. 34:18–28) but can also apply to the nations of the world, as in the blessing of Abraham (Gen. 12:3). In later Judaism the tribes of Israel are usually mentioned only in reference to OT texts, the number twelve (e.g. in the format of the work Test. XII), or in connexion with the related hope of a regathering of all Israel, as in the Eighteen Benedictions (SB II 606–8; IV 881 f., 902–6). The Qumran community speaks of the future restoration of a kingdom of twelve tribes (1QM 2:2 f., 3:14 f.; 1QSa 1:15, 29), and mentions the standards (Num. 2:2) of the twelve tribes (1QM 3:12–4:17). The little interest which Philo shows in plain history means that he rarely speaks of the tribes of Israel as such, though he does comment at some length on the zeal of Levi concerning the incident of the golden calf (Vit. Mos. 2, 160–73). Josephus is proud of his priestly phylē (Life 1, 1). His references to the tribes are otherwise mostly in connexion with the biblical narrative, but he mentions that in his day countless numbers of members of the ten tribes still remained by the Euphrates (Ant. 11, 133).

NT In the NT phylē can refer in the literal sense to the historic tribes of Israel (Rev. 7:4–8), or universally to the tribes of the earth, i.e. peoples and nations (Rev. 1:7). The expression "the twelve tribes of Israel" is used metaphorically of Christians as the true people of God, in the address of the Epistle of James (cf. 1 Pet. 1:1), and of eschatological Israel (Matt. 19:28; Lk. 22:30; Rev. 7:4, 21:12), and literally of all the Jewish people (Acts 26:7). In Matt. 19:28 "the twelve tribes of Israel" represents restored new Israel, i.e. the regenerated elect gathered out of the twelve tribes of historical Israel down the ages (Rom. 11:26). If the expression was intended by Matthew to include born-again Gentiles, so that the church was henceforth to be regarded as the true Israel, the designation did not catch on for many years. The word Israel is first equated with the Christian church by Justin Martyr c. A.D. 160 (Dial. 125, 1). The nearest parallel in the NT itself is Gal. 6:16, where Paul calls down peace and mercy upon the Israel of God, i.e. upon all Christians, Jewish and Gentile, who glory in the cross as the sole basis of their standing with God (W. Hendriksen, The Epistle to the Galatians, 1969, 247). The promise in Matt. 19:28 made to the twelve apostles that they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, is of a reward for their loyalty to Jesus. They will be given a position of royal authority and honour in the new world as judges, i.e. rulers (the sense of judge as in the book of Judges). Those who have been closest to him here will be closest to him there. In the parallel verse in Luke (22:29) Jesus speaks of assigning royal power to them. The Gk. verb is diatithēmi, the usual biblical verb for the making of a covenant. The glorious future which Jesus describes is as sure as the covenant of God (L. Morris, Luke, TC, 1974, 308).

In Rev. 21:12 there are twelve gates to the heavenly Jerusalem, corresponding to the number of the tribes of Israel, and the names of the tribes are inscribed on the gates. The following verse shows that John's vision of the allocation of Jerusalem's gates is along similar lines to that in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 48:30–34). The Temple

Scroll at Qumran speaks not of the city of Jerusalem but of the middle and outer courts of the temple as having twelve gates after the twelve tribes of Israel (Y. Yadin, BA 30, 1967, 139). More grandly, Rab. Jud. thought in terms of 144 gates in the city wall, twelve for each tribe (Mid. Ps. 48:4). We are not to seek to match names of tribes with gates, any more than names of apostles with foundations and jewels (Rev. 21:4, 19 f.). The number twelve implies completeness: the whole regenerate people of God, the whole apostolic band. All twelve tribes are listed in Rev. 7:5–8, except that Dan is replaced by Manasseh, which was actually a section of the tribe of Joseph. The change is probably deliberate. According to Irenaeus (Haer. 5, 30, 2), the early Christians considered on the basis of Gen. 49:17 that Dan was omitted because his was the tribe from which Antichrist should come. Rabbinical tradition consistently associated Dan with idolatry. Dan's dwelling was in the north (Num. 2:25). Darkness comes from the north, and Dan and his idolatry brought darkness into the world. From 1 Ki. 12:28 f. the rabbis deduced that only Dan responded to the lure of the golden calf of Jeroboam I. The prince of Dan is said to be Satan in Test. Ben. 5:6, on the basis of Jdg. 18:30. Jewish and early Christian tradition is at one. But John himself nowhere makes any reference to this tradition, and his own doctrine of Antichrist does not harmonize with it. Although Reuben was the first-born son of Jacob (Gen. 35:23), John puts Judah at the head of his list of the twelve tribes. This is no doubt because Jesus was of that tribe (Heb. 7:13 f.; Rev. 5:5), in accordance with messianic expectation (Gen. 49:9). Since there are more than twenty differently arranged lists of the twelve tribes in the Bible, the reason for John's order is unlikely to be explained with any certainty. See G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974, 144; A. Farrer, The Revelation of St John the Divine, 1964, 106.

A great many Jews in NT times were either from proselyte families or the descendants of men forcibly converted to Judaism by John Hyrcanus (Josephus, Ant. 13, 257) or Aristobulus I (Ant. 13, 318). This meant that only a minority of 1st-cent. Jews could genuinely trace their genealogy back to one of the twelve tribes of Israel. Even fewer Jews would be able to do so after Herod the Great, in an attempt to blur the notoriety of his own utter lack of Israelite blood, burnt many Jewish family registers, if the Christian writer Julius Africanus (d. c. 240) is quoting a reliable report in his Letter to Aristides (Eusebius, HE 1, 7, 13). Certainly, for Herod to do this would be in character (J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 275–302). Examples like Anna of the tribe of Asher (Lk. 2:36; cf. Gen. 30:13), and Paul of the tribe of Benjamin (Rom. 11:1; Phil. 3:5) show that where tribal origin was known, the pedigree was treasured. To be able to trace the ancestral line back to the tribes was to have a sure claim on the covenant promises made by the God of Israel to his people.

Paul's pride in his membership of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. 3:5) was unlikely to be due to the fact that he had been named after the Benjaminite Saul, the first king (1 Sam. 9:1 f.; Acts 13:21). Nor was Benjamin's history unsullied. Members of the tribe had been involved in atrocity (Jdg. 19:16–30), rape (Jdg. 21), and an insult to David, a man after God's own heart (2 Sam. 16:5–13). But on the positive side, the apostle might have thought more highly of the fact that Benjamin was the only son of Israel to be born in the land of promise, and born to Israel's favourite wife Rachel as she died (Gen. 35:16–20). The Blessing of Moses describes Benjamin as the beloved of the LORD (Deut. 33:12). After the division of the kingdom, following the death of Solomon, it was the tribe of Benjamin, or at least a large part of it, which in company with Judah kept loyal to the house of David (2 Sam. 2–3) and later formed the nucleus of the exiles who returned to restore the land of their fathers (Ezr. 4:1). Possibly too the apostle drew encouragement from the knowledge that it was another Benjaminite, Mordecai, who uttered the memorable words: “If you keep silence at such a time as this, relief and deliverance will arise for the Jews from another quarter, but you and your father’s house will perish. And who knows whether you have not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?” (Est. 4:14). If therefore there could have been saving value in being an Israelite, Paul as a Benjaminite, and one who had sat at the feet of another Benjaminite, the rabbi Gamaliel I (Acts 22:3), had the purest possible claim (W. Hendriksen, The Epistle to the Philippians, 1963, 156–8). But now, for Paul, his present relationship to God through the knowledge of Christ Jesus the Lord meant that he willingly discarded the proudest of human links with the past, a divinely organized past at that, as being by comparison so much rubbish (Phil. 3:7 f.).

No NT writer has any comment to make about the supposed ten “lost” tribes of Israel. They did not lose their identity so completely as is commonly thought (F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, 1956, 61). The tribe of Asher for one is represented in Anna, daughter of Phanuel (Lk. 2:36). The Apocrypha mentions Tobit and others of the tribe of Naphtali (Tob. 1:1; 7:3), Judith of the tribe of Simeon (Jud. 8:1; 9:2), and descendants of the tribe of Levi (1 Esd. 8:47; Ad. Dan. Bel 1:1 LXX). N. Hillier

(a). K. Elliger, “Tribes, Territories of”, IDB IV 701–10; H. L. Ellison, “Tribe”, ZPEB 5, 813–20; Z. Kallai, “Tribes, Territories of”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1975, 920 ff.; C. Maurer, phylē, in TDNT IX 245–50; G. E. Mendenhall, “Tribe”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 919 f.; P. Richardson, Israel in the Apostolic Church, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 10, 1969; C. U. Wolf, “Tribe”, IDB IV 698–701.

(b). K. Latte, phylē, in Pauly-Wissowa XX 996–1011.

Trumpet

σάλπιγξ	σάλπιγξ (salpinx), trumpet, trumpet-call; σαλπίζω (salpizō), sound the trumpet, give a blast of the bugle.
---------	--

CL In the ancient world the trumpet was used to give signals in war, whether to change guard, or to prepare for attack or retreat, or to terrify or deceive the enemy. In times of peace it was used at trials, before prayer, by shepherds, in funeral or festal processions, and at athletic contests. Aeschylus called trumpet-blasts “shattering”; the instrument was ill-adapted for music.

OT In the LXX salpinx renders some six Heb. terms, the most common being šōpār (originally the curved “ram’s horn,” then more generally “horn” or “wind instrument”) and ḥšōš-rāh (the long straight “trumpet” made of beaten silver and used mainly for religious, not martial, purposes). The trumpet was sounded at burnt offerings and peace offerings (Num. 10:10; 2 Chr. 29:27–28), at feast times (Lev. 25:9), at royal coronations (2 Ki. 9:13), and at dedications (2 Chr. 5:12; Ezr. 3:10), as well as in war to mark the beginning of a battle (Job 39:24–25; 1 Macc. 9:12–13) or to warn of an invasion (Amos 3:6). Trumpets played an important part in the taking of Jericho (Jos. 6:4–21) and Gideon’s defeat of the Midianites (Jdg. 7:16, 20 ff.). In the Qumran War Scroll (IQM) mention is made of various battle-trumpets bearing inscriptions such as “Reminder of vengeance in God’s appointed time.”

NT Occurring 11 times in the NT, salpinx denotes both the instrument itself (1 Cor. 14:8) and the sound it emits (1 Cor. 15:52). Of the 12 uses of salpizō in the NT, all but two (Matt. 6:2; 1 Cor. 15:52) occur in Rev. 8–11.

(a) The injunction of Jesus to his disciples not to “sound a trumpet” before them when giving alms (Matt. 6:2) prohibits ostentatious giving that is designed to gain men’s attention and praise (Matt. 6:1–4). Jesus may be alluding to a practice (apparently not elsewhere attested) of blowing a trumpet in the → temple when alms were being collected for some special relief project or in the synagogue when notable gifts were given, to encourage other generous donations and to bring the donors to God’s attention. But the verb salpizō here may well be metaphorical: “Don’t advertise [your almsgiving].”

(b) Paul observes that only a distinct bugle-blast rouses troops for battle. Similarly only clear, intelligible communications should have a place in corporate church worship (1 Cor. 14:8–9).

(c) Although “the sound of a trumpet” may be one of the concomitants of a theophany (Heb. 12:18–19), sometimes the authoritative and indescribable voice of God or Christ is itself said to sound “like a trumpet” (Rev. 1:10; 4:1). As in Jewish literature (canonical and extra-canonical), so in the NT, a trumpet-call announces divine judgment (Rev. 8:2–9:21; 11:15–19; cf. Joel 2:1–2; Zeph. 1:14–16; Apc. Mos. 22; Sib. 8, 239), the resurrection of the dead (1 Thess. 4:16; 1 Cor. 15:52; cf. 2 Esd. 6:23–24; Sib. 4, 173–174), and the gathering of the elect from the four corners of the earth (Matt. 24:31; cf. Isa. 27:13; Apc. Abr. 31:1–2).

(d) In only one place in the NT is there a reference to the trumpet as a musical instrument (Rev. 18:22, salpistēs, trumpeter). M. J. Harris

→ Judgment, → Resurrection

G. Friedrich, salpinx, TDNT VII 71 ff.; E. Werner, “Musical Instruments”, IDB III 469–76; Y. Yadin, The Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness, 1962, 87 ff.

Truth

ἀλήθεια	ἀλήθεια (alētheia), truth, sometimes faithfulness; ἀληθής (alēthēs), true, sincere, real, correct, faithful, trustworthy, genuine, veracious; ἀληθινός (alēthinos), genuine, real, true, valid, trustworthy; ἀληθῶς (alēthōs), truly, certainly, indeed, in very truth; ἀληθεύω (alētheuō), to speak the truth.
---------	--

CL 1. For many years there has been a tendency in biblical studies to over-generalize about the uses of alētheia and alēthēs in cl. Gk. This has been done partly with a view to drawing a clear-cut contrast between Gk. and Heb. concepts of truth. It is then argued that whilst some NT writers preserve the Heb. concept, other writers, especially Jn., achieve a fusion of these two views. Thus R. Bultmann too readily speaks of “the Gk. use” of alētheia as over against “the semitic use” (TDNT I 238). According to this theory, alētheia in cl. Gk. denotes truth in contrast to mere appearance, whilst in Hebrew the parallel word denotes stability or faithfulness. It is also urged that truth in Gk. writers is timeless, raised above the temporal and material world. It relates only to extra-historical being. Most scholars also insist that the basic meaning of alētheia in cl. Gk. is that of unhiddenness or unveiling. These traditional claims of nineteenth- and twentieth-century biblical scholarship are valid up to a point, but can be misleading unless they are carefully qualified.

2. The traditional approach depends largely on three arguments. (a) Much is made of the etymology of alētheia in ancient Gk. The word is said to derive from lēthō or lanthanō, meaning to escape notice or to cause to forget, together with Alpha privative prefix, which negates the idea. The difficulty, however, is to show that the etymology of the word played a decisive part in determining its meaning in later Gk. of the cl. and Hel. periods. Indeed, even Homer shows little evidence that the word has this special nuance. (b) alētheia does indeed mean truth in contrast to mere appearance in much Gk. philosophy. But the vast majority of cl. Gk. writers and readers were not philosophers. J. B. Skemp observes, “There is one particular vice in the theological picture (or rather, caricature) of the Greeks. They are always represented as philosophical thinkers. . . . Such a description of the Greeks ignores the fact that many other Greeks at all the relevant times thought differently, and that a multitude of them did not think in this systematic way at all” (The Greeks and the Gospel, 1964, 3–4). (c) The notion of truth as against mere appearance and as that which belongs only to the realm of timelessness and immateriality finds strong support in Parmenides and especially in Plato. This need not be denied. Nevertheless, even within Greek philosophy itself there are other views of truth besides Plato’s, for example, that of the Sophists, which Plato himself attacks, and also that of Aristotle. In these writers truth has a more positive relation to the material world.

3. (a) In Homer alētheia is most frequently used in contrast to the telling of a lie or to the withholding of information, e.g. “Tell me all the truth [pasan alētheian] whether my son is by the ship” (Il. 24, 407); “I will tell you all the truth” (Od. 11, 507). When Odysseus with cunning “spoke not the truth”, he simply tells a lie (Od. 13, 254). Achilles set an umpire to tell the truth of a race, i.e. the state of affairs as it really was (Il. 23, 361). However, this is not the only meaning of alētheia or alēthes in Homer. In Il. 12, 433 gynē chernētis alēthes means a woman who is careful, honest, accurate, or even perhaps reliable. (b) alētheia usually stands in opposition to falsehood in Hdt., Thuc. and Xen. For example, the cowherd in Hdt. “tells the truth” under threat of violence (1, 116). Thuc. speaks of “the actual truth” in contrast to mere empty boasts (2, 41, 2). An oracle provides true answers to enquiries (Hdt., 1, 55). (c) This usage also persists in later Hel. writers. Thus Epict. contrasts telling the truth with deceiving flatteries (Discourse IV, 1, 6, 7). Philo writes that Moses marvelled at the delusion (pseudos) which the multitude had bartered for the truth (alētheia) (Vit. Mos. 2, 167). The evil spies sent out to view the land prefer deceit (apatē) to truth (Vit. Mos. 1, 235). Josephus uses alētheia in several different senses. (i) Truth is that which corresponds to the facts of the matter. Thus Jonathan did not question the truth (veracity) of David’s words (Antiquities 6, 225). (ii) Truth is also proved to be such by historical events. The words of a prophet are thus proved true (Antiquities 2, 209); whilst in the previous passage Jonathan does not wait to see David's words proved true (Antiquities 6, 225). (iii) Josephus also uses alēthēs in the sense of "genuine" or "real". Thus Ahab killed the real owner (ton alēthē despotēn) of the vineyard (Antiquities 8, 360).

4. The use of alēthēs in Gk. philosophical texts is best seen in Parmenides, the Sophists, Plato, and Aristotle. Some of Plato's uses also appear in Philo. (a) Parmenides asks what is the nature of real being, and draws a contrast between the way of truth and the way of seeming. Change belongs only to the material world, which is the realm of mere appearance. There can be no change in what really exists (Fragment 8, 29). "What is not" is unthinkable and unknowable, but change would be the supposed movement of what is to what is not, or of what is not to what is. Hence truth, in contrast to appearance, belongs to the extra-historical realm of the changeless. That such a view occurs in Gk. philosophical literature is therefore clear. What is less certain is the extent to which ordinary Gk. writers shared the view of Parmenides. (b) The Sophists clearly held a different view. In particular Protagoras refused to view the material world as mere illusion. His famous dictum that "man is the measure of all things" was not intended merely, as Plato implied, as an extreme form of relativism. He cited the example of a wind which may seem warm to one person and cool to another. It is not necessary, he urged, to say that one view is true and the other false. Each may be true for the person concerned. In this way Protagoras comes near to the modern notion of existential truth. (c) Plato rejects this view. (i) He replied that if "true" and "false" are only relative to the individual thinker, then as soon as someone says that the philosophy of Protagoras is false for him, it is therefore false (Theaetetus 171a). Falsehood, for Plato, is a matter of deception. It conceals reality (ta onta). False words, he believed, are merely a copy (mimēma) of deception in the soul (Republic 2, 21, 382a–383b). Falsehood is the presentation of what is only appearance (phantasma). By contrast "the divine and the divinity are free from falsehood [apseudes . . . to theion]". God is true in deed and word (alēthēs en te ergō kai en logō) and neither changes himself nor deceives others (382e). Plato thus returns to the view, earlier outlined in Parmenides, that truth stands in contrast to appearance and to change, although he goes further than Parmenides in locating it in the realm of eternal ideas. (ii) At the same time Plato also uses alētheia and alēthēs in more ordinary and less metaphysical ways. Truth sometimes means simply "the facts of the matter" (Epistles 7, 330). alētheia stands in contrast to legend (Timaeus 22d). "Equal to equal . . . because of truth" (Leg. 2, 668a). (d) Aristotle takes us closest to the view of truth found in modern propositional logic. Firstly, Aristotle distinguishes between the genuine proposition, which is true-or-false, and sentences such as pleas or commands. "We call propositions only those (sentences) which have truth or falsity in them" (On Interpretation 4, 17a, 4). Secondly, he considers the logical conditions under which the truth of a proposition entails the denial of its contrary. If it is true to say "Socrates is well", it is therefore false to say "Socrates is ill" (Categories 10, 13b, 14–35). Thirdly, he argues that "the truth of a proposition consists in corresponding with facts" (hoi logoi alētheis hōsper ta pragmata, On Interpretation 9, 19a, 33). The principle is said to include statements about future states of affairs (18a–b). Often, however, the actual word alētheia is used in its ordinary everyday sense without philosophical content. The philosopher seeks to discover "the truth" that is in the universe (De Mundo 4, 391a). (e) Philo uses alētheia in ordinary ways, as we have seen. As a Jewish theologian he speaks of “true doctrine” (alēthes dogma, Leg. All. 3, 229). But as a speculative writer who has been influenced by Platonism he also contrasts truth with mere appearance: “Moses desired truth rather than appearance [tou dokein]” (Vit. Mos. 1, 48). However, he also sees the truth of God manifested in historical events, as in a quick punishment for unbelief (Vit. Mos. 2, 284).

5. alēthinos frequently has the meaning in cl. Gk. of “real” or “genuine”, but it may also mean simply “truthful”. Xenophon speaks of securing a real army (strateumati alēthinōi), in the sense of an army worthy of the name (Anabasis 1, 9, 17). Plato speaks of having a real passion for genuine philosophy (alēthinēs philosophias alēthinos erōs) (Republic 499c). Philo has an interesting theological use in which he describes God as “the real one”, like a coin which is genuine rather than counterfeit, or an article which is not merely veneer (Congr., 159).

6. The adverb alēthōs, truly, varies in force from context to context. At its weakest it may mean little more than “indeed”, “really”, or “certainly”. But it may sometimes be used more solemnly to mean “in very truth”. We may compare “Necessity was in truth upon him” (Hdt., 1, 11) with Plato’s phrase “really alive” (Timaeus 19b). Sometimes the adverb means “honestly” or “straightforwardly”.

7. The verb alētheuō usually means simply to speak the truth. For example, Plato argues that he who commends justice speaks the truth (alētheuei), and this is parallel to his earlier statement that such a man speaks truly, whilst he who commends injustice speaks falsely (pseudoito, Republic 589c). However, sometimes alētheuō means to prove true; or in the passive, to be fulfilled (Xen., Institutio Cyri 4, 6–10).

OT 1. The Hebrew word which is the nearest equivalent to alētheia is ’emet. Whilst the LXX regularly translates ’emet as alētheia, the Eng. versions sometimes render it as “truth”, and sometimes as “faithfulness”. Indeed the majority of O.T. scholars claim that for the Heb. writers “truth” is close to faithfulness in meaning, suggesting the idea of stability, firmness, or reliability. Thus A. Jepsen writes, “By way of summary: ’emet was used of things that had to be proved to be reliable. . . . ‘Reliability’ would be the best comprehensive word in English to convey the idea. . . . ’emet is that on which others can rely”. This applies, Jepsen concludes, to God’s truth as well as to man’s. As the God of truth, “Yahweh is . . . the God in whose word and work one can place complete confidence” (TDOT I 313).

For many scholars, this argument is strengthened by a consideration arising from etymology. It is widely agreed that ’emet is derived from the root ’mn, which has the meaning to be firm. On this basis it is often argued that truth in the OT is not merely theoretical or abstract, but is grounded in the faithfulness of God. If this view is adopted we have all the ingredients for postulating a radical and clear-cut contrast between Hebraic and Gk. conceptions of truth. We have already suggested, however, that whilst such a contrast has validity in certain respects, it can be misleading and simplistic to build arguments on this foundation, unless certain strong qualifications are first made and observed (see above, CL).

(a) Justice must be done, as J. Barr insists, to the variety of different contexts in which ’emet is employed in the OT (The Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961, 187–205). Even the statistical distribution should make us hesitate to assume that it performs the same rôle for all biblical writers. In the Pss., where the word often means faithfulness, ^ʿ*meṭ* occurs 37 times. It is used 12 times in Isa., and 11 each in Prov. and Jer., but is entirely absent from a number of writers, including Job. This is not necessarily, however, because, as Jepsen suggests, the author of Job has nothing on which he can rely (op. cit., 310).

(b) The Qal of ^ʿ*aman* may admittedly mean to support or to sustain. In Num. 11:12 it is used of a nurse carrying a child. In the hiph. it has the sense of putting confidence in something, and is used of having confidence in God (Deut. 1:32). In the niph. it is used of a firmly-fixed peg (Isa. 22:23, 25); whilst the noun ^ʿ*omnâh* means a post or pillar on which a structure may lean (2 Kings 18:16). At first sight, therefore, through ^ʿ*aman* the connexion between ^ʿ*meṭ* and the idea of firmness seems to be established. But the fact that the word is historically derived from a root of which other forms mean “firm” does not give us any precise information about its own distinctive uses in a subsequent period of linguistic history. Etymology provides only statements about the past history of a word; not about its use at some later stage. Hence arguments about the nature of truth which depend on the etymology of ^ʿ*meṭ* are no more conclusive than those which we earlier considered and rejected concerning connexions between alētheia and lēthō or lanthanō (→ CL).

(c) It is much more significant that the LXX translates ^ʿ*meṭ* not only as alētheia, truth, but also as pistis, faith, or faithfulness. It need not be denied that ^ʿ*meṭ* does frequently mean “faithfulness”. However, it is possible to offer two quite different explanations for this. (i) It is usually assumed that since ^ʿ*meṭ* means both truth and faithfulness, each concept necessarily entails the other, with the result that faithfulness is a necessary part of the distinctively Heb. concept of truth. But another explanation may also be offered. (ii) We have here an example of polysemy, or multiple meaning. ^ʿ*meṭ* means “truth” in some contexts, and “faithfulness” in other contexts. We may compare the parallel semantic phenomenon in the case of the word “taste” in English, French, German, and Italian (goût, Geschmack, gusto). The word means taste by the tongue in eating in some contexts, and taste in aesthetics in other contexts. The semantic phenomenon does not commit us to the conclusion that there is a distinctive Western European concept of taste, according to which aesthetic judgments have a close connexion with enjoying food. The same principle can be applied to the Heb. word dābār, which can mean either word or thing (cf. J. Barr, op. cit., 129–40; and A. C. Thiselton, “The Supposed Power of Words in the Biblical Writings” in JTS n.s 25, 1974, 283–99, and “Semantics and New Testament Interpretation” in I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation, 1977, 75–104).

2. ^ʿ*meṭ* means faithfulness in a number of instances in the OT. (a) We may compare the similar use of the noun ^ʿ*mûnâh*, which is also derived from the same root ^ʿ*mn*. ^ʿ*mûnâh* and ^ʿ*meṭ* are both often translated by pistis in the sense of fidelity or faithfulness in the LXX (→ Faith). But whereas ^ʿ*mûnâh* hardly ever means “truth”, as against faithfulness, ^ʿ*meṭ* embraces both word-uses. (i) Normally the nearest that ^ʿ*mûnâh* comes towards meaning “truth” is in the sense of reliability, trustworthiness, or honesty. Thus in 2 Kings 22:7 no accounting of money is made concerning the collectors under Hilkiah in Josiah’s reformation “because they deal honestly”, i.e. they act with fidelity (^ʿ*mûnâh*). (ii) ^ʿ*mûnâh* also, on at least one occasion, means firm or steady, in accordance with the usual theory about its etymological root ^ʿ*mn*. Thus in Ex. 17:12 Aaron and Hur hold up Moses’ hands so that they remain “steady” (Heb. ^ʿ*mûnâh*; LXX estērigmenai) until the sun goes down. (iii) Sometimes it is not entirely clear whether 'mûnâh means faithfulness, or honesty or even integrity. In 1 Sam. 26:23 and in Isa. 11:5 it occurs in parallelism with "righteousness": "The LORD rewards every man for his righteousness and his faithfulness [honesty?]" ; "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his waist, and faithfulness the girdle of his loins". As we shall see, the connexion between faithfulness and truth depends not on semantic considerations said to be peculiar to the Heb. language, but on the fact that when God or man is said to act faithfully, often this means that his word and his deed are one. He has acted faithfully in accordance with his spoken word. Hence the believer may lean his whole weight confidently on God, and find him faithful. What is perhaps most distinctively Hebraic is the notion that even God binds himself to his word once spoken, especially in the covenant. Hence, the biblical writers speak repeatedly of the faithfulness of God, with whom word and deed are one.

(b) When it is used in the sense of faithfulness, 'met frequently occurs in parallelism with the word hesed, steadfast love. This conjunction of hesed and 'met is said by many writers to lie behind the phrase "grace and truth" in John's prologue (→ NT 4). However, we must still distinguish between contexts in which 'met (in syntagmatic relation to hesed) means faithfulness, and those in which it means truth. When Abraham's servant Eliezer asks Bethuel and Laban to show hesed and 'met to Abraham (Gen. 24:49) it is possible that both words mean loyalty and fidelity, but more likely that we should follow the RSV phrase "deal loyally and truly", in the sense of acting with honesty and integrity. However, earlier in the same chapter when he first meets Rebekah, Eliezer praises God "who has not forsaken his hesed and his 'met", meaning that God has remained loyal and faithful to his covenant promises to Abraham (24:27). In precisely the same way Jacob acknowledges that he is not worthy of all God's faithfulness ('met; Gen. 32:10). In Exod. 34:6, Yahweh renews his covenant with Moses, declaring himself, indeed pledging himself, to be "merciful and gracious, slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness" (hesed w'et). G. Quell is probably correct in interpreting this to mean "worthy of confidence" (TDNT I 236). But even here the context may suggest the idea of truth in the sense both of veracity and integrity, since the next verse sets side by side the promise of mercy for thousands and the warning of punishment for the guilty. 'met is almost certainly used in the sense of faithfulness in David's solemn charge to Solomon. He and his sons are to take heed to walk before the Lord "in faithfulness" (1 Kings 2:4). Conversely, Solomon later declared that David received the hesed of God because he walked before him in faithfulness ('met) and righteousness and uprightness of heart (3:6). Hezekiah prays, at the point of possible death, that God will remember that he has walked before him faithfully and with a whole heart, i.e. "with a conscience wholly unimpaired" (J. Gray, I & II Kings, 1964, 634).

Characteristically it is in the Psalms that both praise and prayer are offered repeatedly on the basis of God's faithfulness. Over half of the occurrences of 'met have this meaning. When the Psalmist exclaims that "all the paths of the LORD are mercy and truth" (Ps. 25:10), he testifies that God's dealings with his people are utterly trustworthy, because they are characterized by loyalty to the covenant (M. Dahood, Psalms, 1966, I, 156). "Faithfulness" is also the meaning of 'met when it occurs in conjunction with hesed in Pss. 57:3 and 10; 61:7; 69:13; 108:4; and 115:1. In this sense, as the AV puts it, "mercy and truth are met together" (Ps. 85:10). God's steadfast love is manifested as an expression of his faithfulness (or perhaps as Kissane suggests, God's steadfast love calls forth Israel's faithfulness). Even without syntagmatic relation to hesed, 'emet regularly means faithfulness in such characteristic passages as "I will praise for thy 'emet" (Ps. 71:22). God's faithfulness endures for ever (Ps. 117:2). Even the phrase "word of truth" in Ps. 119:43 is interpreted by A. A. Anderson to mean the record of God's faithfulness to his people (The Book of Psalms, II, 1972, 821). The idea of testimony to God's 'emet is even more striking in Ps. 30:9, where it is said that Sheol cannot declare God's faithfulness, presumably because there is a cessation of that ongoing experience which enables the believer to testify to God's faithfulness anew. Other examples in which 'emet probably means faithfulness can be found in Prov. 3:3; 16:6; Isa. 16:5; 38:18; Hos. 4:1 and Zech. 8:8.

3. It would be a mistake, however, to infer from these examples that 'emet always means reliability in a theological sense, rather than simply "truth" in contrast to deceit or falsehood. This is not to say that truth in the OT is merely theoretical and abstract. It is to say that we must first complete our survey of different uses of 'emet before endeavouring to reach larger conclusions about the matter.

(a) Truth is used in contrast to deceit or falsehood in a number of places. In Gen. 42:16 Joseph says that he wishes to establish whether the brothers have told the truth. Admittedly it may be claimed that he is testing their "reliability"; but this sense of the term would apply equally to statements about testing the truth in Homer or Herodotus. The issue is whether their statements accord with the facts, and are therefore correct. The same principle applies to Exod. 18:21, where Moses selects men of truth who hate a bribe, to help him with the burden of administration. To be sure, these men are to be reliable and trustworthy. But the reference to bribery implies that their trustworthiness rests on their honesty and integrity. They themselves are to reach decisions and to make judgments on the basis of truth, i.e. by taking account of all the facts and hiding nothing. Similarly in Deut. 13:14 the injunction is given to check whether or not the report that citizens have been seduced into idolatry is actually true. Whether the report is reliable depends on whether it accords with fact (cf. Deut. 17:4). In 1 Kings 17:24 the widow acknowledges the truth of Elijah's word when he restored her son to life. It may equally be said that his word is reliable, or that he has not deceived her.

(b) In the Wisdom literature, 'emet is sometimes used in the sense of faithfulness (Prov. 3:3; 16:6), but perhaps more often against the background of the contrast between truth and falsehood or deception. When Wisdom says, "My mouth will utter truth" (Prov. 8:7), the point is that she will not deceive the one who embraces her. Indeed, she will bring him the disclosure which comes through instruction and knowledge. In Prov. 12:19 truthful lips are set in contrast to a lying tongue, and the whole passage attacks lies, deceit, and false witness (vv. 17-22). In 22:21 truth is disclosed in order that a true answer may be given, i.e. that there be no lie or deception. Finally, the injunction to "buy" truth (23:23) can hardly refer to stability or reliability. What can be "acquired" is knowledge of the true facts of the matter, and an end to deception through false or partial information. The emphasis is on the value of good education (R. B. Y. Scott, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, 1965, 143).

(c) The contrast between truth and falsehood or deception is also prominent in the Psalms even though we have also noted that here 'emet often means faithfulness, especially when applied to the faithful acts of God. Indeed, in perhaps three passages in the Psalms, truth stands in contrast to concealment, almost in a sense which many scholars claim to find exclusively in Gk. literature. In Ps. 43:3 the Psalmist prays, "Send out thy light and truth". This is not a prayer for God to remain faithful, but that God will show him the truth of the matter in the face of the enticing words of "deceitful men" (v 1). Hence he needs truth and light. Truth enables him to escape from the dark, and to see things for what they are. In the same way the king in Ps. 45:4 is to be a champion of truth. Here the thought is not so much his reliability as his readiness to expose whatever is shady, underhand, unfair, or false. He defends the afflicted by bringing their cause out into the open. The well-known reference to "truth in the inward parts" in Ps. 51:6 is less clear. A. A. Anderson insists that here 'emet means faithfulness (Psalms, I, 396). But the idea seems to be that the psalmist pleads not for loyalty but for liberation from self-deception. The theme of the psalm is confession, which is an acknowledgement of truth of the state of affairs as God sees it. This interpretation is even more likely to be correct, if we understand "inward parts" to mean "that which is covered over" in the context of the need for revelation (E. A. Leslie, The Psalms, 1949, 400), and the theme of the Psalm to be that Yahweh is in the right (S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, 1967, I, 214).

(d) The prophets also use 'emet sometimes in the sense of faithfulness (above, 2(b)), and sometimes in the sense of truth in contrast to falsehood. In Isa. 43:9 the nations are to come together as a judicial assembly to determine whether the claim of Yahweh, or of the pagan gods, is true. The claim is reliable only if it is valid, or accords with the facts of the matter (C. Westermann, Isaiah 40-66, 1969, 121-2). In Isa. 59:14, 15, the complaint that truth is lacking seems at first sight to be an allusion to Israel's unfaithfulness, since v. 13a refers to "turning away". But on closer inspection it is clear that the real cause of complaint is "lying words" (13b). Jeremiah similarly complains that "every one deceives his neighbour, and no one speaks the truth; they have taught their tongue to speak lies" (9:5). Admittedly this has the consequence that no one can trust his brother (v. 4). But it is the lying itself that is the main issue here. Zechariah expresses the same concern: "Speak the truth to one another; render in your gates judgments that are true. . . . Love no false oath" (8:16, 17). In Daniel the truth of God is set in contrast with the deceptions of godless powers (Dan. 8:12; 9:13).

4. Now that we have attempted to set out the different uses of 'emet that occur in the OT, is it possible to say anything at all about truth in the OT as such? Are the usual generalizations about Gk. and Heb. views of truth entirely wrong, or do they have a limited validity, given certain qualifications?

(a) Even when we take account of the varied ways in which 'emet is used, it is still clear that in the vast majority of contexts truth is not a merely abstract and theoretical concept. Certainly it is never located, as it is in Plato, in some timeless extra-historical realm. To this extent W. Pannenberg is correct when he asserts that in accordance with the OT background "the truth of God must prove itself anew" (Basic Questions in Theology, II, 1971, 8). The God of Israel reveals his truth not only in his words but also in his deeds, and this truth is proved in practice in the experience of his people. Similarly, men express their respect for truth not in abstract theory, but in their daily witness to their neighbour and their verbal and commercial transactions. It is not surprising, then, to find at times what would nowadays be called an existential view of truth in the OT. For example, when it is said in Ps.

119:142 that “the law is true”, this acknowledgement has the existential ring of testimony on the part of one who delights in God’s law (v. 143). However, it is not only existential truth. For the same Psalmist sees the law of God as a lamp and a light (v. 105) which shows the believer the true state of affairs, although admittedly the true state of affairs as it relates in practice to him (“my feet . . . my path”).

(b) Such truth can be relied on, and is firm. But this insight is not arrived at on an exclusively theological basis. Certainly the believer may confidently rely on God because of his covenant faithfulness ([’]met, hesed, [’]mûnâh). But this particular use of [’]met does not lie behind every occurrence of the word. The Hebrews recognized the logical truth that others also recognized, that a true word can be relied upon because it accords with reality, and that both for a God of truth and for a man of truth, word and deed are one. Thus serving God “in sincerity and truth” (Jos. 24:14) means serving him with honest intention and integrity. Those who call on God “in truth” (Ps. 146:18) do so honestly. God’s decrees are enacted with [’]met (Ps. 111:8), because, in Calvin’s words, there is agreement between the sayings and doings of God (Psalms, III, ET 1840, 149). This is the logical point which lies behind the connexion between truth and faithfulness, and it is not to be confused with arguments about “faithfulness” found in most studies of this subject. We shall see that the notion of truth as correspondence between word and deed has particular significance in the NT.

5. (a) In the post-canonical Jewish writings, alêtheia is used mostly but not always to mean truth in contrast to falsehood. In 1 Macc. 7:18 the word may seem at first sight to be used in the sense of faithfulness, since the statement “there is no truth in them” is parallel to “they have broken the covenant and oath which they made”. But the context shows that the real issue is the deceitful use of words. In Sir. 7:20 the servant works reliably indeed, but the main point is that he is “true” in the sense of being honest. In Tobit 7:10 truth is used of giving a true report. However, sometimes alêthêia does duty for [’]met in the sense of faithfulness (pistis), especially when the later Jewish writer quotes or paraphrases the OT. Thus in Wis. Sol. 15:1 the writer declares, “Thou, our God art kind and true [chrêstos kai alêthês]”, probably in paraphrase of Exod. 34:6 (A. T. Hanson, Grace and Truth, 1975, 9 and 114). Here the word probably means faithfulness, because the sense of Exod. 34 is too clear to be lost. On the other hand, in Wis. Sol. 3:9 truth is used either in opposition to falsehood, or else in the more absolute sense of “revealed truth” or “doctrine” (cf. 6:22).

(b) Truth is especially prominent in the Dead Sea Scrolls, perhaps most of all in the Thanksgiving Hymns. God is the God of truth (1QH 15:25), and the phrase “truth of God” also occurs (1QS 3:6; 11:4; 1QM 4:6). J. Murphy-O’Connor points out that the word often occurs as a designation of revealed doctrine, which embodies both the law and its interpretation (“Truth: Paul and Qumran” in RB 72, 1965, 29 ff. = Paul and Qumran, 1968, 179–230). But no less strongly, truth is also emphasized as a quality of moral behaviour. Entrance into the Qumran community is a conversion to truth (1QS 6:15), and the initiates bind themselves to the precepts of truth by oath (1QS 1:15). They are now within the sphere of influence of the spirit of truth (1QS 3:24). J. Murphy-O’Connor observes, “This is the crucial point, for it is in proportion as a man is dominated by this spirit that he loves truth (1QS 4:17, 24)” (op. cit., 184). Truth plays a part in cleansing him from sin; he grows in the knowledge of truth; and at the end of time all lies will be done away with (1QS 4:20–21; 9:17). Meanwhile, it is binding on the members of the community to practise truth (1QS 1:5; 5:4; 8:2). A man is not established in truth if he has a double heart. Indeed only by responding to God in singleness of heart can a man embrace truth (1QH 4:14; 16:17). Finally the community are “witnesses of truth” (1QS 8:6). As against those fellow Jews whom they regarded as apostate, the Qumran community see themselves, in effect, as the true Israel. In this sense, many of their uses of the word “true” articulate a polemical claim. Truth, then, is used in a variety of ways in the Qumran writings, and is very important for the community. Their uses of the term have their basis in the OT, but also offer striking points of comparison with the NT writings. In particular the community’s conception of God’s revelation as “the truth” invites careful comparison with Paul, and the notion of “the spirit of truth” invites comparison with John.

6. alēthinos in the LXX overlaps with the meaning of alēthēs, which, in turn, reflects alētheia. However, sometimes alēthinos has its more distinctive sense of “real” or “genuine”. Thus in 2 Chr. 15:3 it is said that for a long time Israel was without the “true” God.

NT 1. Although the words for “truth” and “true” become very important in Paul and John, alētheia, alēthēs, and alēthōs occur relatively seldom in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, and even then they have little distinctive theological significance.

(a) On the lips of Jesus himself these terms occur only in Lk. 4:25; 9:27; 12:44; and 21:3. In the first two instances the forms “I tell you in truth” (ep’ alētheias) or “I tell you truly” (alēthōs) serve to introduce a solemn statement, and are presumably Luke’s translation into Gk. of the characteristic amēn-formula used elsewhere by Jesus. In spite of Berger’s arguments, J. Jeremias has shown convincingly that the amēn-formula takes us back to the ipsissima verba of Jesus (→ Amen). It is used by Jesus, Jeremias argues, to strengthen his words, to express his authority, and to underline the certainty of his message (J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: I, The Proclamation of Jesus, 1971, 35–6; and Abba, 1966, 148–51).

(b) At the same time the isolated occurrences of alētheia and alēthēs in the Synoptics do not exhaust what we may infer about Jesus’ attitude to truth. (i) Negatively, many of his sayings attack hypocrisy, or, more generally, any discrepancy between word and deed, or between word and reality. “The Pharisees . . . preach but do not practise. . . . You tithe mint and dill . . . and have neglected the weightier matters of the law . . . straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel” (Matt. 23:2, 3, 23, 24). “Woe to you lawyers, for you load men with burdens hard to bear, and you yourselves do not touch the burdens with one of your fingers” (Lk. 11:46; cf. Matt. 23:4). Such an attitude is untruthful, for it is deceitful, and based on a contradiction between word and deed. (ii) Positively, Jesus’ own words always accord with his deeds and with actuality. He proclaims grace to the outcast; therefore he eats with tax-collectors and sinners. He is messiah in word, proclaiming the advent of the kingdom of God; therefore he is also messiah in deed, demonstrating the advent of the kingdom by works of power. Jesus’ life of integrity culminates in the cross. Thus his life provides backing that gives the status of reliable currency to his words (→ Word). Whether or not this has any special connexion with the notion of truth or reliability in the OT, we have argued that this aspect of truth is bound to come into prominence whenever emphasis is laid upon a correspondence between word and deed. It is left to Jn. to show how this correspondence exhibits the truth of Jesus' words especially in the context of his christological claims.

(c) Other occurrences of alētheia and alēthēs in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts either have the sense of truth in contrast to falsehood, concealment, or deception, or else refer to honesty or sincerity. In Matt. 22:15 (Mk. 12:14) the Pharisees and Herodians seek to trap Jesus with their questions and introduce this query with the words, "We know that you are true [alēthēs] and teach the way of God truthfully [en alētheia]"'. The point here is that Jesus will not conceal the truth through any fear of the consequences of stating it. He is known to be honest in stating his views. This can be called the Gk. view of truth only on the unwarrantable assumption that the contrast between truth and concealment (lēthō) occurs only in Gk. literature. The same meaning of alētheia occurs in Mk. 5:33, when the woman with a flow of blood who touched Jesus in the crowd tells "the whole truth", i.e. conceals nothing. However, in Mk. 12:32, to speak ep' alētheias is simply to state the facts of the matter accurately or correctly. This accords with the statement in Acts 26:25: "I am not mad, most excellent Festus, but I am speaking the sober truth". The words are based not on fancy but on fact.

(d) alēthinos occurs in the Synoptics only in Lk. 16:11: "who will entrust to you the true riches?" Here the meaning is clearly that of "genuine" or "real".

2. Research on the Pauline uses of alētheia is still dominated by the question raised by H. H. Wendt in 1883 about the extent to which NT writers are influenced by a distinctively Heb. understanding of truth ("Der Gebrauch der Wörter alētheia, alēthēs und alēthinos im NT auf Grund der alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauches", Theologische Studien und Kritiken, eine Zeitschrift für das Gesamt der Theologie 65, 1883, 511–47). In a study of 1928, prior to his article in TDNT, R. Bultmann agreed that Wendt's thesis applied to Paul, but not to John ("Untersuchungen zum Johannesevangelium", ZNW 27, 1928, 113–63; cf. TDNT I 242–50). An unduly clear-cut contrast between Gk. and Heb. views of truth also marks D. J. Theron's study "Alētheia in the Pauline Corpus" (EQ 26, 1954, 3–18). However, we have already seen that such an approach needs to be qualified in the light of concrete examinations of specific passages and word-uses.

(a) One of Paul's most distinctive uses of alētheia within the NT (if the Pastorals are included) is his use of the phrase "the truth" (hē alētheia) to characterize the gospel itself. Although this is most prominent in the Pastorals (→ (g) below) this meaning already occurs in Gal. and perhaps in 2 Thess. The actual situation in Gal., rather than considerations about Gk. or Heb. background, makes this correlation intelligible. In Gal. 2:5 Paul declares that what is at issue in his conflict with the Judaizers is quite literally "the truth of the gospel". In Paul's judgment, enticement to compromise the gospel is an enticement to compromise the truth, and vice versa. To give way is deny the truth, both in the sense of his own integrity and in the sense of the actual situation in salvation-history as it now is. Hence by Gal. 5:7 "the truth" has become synonymous with the gospel itself: "What hindered you from obeying the truth?" J. Murphy-O'Connor rightly comments "No single term could better mark the contrast between the reality of the Gospel and the ineffectiveness of the Law" (Paul and Qumran, 195). He is also correct in noting the parallel between this use of alētheia in Paul, and the use of the term to mean revealed truth or correct doctrine in Qumran (op. cit., 183–202). It is open to question whether pistei alētheias in 2 Thess. 2:13 also has this meaning. As E. Best argues (The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, BNTC, 1972, 315), the phrase is already ambiguous, meaning either the truth which creates saving faith, or the faith which is placed in the truth. Whichever interpretation is accepted, alētheia here may mean either the gospel, as the message of salvation, or else (more probably) that which is real, in contrast to mere human imaginings. Another ambiguous reference is 2 Cor. 13:8 (→ (e)), which Bultmann places under this heading, in analogy to Dan. 8:12 (TDNT I 244). Truth here, he argues, means true doctrine, as opposed to “a different gospel” (11:4). Bultmann’s suggestion about this verse is possibly correct, although open to question. However, his attempts to assimilate several other passages from 2 Cor. (e.g. 4:2) must be rejected, since the issue behind these allusions to truth concerns a correspondence between speech and conduct (→ (d)).

(b) Paul also uses alētheia in a similar but definitely broader sense, to mean God’s revelation of his will or even of his Being either through the law or even, at one point, through creation. This use is characteristic of the first two chapters of Romans. Men by their wickedness “suppress the truth” (Rom. 1:18), and exchange the truth about God for a lie (pseudei) (1:25). Hence there will be wrath for those who do not obey the truth (2:8). The law itself, by contrast, is the embodiment of knowledge and truth (2:20, tēn morphōsin tēs gnōseōs kai tēs alētheias en tō nomō). The truth at issue here is not primarily the truth of the gospel. Men are without excuse for Paul not, as for John, because they lay claim to a knowledge which would allow them to recognize the messiah, but because they reject the truth about God as creator and judge. Paul does not say that the whole Gentile world has wilfully rejected gospel-truth, but that it has wilfully suppressed (katechein) what may be seen about God and his sovereign claims from creation: “the invisible attributes of God are plainly seen, namely, his eternal power and deity” (Rom. 1:20). That “the truth” here does not mean specifically the truth of the gospel is clear when we remember that Paul is stating a central principle of Jewish synagogue-preaching in Heb. cities, as reflected equally in Wis. Sol. 13:1–10, 14. To admit this is not necessarily to be committed to a full-scale natural theology. Even Karl Barth allows that nature and the order of creation at least disclose, to those who will see, “the insecurity of our whole existence, the vanity and utter questionableness of all that we are” (The Epistle to the Romans, ET 1933, 46). To say that the law is an embodiment of truth (2:20) does not narrow this concept of truth, but is to say only that this truth comes to a focus in the law of God as revealed in men’s hearts. Admittedly, once again, Paul is taking up standard Jewish sermon-material, with a view to using it against the Jews themselves. But he does not deny its general validity.

(c) Truth in Paul often stands in contrast to lying or deception. Indeed, together with Wis. Sol. 13 and 14, Paul inherits the traditional Heb. prophetic view that divine truth stands in contrast to idolatry, precisely because idolatry is a deception and delusion (cf. Rom. 1:25). We have already said that there is nothing distinctively Greek about this contrast. Paul uses the word in a thoroughly natural sense when he asserts, “I am speaking the truth in Christ; I am not lying” (Rom. 9:1). “Everything we said to you was true” (2 Cor. 7:14). Whereas some writers employ this contrast in a primarily intellectual way, others underline its ethical and practical significance for life. This is not, however, chiefly a contrast between Heb. and Gk. thought, but between those for whom practical integrity is important, and those whose main concerns are more strictly to do with theoretical knowledge. Thus we find that for Paul, as for Jesus, truth becomes a matter of correspondence between word and deed.

(d) These two aspects of alētheia are brought together in a striking way in 2 Cor. On the one hand, Paul was accused of vacillation and change, and asserts his own concern for the truth in the sense of an honesty or integrity in which word and deed correspond. Indeed, he urges, it is the false apostles who need artificial commendation, rather than that of a costly and fruitful ministry which proves the worth of words. On the other hand, Paul is also accused of veiling his gospel. Once again, he urges it is not he but his opponents who tailor the gospel message to conform to human expectations and demands. Hence he exclaims: “We have renounced disgraceful, underhanded ways: we refuse to practise cunning or to tamper with God’s word [mēde dolountes ton logon tou theou], but by the open statement of the truth we would commend ourselves to every man’s conscience in the sight of God” (4:2). But side by side with this emphasis on truth or unconcealment (the so-called Gk. views), Paul stresses his unity of word and conduct: “We commend ourselves [cf. 4:2] . . . through great endurance, in afflictions, hardships, calamities . . . by truthful speech . . .” (2 Cor. 6:4–7).

(e) Paul believes in the power of truth. Truth exposes lies (Rom. 3:4, where divine truth exposes human falsehood for what it is). Love of the truth can even lead to salvation (2 Thess. 2:10), although this means not mere theoretical admiration of intellectual truth, but commitment to the truth as this is expressed in the gospel. To encounter the truth as it is in Jesus leads on to transformation of life, in which the believer turns away from old deceits (Eph. 4:21, 22). Thus in 2 Cor. 6:7 “truthful speech” occurs in parallel with the power of God and weapons of righteousness. Paul does not use the weapons of power politics or psychological pressure, but with honest integrity speaks and acts in truth and righteousness. Similarly in Eph. 6:14 truth is part of the Christian’s armour, which protects him in the face of attack. 2 Cor. 4:2, to which we have already alluded, has the same flavour. Paul’s statement in 13:8, “We cannot do anything against the truth, but only for the truth”, may just possibly refer to truth as a synonym for the gospel, as R. Bultmann maintains (→ (a)), but more probably conveys the idea that the power of truth is such that openness to truth, whatever its consequences, can only further the cause of Christ and the gospel.

(f) Truth is demanded of the Christian as a corollary of his union with Christ and status as a new creation. In 1 Cor. 5:8 the Christian celebrates the festival of the new life with sincerity and truth, banishing all impurity and deception or dishonesty, just as the Jews banished the old leaven from their houses at Passover time. Truth and purity stand in contrast here to kakia, ponēria and porneia. The new life is to be untarnished; free from anything that spreads corrupting influences by virtue of its impurity or duplicity. The same idea occurs in Eph. 4:25, with more explicit reference to falsehood. Because the believer has put on the new nature (v. 24), Paul adds: “Putting away falsehood [to pseudos], let every one speak the truth with his neighbour, for we are members one of another”. The word for “putting away” (apothemenoi) is the same as that which is used in v. 22 for “putting off” the old nature. Paul is probably citing Zech. 8:16 (→ οτ). Paul also insists that the Christian speaks the truth in love (→ (h), alētheuo, Eph. 4:15). Two commentators even suggest that after the sentence “love rejoices at the truth” (1 Cor. 13:6), we should understand “love bears all things” (panta stegei, v. 7) to mean that love “keeps all confidences” (W. F. Orr and J. A. Walther, I Corinthians, 1976, 296). But although stegei means “covers over” in some contexts, here it probably means either “is proof against everything” (A. Robertson and A. Plummer, I Corinthians, ICC, 1914) or else “supports everything” (C. K. Barrett, The First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1968, 304). The interpretation of “love rejoices at the truth” is difficult. The RSV translates alētheia as “right”, in contrast to adikia in the previous clause. But the meaning of the verse probably is: love is brave enough to face the truth. It has nothing to conceal, and so is glad when the truth prevails. Genuine love entails not the kind of deception that makes someone else a tool or a captive, but the kind of truth which is the basis of fully inter-personal relationships.

(g) The Pastoral Epistles reflect a distinctive outlook, although they take up and develop a trend which we have already noted in Gal. and Rom. Truth is essentially the revealed truth of the gospel message. This is precisely because the problem of false doctrine looms as large as it did earlier in Gal. To become a Christian is “to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Tim. 3:7). By contrast, the great danger which is under attack is that men will listen only to teachers who “suit their own likings, and will turn from listening to the truth and wander into myths” (2 Tim. 4:3, 4). Such men have “a morbid craving for controversy and for disputes about words . . . wrangling among men who are . . . bereft of the truth” (1 Tim. 6:5). The term “controversy” (zētēsis) in this context denotes not concern to arrive at or to defend the truth, but “pre-occupation with pseudo-intellectual theorizings” (J. N. D. Kelly, The Pastoral Epistles, BNTC, 1963, 134). This kind of controversy keeps truth at arm’s length. It is in this connexion that we should consider the quotation of the logical antinomy of Epimenides in Tit. 1:12, 13. The logical puzzle is the status of the assertion that “all Cretans are liars”, if this is spoken by a Cretan. If the statement is true then it is falsified by a Cretan’s speaking it truly; whilst if it is false, to assert it would be untrue. Its conclusion in the Pastorals with the added statement “this testimony is true” suggests not that the author has misunderstood the philosophical point, but that the Cretan antinomy constitutes a valid example of the kind of profitless controversy described above, which makes truth a merely theoretical matter. By contrast, “the truth” in the Pastorals, especially in the sense of Christian revelation, is wholesome and health-giving (Gk. hygiainousēs, e.g. 2 Tim. 4:3). Thus, far from evading the question of truth, the Pastorals demonstrate the NT concern for it, even though alētheia is more readily restricted to the content of Christian revelation than in earlier epistles such as 2 Cor.

(h) The verb alētheuō occurs only twice in the NT, both times in Paul. In Gal. 4:16 Paul exclaims, “Have I then become your enemy by telling the truth?” Here the irony has most point if “truth” is understood to mean the actual facts of the gospel as they really are, in contrast to the deceptions of Paul’s opponents. Even if alētheuō is understood to mean little more than “to proclaim the Christian message”, the contrast between Paul and his opponents loses its point if this is not specifically a truth proclamation which hides nothing from the hearer, however unpalatable. In Eph. 4:15 the believer is enjoined to speak the truth in love. It is possible that alētheuō here entails integrity of life in addition to truthful speech. The previous verse warns against the kind of fickleness which moves from one novelty to another in response to deceptive persuasions. The adjective alēthinos occurs only once in Paul, where “to serve the living and true God” (1 Thess. 1:9) seems to have, once again, its characteristic meaning of real or genuine. The real God, here, stands in contrast to idols, or so-called gods. The adverb alēthōs also occurs only once in Paul, in the same epistle. The Thessalonians received the message of Christ not as mere human words, but “as what it really is, the word of God” (1 Thess. 2:13). The word describes what is genuinely or really the case.

3. In the rest of the NT apart from the Johannine writing and Rev., alētheia is used only 8 times; alēthēs, twice; and alēthinos three times. alēthōs and alētheuō do not occur at all.

(a) In the Petrine Epistles we find “the truth” or “the way of truth” used as it is especially in the Pastorals virtually as a synonym for the truth of the gospel. Christians are therefore those who have become obedient to the truth (1 Pet. 1:22). On the other hand false prophets and false teachers deny Christ, and thereby cause men to revile the way of truth (2 Pet. 2:2).

(b) Sometimes “true” means “in accordance with the facts of the matter” and even “in accordance with experience”. Thus “the true grace of God” (1 Pet. 5:12) means the grace which the readers had proved true in their experience, and which was based on reality and not delusion. A true proverb (2 Pet. 2:22) states truth as it is in the light of experience.

(c) At first sight “the word of truth” in Jas. 1:18 seems to mean simply the message of the gospel (→ 2(a) and 3(a)). But the context suggests that what is at issue is that God acts reliably and consistently. God does not tempt men to sin (vv. 13–16). With him is no shadow due to change (v. 17). His word is, in this sense, the word of truth. To wander from the truth (Jas. 5:19) might also seem to mean to turn away from the gospel. But once again the term here is broader, meaning “the right path”. In what sense does selfish ambition lead one to be “false to the truth” (Jas. 3:14)? James may be referring to a false estimate of one’s own capabilities. But it is more likely that he is warning his readers that selfish ambition and arrogance lead men to put considerations about their own status even above those which concern the truth. Often lies stem from a concern to defend, or assert the claims of, one’s own status in the eyes of others (→ 5(h)).

(d) The reference in Heb. 10:26 to receiving knowledge of the truth certainly means knowledge of the truth of the gospel. But “truth” here also underlines the absoluteness and finality of the Christian message. If a man turns his back on that which is the truth, indeed there is nothing else.

(e) alēthinos occurs three times in Heb., describing “the true tent” (8:2 and 9:24) and “a true heart” (10:22). (i) Many scholars see the contrast between the true tabernacle and its earthly “copy” (cheiropoiēta . . . antitypa; cf. 9:24) as a clear and unambiguous allusion to the Platonic doctrine of forms. The earthly sanctuary is that which is a mere copy of the “real” sanctuary in the realm of eternal ideas. In spite of the long vogue which this theory has enjoyed, C. K. Barrett and several other scholars have shown that the Jewish apocalyptic writers also drew a contrast between the heavenly sanctuary as it existed in the mind of God, or in heaven, and the earthly tabernacle which reflected on earth this heavenly reality (“The Eschatology of Hebrews”, in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of C. H. Dodd, 1956 and 1964; R. G.

Hamerton-Kelly, Pre-existence, Wisdom and the Son of Man, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 21, 1973, 256–8; and A. Cody, Heavenly Sanctuary and Liturgy in the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1960). It is possible that apocalyptic Judaism is indirectly influenced by Platonic ideas, but this is very different from claiming to see a Platonic view of truth in Heb. At the same time, this is not to deny that alēthinos in 8:2 and 9:24 bears its characteristic meaning of genuine or real. (ii) By contrast in 10:22 “a true heart” means one that is honest and without deceit. The believer draws near to God without the burden and duplicity of a divided self, coming in full assurance of faith with a heart sprinkled clean from an evil conscience.

4. Considerations about word-frequency alone suggest the importance of truth in John and the Johannine Epistles. Nearly half of the 109 occurrences of alētheia appear in the Johannine writings (25 times in the Gospel and 20 times in the Johannine Epistles). alēthēs is used 17 times out of a total of 26 occurrences in the NT; whilst alēthinos appears 23 times (including 10 times in Rev.) out of a total of only 28 uses in the whole NT. In all, therefore, over half of the NT uses of all three words occur in the Johannine writings. Thus it is all the more unfortunate that many scholars allow their exegesis of passages about truth to be dominated by the questions of whether John holds the “Gk.” or “Heb.” view of truth. R. Bultmann and C. H. Dodd argue that John sees truth primarily as reality in contrast to falsehood or appearance, but insist on seeing this as evidence of a Hellenistic view of truth in John. Other writers, including most emphatically L. J. Kuypers (“Grace and Truth, An OT Description of God and its Use in the Johannine Gospel”, Interpretation 18, 1964, 3–19) and more moderately C. K. Barrett, L. Morris, and R. E. Brown, underline instances in John where alētheia may possibly mean faithfulness, as evidence of affinities with the OT and Judaism. This way of posing the question, however, is unsatisfactory for two main reasons. Firstly, we have seen that an unduly clear-cut contrast between Heb. and Gk. views of truth must be in question. Secondly, it is misleading to tie exegetical conclusions about the meaning of alētheia to a theory about Johannine affinities of thought. The view adopted in this article is that John uses alētheia regularly in the sense of reality in contrast to falsehood or mere appearance, but that this in no way provides evidence of Gk. affinities of ideas, or of disregard for the OT tradition.

(a) Special consideration may be given to the use of the phrase “full of grace and truth” (plērēs charitōs kai alētheias) in the Prologue (1:14; cf. hē charis kai hē alētheia, 1:17). It is usual to find the background to these verses in Exod. 34:6: “The LORD, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness” (Heb. rah̄ ḥesed̄ w^emet̄; LXX, polyeleos kai alēthinos). The LXX use of eleos to translate ḥesed̄ represents a standard procedure, but this need not be an obstacle to the argument that Jn. takes up this phrase from Exod. 34. Jn. does not always follow the LXX accurately, and in any case in later Gk. charis, grace, comes regularly to replace eleos, mercy, as the standard translation of ḥesed̄ (J. A. Montgomery, “Heb. ḥesed̄ and Gk. Charis”, HTR 32, 1939, 97–102). L. J. Kuypers therefore urges emphatically that the OT idea of covenant loyalty, expressed in ḥesed̄, completely determines the meaning of the whole phrase “grace and truth” in Jn. Everything turns on fidelity, loyalty, faithfulness, and dependability (op. cit., 6–9 and 14–16). That Exod. 34 lies behind these verses is well argued by A. T. Hanson (Grace and Truth, 1975, 5–11). Moses had made the bold request that he might see God's glory (Exod. 33:18). God replied that no one might see his face and live; but he promised that "you shall see my back". The phrase cited in John 1:14 describes this experience of "seeing" God. But Jn. gives the phrase fresh point. He says that truly to "see" God is to see nothing other than his glory in Christ. This interpretation of John 1:14-18 is valid. However, does alētheia (vv. 14 and 17) therefore necessarily mean faithfulness (Kuyper), reliability (Morris), or constancy (Brown)? Bultmann flatly rejects this as "not possible" (The Gospel of John, 1971, 74 n. 2). For this reason he also rejects Exod. 34 as the background of the passage. But must both possibilities be either accepted or rejected together? On the one hand, the Exod. 34 background of "seeing God" is appropriate to Jn.'s thought. On the other hand, to say that Christ the Logos abounds in covenant faithfulness, or reliability, seems strained in this context. Admittedly C. K. Barrett is correct in seeing the idea of God's covenant faithfulness in the background (The Gospel according to St. John, 1958, 139). God's promises of grace and revelation are pre-eminently fulfilled in Christ. But what Jn. wishes to stress in these verses is that, in Christ the Logos, men can see God in his genuine actuality and reality. If men can see God's reality anywhere, it is in Christ. Thus R. Schnackenburg rightly comments that whilst it is just possible to understand alētheia here as steadfastness, "the evangelist probably took it to mean 'divine reality' in a more strongly ontological sense (cf. v. 17) as he understands alētheia in 4:23; 8:44; 14:6; 17:17; 18:37d. The hymn sees in the bodily presence of the Logos among men the eschatological fulfilment of God's dwelling among his people" (The Gospel according to St. John, I, 1968, 273). This would accord entirely with the sense of v. 17. The law does indeed constitute a witness to God, as does Moses; but the reality itself, to which everything else witnesses, is encountered in Christ.

(b) There can be no doubt at all that sometimes in Jn. alētheia and alēthēs mean simply truth in contrast to falsehood. In Jn. 4:18 the woman of Samaria speaks the truth about her marital status. In 10:41 it is affirmed that everything that John the Baptist said about Jesus is true. The statement "I tell you the truth; it is to your advantage that I go away" (16:7) dispels any suspicion that the words may have been tailored to provide some illusory comfort. In 1 Jn. a liar is one who does not speak the truth (2:4; cf. 2:21, 27). To err from the truth is to be deceived (1 Jn. 1:8). The notion of witness is very prominent in the Fourth Gospel, and much is made of the fact that the witness to Christ is true (Jn. 5:31 f.). However, the notion of a witness which is true rather than false leads on to the question of the validity of that witness, and thereby to the use of alētheia in the sense of validity.

(c) The debate about truthful witness, which is touched on in Jn. 5:31, is developed more fully in 8:13-58. Here it may seem that we come closest in Jn. to the so-called Heb. concept of truth as reliability. Witness to Jesus Christ is reliable because it comes from God, and from more than one witness (8:17, 18). But on closer inspection the issue turns on validity, rather than reliability as such. The witness to Jesus Christ is valid, because there is no higher court of appeal than God himself. The witness of those who judge "according to the flesh" (v. 15) is not necessarily dishonest (although there may be a hint of this in 9:41); but such testimony is untrue in the sense that it is invalid. Valid witness depends on revelation.

(d) One of the most important uses of alētheia and alēthēs in Jn. is to convey the idea of reality, in contrast to whatever the situation may seem to look like on the surface. (i) The clearest example of this use is when the adj. alēthēs is used in the same sense as the more characteristic word alēthinos to mean “real”. Thus in 6:55 Jesus says that his flesh is real food, and his blood is real drink. It is more genuinely food and drink than other things that go under these names. Real food gives more lasting satisfaction and nourishment than other things which men call “food”. (ii) Those who worship God in Spirit and in truth (4:23, 24) are not those who worship in sincerity and inwardness. The Samaritans are not criticized for lacking sincerity. True worship is that which accords with reality, which men grasp on the basis of revelation. The phrase en alētheia, as C. H. Dodd rightly insists, means “on the plane of reality” (The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, 1953, 175). It is on the plane of ta onta as distinct from eidōla or phantasiai. Hence it is associated with the Holy Spirit.

(e) Special attention should be given to the phrase “doing the truth” in Jn. and the Johannine Epistles. At first sight it may seem simply to reflect the OT and Jewish usage according to which it need mean little more than practising fidelity. But C. H. Dodd and others are correct in rejecting this interpretation of the phrase in Jn. It combines an allusion to the way of Christian revelation with an additional reference to the contrast between truth and falsehood. Thus in Jn. 3:21 the statement, “He who does what is true comes to the light that it may be clearly seen that his deeds have been wrought in God,” cannot simply refer to the man who lives up to his aspirations faithfully. This would make nonsense of the thrust of the whole chapter, namely that even a good man needs to be born anew. C. K. Barrett, therefore, understands the phrase to mean: “he that practises the true (Christian) faith and life” (op. cit., 182). However, the verse also means more than this. For there is the additional thought that such a man will in practice wish to hide nothing. Truth can only serve Christian faith and Christian life. 1 Jn. 1:6 similarly combines the notion of truth as revelation with truth in contrast to falsehood. A sharp tension between profession of faith and actual practice is both inconsistent with Christian revelation and also in principle self-contradictory. Hence if we claim to have fellowship with God but walk in darkness “we do not live according to the truth”.

(f) There are several passages in Jn. in which the meaning of alētheia or alēthēs is too broad to be equated with any one of the five categories discussed above. (i) One of the most important of these is Jn. 14:6 where Jesus declares, “I am the way, the truth, and the life; no one comes to the Father, but by me.” (A survey of interpretations can be found in I. de la Potterie, “‘Je suis la Voie, la Vérité et la Vie’ (Jn. 14:6)” Nouvelle Revue Théologique 88, 1966, 907–42.) Dodd and Bultmann interpret this verse along the lines of a Hellenistic or gnostic dualism, to mean that through Christ the soul ascends to the heavenly realm of truth. Whilst we may question Bultmann’s assumptions about the relevance of the gnostic background, he is nevertheless correct when he writes: “He (Christ) is the way in such a manner as to be at the same time the goal; for he is also hē alētheia . . . as the revealed reality of God.” To say that Jesus is the way as well as the truth means that “the discovery of this alētheia is not something . . . at man’s disposal . . . Jesus is the truth; he does not simply state it. One does not come to him to ask about truth; one comes to him as the truth” (op. cit., 605 f.). Since the way leads to the Father, I. de la Potterie and R. E. Brown stress that “the way” is primary, and that “the truth” describes the way. Nevertheless, as the truth, Jesus is also the goal of man’s search, for “he who has seen me has seen the Father” (v. 9). When he declares that he is the truth, therefore, a number of distinct ideas are combined. Firstly, truth is not abstract or supra-historical but revealed in the actual personal life of the Word made flesh. This looks back to the point made with reference to the Synoptics about the correspondence between word and deed in the life of Jesus Christ (→ 1 (b)). Secondly, Christ is also the truth because he is the revelation of God, and therefore his own witness is valid (→ 4(c) and (e)). Thirdly, truth also stands in opposition to deception or falsehood. In the case of divine revelation, this means that Christ is both truth and reality (→ 4(b) and (d)).

(ii) It is probable that the same range of meaning applies to the assertion “thy word is truth” in Jn. 17:17. The context of thought is the distinctiveness of the community of believers as over against the world. The community is holy, for it belongs to God and is founded on God’s word. However, the very word on which the community depends for its existence and its consecration is also a word of commission which sends it out into the world (v. 18). In both respects, this word from God is valid, effective, in no way false, indeed in accord with reality. It is all these things precisely because it is the revealing word of God himself. Thereby the sanctification of the community is assured, and its commission validated. In addition to this, the verse looks back to the OT and Judaism. The Gk. phrase is identical with the LXX form of Ps. 119:142, as found in Codex Sinaiticus (although not in the MT and other MSS of the LXX, which read “your law is truth”). Jer. 10:10 also has: “Purify our hearts to serve you in truth. . . . Your word is truth”, and Jewish prayer regularly expressed the thought that God consecrates men through his commandments. There is perhaps some justification, therefore, for correlating “word” here with the (OT) Scriptures, although it primarily refers to God’s word to the Christian community. If, in effect, God’s word may be said to include the NT writings, it should still be remembered that this verse is not making an explicit statement about the truth-status of the Bible as such.

(iii) In Jn. 8:44, 45, the truth spoken by Jesus is set in contrast to the lie spoken by the devil. The devil “has nothing to do with the truth, because there is not truth in him [en tē alētheia ouch hestēken; hoti ouk estin alētheia en autō]”. Here truth is primarily but not exclusively contrasted with falsehood or deception. There is doubtless an allusion here to the deception by the serpent in Gen. 3:4, 5. The implication is that by opposing the truth of Jesus (here, also in the sense of the authentic divine revelation), the Jews are actually doing the devil’s work. R. Bultmann argues that truth in this verse stands in opposition not only to falsehood, but also to reality and to authentic existence (op. cit., 320–22). The devil seduces men away from reality and life.

(iv) By contrast, the Spirit of God is the Spirit of truth (Jn. 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; cf. 1 Jn. 4:6; 5:6). It is striking that this phrase is repeated in no less than three of the five Paraclete sayings. This harmonizes well with C. K. Barrett’s understanding of the work of the Paraclete as that of a prosecuting counsel who “exposes” (elenchein) the facts of the matter. He brings things “to the light of day” or “shows a thing in its true colours”. It is “the activity of a judge and prosecuting counsel in one” (op. cit., 76). The Spirit places the Christian community in the light of judgment which belongs, strictly speaking, to the last day. Hence his verdict is absolutely valid and needs in no way to be modified by fresh knowledge. One other idea, however, must be added. It is also true that “the Spirit of truth is a Paraclete precisely because he carries on the earthly work of Jesus” (R. E. Brown, op. cit., 644). In 18:37 Jesus declares to Pilate, "For this I was born, and for this I have come into the world, to bear witness to the truth. Everyone who is of the truth hears my voice". The Spirit, as Paraclete, continues the work of Jesus also as Paraclete, whereby proponents of truth and falsehood are shown up to be what they are. Falsehood is exposed in all its seductive deception as a lie. The truth is shown to be reality, based on God's revelation. In this comprehensive theological sense what is true and what is false is brought out fully into the open only in relation to Christ and the Spirit. Pilate's baffled question, "What is truth?" (18:38), is a direct rejoinder to Jesus' claim that he bears witness to the truth. It is not, as L. J. Kuypers claims, that Pilate cannot understand a Heb. concept of truth, because he himself approaches the matter with a Gk. view of truth (op. cit., 17-18). Pilate remains baffled because there are certain questions about truth which can be answered only when a man is fully open to hear the witness of Jesus. This brings us back to the claim of Jn. 14:6, that Jesus Christ not only states the truth; he is the truth.

(g) It remains to consider alēthinos and alēthōs in the Johannine writings. (i) Often alēthinos has its characteristic meaning of "genuine" or "real". In Jn. 1:9, Jesus is the real light, in contrast to John the Baptist. C. K. Barrett rightly points out that this "light" means not so much the idea of inward illumination as of exposing to the light of judgment (op. cit., 134; cf. phōtizō, shed light upon). John the Baptist did indeed expose men's actions and call them to repentance; but the real crisis of division, which brings to light the direction in which men are going, is Jesus Christ. We have already seen that "real worshippers" (4:23) are those whose worship is based on reality, not on human aspiration (→ (d)). In 6:32 Jesus tells his hearers that whereas Moses gave Israel bread from heaven, God now gives them the real bread. The manna was physical nourishment which both fed Israel and taught them dependence on God. But the real bread, to which the manna merely pointed forward, was Jesus himself. Similarly in 15:1 Jesus is the real vine, worthy of the name. Israel was like a vine which was unproductive and wild; real fruitfulness is to be found only in Christ. (ii) On the other hand, alēthinos may also have the same range of meaning as alēthēs. It may denote a true saying (4:37), or true judgment (8:16). Sometimes the two senses merge, as when the meaning is primarily or partly, but certainly not exclusively, that of "real", e.g. "the only true God" (17:3). (iii) It is difficult to determine how narrowly or otherwise we should interpret the meaning of alēthinos in Rev. God is "the holy one, the true one" (Rev. 3:7); "the faithful and true witness" (3:14). "Just and true are thy ways" (15:3); "Just and true are thy judgments" (16:7). "These are the true words of God" (19:9); "these words are trustworthy and true" (21:5; cf. 6:10; 19:2; 22:6). It must not be forgotten that Rev. uses only alēthinos and never alēthēs, or even alētheia. Hence it would be unwise to try to draw too clear-cut a distinction between them. In Hellenistic literature alēthinos is used of divine beings to mean "that which truly exists", and this may well form part of the meaning in Rev. But God is also true in contrast to the deceits and falsehoods of idolatry and the antichrist. The martyrs and faithful believers may also rely upon his truth. As in the case of the last category which we examined under alētheia and alēthēs (→ (f)), "true" in these passages seems to include several of the nuances which we examined earlier separately. (iv) The adverb alēthōs occurs seven times in Jn., once in 1 Jn., and is absent from Rev. Sometimes it is used in the sense of "real" or "genuine", as an adverbial equivalent to alēthinos. Thus Nathanael is "really an Israelite" (Jn. 1:47) in the sense of being a man really worthy of the name. Usually, however, the adverb is used in the sense of "truly" or even "indeed", and requires no additional comment.

5. Discussions about truth in modern philosophy are extremely complex, but certain basic points may be made with reference to current philosophical and theological discussion.

(a) Account must be taken of the varied ways in which the words "true" and "truth" are actually used in everyday speech, including that of the religious man. When we speak of a "true" report in the press, we usually mean that it corresponds to the facts of the matter, as may be confirmed by eye-witnesses of the event. When a historical statement is described as "true", this generally also means "corresponding to the facts", but in this case contemporary eye-witnesses (as opposed to reports of other past eye-witnesses) can no longer corroborate the event. Indeed in this case the usual way of testing the truth may be with reference to the internal coherence of a variety of historical traditions and reconstructions. However, when someone says that the statement "confession is good for the soul" is true, he usually means that he endorses this value-judgment, or that this maxim rings true in his own experience. The truth of a poem is something different from the truth of a report. In one sense, to speak of factual truth, historical truth, existential or personal truth, poetic truth, and moral truth, is to speak of different things. Yet in another sense, there is a closer relation between these different uses of the word "truth" than mere family resemblances. Many Christians would wish to claim that whilst the Bible contains more than one kind of truth, nevertheless there is a comprehensiveness about the truth of God which embraces all this particular variety. Our discussion, then, must do justice to two sets of considerations. On the one hand, truth is multiform, and criteria for different kinds of truth may vary. On the other hand, the truth of God lays claim to a universality which somehow undergirds and holds together particular expressions and experiences of truth in thought and life.

(b) From Plato and Aristotle to M. Heidegger, J. L. Austin and Peter Strawson, philosophers have debated the validity of the correspondence theory of truth. Thomas Aquinas defined truth in terms of the correspondence (or more strictly, adequacy) between the mind and the thing itself (veritas est adequatio rei et intellectus) (Summa Theologiae 1 Q. 16, 1). This points back to Aristotle's definition that "To say of what is that it is not . . . is false, while to say of what is that it is . . . is true". Plato made a parallel point in the Sophist: the statement "Theaetetus is sitting down" is true because Theaetetus is in fact sitting down; whilst the statement "Theaetetus is flying" is clearly false (Soph. 263 a, b).

(i) The correspondence theory of truth has received special discussion in modern times from Moore and Russell, and is also bound up with the earlier Wittgenstein's picture theory of meaning. In his earlier work Wittgenstein argued that there are two different ways in which a proposition may be true or false. A statement such as "Either it is raining or it is not raining" is a logical or necessary truth. It is "irrefutable by any possible experience". But the statement "it is raining" depends for its truth on whether it corresponds with the state of affairs which it describes. In the Tractatus, Wittgenstein argued that any contingent proposition, however complex (i.e. one that does not merely express logical necessity), depends for its truth on the correspondence between its smallest fact-stating units (elementary propositions) and states of affairs. In technical terms: "A proposition is an expression of agreement and disagreement with truth-possibilities of elementary propositions" (Tractatus, 4.4). In the case of an elementary proposition, the constituent elements of the proposition correspond with the configuration of simple objects in the state of affairs (der Sachverhalt) which they portray.

(ii) The unprecedented clarity and rigour with which Wittgenstein stated this theory, however, by its very thoroughness also exposed some of its weaknesses. These were so clearly apparent that Wittgenstein himself came to adopt a radically different approach in his own later writing, although his later work concerns language and meaning rather than (at least, explicitly) a theory of truth. Firstly, can the relationship between truth and all language be explained in this way? In his earlier writings Wittgenstein had answered this question by asserting, even more sharply than Kant, a dualism between the truths of factual statements about the physical world and truths of religion and ethics which could not be expressed in language at all. Moral, religious, or poetic truth might be "shown" but it could not be "said". In his later writings, however, Wittgenstein saw that in practice human language functions in many varied ways, and that his earlier approach was arbitrary and doctrinaire. Language does not only either portray facts within the world or express logical truths. But as soon as we extend our view of language, we have surrendered the picture theory of meaning with which the correspondence theory of truth is bound up. Secondly, Wittgenstein also came to doubt whether all language and meaning operates solely, or even primarily, on the basis of reference. To say that the meaning of a word is the object to which it refers is a view which already requires a prepared framework of linguistic habit or training. Some simple meanings, like "bread" or "table" might seem to be arrived at on this basis; but more complex examples like "the square root of minus one" or even the warning "Look out!" cannot be explained in this way. Thirdly, how do we escape the difficulty that when we try to test the truth of our judgment about a fact with the fact itself, all that we can really do is to compare our first judgment with some second judgment, not with "the fact itself" independently of any human judgment? To borrow a simile used by Wittgenstein in another context, it is like buying a second copy of the morning paper in order to test whether what the first copy said was true.

(iii) It may be replied that in practice we always test our first judgment in the light of better or improved evidence, even if this can never be "the fact itself" independently of all human judgment. This then brings us to a weakened version of the correspondence theory of truth, which we find in J. L. Austin. Austin argues that there cannot indeed be an exact one-to-one correspondence between facts and language, but that speech-acts, or units of language, can be more broadly related to the world in a way which takes full account of the part played by convention. "The statements fit the facts always more or less loosely, in different ways on different occasions for different intents and purposes" ("Truth", in G. Pitcher, ed., Truth, 1964, 28). But this gives rise to a view of truth which in practice tends towards relativism. Elsewhere he writes that truth stands "only for a general dimension of being a right and proper thing . . . in these circumstances, to this audience, for these purposes" (How to Do Things with Words, 1962, 44). In the context of British linguistic philosophy, P. F. Strawson has attacked Austin's approach, claiming that "what supremely confuses the issue is the failure to distinguish between the task of elucidating the nature of a certain type of communication (the empirically informative) from the problem of the actual functioning of the word 'true' within the framework of that type of communication" ("Truth", in G. Pitcher, ed., op. cit., 53; see below, (d) (iv)). Current controversy in British philosophy is still influenced by the terms of the Austin-Strawson debate. In German philosophy the adequacy of the correspondence theory of truth has been emphatically challenged by Martin Heidegger (see below, (e) (ii)), and there are other factors which tend further to undermine it in a variety of philosophical traditions (see below, (f)).

(c) A number of philosophers have advocated alternative theories to that of a correspondence view of truth. Next in importance and influence to the correspondence theory is the coherence theory of truth. Leibniz, Spinoza, Hegel, and Bradley, all held versions of this theory. A statement is described as true or false in accordance with the extent to which it coheres, or fails to cohere, with a system of other statements. Just as empirical facts tend to be cited as the primary models for discussion in the context of the correspondence theory, so truths of mathematics perhaps most clearly demonstrate the principle of coherence. A mathematical proposition is true if it coheres with other propositions (ultimately with axioms) of its system. Traditionally many systematic theologians test theological truth in this way. If a proposition contradicts one or more of the accepted axioms of theology, it is said to be false. This criterion is also of special value to theology in that it takes account of the expansion and all-inclusiveness of truth. F. H. Bradley stressed that only the whole system is wholly true. In this sense, as J. Macquarrie remarks, "Theological statements are true in the sense that they are on the way to truth; that is to say, they do not freeze the question but open up the possibility of new insights" ("Truth in Theology", Thinking about God, 1975, 25).

It may seem that the relevance of this theory of truth to theology is ruled out by the fact that many theological statements, especially the language of the Bible, impinge on history. But we have already seen that statements about past history relate more closely to the coherence theory than to the correspondence theory (see above, (a)). The chief difficulty with the coherence theory is that it is possible to have two or more different systems, within each of which many propositions cohere. Only if the whole of truth, embracing all human history and the whole of reality, can be expressed as a single comprehensive system, can the coherence theory retain its fullest value as a criterion of truth. But whether a given system is fully comprehensive is very often precisely the point which is at issue. In such a case the theory would operate only if we assumed the truth of the very thing that is in question. This is not to deny that Christians often affirm this about Christian truth as a statement of faith (see below, (g)). But this is different from holding that the coherence theory offers a complete and final answer to all questions about truth.

(d) Other philosophical theories of truth have been put forward. (i) The pragmatic theory of truth is associated with the names of C. S. Pierce, William James, and John Dewey. It is argued that thought does not merely duplicate reality, or represent experience. A thought or an idea is true not when it provides a good copy of experience; but when it is good, fruitful, workable, or practical, in relation to a particular problem before us. In one sense this accords with the biblical perspective that truth is not merely abstract or theoretical. "By their fruits you shall know them" (Matt. 7:16). However, in another sense this theory is at variance both with Christian thought and with philosophical reflection. A false belief may help someone to come to terms with life, or may help him to see the way forward in a particular situation; but this does not make it true. False prophets in the OT spoke words of encouragement which led to certain courses of action. But we should not for this reason claim that their utterances were in practice true. The truth of a theology or religion is not determined by calculating its effects, nor the numbers of its adherents at given points in history. Rudolf Carnap and G. E. Moore pointed out that in these terms truth would be a mutable concept, perpetually open to revision as circumstances changed.

(ii) The so-called redundancy theory of truth was formulated by F. P. Ramsey, and taken up by A. J. Ayer. Ramsey argued that there is no difference between the truth-value of the assertion "It is raining" and of the assertion "It is true that it is raining". In Ayer's words, "To say that a proposition is true is just to assert it" (Language, Truth, and Logic, 1946², and 1971, 118). Ayer then argues, "We conclude, then, that there is no problem of truth as it is ordinarily conceived" (op. cit., 119). The abstract noun "truth", he insists, can always be translated in terms of the adjective "true". We are simply misled by accidents of grammar into false assumptions about the "problem" of truth. Probably few philosophers would entirely endorse this view, without wishing to take the issue further. However, some thinkers do accept one of two possible variants, which take Ramsey's approach as a point of departure.

(iii) Alfred Tarski outlined what is often called the semantic theory of truth. As against Ramsey, Tarski insists that "true" functions as a genuine adjective, in the sentence "It is true that it is raining". But it does not simply make an assertion, let alone a repeated assertion, within the same language-system as "it is raining". In effect, it states that the sentence "it is raining" is a true sentence in English. It is a statement about a sentence. The standard objection to this theory is that we predicate truth not of sentences in a particular language, but of statements or propositions.

(iv) P. F. Strawson has advocated a performative theory of truth. Contrasting Austin's approach, he holds that, in terms of bare assertion, "it is true that. . ." adds nothing to the statement "it is raining". But it is not (as Tarski would hold) an assertion about the status of a sentence in a given language. To add the phrase "it is true that. . ." is to perform the act of accepting and endorsing the statement which the phrase qualifies. As against Austin, Strawson writes, "Why should the problem of Truth (the problem about over-use of 'true') be seen as this problem of elucidating the fact-stating type of discourse? . . . The occurrence in ordinary discourse of the words 'true', 'fact', etc. signalizes, without commenting on, the occurrence of a certain way of using language" ("Truth", in G. Pitcher, ed., op. cit., 42). There is a certain irony in Strawson's attacking J. L. Austin (the philosopher who did most to elucidate the nature of performative language) by means of the latter's own weapons. It is Austin himself who argues that "I know" can be used performatively rather than descriptively. Strawson's approach, however, has been attacked in turn by other philosophers, including G. J. Warnock. To say "That is true", Warnock argues, may indeed be to endorse a statement; but it is also more than this. It is also to make a statement about a statement. Otherwise it is hard to see any difference between "it is true that" and "I believe that".

(e) Questions about truth have been approached quite differently by philosophers of the existentialist or phenomenological tradition. In the view of Kierkegaard and Heidegger, truth is not primarily a property which resides in propositions at all. It relates first and foremost to the human subject, who alone can appropriate and live out truth. (i) Kierkegaard writes: "Truth becomes untruth in this or that person's mouth" (Concluding Unscientific Postscript, 1941, 181). "It would help very little if one persuaded millions of men to accept the truth, if precisely by the method of their acceptance they were transformed into error" (op. cit., 221). Truth, for Kierkegaard, was not something that can be received neatly served out on a plate. Truth, in any important sense, needs to be sought for and passionately engaged with. In this sense "truth is subjectivity" (op. cit., 169; cf. 169–224). For "everyone who has a result merely as such does not possess it; for he has not the way" (The Concept of Irony, 1966, 340). Christ, therefore, is himself both the truth and the way (Jn. 16:6 f.; see above, 4). The truth of Christ is seen not so much in some objective body of knowledge, as in the way in which the gospel transforms someone's life when its truth is actively appropriated. This is the perspective that lies behind Bultmann's belief that the truth of the gospel comes to light not as theory but in personal decision.

(ii) Martin Heidegger firmly rejects the correspondence theory of truth (see above (b)). He writes: "Representations [Vorstellungen] do not get compared . . . in relation to the real thing. . . 'Confirmation' signifies the entity's showing itself in its selfsameness" (Being and Time, 1962, 261). "Truth does not possess its original seat in the proposition" (Vom Wesen der Wahrheit, 1961⁴, 12). Truth, for Heidegger, is a matter of the "standing open" of the attitude of the "I" or Dasein (Offenständigkeit des Verhaltens). Truth, in effect, is almost synonymous with revelation. It is the "letting-be of things that-are [das Seinlassen von Seiendem]" (Vom Wesen der Wahrheit, 16). Especially in his later writings Heidegger stresses that truth, as unveiling, comes only to the one who waits for it in quiet composure (Gelassenheit der Milde).

(iii) Hans-Georg Gadamer attacks a view of truth which is bound up too narrowly with theoretical reason alone. Such a view, he insists, belongs essentially to the outlook of the Enlightenment and its rationalism. Even Aristotle recognized that the sophia (wisdom) of the scholar depended on the practical phronēsis (wisdom) of the wise man. The Romans stressed the practical significance of the sensus communis. As against the narrow rationalism of Descartes, Vico went back to his broader and more practical perspective. Thomas Reid called attention to the rôle of common sense in assessing truth; whilst Shaftesbury stressed the rôle of wit, and Bergson, that of creative intuition. Truth, Gadamer urges, is not merely a property of concepts, but relates more deeply and broadly to all human experience. For example, "The experience of art acknowledges that it cannot present the perfect truth of what it experiences in terms of final knowledge" (Truth and Method, 1975, 89). Experience of reality and the truth conveyed in it transcend the conscious states of mind of a given historical moment; just as in a game, the reality of all that makes up the game transcends the conscious thoughts of the player. We discover truth, Gadamer urges, when we are grasped deep down by the "world" of the work of art, or the "world" of the game.

(iv) Largely on the basis of the view of truth and language found in Heidegger and Gadamer, E. Fuchs and G. Ebeling have approached the writings of the NT in a way which sees the truth of the gospel as that which is communicated at a pre-conceptual, pre-cognitive level (→ Explain, art. hermeneuō, NT 5(b)). In the parables, for example, the truth of Jesus' message grasps the hearer not by passing on information in discursive form, but by drawing him into a world of new values which engages with his pre-cognitive attitudes and presuppositions. In America this approach has been explored by R. W. Funk, W. Wink, and J. D. Crossan, although less explicitly with reference to Heidegger.

(f) A number of different factors have combined to produce a measure of scepticism about truth in our own day. Our own age often feels obliged to rest content with a kind of relativism which reveals extreme pessimism about questions of truth. From among a whole variety of causes, three may be selected for special comment.

(i) Philosophers like René Descartes felt able to rest the trustworthiness of human reason and sense perception on the character of God (Meditations, IV, V). We can come to know truth, he believed, because God exists and will not deceive us. Each in his different way, Berkeley and Leibniz also believed that truth depends on God. The correspondence and coherence theories of truth (see (b) and (c)) were more convincing in the context of this theological belief. In modern conservative Protestant theology and apologetics, it is the particular achievement of H. Dooyeweerd, Cornelius Van Til, and Francis Schaeffer to urge that theories of truth which may hold water within the framework of a biblical theism take on a radically different shape when they are transferred from their original moorings into a secular climate of thought. When theories of truth are placed in an entirely secular context there is an inevitable tendency towards greater scepticism and relativism.

(ii) This tendency is also aggravated by a pessimism about the unity of truth which stems partly from Kant, and which then receives further impetus from Kierkegaard and Nietzsche. In German thought this is bound up with the problem of "objectifying" thinking. Kant stressed the activity of the human mind in shaping and conceptualizing the phenomena placed before it. The truth of God was therefore to be found outside this realm, in the area of moral or practical reason. A division between rational and moral truth emerged, which in Kierkegaard and Schopenhauer (and later in Bultmann) became a dualism between thought and will. In particular the Neo-Kantianism of the late nineteenth century stressed the subjectivity of human consciousness. Hermann Cohen, for example, argued that "sensation can be nothing else but a question mark"; whilst Helmholtz believed that space itself depends on man's bodily modes of apprehension. Knowledge, Heinrich Hertz maintained, depends not on the direct apprehension of truth, but on the use of models (Bilder) and representations (Darstellungen). To think, therefore, is to construct and to shape "objects" in accordance with laws of thought. P. Natorp insists, "All objectifying [objektivieren] is the creative work of consciousness". It is because he so readily accepts this background of Marburg Neo-Kantianism that Rudolf Bultmann removes the truth of God from the realm of objectifying thinking. For on the basis of this theory of knowledge, to make God an object of thought is somehow to put knowledge of him at man's disposal; to make it human "work". The price to be paid for this approach, however, is a fragmentation of truth, in which the Christian believer can hardly move from beyond a confession of faith to making objective truth-claims. Even historical knowledge, including knowledge about Jesus, is placed in the realm of objectifying thought. Hence, according to Bultmann, strictly history as such cannot communicate religious truth.

Whilst many British and American theologians would hesitate to adopt the same philosophical and theological perspective, nevertheless the mood of uncertainty to which late nineteenth-century Neo-Kantianism gives rise in theology has spread far beyond Germany. A parallel problem has also arisen in the area of psychology, where it is often argued that the power of the human mind is such that men can persuade themselves to believe almost anything. Even in physics, the world of Newton has given way to the less objectivist world of Einstein. The approaches of J. C. Maxwell, Heinrich Hertz, Max Born, and W. Heisenberg, suggest that “the world is not a fixed, solid array of objects, out there. . . . It cannot be fully separated from our perception of it. . . . The knowledge that it yields has to be interpreted by us. There is no way of exchanging information that does not demand an act of judgment”. “There is no absolute knowledge” (J. Bronowski, The Ascent of Man, 1976, 353 and 364). At a popular level such an admission invites either of two different responses. Either it can lead to increased scepticism about the possibility of arriving at truth in any area; or else it can lead to the recognition that truth in the realm of religion is in the end hardly more nebulous or “subjective” than truth in the physical sciences. In this connexion T. F. Torrance writes, “We cannot pretend for a moment that objectivity can be abstracted from the subject-object relationship all knowledge involves” (Theological Science, 1969, 36). “The kind of demonstration (i.e. of truth) which a scientific theology requires is one in strict accord with the nature of its Object” (i.e. God; op. cit., 139).

(iii) Karl Rahner points out that one consequence of the attitude of relativism and scepticism in our own age is quite simply a lack of reverence for truth as such (Theological Investigations, VII, 1971, 230–33). Mass advertising and party-political propaganda, through mass media, exemplify this lack of reverence for truth. A sense of need is artificially stimulated, and false claims are implied by the arbitrary use of inappropriate visual images. The mass media, though perhaps in themselves often neutral, nevertheless increase the opportunities which are at the disposal of politicians and commercial advertisers, whereby this other-than-serious attitude to truth becomes the commonly accepted ethos of the age. Attitudes towards truth reflected in the OT and NT (→ above) stand in sharp contrast to, and indeed invite judgment on, any passive acceptance of such an ethos.

(g) Wolfhart Pannenberg has pointed the way forward to recovering a sense of the unity and comprehensiveness of truth in theology (“What is Truth?”, Basic Questions in Theology, II, 1971, 1–27). Admittedly he begins by making over-generalizing remarks about the contrast between Gk. and Heb. concepts of truth, against which we have expressed strong warnings (→ CL, OT). Nevertheless he is correct in his claim that the biblical writers do not see the truth of God simply in terms of logical necessity which has no grounding in the contingent events of history. Theological truth, especially in the OT, is not like the truth that the sum of the angles of a triangle amount to 180°. For this remains true independently of whether such a geometrical figure is actually drawn and given existence. The truth of God “is not the result of a logical necessity. . . . The truth of God must prove itself anew in the future” (op. cit., 8). At the same time, this truth “embraces all other truth”. This does not mean, as in Platonism, that it is above time and change. Indeed precisely the opposite is the case. “Truth is not to be found already existing somewhere as a finished product, but is instead thought of as history, as process” (op. cit., 21). Pannenberg does not deny that this understanding of truth has affinities with Hegel’s philosophy. Indeed he praises the value of Hegel's thought for theology. However he looks still more decisively to biblical eschatology as the basis for his view of truth, allowing that the horizon of the future is effectively lost in Hegel's thought.

If we once allow, with Hegel and Bradley, that the whole truth can be found only in the whole, from a biblical perspective this means that the whole truth emerges fully only at the end of history, when history reaches the goal. Pannenberg argues, however, that the significance of Jesus Christ, especially in the context of apocalyptic expectations, is that he constitutes the proleptic revelation of the End. In Jesus we see proleptically what God decrees and destines for the church and for the world. Hence Jesus Christ is the truth, in a way which allows for the unity and comprehensiveness of this truth. All reality is seen in this light, because Jesus Christ is the revelation of God, who is the God of all history. Pannenberg concludes, "the unity of truth is constituted only by the proleptic revelation of God in Jesus Christ" (op. cit., 27). In spite of his language about "Gk." and "Heb." concepts of truth, Pannenberg's achievement is to hold together a confident acceptance of the unity of the truth of God against the inroads of relativism and scepticism, whilst also acknowledging the particular (though limited) value of Kierkegaard's emphasis on personal truth. It should be noted that whatever his similarities to Hegel, Pannenberg's approach is a theological one, which rests on the decisive role of revelation. Nevertheless this is emphatically not to follow Bultmann in making almost everything depend on faith and decision. The truth of God is revealed publicly for all to see, in history and in Jesus Christ.

(h) In practical terms, reverence for the truth demands openness towards it, and submission to its leading. From the Protestant side, T. F. Torrance speaks of the readiness to submit all pre-conceptions to the test of truth, which characterized the Reformation. From the Roman Catholic side, K. Rahner speaks of the way in which self-defensiveness and self-assertion give rise to falsehood. Why else should someone wish to lie, except to gain undue advantage for himself, with a view to preserving his own reputation or urging his own views? Only the man who feels insecure, whose sins have not been forgiven, and who therefore fears to take the blame, needs to lie. The liberated man will have the courage to bear witness to the truth. He will follow truth, wherever it leads, having no vested interests in arriving at some pre-determined destination. In theology, this attitude need not and should not be the prerogative of classical liberalism alone, as is sometimes claimed. It is larger than any one theological tradition. As T. F. Torrance rightly argues, the method of following wherever the truth may lead is the only appropriate and genuinely "scientific" method when what is at issue is the truth of God himself. Reverence for truth is not simply the pseudo-cynicism of our own age which tries to "unmask" everything, in the belief that no one and nothing can genuinely lay claim to truth. It is the attitude which combines joyful confidence that truth can indeed be found, with a humble submission to truth whenever and wherever it emerges. Such openness to truth is required of those who worship the God of truth; whilst a due reverence for truth ensures honesty in a man's dealings with his neighbour, both in word and deed. This is the attitude, we have seen, to which both the OT and the NT bear witness.

A. C. Thiselton

(a). S. Aalen, "Truth, a Key Word in St. John's Gospel", Studia Evangelica, II, 1964, 3-24; J. L.

Austin, "Truth", in Philosophical Papers, 1961, 85–101 (also in G. Pitcher, below)*; A. J. Ayer, Language, Truth and Logic, 1946 and 1971, 116–35*; J. Barr, The Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961, 187–205; R. E. Brown, alētheia, The Gospel according to John, I, Anchor Bible, 499–501; E. Brunner, Truth as Encounter, 1964; R. Bultmann and G. Quell, alētheia in TDNT I, 1964, 232–51; C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, 1953, 170–79; J. J. L. Feisser, "Kant without End? The Critique of Kant in the Work of Dooyeweerd", in Philosophy and Christianity: Essays for H. Dooyeweerd, 1965, 212–19*; H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method, 1975*; A. T. Hanson, Grace and Truth. A Study in the Doctrine of the Incarnation, 1975; M. Heidegger, Being and Time, 1962, 256–73*; E. Hoskyns and N. Davey, The Riddle of the New Testament, 1947³, 26–31; W. A. Irwin, "Truth in Ancient Israel", JR 9, 1929, 357–88; I. Jepsen, 'āman, TDOT I, 1974, 292–323; L. J. Kuyper, "Grace and Truth", Reformed Review 16, 1962, 1–16, and "Grace and Truth. An OT Description of God and its Use in the Johannine Gospel", Interpretation 18, 1964, 3–19; J. Macquarrie, "Truth in Theology" and "Mystery and Truth", in Thinking about God, 1975, 15–43; L. Morris, The Gospel according to John, 1971, 293–6; J. Murphy-O'Connor "Truth: Paul and Qumran", in Paul and Qumran, 1968, 179–230; W. Pannenberg, "What is Truth?", in Basic Questions in Theology, II, 1971, 1–27; G. Pitcher, ed., Truth, 1964 (essays by Austin, Strawson and Warnock)*; K. Rahner, "On Truthfulness", Theological Investigations VII, 1971, 229–59; E. T. Ramsdell, "The O.T. Understanding of Truth", Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society, 31, 1951, 264–73; B. Russell, An Inquiry into Meaning and Truth, 1940, 226–326*; V. H. Stanton, "Truth", in HDB IV, 816–20; R. H. Strachan, The Fourth Gospel, 1941, 141–5; D. J. Theron, "Alētheia in the Pauline Corpus", EQ 26, 1954, 3–18; A. C. Thiselton, "Kierkegaard and the Nature of Truth", The Churchman 89, 1975, 85–107; T. F. Torrance, Theological Science, 1969, 141–202; and God and Rationality, 1971; J. Wheatley, "Austin on Truth", in K. T. Fann, ed., Symposium on J. L. Austin, 1969, 226–42*; A. R. White, Truth, 1970*; L. Wittgenstein, Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus, (1922) 1961*; and On Certainty, 1969*.

(b). J. Blank, "Der johanneische Wahrheits-Begriff", BZ 7, 1963, 164–73; R. Bultmann, "Untersuchungen zum Johannesevangelium: A Alētheia. I Der Begriff der Wahrheit im Alten Testament und unter alttestamentlichem Einfluss", ZNW 27, 1928, 113–34, "II Alētheia in der griechischen und hellenistischen Literatur", ibid., 134–63; E. Fuchs, "Wahrheit", *RGG*³ VI, 1962, 1515 ff.; M. Heidegger, Vom Wesen der Wahrheit, 1954 (also in Wegmarken, 1967)*; K. Jaspers, Von der Wahrheit, 1947*; W. Kamlah, Wissenschaft, Wahrheit, Existenz, 1960*; D. Michel, "Āmāt. Untersuchung über Wahrheit in Heb.", Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte 12, 1968, 30–57; I. de la Potterie, "L'Arrière-Fond du thème Johannique de Vérité", Studia Evangelica I, 1959, 277–94; and "Je suis la Voie, la Vérité et la Vie (Jn. 14:6)", Nouvelle Revue Théologique 88, 1966, 907–42; H. von Soden, Was ist Wahrheit?, 1927.

* philosophical works

Turn Away

ἀποτρέπω

ἀποτρέπω (apotrepō), mid. turn away from, avoid; ἐκτρέπω (ektrepō), pass. turn away (from), avoid.

CL Both verbs are more commonly used in secular Gk. than in biblical Gk. Whereas apotrepō is commonly used metaphorically (in the active voice) of dissuading, deterring or diverting a person from a particular course of action and (in the middle and passive voices) of avoiding danger or rejecting truth, ektrepō often denotes a literal turning aside, as of a tributary from a river or a person from a road.

OT apotrepō is not used in the LXX version of the Heb. canonical scriptures.

Elsewhere in the LXX it is used in reference to such matters as the averting of reproofs (Sir. 20:29) and the relinquishing of pleasures (4 Macc. 1:33) or the diverting of people from their designs (3 Macc. 1:23). The single LXX use of ektrepō is in Amos 5:8 (God turns darkness into morning).

NT (a) In Heb. 12:13 the author encourages the disheartened to make straight paths for their feet “in order that what is lame may not be dislocated (ektrapē) but rather be healed” (cf. Arndt, 245). Minor injuries (“those who are lame”) were to be bound up (“healed”), so that major injuries (such as dislocation) would be avoided. The reference to healing shows that ektrepō bears its technical medical sense of “dislocate” (as in Hippocrates) rather than its general sense of “turn away”.

(b) In 2 Tim. 3:5b Paul enjoins Timothy (and indirectly the church at Ephesus) to “keep clear of” (apotrepou) any persons who are characterized by the vices he lists in vv. 2–4, for they “preserve the outward form of religion, but are a standing denial of its reality” (NEB, v. 5a). Such people were to be denied church membership as much as the controversialists mentioned in 2 Tim. 2:23–26. apotrepomai in 2 Tim. 3:5 is virtually synonymous with ektrepomai in 1 Tim. 6:20, both being followed by an accusative. In the latter passage, Timothy is told to shun (ektrepomenos) “irreligious and frivolous talk” (Weymouth) and the subtle and endless distinctions that belong to what is falsely called “knowledge”. Timothy was to turn a deaf ear to this pseudo-science and to these unholy discussions that relied on futile jargon, because those who had given their attention to such matters had “shot far wide of the faith” (NEB, v. 21).

In the remaining three uses of ektrepomai in the Pastoral Epistles, the idea of doctrinal or ethical deviation is uppermost. As a result of neglecting the Christian triad of love that springs from a pure heart, a good conscience and sincere faith, the false teachers had “gone astray [extrapēsan] into a wilderness of words” (NEB, 1 Tim. 1:6). Paul warns Timothy that the time would come when people would follow their own fancies and find themselves a crowd of teachers to satisfy their craving for novelty. They would shut their ears to the truth and turn aside (ektrapēsontai) or wander into a counterfeit world of mythology (2 Tim. 4:4). Already some widows had become idle scandal-mongers (1 Tim. 5:13) and gone astray (extrapēsan) to become Satan’s servants (1 Tim. 5:15), probably an allusion to their immorality.

M. J. Harris

M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972; C. Spicq, Saint Paul. Les Épîtres Pastorales, I–II 1969⁴.

Type, Pattern

τύπος	τύπος (typos), form, likeness, model, type; τυπικῶς (typikōs), as an example, typologically; ἀντίτυπος (antitypos), corresponding to; ἀντίτυπον (antitypon), copy, image, antitype; ὑποτύπωσις (hypotyposis), pattern, model, example, prototype, standard.
-------	--

CL The etymological derivation of typos is disputed. It may be derived from τυπτό, strike, beat, which is found in the NT, particularly in Lk. and Acts (Matt. 24:49; 27:30; Mk. 15:19; Lk. 6:29; 12:45; 18:13; 23:48; Acts 18:17; 21:32; 23:2 f.; 1 Cor. 8:12). Whereas this meaning can frequently be demonstrated for antitypos, in the active as well as in the passive use of the adj. (i.e. in the sense of repelling and repulsed), it would hold for typos in at most one ref. (Hdt., 1, 67, 4). Otherwise this word, with its denominatives typōō, typōsis, typōma, etc., is found in the original meaning of form, and in particular, a (hollow) mould.

1. In this sense, typos refers first of all to a concrete object such as the shape of a loaf, a relief, a coin, etc., and then (still concrete) the impression of a form, i.e. what an object leaves behind when pressed against another, such as a trace, a scar, the impress of a seal, a letter of the alphabet, etc., and still more generally, a likeness (→ Image, art. eikōn).

2. The word is found to a great extent in the abstracted sense of general form or type, such as the form of a style or a doctrine. There then follows the wider abstraction of the word in both directions; signifying the mould, the form which stamps and the impress, the form which is stamped. typos thus denotes: (a) an original, a pattern, and in two senses: the technical sense of prototype, model, and the ethical sense of example (so also hypotypōsis); and (b) copy (so also antitypon). (For further details of secular usage see L. Goppelt, typos etc., TDNT VIII 246 ff.)

OT 1. In the LXX typos occurs in only 4 places. It renders the Heb. words, tabnūt (Exod. 25:40), original, model, and šelem (Amos 5:26), image, idol. Both Heb. words are elsewhere translated by other words, tabnūt above all by paradeigma, example, pattern, and homoiōma, likeness, copy (→ Like art. homoios), šelem usually by eikōn, picture. In 3 Macc. 3:30 typos denotes the form, the style of writing, and in 4 Macc. 6:11 the (religio-ethical) example.

2. The word is a favourite term of Philo who uses it entirely in accord with general Gk. usage. Platonic influence primarily determines the following twofold usage: typos can specifically denote both the original, the picture-model, pattern as well as the imitation or copy. It is not a special concept for model or copy (for which Philo has a sufficient number of other terms), but is rather capable of denoting both at the same time. It is the general form which characterizes both originals (patterns) and copies or likenesses. Philo claims that God conceived of the archetypos, archetype, of the tabernacle which he gave as a typos or paradeigma, model, to the spirit of Moses (cf. Leg. All. 3, 102; Vit. Mos. 2, 74 ff., 141; Som. 1, 206; Op. Mund. 16, 19, 29, 36, 129; Exod. 25:40; cf. TDNT VIII 258).

3. typos was also used amongst the rabbis as a loan-word (dḥūs and tūpōs and several variable vocalizations) with the meaning, as in Gk., of form, model, and then the more general meaning, which (as in Lat. since Cicero) is current in numerous languages today. It may be compared with the introduction of sēmeion, sign, as the loan-word sēmān, which can express a correspondence of historical situations, a "typological" relationship, and thus approximate more closely to a distinctive NT usage of typos.

NT In the NT typos is found 14 times, but without allowing any particular emphasis to be discerned in individual writings. The word is missing entirely from the Synoptics, the Catholic Epistles (except 1 Pet.) and Rev., and also several letters in the Pauline Corpus.

1. The concrete meaning, the impression of a form, is found in Jn. 20:25a for the mark of the nails in the hands of the risen Christ.

2. In Acts 23:25 typos has the abstract sense of the gist, the content of a letter, in Rom. 6:17 the content, the expression of the doctrine. In the latter reference, however, the original meaning of the form which stamps can still be strongly felt. As previously sin, so now the new teaching, i.e. the message of Christ, is the factor which stamps and determines the life of the Christian.

3. This basic meaning of the form which stamps is the one that is most commonly found.

(a) The double meaning of typos as the form of both pattern and copy is found in two references in Acts. Acts 7:43, with the LXX quotation from Amos 5:26, takes over the meaning of the images of idols. Acts 7:44 and Heb. 8:5 quote Exod. 25:40 and denote by typos the heavenly original, on the basis of which Moses had to erect the holy tent. Whereas the reference in Acts focuses on the divine commissioning of Moses' work and the divine institution of the earthly sanctuary, the OT quotation in Heb. is to be seen in the context of a more comprehensive concern with the interpretation of OT assertions about the saving work of Christ. A certain closeness to the Platonically influenced speculation concerning original and copy must not mislead us: even this passage has its place in the eschatological-temporal theology of history of Heb. The relationship of the original heavenly pattern (typos, Heb. 8:5, and eikōn, Heb. 10:1) to the earthly copy (antitypon, Heb. 9:24, or hypodeigma and skia, shadow, Heb. 8:5) is inserted into the scheme of the past and future blessings of salvation. Through Christ the heavenly patterns enter history and show the copies and shadows to be perishable (cf. ch. 10; see also O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer, KEK 13, 1966¹², 286).

(b) Alongside typos and hypotypōsis, in the sense of example, stand other words such as hypodeigma or hypogrammos (→ Image). These latter represent Christ's ministry of self-sacrifice (Jn. 13:15) and his suffering (1 Pet. 2:21) not simply as an ethical example, but as the saving work which the community may appropriate and so follow Christ (cf. 1 Pet. 2:21b). hypodeigma is also found only (apart from in Jas. 5:10 as the example of the suffering of the prophets) in the sense of a terrifying object-lesson (Heb. 4:11; 2 Pet. 2:6). typos, meaning example, is used solely with reference to Paul (Phil. 3:17; 2 Thess. 3:9), the officials of the congregation (1 Tim. 4:12; Tit. 2:7; 1 Pet. 5:3) or the congregation itself (1 Thess. 1:7). These passages are not simply admonitions to a morally exemplary life; they call for obedience to the message (2 Thess. 3:6). It stamps those who proclaim it, and gives them authority. The shaping power of a life lived under the Word has in turn an effect on the community (1 Thess. 1:6), causing it to become a formative example.

4. Besides this common Gk. linguistic usage, typos also appears in the NT for the first time to denote historical events. It becomes a hermeneutical concept in the interpretation of OT tradition, in particular, of specific historical experiences of Israel, with the present eschatological event of salvation.

(a) In 1 Cor. 1:6, 11, Paul uses typos to interpret the events in the Corinthian church in the light of Israel's experiences in the wilderness. The punishment of God's ancient people which followed their disgraceful practices is seen as a refiguration of judgment on those who abuse the Lord's Supper. It carries a specific warning to the "strong" at Corinth not to abuse the sacrament. The typological method developed by Paul thus consists in expounding the analogous relationship of concrete historical OT events, in the sense of the past prefiguring present or future eschatological happenings. This introduces a vital theological concern of Paul. God's activity in history is expounded, in order to show how God is bound to his promises. It is God himself who creates this "typical" relationship, in so far as his Word of revelation (the Scriptures) fulfils it (cf. Rom. 4:23 f.; 1 Cor. 10:11). In this prefiguration of eschatological saving events in OT history, witness is born to the participation of the community in the saving work of Christ. As against some supposed metaphysical misinterpretation, salvation history is interpreted as the self-fulfilling activity of God in concrete human history. (On the question of allegory or typology in Paul → Parable, art. parabolē, NT 9.)

(b) The argument in Rom. 4 and Gal. 3 is also typological in this sense, though without the actual occurrence of the word typos. The same typological argumentation is present in 1 Pet. 3:21. Noah's deliverance through the waters of the flood is seen as a prefiguration and type of the saving event of → baptism, which thus becomes the antitypon, the antitype (in the sense of being an image).

(c) In Rom. 5:14, the typos-concept produces a tension which basically breaks through the typological method. The figures of → Adam and Christ are compared and contrasted in their significance and effectiveness for "all". Adam is designated a "typos of the one who was to come". This has given rise to an Adam-Christ typology. But since, on the one hand, Adam cannot really count as a faithful prefiguration of Christ, and on the other there is no other known occurrence of typos meaning a contrasting picture, Paul is here quite possibly employing the concept with the precise polemical intention of rejecting a traditional Adam-messiah typology. It is a matter of the radical abrogation of the old by the new; the new only becomes actual, when the old is overcome. Paul thus shows that this paradoxical relationship of the radical opposition and profound association of old and new is the reality in which the community is already living in the present.

Typology in Paul has obviously not yet hardened into a methodology simply requiring appropriate technical application to any situation. Its degeneration in subsequent years has cast suspicion on its credibility. On the other hand, attempts are being made in present-day (especially OT) scholarship to make the original relevance of typology fruitful again for the interpretation of the OT and so also for practical preaching.

H. Müller

→ Explain (especially for discussion and literature on hermeneutics), → Image, → Parable, → Truth, → Word

(a). P. Achtemeier, An Introduction to the New Hermeneutic, 1969; F. W. Beare, "On the Interpretation of Romans vi. 17", NTS 5, 1958–59, 206–10; W. P. de Boer, The Imitation of Paul: An Exegetical Study, 1962, 17–24, 96–216; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964; and This is That: The New Testament Development of Some Old Testament Themes, 1968; F. Büchsel, allegoreō, TDNT I 260–63; J. Daniélou, From Shadows to Reality: Studies in the Biblical Typology of the Fathers, 1960; C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures, 1952; E. E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the Old Testament, 1957; L. Goppelt, typos etc., TDNT VIII 246–59; P. Fairbairn, The Typology of Scripture, 1854³; A. T. Hanson, Jesus Christ in the Old Testament, 1965; and Studies in Paul's Technique and Theology, 1974; R. P. C. Hanson, Allegory and Event: A Study of the Sources and Significance of Origen's Interpretation of Scripture, 1959; G. W. H. Lampe and K. Woolcombe, Essays in Typology, SBT 22, 1957; E. K. Lees, "Words Denoting 'Pattern' in the New Testament", NTS 8, 1961–62, 166–73; R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 1975; I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation, 1977; N. H. Ridderbos, "Typology", Vox Theologica 31, 1961, 149 ff.; H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religion and History, 1961; R. V. G. Tasker, The Old Testament in the New Testament, 1954²; H. E. W. Turner, The Pattern of Christian Truth, 1954; C. Westermann, Essays on Old Testament Hermeneutics, 1963; and The Old Testament and Jesus Christ, 1970.

(b) S. Amsler, "La Typologie de l'Ancien Testament chez S. Paul", Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 37, 1949, 113–28; and L'Ancien Testament dans l'Église. Essai d'Herméneutique Chrétienne, 1960; A. von Blumenthal, "typos und paradeigma", Hermes 63, 1928, 391–414; R. Bultmann, "Ursprung und Sinn der Typologie als hermeneutische Methode", TLZ 75, 1950, 205–21 (reprinted in Exegetica, 1967, 369 ff.); U. Früchtel, Die kosmologischen Vorstellungen bei Philo von Alexandrien, (Dissertation, Hamburg) 1962; E. Fuchs, Hermeneutik, 1970⁴; Marburger Hermeneutik, Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie 9, 1968; Zum hermeneutischen Problem in der Theologie, 1959; K. Galley, Altes und neues Heilsgeschehen bei Paulus, 1965; L. Goppelt, "Apokalyptik und Typologie bei Paulus", TLZ 89, 1964, 321–44; and Typos. Die typologische Bedeutung des Alten Testaments im Neuen, Beiträge zur Förderung der Theologie, II, 43, 1966; J. Kürzinger, "Typos Didachês und der Sinn von Röm. 6:17 f.", Biblica 39, 1958, 156–76; W. G. Kümmel, "Schriftauslegung", *RGG*³ V 1517–20; C. Larcher, L'Actualité Chrétienne de l'Ancien Testament d'après le Nouveau Testament, 1962, 489–513; E. Larsson, Christus als Vorbild, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 23, 1962; O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer, KEK 13, 1966¹²; K. Müller, Die Auslegung alttestamentlichen Geschichtsstoffes bei Paulus, (Dissertation, Halle) 1960; A. Schulz, Nachfolgen und Nachahmen. Studien über das Verhältnis der neutestamentlichen Jüngerschaft zur urchristlichen Vorbildethik, Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament 6, 1962, 308–31; C. Spicq, L'Épître aux Hébreux, I–II, 1953²; E. Starfelt, Stud. i rabbinisk och nytestamentlig skriftolkning, Studia Theologica Lundensia 17, 1959, 241–53, 284 f.; A. Takamori, Typologische Auslegung des Alten Testaments? Eine wortgeschichtliche Untersuchung, (Dissertation, Zürich) 1966; H. Ulonska, Die Funktion der alttestamentlichen Zitate und Anspielungen in den paulinischen Briefen, (Dissertation, Münster) 1963.

U

Unanimity

ὁμοθυμαδόν

ὁμοθυμαδόν (homothymadon), unanimous, of one mind.

CL homothymadon is compounded of homo-, together and thymos (derived from thyō, rage, seethe), the principle of life, feeling and thought. homothymadon thus means unanimous, but is later weakened to mean together. It is first found in the 5th and 4th cent. B.C. (Aristophanes, Plato, Demosthenes) and in the political sphere is used especially for the visible, inner unity of a group faced by a common duty or danger. The unanimity is not based on common personal feelings but on a cause greater than the individual.

OT The LXX uses it 36 times in all, generally as a rendering for yaḥad (e.g. Job 3:18; 6:2) and yaḥdāw (Exod. 19:8; Job 2:11; Jer. 5:5; 46:21; Lam. 2:8), which mean together, all together, i.e. homothymadon is used in the weakened Hellenistic sense. At the same time the rendering of these Heb. words by hama, at the same time (Isa. 1:28; 42:14), and epi to auto, together (Ps. 41:7 [MT 41:8]; Amos 1:15) may indicate that the translators intended there to be overtones of the original meaning of homothymadon.

In Hellenistic Jewish literature homothymadon occurs in its original meaning in contexts of praise and lament (e.g. Jud. 4:12; Wis. 10:20; 3 Macc. 4:6; in a secular sense Jud. 15:9; Aris. 178), and also in the general sense of together (e.g. Jud. 15:2, 5 which, however, RSV renders with the force of unanimity; Wis. 18:5; 3 Macc. 4:4).

NT Apart from Rom. 15:6, homothymadon is used only in Acts (10 times). In Acts 12:20 it obviously means no more than that Tyre and Sidon joined in sending envoys to King Herod Agrippa I. In the other cases a unanimity is indicated: the eleven with the women and Mary in prayer (Acts 1:14), the growing church in the temple, breaking bread, etc. (Acts 2:46 f.; 5:12), the prayer after the release of Peter and John (Acts 4:24); the decision to send Judas and Silas with the decisions of the Jerusalem meeting (Acts 15:25). Equally there is unanimity even in the qualified hearing of Philip's message (Acts 8:6; prosechō, give heed to, follow), and the hatred of the Jews (Acts 7:57; 18:12 f.) and Hellenists (Acts 9:29), when faced with the message of the crucified and exalted Jesus.

There is thus a double kind of unanimity shown us in Acts, of the church and of its enemies. The cause is the same, viz. the preaching of Christ as Saviour and Lord. The reaction can be either faith and worship or hatred and rejection. His enemies found themselves united for the first time when they rejected the claims of Christ. Similarly the unanimity of the church was not based on the sharing of the same human or religious feelings and convictions, but on the reality of Christ which had brought together both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 15:11). The unanimity of their enemies stemmed from seeing their religious (Acts 7:56 f.; 18:13) and commercial traditions challenged and their wish to maintain them at all costs.

When the local church lives and works homothymadon, it is living and working in harmony with its origin. That is why it is repeatedly stressed by Luke. If he plays down almost all the elements that militated against such unanimity in his picture of the primitive church (Acts 6:1 ff.; 15:37 ff.; cf. 8:1), it was hardly because he wanted to idealize it. It had its tensions and controversies (cf. 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Epp. of Jn.). Rather, he wanted to show the essential unanimity of the church, an expression of its nature and therefore a pattern for later generations. Its realization is continually offered and promised to it, so that it may carry out its work of witness (Acts 1:8) in a world that rejects the salvation offered to it. The same goal, the unanimous praise of God en heni stomati, with one voice, is also envisaged by Paul in Rom. 15:5 ff., when he prays to God for the unanimity in service that comes from Christ Jesus and that surmounts all differences in understanding and knowledge. E. D. Schmitz

→ One

H. W. Heidland, homothymadon, TDNT V 185 f.

V

Vessel, Pot, Potter, Mix

κεράμιον κεράμιον (keramion), an earthenware vessel, jar; κέραμος (keramos), clay, earthenware vessel, a roof tile; κεραμεύς (kerameus), potter; κεραμικός (keramikos), belonging to the potter, made of clay; κεράννυμι (kerannymi), mix; σκεῦος (skeuos), thing, object, vessel.

CL In antiquity a complex of words clustered around the basic term kerameia, which designates the potter's craft. From Homer onward keramion denotes vessels of clay, and especially earthenware jars for storing wine or water. The potter was a familiar figure in every village, and in the larger cities potters were organized as a trade guild. The potters' quarter in Athens was called the kerameikos (Menecles Barcaeus 3; Scholia to Aristophanes, Birds 395; Knights 769; Frogs 131). The absence of skill, evident in the crude work of an apprentice only learning his trade, gave rise to the proverbial statement, "he learned the potter's craft on a large wine jar!" which describes those who undertook the most difficult tasks without learning the elements of a trade (Plato, Protagoras 324 e; Laches 187 b; Gorgias 514 e). The fragility of earthenware and the ease with which a potter's stock could be depleted through breakage gave rise to a number of proverbs which suggest that the potter was sometimes the butt of jokes: e.g., "to make a pot of the potter" (Plato, Euthydemus 301 d); "and potter bears a grudge against potter!" (Hesiod, Works and Days 25; cf. Aristotle, Rhetoric 1381 b 16): "A rich potter" became a euphemism for anything fragile or uncertain (Diogenianus 5, 97, 98), and "broken pottery" was a common phrase for ostracism (Strabo 7, 3, 9; Comica Adespota 33).

Although keramos describes a clay vessel, and in a collective sense pottery from the time of Homer (Iliad 9, 469; cf. Herodotus 3:96), it also came to designate in the plural tile-work. It is used in this sense in accounts associated with the building of a temple at Delos in the 3rd cent. B.C. (C. Michel, Recueil d'Inscriptions Grecques, 1900, 594⁵², 1387¹²³). In the Hellenistic period the idea was prevalent, according to Plutarch, that a person marked for death could not return to his house in the ordinary way. Thus people who were reported missing were not allowed on their return to enter their house through the door, but had to climb to the roof, remove the tiles, and lower themselves through the opening (Quaestiones Rom. 5). On the other hand, it was also believed that demons, disease, and death characteristically entered a house through the roof (Gellius, 10, 15, 8).

The verb kerannymi, which means to mix or blend, may originally have had something to do with the necessity of mixing water with soil in order to prepare the potter's clay. But in our existing sources it is used primarily of diluting wine with water (Odyssey 3, 393; 5, 93; 18, 423; 20, 253; 24, 364; Iliad 4, 260). A medical prescription from the first century A.D. preserved among the Oxyrhynchus Papyri (VIII, 1088⁵⁵ : “give to drink with raisin-wine and honey and pine-cones mixed”) indicates a persistent tendency to dissociate the verb from the potter’s craft.

OT In the LXX the Greek term keramion designates an earthenware pot or jar, perhaps of a fixed measure. In Isa. 5:10 God warns unresponsive Israel that ten acres of vineyard will yield only one measure (Heb. bat) of wine. The possession of jars filled with wine was a token of prosperity and blessing. Conversely, the judgment upon Moab may be pronounced in terms of emptying his vessels and smashing his wine-jars (Jer. 48:12).

The noun kerameus was consistently used to translate Heb. yôšēr, potter, as in 1 Chr. 4:23 which speaks of the potters among the men of Judah who laboured for the king. Normally the reference to the potter is literal in the OT, although the potter’s craft suggested a metaphor for God in his relationship to Israel and the nations (Ps. 2:9; Isa. 29:16; 41:25; 45:9; Jer. 18:2, 3, 6, on which → pēlos, clay). Typical of these passages is the oracle of lament in Isa. 45:9, which pronounces woe upon those who disbelieve in the deliverance God has promised. As inconceivable as it would be for a lump of clay to inquire of the potter what he was doing in the moulding process, or an unfired jar to complain that handles had not been added to the completed piece, so is the folly of anyone who would seek to show through argument that God is unable to accomplish what he has promised.

Keen observation of the potter is characteristic of the later scribe Joshua ben Sira (c. 200 B.C.). In a moving passage, Ben Sira contrasts the wisdom of the scribe with the skill evidenced by the farmer, the gem-cutter, the smith, and the potter – all men who keep the fabric of the world stable (Sir. 38:24–34). He observed not only the potter at work at his wheel, but the importance of glazing and the cleaning of the kiln (Sir. 38:29–30). It was inevitable that the concentration of the potter upon his work should suggest an apt figure for God in the pursuance of his purposes among men (Sir. 33:13). Similarly, the effect of the kiln upon the finished vessel furnished a simile for the manner in which human reasoning tests individual character (Sir. 27:5).

In common with classical usage, the verb kerannymi has reference to the diluting of wine with water (Prov. 9:2, 5; Isa. 5:22; 19:14; Bel and the Dragon 11) and has no association with the potter’s trade.

NT The sole instance of keramion in the NT occurs in connexion with the arrangements for the paschal meal (Mk. 14:13 par. Lk. 22:10). The instructions given to the two disciples charged with the preparation of the Passover meal were to follow a man they would meet in the city, who would lead them to the house, where the feast was to be celebrated. They would recognize the man by the fact that he was carrying an earthenware water-jar. Jesus’ knowledge of this circumstance and his precise instructions concerning what was to be said to the householder provides evidence of arrangements finalized in advance. The device of a man carrying a water-jar suggests a pre-arranged signal, for ordinarily only women carried water in jars; it would be normal to find a man carrying a wine-skin. A sufficient reason for resorting to a means of recognition which required no exchange of words in the street is provided by the determined search for Jesus and the issuing of a warrant for his arrest implied in Jn. 11:15.

The only instances of keramos in the NT occurs in Lk. 5:19, in the sense of roof-tiles. When four men were unable to break through a crowd with their paralyzed friend, they ascended a staircase on the side of the house to the flat roof which they broke open in order to lower the man before Jesus. It was not difficult to make an opening in the roof, which was made from light material coated with clay (cf. Mk. 2:4). The opening of a roof is mentioned elsewhere in contemporary literature, e.g., Midrash Rabba to Leviticus, 29, 6 end (in a story about Jeconiah's wife): "they opened the roof and let him down to him." In the Roman setting, Cicero speaks of letting a man down through the tiles (In M. Antonium oratio Philippica 2, 18, 45).

Of the three NT instances of kerameus, two occur in the stylized phrase "the potter's field" (Matt. 27:7, 10). The reference is to a field which the chief priests purchased with the thirty pieces of silver Judas returned after the betrayal of Jesus, as burial ground for strangers who died in Jerusalem (Matt. 27:3–10; Acts 1:18; → Akeldama). The field contained a pit where potsherds were discarded. A site has been located south of the Valley of Hinnom, where in Jeremiah's day a potter pursued his trade (cf. Jer. 18:2; 19:2).

The third instance occurs in the parable of the potter in Rom. 9:19 ff., where God's sovereign disposition over his own creation is affirmed on the analogy of the potter's determination to make from the same lump of clay one vessel (skeuos) of striking beauty and another destined for menial use (Rom. 9:21). The interpretation of the passage must take account of the context. In responding to the charge that God is unjust in the administration of his judgment, Paul appeals to Exod. 33:19, where God affirms, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy." From this, Paul deduces that everything depends upon God's mercy, which he extends or withholds according to his sovereign will (Rom. 9:15–18). Verse 19 then takes account of the defiant question, how can God hold the individual accountable for his transgression, if he himself assigns to each person his rôle? In his reply to this objection, Paul makes use of the parable of the potter, which earlier had informed the preaching of Isaiah (Isa. 29:16; 45:9). As the clay cannot protest against the action of the potter, neither can the creature protest against the action of his Creator (verse 20). Verse 21 recalls Jer. 18:6 (cf. Wis. 15:7), where God's right to make vessels designed for different purposes from the same lump of clay is affirmed. God as Creator has an indisputable right to use the vessels which he makes for an honourable or less honourable purpose. The verses which follow (vv. 22 ff.) contemplate the two categories of earthenware vessels in terms of the sovereign disposition of the divine will. Implied in the discussion is a call for Israel to become open to God's grace expressed in Christ and to the experience of God's mercy. What is only implied in Rom. 9:19–33 is made explicit in 2 Clement where the parable of the potter is retold in order to underscore a new point: the potter can refashion vessels he has made only so long as he has not fired them (2 Clem. 8:2). On this basis men are summoned to repentance before they forfeit the opportunity to be responsive to God.

The noun skeuos, thing, object, vessel, jar, dish, occurs elsewhere in Paul and in other NT writings. In 2 Cor. 4:7 Paul speaks of having the treasure of the knowledge of the glory of God "in earthen vessels" (→ ostrakinos NT). The believer who purifies himself from what is ignoble "will be a vessel for noble use, consecrated and useful to the master of the house, ready for any good work" (2 Tim. 2:21; → ostrakinos NT). This reflects the language of Acts 9:15, where Ananias is told that Saul of Tarsus is “a chosen instrument of mine to carry my name before the Gentiles and kings and the sons of Israel.” skeuos means generally a thing or object used for any purpose (Mk. 11:16), goods or property (Matt. 12:29; Mk. 3:27; Lk. 17:31). The addition of a qualifying phrase may define its nature more precisely, e.g. panta ta skeuē tēs leitourgias, “all the vessels used in worship” (Heb. 9:21; cf. also Rev. 18:12). In Acts 27:17 it appears to be the keedge or driving anchor (Arndt, 761), though it may be gear or sails (cf. also Acts 10:11, 16; 11:5). The sense of vessel, jar, dish, etc., which is well attested in cl. Gk., is found in Lk. 8:16; Jn. 19:29; Rom. 9:21 ff.; 2 Tim. 2:20 f.; Rev. 2:27. For discussion of the meaning in 1 Thess. 4:4 and 1 Pet. 3:7 in the context of marriage relationships → Woman, art. gynē NT 2.

The adj. keramikos occurs only once in the NT, in the pledge of shared power with Christ extended to the Christian at Thyatira who remains faithful to his Lord (Rev. 2:27). He is promised power over the nations which will be ruled with an iron rod, “as when earthen pots are broken to pieces.” The reference to the iron rod, which was apparently the shepherd’s oak club, the end of which was capped with iron, and the shattered clay vessels, furnish a clear allusion to Ps. 2:9, where the Lord’s Anointed is promised sovereignty over the nations who resist his rule. The new order must be preceded by the shattering of the old (cf. Rev. 11:15). In context, the promise provides an assurance of vindication and a reversal of rôles in which the humiliated people of God will share in the sovereign authority of their Lord. The existence of a potters’ guild at Thyatira has been confirmed by an inscription (Inscriptiones Graecae ad res Romanas pertinentes 4, 1205).

Although the vb. kerannymi has reference to mixing or blending, in the NT it is unrelated to the potter’s craft. In common with older Greek practice it is used of diluting wine with water. In Rev. 14:10 it carries the nuance of pouring, in reference to the wine of God’s wrath which is “poured out unmixed into the cup of his anger.” In Rev. 18:6 it occurs in a context describing the fate of → Babylon, whose judgment is described figuratively under the image of mixing a double portion of wine which will make her reel from drunkenness and deprive her of all sense and capability (cf. Isa. 19:14; Ps. Sol. 8:14).

W. L. Lane

ὄστράκινοσ

ὄστράκινοσ (ostrakinos), made of earth or clay, earthenware.

CL Another term for a potter was ostrakeus (Nicaenetus in Anthologia Graeca 4, 191), which is related to the description of his wares as ostraka. In the classical and Hellenistic periods, the singular noun ostrakon can denote either an earthenware vessel, or a fragment of such a vessel, a potsherd. From the practice at Athens and elsewhere of using potsherds for voting on the banishment of a citizen, the verb ostrakizō was coined to speak of the ostracizing of someone (Thucydides 1, 135; 8, 73; Andocides 3, 3; Aristotle, Polity of the Athenians 22, 6; Politics 1284 a 21). In Hellenistic Greek “to cast the ostrakon” means to vote for any one’s banishment (Plutarch, Alcibiades 13; cf. Pericles 14).

The adjective ostrakinos was used by the Jewish composer of Sibylline Oracles 5, 495 to describe as useless and lifeless the terracotta images of pagan idols that were carried in processions (cf. Epistle of Diognetus 2:2, 7). There is little evidence of a metaphorical use of ostrakinos in antiquity until the second century A.D. when Artemidorus describes the body of a man as an earthenware vessel (5, 25).

OT In the LXX the adjective ostrakinos simply defines the material from which a vessel was made as clay or earthenware (Lev. 6:28; 11:35; 14:5, 50; 15:12; Num. 5:17; Jer. 32:14). Thus pleasant speech (lit. "smooth lips") concealing an evil heart is compared to earthenware concealed by a silver glaze (Prov. 26:23). The humiliated sons of Zion, who are "worth their weight in gold," are considered to be of no more value than common earthenware by their captors (Lam. 4:2). Similarly, in rendering the Aramaic portion of Daniel the translators chose ostrakinos to describe the great image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in a dream, whose feet were partly of iron and partly of clay (Dan. 2:33, 34, 41, 42).

The related meaning, potsherd, also occurs. Judgment is pronounced upon Israel's unbelief in terms of the ruthless smashing of a potter's vessel into fragments so small there remains no sherd large enough to carry fire from the hearth nor to dip water from the cistern (Isa. 30:14). The familiar sight of sherds of pottery bleached by the scorching sun provided a suggestive image for the parched sufferer who complains that his strength is dried up "like a potsherd" (Ps. 22:15; LXX 21:16). Both nuances of the word are evident in the instruction given to Jeremiah to purchase an earthenware flask from the potter, but to smash it in the presence of the elders as a representation of what will happen to Jerusalem for its defilement through idolatrous practices (Jer. 19:1, 11).

In the intertestamental period the impossibility of mending a smashed pot provided Ben Sira with the proverb, "He who teaches a fool is like one who glues potsherds together" (Sir. 22:7). It is a study in futility.

NT ostrakinos occurs twice in the NT meaning earthenware. In 2 Cor. 4:6 Paul had described the gospel as "the splendour of the knowledge of the glory of God." In the following verse he makes the startling statement that this treasure has been committed to earthen vessels (en ostrakinois skeuesin), a metaphor which compares the apostle and his colleagues to common clay pots. The striking contrast between the splendour of the treasure and the commonness of the vessel in which it is stored directs attention away from the preachers to the glory of the message they proclaim. It was not unusual in the ancient world to conceal valuable treasures in earthenware urns. In this context ostrakinos refers to the whole man who is entrusted with the gospel. This description finds a parallel in rabbinic accounts of men as clay vessels containing the Torah or wisdom which God has bestowed, e.g. Sifre Deut. 48 (84a on Deut. 11:22): as it is not possible for wine to be stored in golden or silver vessels, but only in one which is least among the vessels, an earthenware one, so also the words of Torah can be kept only with one who is humble in his own eyes; cf. b. Taanith 7a, where "glorious wisdom in a repulsive earthen vessel" describes R. Jehoshua ben Chanaiah, whose appearance was unattractive. Paul's detractors had described his bodily appearance as weak and dismissed his words as inconsequential (2 Cor. 10:10; cf. 10:1; 11:6). His self-description as ostrakinos attests that human weakness presents no barrier to the accomplishment of the divine intention when it is undergirded by the transcendent power of God (cf. 2 Cor. 3:5; 4:7; 12:9–10; 13:3–4).

The second instance of ostrakinos occurs in a context, where Paul urges Timothy to separate himself from false teachers like Philetus and Hymenaeus, who have subverted the faith of some Christians at Ephesus (2 Tim. 2:14–19, 22–26). The appearance of false teachers poses the question as to why there are disloyal persons in the congregation. Paul responds by comparing the church to a large house in which it is normal to find vessels of differing material, which serve different, indeed opposite, functions (2:20). Even as the presence of vessels of wood and earthenware (ostrakinos) devoted to disreputable use in such a house occasions no surprise, so the evidence of base leadership in the church can be anticipated. But verse 21 makes the point that, whether a vessel is made of gold, silver, or earthenware, it may be clean in order to be ready for honourable service to the owner. By separating himself from the false teachers and cleansing himself from their disreputable actions, Timothy will be prepared for any task to which his Master is calling him. W. L. Lane

πηλός

πηλός (pēlos), clay, mud, mire.

CL In classical Gk. pēlos means mud, muck, dung, loam, or clay. The primary thought is of dust or soil mixed with some fluid, especially water, with the result that the material becomes soft and pliable. Herodotus was struck by the fact, that in the districts inhabited by the Scythians, it was so unbearably cold for eight months of the year that it was a burning fire, not water poured upon the ground, that formed mud (4, 28).

The term commonly designates the clay or earth used by masons and potters (Herodotus 2, 36, 136; Aristophanes, The Birds 1143; Plato, Theaetetus 147a). The skill of the potter in moulding clay suggested an image for describing men as “clay figurines” (Aristophanes, The Birds 268; cf. Callimachus, Fragment 87). In the Hellenistic period the thought of man as a piece of clay is a commonplace, as in Herodas 2, 28 f.: “who ought to know who he is, and of what clay he is mixed, and to live as I do, in awe of even the least of the citizens.” Epictetus observed that “the body is by nature clay” (Dissertationes 4, 11, 27).

In the Roman period there is some evidence for the use of mud or clay in medical prescriptions (Galen, De Theriaca 19) and in connexion with treatments at the shrine of Aesculapius in Pergamon (Aelius Aristides, Orations 48, 74 f.) and in Epidauros (the Apellas stele in W. Dittenberger, *Sylloge Inscriptionum Graecarum*³ 1170).

OT In accord with common Greek usage, the LXX uses pēlos for mud or mire (e.g. 2 Sam. 22:43; Ps. 68:14 [EV 69:13]), loam or clay (e.g. Isa. 29:16; 41:25; Jer. 18:6). It is especially the work of the potter in his preparation and shaping of clay that suggested lines of thought that were theologically important in the OT.

1. The account that God formed the first man out of dust or loam (Gen. 2:7; 3:19) finds a distinct echo in the book of Job where men are described as those “who dwell in houses of clay” (Job 4:19). Job chides God for having fashioned him and then turning about to destroy him: “Remember that you have made me of clay. Will you turn me to dust again?” (Job 10:8–9). The fragility of clay provides an apt figure for Job’s powerlessness when overcome by affliction and impending death. The implicit allusion to the action of the potter in the thought of man fashioned by God’s hands becomes explicit in Isaiah. The prophet cautions those who believe they can conceal their counsel from the Lord not to confuse themselves with God who made them: "Shall the potter be regarded as the clay . . . that the thing formed should say of him who formed it, 'He has no understanding'?" (Isa. 29:16). A rebellious man who strives with his God is like an earthen vessel who wishes to dispute with the potter (Isa. 45:9). God's sovereign jurisdiction over man whom he fashioned from dust is affirmed emphatically by the scribe Joshua ben Sira (c. 200 B.C.), who comments, "As clay in the hand of the potter – for all his ways are as he pleases – so men are in the hand of him who made them, to give to them as he decides" (Sir. 33:10–13).

2. Jeremiah found in the action of a local potter working at his wheel an object lesson which illumined the sovereign judgment of God upon the nation (Jer. 18:1–12). When the recalcitrant clay refused to conform to the potter's purpose, and the intended vessel was spoiled, he reworked the clay into another vessel. The potter furnished a parable of the divine potter at work with human clay. God remains master of the clay, which in this context designates Israel as a nation. He will shape it to his intended purpose. If Israel fails to respond to the shaping pressure, it will be remoulded: "Behold, like the clay in the potter's hand, so are you in my hand, O house of Israel" (Jer. 18:6). The responsiveness of the best quality clay to the potter's hands becomes a paradigm for Israel's sensitivity to the intention of God.

3. In the preparation of clay for his trade, a potter would knead the clay by treading upon it with his feet (cf. Nah. 3:14). This common practice furnished Isaiah with a vivid image for the ruthless treatment Babylon could expect from an invader who would approach from the north (Isa. 41:25). As a potter treads upon the clay with which he works, this conqueror will trample under foot his enemies.

4. The latter half of the Wisdom of Solomon (11:2–19:22) is a polemic against the Gentiles. The writer focuses attention upon a pagan potter who makes his living from the manufacture and sale of terracotta figurines (Wis. 15:7–17). From the same lump of clay he moulds "counterfeit gods" (Wis. 15:9) and sewer tiles (Wis. 15:7): "with misspent toil, he forms a futile god from the same clay – this man who was made of earth a short time before and after a little while goes to the earth from which he was taken . . . his life is of less worth than clay" (Wis. 15:8, 10). Here the older biblical motifs of God as Creator and man as clay are combined with a defence of the second commandment prohibiting the fashioning of graven images (Wis. 15:13). The lifelessness of a fragile, clay figurine is mocked by the God who breathes the breath of life into men whom he fashioned from clay (Wis. 15:7–17).

NT In the NT pēlos is used in two distinct ways.

1. In John it designates the mixture of dirt and spittle which Jesus applied to the eyes of a man who had been born blind (Jn. 9:6–15). The application of spittle to the eyes and the laying on of hands in healing was widespread in Jewish practice. By his touch and action Jesus entered into the thought-world of the man and established significant contact with him. The repeated reference to the clay-like mixture (five times in Jn. 9:6, 11, 14, 15), however, suggest a deeper level of meaning. By his action on the blind eyes of the man, Jesus completes the creative activity which provides men with sight and demonstrates that he is the Light of the world (cf. Jn. 1:4–9; 8:12; 9:5). By juxtaposing Jesus' declaration that he is the Light of the world (Jn. 9:5) with the account of the opening of the blind man's eyes (9:6–15), John affirms his theological understanding of this incident with its focus upon the application of clay to unseeing eyes.

2. In Rom. 9:20–21 Paul draws upon the common OT image of God as the Potter who exercises sovereign control over his creation. In the context man is described as moulded clay and God as the one who moulded the clay for his own purposes. The rhetorical question, “Has the potter no right over the clay, to make out of the same lump one vessel for beauty and another for menial use?” is indebted to Isa. 29:16 and 45:9. The imagery underscores God’s freedom and sovereignty in relationship to men as his creation and repeats the caution of Isaiah that men are not to confuse their claims with the divine prerogative. W. L. Lane

φύραμα

φύραμα (phyrama), a mixture, a lump.

CL In the classical and Hellenistic periods phyrama describes something mixed or kneaded, like dough (Mnesimachus 4, 11; Aristotle, Problems 929 a 25; Plutarch, Moralia 693 e). The cognate verb is almost restricted to the sense of mixing flour or some similar substance. Only rarely is there reference to the mixing of soil with water to form a clay paste (cf. Plato, Timaeus 73 e; Theaetetus 147 c). Not until Plutarch is there a clear instance of the use of phyrama for the dough-like mixture from which the potter moulds his ware (Moralia 811 c).

OT In the LXX the term phyrama is unrelated to the potter’s craft. It denotes the kneading bowls in which dough is prepared (Exod. 8:3), the dough itself (Exod. 12:34), or the coarse flour to be worked into dough (Num. 15:20 f.). Consistent with this, the cognate verb phyraō describes the mixing of unleavened flour with oil (Exod. 29:2, 40; Lev. 2:4, 5; 6:21; 7:2; 14:10; Num. 15:4; 1 Chron. 23:29) or the action of kneading (Gen. 18:6; 1 Sam. 28:24). In no passage does it describe the preparation of clay for use by the potter or the lump of clay which he places upon his wheel.

NT Of the five occurrences of phyrama in the NT, four have reference to a lump of dough (Rom. 11:16; 1 Cor. 5:6, 7; Gal. 5:9). In Rom. 9:21, however, phyrama denotes the lump of clay from which a potter may make one vessel for honoured use and another to serve a menial purpose. This singular use of phyrama to refer to the dough-like mixture from which earthenware vessels are to be fashioned is supported in the context by the parable of the potter who from the same lump of clay makes vessels of differing quality and function. Even so God has fashioned men as vessels of mercy and vessels of wrath who advance his redemptive purposes. In the context it is clear that God’s wrath stands in the service of his mercy and is designed to draw attention to the extent of his mercy toward all who will receive by faith the righteousness provided in Christ (Rom. 9:22–33). W. L. Lane

(a). R. Amiran, Ancient Pottery in the Holy Land, 1969; K. Barth, CD II, 2, 222–233; C. Chavasse, “Studies in Texts – 2 Cor. 4:7,” Theology 54, 1951, 99–100; D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 385–387; N. L. Lapp, “Pottery,” IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 674–677; C. Maurer, skeuos, TDNT VII 358–367; E. H. Plumpré, “The Potter and the Clay,” Expositor, 1st Series 4, 1876, 469–480.

(b). V. d.W. te G., “Onderscheidene vaten in ’s Heeren huis; 2 Tim. 2:20–21,” Gereformeerd Theologisch Tijdschrift 3, 1902, 171–173, 184–185; K. Jägger, Das Bauernhaus in Palästina, 1912, 11 ff., 22 ff.

Vine, Wine

ἄμπελος	ἄμπελος (ampelos), vine, grapevine; ἄμπελοργός (ampelourgos), vine-dresser, gardener; ἄμπελών (ampelōn), vineyard; οἶνος (oinos), wine; οἰνοπότης (oinopotēs), wine-drinker; οἰνοφλυγία (oinophlygia), drunkenness.
---------	---

CL & OT 1. ampelos is found in cl. Gk. from Homer onwards meaning a vine. In the LXX it stands chiefly for geḗen, whereas ampelōn is used chiefly for kerem. The rare term in the LXX ampelourgos translates kōrēm (2 Ki. 25:12; 2 Chr. 26:10; Isa. 61:5; Jer. 52:16). oinos stands for 8 different Heb. words, but mainly for yayin, and less frequently for the archaic tīrōš and tīrōš.

2. Viticulture is one of the oldest forms of agriculture, and Gen. 9:20 f. (attributed to J) says that “Noah was the first tiller of the soil. He planted a vineyard; and he drank of the wine, and became drunk, and lay uncovered in his tent.” The twin themes of the vine and wine as symbols of fertility and well-being on the one hand and of wine as a cause of debauchery and shame on the other hand run throughout Scripture. Isa. 5:1–7 not only gives a description of contemporary viticultural practice; it sees Israel as the vineyard, Yahweh as the vinedresser and a harvest of wild grapes instead of ripe, juicy grapes from which to make wine.

The vine was an important part of OT economy. As with other crops, the owner was not permitted to reap the vineyard twice in one harvest; gleanings were to be left for those who lacked possessions (Lev. 19:10; Deut. 24:21). Vineyards were to lie fallow every seventh year (Exod. 23:10 f.; Lev. 23:3 ff.). They were not to be sown with other plants (Deut. 22:9; but cf. Lk. 13:6, though some some scholars think that the reference here may be to an orchard, cf. Arndt, 46).

The symbolism of Isa. 5:1–7 is found in the Pss. and other prophetic books. Israel is a vine brought out of Egypt which fills the land; the Psalmist asks why Yahweh has allowed it to be ravaged (Ps. 80[79]:8–13). Although Israel was a “choice vine”, he became a “wild vine” (Jer. 2:21). The infidelity of Israel is reproached by Hosea: “Israel is a luxuriant vine that yields its fruit. The more his fruit increased the more altars he built; as his country improved he improved his pillars” (Hos. 10:1). The wood of the vine is good for nothing but fuel (Ezek. 15:1–8; cf. 19:10–14), and so the vine that has ceased to bear fruit is a symbol of judgment. In the allegory of Ezek. 17:1–10 “the seed of the land” (Zedekiah) is planted by “a great eagle” (Nebuchadnezzar) and becomes “a low spreading vine”. However, it is transplanted by another eagle (Hophra). The allegory closes with the question whether the transplanted vine will survive, when the east wind strikes it. In Ps. 128(127):3 the wife of him who fears Yahweh “will be like a fruitful vine in your house.” The abundance of vineyards is a sign of Yahweh’s favour (Hos. 2:15). Superabundance will characterize the end-time: “Behold, the days are coming,” says the LORD, “when the plowman shall overtake the reaper and the treader of grapes him who sows the seed; the mountains shall drip sweet wine, and all the hills shall flow with it' ” (Amos 9:13). This is developed in Syr. Bar. to the point at which each vine will have a thousand branches, each branch a thousand clusters and each cluster a thousand grapes (Syr. Bar. 29:5). The dominion of the messiah is like a vine (Syr. Bar. 39:7). In Sir. 24:17 the vine is a symbol of wisdom. Other expressions in the OT compare Israel with grapes in the wilderness (Hos. 9:10) and a cluster of grapes (Isa. 65:8).

3. Wine is frequently mentioned in lists of produce (e.g. Gen. 27:28; Deut. 7:13; 11:14; 18:4; 2 Ki. 18:32; Jer. 31:12). Because of its colour it could be called “the blood of the grape” (Gen. 49:11; Deut. 32:14; Sir. 39:26; 50:15; cf. Isa. 63:3; Rev. 14:20). The misuse of wine brings numerous evils, beginning with the nakedness of Noah and the curse of Canaan (Gen. 9:20–27; cf. 19:32–35). Those whose lives are in the grip of wine are denounced by the prophets (Isa. 5:11, 22; 28:7; 56:11 f.; Hos. 4:11; 7:5; Hab. 2:5; Mic. 2:11). Priests were forbidden to drink wine when engaged in their duties (Lev. 10:9; Ezek. 44:21). Similarly Prov. has numerous warnings against inordinate love of wine (Prov. 20:1; 21:17; 23:20 f.; 23:31 ff.). The Nazirites took vows never to drink wine or the products of the grapevine (Num. 6:3; cf. Jdg. 13:4, 7, 14), and the Rechabites abstained both from wine and from building houses (Jer. 35:6 f.). But wine was also part of daily life, and would be safer to drink than much of the water. Wine was drunk at feasts, and was an honoured gift (cf. 1 Sam. 25:18; 2 Sam. 16:1). It was an article of trade (2 Chr. 2:8 ff., 15). Wine is praised by the psalmist as gladdening the heart of man (Ps. 104[103]:15; cf. Jdg. 9:13; Eccl. 10:10). Libations of wine were also used in → sacrifice, both to false gods (Deut. 32:37 f.; Isa. 57:6; 65:11; Jer. 7:18; 19:13) and to Yahweh in connexion with other offerings (Exod. 29:40; Lev. 23:13; Num. 15:7, 10; 28:14). It is treated in later practice as if it were blood and was poured out at the base of the altar (Sir. 50:15; Josephus, Ant. 3, 234). Its use in the Passover is first mentioned in Jub. 49:6.

4. In the prophets → judgment is expressed under the symbolism of wine: the wicked will be forced to drain the cup with the consequences that they will not be able to stand (Pss. 60[59]:3; 75[74]:8); the wine-harvest (Joel 3:13) and the treading of the grapes (Isa. 63:2–6) are pictures of judgment. On the other hand, abundance of wine is a sign of blessing (Gen. 27:28; Joel 2:24; 3:18; Amos 9:13; Zech. 10:7).

5. In Gk. religion the cult of Dionysus or Bacchus which originated in Thrace played a prominent part. There were numerous Dionysia or festivals characterized by orgies. But modern scholastic opinion connects Dionysus more with emotional religion and fertility rites associated with phallic symbols, than with wine (OCD 352 f.).

NT 1. Vineyards feature in Jesus' parables. In Lk. 13:6–9 the centre of interest is the fig-tree which is planted in a vineyard (ampelōn) and tended by a vine-dresser (ampelourgos) who pleads for it to be spared one more year after three successive years of failure to bear fruit. If it fails then, after further careful tending, it will be cut down. The parable is a parable of judgment on the Jewish people in the light of their failure to respond to the preaching of Jesus. In context it explains the previous verses which record various disasters which have befallen people. The fact that the hearers have been spared similar disasters is no proof of their righteousness before God.

“Unless you repent you will all likewise perish” (Lk. 13:5b). The ultimate disaster came with the Jewish War and fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

Matt. 20:1–16 records the parable of the labourers in the vineyard. It is preceded by and concludes with the assertion that the first will be last and the last first. In the parable each of the labourers receives a denarius regardless of how long he has worked. The main point of the parable is not to teach about vocation or that all men are of equal value in God’s sight. D. Hill sees it as teaching God’s sovereign grace which (in contrast with the grumbling attitude of the Pharisees) welcomes late-comers into the kingdom (The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 285; cf. Lk. 15:15). As such, it is an explanation of the first-last theme, not an illustration. If the parable is a warning against a begrudging attitude to Jesus’ reception of sinners, its teaching is similar to that of the parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin and the lost son in Lk. 15. But another viewpoint is possible. In the context of Matt., it follows Jesus’ response to Peter’s declaration, “Lo, we have left everything and followed you. What then shall we have?” (Matt. 19:27). Jesus’ reply promises that the disciples shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. 19:28), and that those who have left houses and relatives “will receive a hundredfold, and inherit eternal life” (Matt. 19:29). In context the parable may be seen as counterbalancing these statements and encouraging the disciples not to be self-seeking, but to accept what God gives. Thus, the disciple who has laboured all day, having agreed like the rest to work for a denarius, is told, “Friend, I am doing you no wrong; did you not agree with me for a denarius? Take what belongs to you, and go; I choose to give to this last as I give to you. Am I not allowed to do what I choose with what belongs to me? Or do you begrudge my generosity? So the last will be first, and the first last” (Matt. 20:13–16).

The parable of the two sons, the first refusing to work in the vineyard but then going and the second promising but not actually going (Matt. 20:28–32), may be seen as a Matthean counterpart to the parable of the lost son in Lk. 15:11–32. Here again the first-last theme recurs. It is explained: “Truly, I say to you, the tax collectors and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came to you in the way of righteousness, and you did not believe him, but the tax collectors and the harlots believed him; and even when you saw it, you did not afterward repent and believe him” (Matt. 20:31 f.).

This is immediately followed by the parable of the wicked husbandmen which is a christological restatement of Isaiah’s parable of the vineyard (Matt. 21:33–46 par. Mk. 12:1–12, Lk. 20:9–19; cf. Isa. 5:1–7). The tenants of the vineyard (the Jewish nation) have killed servants (the prophets down to John the Baptist) who were sent by the owner (God) to get his fruit. By killing the heir (Jesus), the tenants believe that the vineyard will be theirs to use as they wish. But the owner will put the tenants to death and replace them with “other tenants who will give him the fruits in their season” (Matt. 21:41), i.e. a new people of God. The parable has been seen as taking its origin not in the teaching of Jesus but in the Sitz im Leben of the early church and its conflict with Judaism (cf. W. G. Kümmel, “Das Gleichnis von den bösen Weingärtnern (Mk. 12, 1–9)”, reprinted in Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte, 1965, 207–17). But in fact, the situation fits the setting given in Matt. with the rejection of Jesus at the climax of his ministry, and recent writers are now more inclined to admit the presence of allegory in the teaching of Jesus than earlier writers who insisted that authentic parables should have only one point (cf. M. Black, "The Parables as Allegory", BJRL 42, 1959–60, 273–87; R. E. Brown, "Parable and Allegory Reconsidered", New Testament Essays, 1965, 254–64).

Jn. 15:1–11 contains the great description of Jesus as himself the vine, the Father as the vinedresser and the need of the disciples to abide in him in order to bear fruit. This is more precisely defined in terms of his words abiding in them (v. 7) and abiding in his love (v. 9), which means keeping his commandments (v. 10). All this is said that the joy of Jesus may be in them to the full (v. 11). Whereas Israel was the vine or the vineyard in the OT, the vine is now narrowed down to Jesus himself. In view of the OT and Jewish parallels and the late date of his own putative sources it would seem misguided to follow R. Bultmann in his claim that the vine here does not have its origin in OT-Jewish tradition but in the myth of the tree of life (The Gospel of John, 1971, 530; cf. E. Schweizer, EGO EIMI . . . Die religionsgeschichtliche Herkunft und theologische Bedeutung der johanneischen Bildreden, FRLANT 56, [1939] 1965², 39 ff., who cites numerous examples from Mandaean sources). As C. K. Barrett points out, the Mandaean references to the vine are almost certainly dependent on Christian sources (The Gospel according to St John, 1955, 394). Some have speculated that the saying was occasioned by the disciples commenting on the ornamental vine which decorated Herod's temple (cf. Middoth 3:8; Josephus, War 5, 210; Tacitus, Historiae 5, 5). If so, it would be a further comment on the true identity and character of the vine in the tradition of prophetic imagery, but going beyond anything the prophets had said, by identifying the vine with Jesus. It also stands in contrast with the disciples of Johanan ben Zakkai at Jabneh (Jamnia) who after A.D. 70 were called kerem byabneh, the vineyard of Jabneh (Ketuboth 4:6). Not only is Jesus said to be the true vine; the only way for the branches to live and flourish is to abide in him. Paul does not use this picture of the vine, but uses that of the olive tree from which the natural branches have been removed and those of a wild olive grafted in (Rom. 11:17–24; → Oil, Olive, art. elaion).

2. Wine is generally understood lit. in the NT, and never in a cultic sense. John the Baptist abstained from drinking wine (Lk. 1:15; cf. 7:33; Matt. 11:18), perhaps following a Nazirite vow. Jesus, on the other hand, was accused of being "a glutton and a drunkard [oinopotēs]" (Matt. 11:18 f.; Lk. 7:33 f.). The spirit that was to fill John was the Holy Spirit: "For he will be great before the Lord, and he shall drink no wine nor strong drink, and he will be filled with the Holy Spirit, even from his mother's womb" (Lk. 1:15; cf. Num. 6:3; Jdg. 13:4, 7). Jesus justified his refraining from fasting on the grounds that the presence of the bridegroom is a time for festivity; but when the bridegroom is taken away the disciples will then fast (Mk. 2:18–22 par. Matt. 9:14–17, Lk. 5:33–38). The saying has not only messianic implications, but a hint of Jesus' death. The same passage contains the sayings about patching an old garment and putting new wine into old wineskins, implying that the Pharisaic outlook is burst apart by the life that he brings. Lk. 5:39 adds: "And no one after drinking old wine desires new; for he says, 'The old is good.'" The statement is not intended to be a rule-of-thumb guide for wine connoisseurs. It is a warning against over-estimation of the old by those who think that they know best. It is a comment on the attitude of Jesus' opponents who stick to the old and familiar, thinking that they know that the old is better simply because it is old. Similar sayings are given in both Jewish and classical writings (Sir. 9:10; Ber. 51a; Lucian, De Mercede Conductis 26; Plutarch, De Mario 44; Plautus, Casina 5; cf. TDNT V 163).

The NT maintains a similar attitude to wine as the OT. On the one hand, it is one of God's gifts of creation to be enjoyed. On the other hand, to refrain from drinking wine may be necessary for the sake of the gospel. Drunkenness (oinophlygia) is a characteristic of the Gentile way of life (1 Pet. 4:3). "It is not right to eat meat or drink wine or do anything that makes your brother stumble" (Rom. 14:21). The disciples are exhorted to "take heed to yourselves lest your hearts be weighed down with dissipation and drunkenness and cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly like a snare" (Lk. 21:34). Timothy, on the other hand, is exhorted to drink a little wine for his stomach's sake (1 Tim. 5:23). Moderation must not be confused with licence. Bishops and deacons must not be drunkards (1 Tim. 3:3, 8; Tit. 2:3). Eph. 5:18 warns against excessive drinking: "And do not get drunk with wine, for that is debauchery; but be filled with the Spirit" (cf. Prov. 23:31). At → Pentecost the bystanders made the opposite mistake, concluding that the disciples were filled with new wine (gleukos), whereas in fact they were filled with the Spirit (Acts 2:13).

Some scholars interpret the miracle of the water into wine at Cana (Jn. 2:1–11) as unhistorical on the basis of redaction criticism (cf. B. Lindars, The Gospel of John, New Century Bible, 1972, 123–33; cf. R. Bultmann, op. cit., 113–21). Parallels have been suggested in the Graeco-Roman world (cf. Euripides, Bacchae 704 ff.; Lindars, op. cit., 127). The Logos under the guise of Melchizedek brought wine instead of water (Philo, Leg. All. 3, 82). The miracle is described only by implication. "The point of the story does not lie in the transformation of water into wine as such, but in the comment of the steward, who does not even know what has happened" (Lindars, op. cit., 131; cf. v. 9). Lindars concludes: "If the form-critical analysis . . . is accepted, the transformation is regarded as unhistorical, so that the miracle requires no explanation. But if the narrative is accepted as substantially historical, it is essential to accept the miraculous element along with it, and to assume that Jesus could and did perform the miracle as it is described" (ibid.). The story has been seen not only as symbolic of Jesus' transforming power, but also as a symbolic anticipation of the new age foretold in the OT and deuterocanonical writings in which wine would be present in abundance. For further discussion see J. D. M. Derrett, "Water into Wine", Law in the New Testament, 1970, 228–46.

oinos is not mentioned in the accounts of the Last Supper, but Jesus said: "Truly, I say to you, I shall not drink again of the fruit of the vine [ek tou genēmatos tēs ampelou] until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God" (Mk. 14:25 par. Matt. 26:29; → Lord's Supper). Elsewhere the consummation is pictured in terms of an eschatological meal (cf. Matt. 8:11; 22:1–14). On the drinks offered to Jesus on the cross (Matt. 27:34; Mk. 15:23) → Gall. Wine is a means of healing in Lk. 10:34.

Wine is mentioned frequently in Rev., but only once literally (Rev. 18:13), where it is a commodity which cannot be sold in the days of judgment. On Rev. 6:6 → Oil, art. elaion. On Rev. 14:10; 16:19; 19:15 it symbolizes the wrath of God, recalling OT imagery on wine and the cup of God's wrath (cf. Jer. 25:15 f., 27 f.; Isa. 51:17, 22; Ezek. 23:31–35; Hab. 2:16; Ps. 75:8). Rev. 14:8 celebrates the fall of → Babylon "who made all nations drink of the wine of her impure passion" (cf. Rev. 17:2; 18:3). Here the debauching effects of wine are seen as descriptive of worldly passion which will be requited by the wine of God's wrath.

C. Brown

→ Drunken, → Fruit, → Gall, → Lord's Supper, → Oil, → Seed, → Tree

- (a). J. Behm, ampelos, TDNT I 342 f.; J. D. M. Derrett, "Water into Wine", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 228–46; M. Jastrow, Jr., "Wine in the Pentateuchal Codes", Journal of the American Oriental Society 33, 1913, 180–92; H. F. Lutz, Viticulture and Brewing in the Ancient Orient, 1922; J. F. Ross, "Vine", IDB IV 784 ff.; and "Wine", IDB IV 849–52; H. Seesemann, oinos, TDNT V 162–66.
- (b). L. Anderlind, "Die Rebe in Syrien, insbesondere Palästina", Zeitschrift der Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 11, 1888, 160–77; E. Busse, Der Wein im Kult des Alten Testaments, Freiburger Theologische Studien 29, 1922; J. Döllner, "Der Wein in Bibel und Talmud", Biblica 4, 1923, 143–67, 267–99; V. Zapletal, "Der Wein in der Bibel", Biblische Studien 21, 1920, 103–6.

Virtue, Blameless

Virtue is a fundamental term in Gk. and idealist anthropology, expressing particularly the ethical qualities of a person (cf. the Ger. words taugen, Tauglichkeit, to be of value, suitability, which are related to the term Tugend, virtue). The main word in Gk. is aretē, which refers both to an appropriate awareness of what is right and to commendable behaviour. In contrast to the philosophical concept of virtue, anenklētos belongs to the legal setting of accusation in court, and connotes behaviour which is irreproachable, against which no accusation can be made. From the sphere of religious worship come the terms amiantos, undefiled, and aspilos, spotless, both of which originally refer to cultic and ritual purity, but are later used with reference to moral purity. These are accordingly dealt with under the heading of anenklētos. The article concludes with a discussion of Haustafeln.

ἀνέγκλητος

ἀνέγκλητος (anenklētos), not accused, without reproach, blameless, irreproachable; ἀμίαντος (amiantos), undefiled; ἄμωμος (amōmos), unblemished, blameless; ἄπιλος (aspilos), spotless, without blemish.

CL 1. anenklētos is derived from enklēma, (a) accusation, complaint; (b) crime, defect, with a-privative. Thus in cl. Gk. from Plato onwards it means a person or thing against which no accusation can be made, or free of guilt, and so in its original meaning denotes not accused, innocent (Plato, Laws 737a). It is used frequently in colloquial speech, as papyri from both pre-Christian and Christian eras bear witness (P. Soc. 541, 6, 3rd cent. B.C.; BGU 1347, 8, 2nd cent. B.C.; Papyrus de Magdola 15, 3, 3rd cent. A.D.). In the process the meaning underwent a change from the original sense to that of respectability without reproach. In the LXX it is only found at 3 Macc. 5:31 (cf. Josephus, Ant. 10, 281; 17, 289).

2. On the other hand, amiantos, undefiled, and aspilos, spotless, are cultic terms; so too is amōmos, faultless, which is used particularly in Lev. for Heb. tāmîm (e.g. 3:1, 6) and Num. (e.g. 6:14) of sacrificial animals which were free from blemish, but also in Pss. in a moral sense. amōmētos, unblemished, is in origin a specific term of praise, almost equivalent in meaning to anenklētos. The same is true of amemptos, blameless, except that here the legal background is absent and the word has more of an emotional content.

OT The NT use of anenklētos is not theologically affected by the OT or LXX. The word is found only in 3 Macc.; amiantos only in Wis. 3:13; 4:2; 8:20. and 2

Macc. 14:36; 15:34; aspilos only at Job 15:15 (Symmachus). Only amemptos appears more frequently, in the book of Job, where it is used together with dikaios, just, and katharos, pure, cf. Job 11:4; 12:4. amōmos stands for tāmīm and cognates at Exod. 29:1; Lev. 1:3, 10; 3:1, 6, 9; 4:3, 14, 28, 32; 5:15, 18, 25 (6:5); 9:2 f.; 14:10; 22:19, 21; 23:12, 18; Num. 6:14; 19:2; 28:3, 9, 11, 19, 31; 29:2, 8, 13, 17, 20, 23, 26, 29, 32, 36; 2 Sam. 22:24, 31, 33; Pss. 15(14):2; 18(17):23, 30, 32; 19(18):7, 13; 37(36), 18; 64(63):4; 101(100):2, 6; 119(118):1, 80; Prov. 11:5, 20; 20:7; Ezek. 28:15; 43:22 f., 25; 45:18, 23; 46:4, 6, 13. It stands for m'ûm, blemish, used with a negative at Dan. 1:4, but is otherwise without Heb. equivalent at Exod. 29:1, 38; Lev. 4:14; 12:6; 23:18; Num. 7:69, 88; 15:24; 28:27; Ps. 37(36):28; Prov. 22:11; Eccl. 11:9; Wis. 2:22; Sir. 31(34):8; 40:19; Isa. 33:15; 1 Macc. 4:42. amōmotēs is found only in variant translations of Ps. 26(25):1, 11. amemptos translates 9 different Heb. terms: bar, pure (Job 11:4); zākâh (Job 15:14) and zākak (Job 15:15; 25:5), pure; ḥap, pure (Job 33:9); ṣāḥēr, clean (Job 4:17); nāqī, free from guilt, innocent (Job 22:19); tām, unblemished, blameless (Job 9:20); tāmīm, unblemished, blameless (Gen. 17:1; Job 12:4); ṣāḏaq, righteous (Job 22:3); and yāšār, upright, blameless (Job 2:3). It has no Heb. equivalent at Wis. 10:5, 15; 18:21. The adv. amemptōs is found only at Est. 3:13.

NT 1. aneklētōs, not accused, without reproach, is found in the NT along with the other related terms mentioned in CL 2 above. In relation to their original meanings the words have here taken on theological ideas arising to a considerable extent from their context. The meaning of aneklētōs in the Pastorals (Tit. 1:6 f.; 1 Tim. 3:10) is akin to the usage in Hellenistic colloquial speech. Under discussion here are the qualifications for office in the church as a deacon, elder or → bishop. The other adjectives used in this context indicate that the meaning is beyond reproach, in the ordinary sense of common respectability. Thus in addition to qualifications of a spiritual nature, ordinary standards of decency are made into preconditions of office in the church, for the sake of the church's good name in the world. The adoption of Hellenistic Stoic ideas also marks other aspects of the theology of the Pastoral Epistles.

2. aneklētōs is found in the original, legal sense in 1 Cor. 1:8 and Col. 1:22.

(a) 1 Cor. 1:8 speaks of the eschatological day of the Lord (→ Present, art. hēmera). God promises believers that he will keep them firm (bebaiōsei) to stand blameless, i.e. innocent, on the day of the Lord. This blamelessness is not to be understood as an ethical quality and so as the Christian's own achievement, but rather follows from the call into fellowship with Christ (v. 9); and blamelessness on the day of the Lord is the consequence of holding fast to fellowship with Jesus Christ until the end (telos, v. 8).

(b) A similar affirmation is made in Col. 1:22. This passage also speaks of → judgment. Again it is the work of Christ, i.e. the → reconciliation which has been effected by his death, that forms the basis of the Christian's blamelessness. The writer is speaking of justification. Alongside aneklētōs, the word drawn from the original legal and moral thought of Hellenism, he uses here amōmos, faultless, a word drawn from the language of Jewish ritual (cf. Phil. 2:15; Eph. 5:27; 1 Pet. 1:19). Both words have been divorced from their Hellenistic or Jewish origins by the new content given to them. The deliverance from well-merited accusation which is already (nyni, now, v. 22) beginning through faith in Jesus Christ (v. 23) has as its final purpose (v. 22 parastēsai, to present you, a final infinitive) the confirmation of this state of blamelessness on the day of the Lord (katenōpion autou, before his face; cf. Rom. 8:33 f.).

3. amiantos, undefiled, pure, is used to express the purity of Christ as High Priest (Heb. 7:26), of our heavenly inheritance (1 Pet. 1:4), of sexual relations within marriage (Heb. 13:4), and of practical religion (Jas. 1:27). The common factor is the absence of anything which would constitute defilement before God (→ Defile, art. miainō). There are cultic overtones in each of these contexts, even in those cases where it is a question of everyday living, for the secular is to be hallowed. amōmos means unblemished in the cultic sense of free from defects, and hence Christ is described as “a lamb spotless and without blemish [amnos amōmos kai aspilos]” (1 Pet. 1:19). He “presented himself as an offering without blemish to God [heauton prosēnenken amōmon tō theō]” (Heb. 9:14). amōmos is used in the moral and religious sense of blameless of the Christian community (Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Col. 1:22 with hagios and anenklētos; 2 Pet. 3:14 v.l. with aspilos; Phil. 2:15; Rev. 14:5; cf. Jude 24). For the use of amemptos → Guilt, art. amemptos. H. Währisch ἀρετή (aretē), virtue.

ἀρετή

CL The noun aretē is related to the vb. arariskō, to fit together, and is derived from the root ari- which is also seen in areskō, to please, arestos, pleasing, and aristos, best. Originally it meant the specific quality appropriate to an object or a person.

1. In the early classical period, the term aretē was used fairly universally with reference to things, animals, men and gods. Thus it can connote the excellent quality of arms or horses (Hdt., 3, 88; Plato, Republic 335b). Homer speaks of the aretē of the gods and demonstrations of their power (Il. 9, 498; → Strength, art. bia). This religious usage is found right up to the Hellenistic period (Philo, Som. 1, 256; Spec. Leg. 1, 209; Josephus, Ant. 17, 130; 18, 266). Usually, however, the reference is to human qualities, e.g. aretē of feet, in fighting, or of the mind (Homer, Il. 15, 642; 20, 411). Thus aretē is used of the whole man, of both physical and spiritual abilities. In this sense aretē may describe the quality of women (Homer, Od. 2, 206) or courage of men (Xen., Anabasis 1, 4, 8; cf. Lat. virtus). The extraordinarily wide variety of uses to which this word can be put also extends to good fortune (Homer, Od. 13, 45; Hesiod, Works 313) in a more general sense, and the glory (doxa; Soph., Philoctetes 1420), which all men seek.

2. The meaning of the concept of virtue is limited in the case of Socrates, who used aretē to describe not general human qualities which are outwardly apparent, but only morality. His individualistic and rationalist ethic removes the ties binding aretē to the polis, making it into something based upon man's striving for the good, and leading to the thesis that virtue may be learned. He who attains a true insight into the good, will also do it (Plato, Protagoras 329 f.; Apology 25d).

Plato saw virtue as conditioned by the soul and in his doctrine of the soul (Republic 1, 353; 2, 376e) developed the sequence of the four classic virtues: sophia, wisdom; andreia, courage; sōphrosynē, prudence; and dikaiosynē, justice (Republic

4, 433). This scheme of the four cardinal virtues is taken over by the Wisdom literature (see below, OT 2) and Cicero (de Officiis).

In contrast to the psychology of Plato, Aristotle regarded virtue as hexis, i.e. as the permanent pattern of behaviour of a person, depending on his qualities and decisions (cf. his definition in Eth. Nic. 2, 4 f.; 1106a 14 ff.). He distinguished between ethical, i.e. practical virtues, which include courage, temperance and generosity; and dianoetic virtues, i.e. ways in which the reason is used, which include insight, wisdom, knowledge and art (cf. Eth. Nic. 1130 ff.). Ontologically, virtue is defined as the mean between two extremes (the doctrine of mesotēs, Eth. Nic. 1107a).

3. The Stoics emphasized the agreement between the virtues and human nature (kata physin zēn means kat' aretēn zēn, to live according to nature means to live according to virtue). They serve no outside purpose, such as the interests of the state or of the gods, but are an end in themselves, bringing about by means of knowledge and practice the goal of eudaimonia, happiness (Seneca, Ep. 66, 31 f.; Cicero, Leg. 1, 8; 1, 16; cf. also Diogenes Laertius, 7, 81 ff.; 10, 132 ff.). The Platonic scheme of the four cardinal virtues became the basis for summaries of the virtues, the so-called catalogues of virtue (Epictetus, Dissertationes 2, 16, 45; 3, 2, 3 and 14; 3, 22, 13; and often). Similar catalogues of virtue are found in Philo (Sacr. 22, 27; Leg. All. 1, 86; Spec. Leg. 3, 63), in Qumran (see below, OT 3) and in the NT (see below, NT 3).

OT 1. The Heb. language has no word corresponding to the Gk. aretē. The only places where the word occurs in the canonical books of the LXX are Isa. 42:8, 12; 43:21; 63:7, where it translates hillâh*, praiseworthy deed, the praise of Yahweh, and two occasions where it stands for hōd, majesty (Hab. 3:3, with reference to Yahweh; and Zech. 6:13, where it refers to Joshua, the priestly messiah-designate). In none of these instances does it represent a toning down of the OT concept of Yahweh's acts in history (which are especially prominent in Isa.) to accommodate this to Gk. ideas of quality.

2. aretē is often mentioned in the books of Maccabees, especially 4 Macc. In 2 Macc. 6:31 the martyrdom of Eleazar is called a memorial of his aretē (cf. 4 Macc. 1:8, 10). In 4 Macc. aretē often means the martyrs' loyalty to the faith, which they have maintained until death despite suffering and torture (4 Macc. 7:22; 9:8, 18; 10:10; 11:2; 17:12, 17). At the same time we find the Gk. concept of aretē as courage (2 Macc. 15:17), manliness (4 Macc. 17:23), cleverness (4 Macc. 1:2), or reason (4 Macc. 1:30). Gk. influence can be detected also in the Book of Wisdom, when in Wis. 5:13 virtue is contrasted with wickedness, and in Wis. 4:1 it is linked with immortality. In Wis. 8:7 the four Platonic cardinal virtues are named.

3. In a way similar to the Stoic writers, the Qumran community included in its Community Rule catalogues of virtues and vices, which contrast the behaviour of the righteous and the wicked in accordance with the OT idea of the two ways (cf. Jer. 21:8b) and the sect's own dualistic outlook on the world (1QS 4:3–14; 10:22, 25 f.). The virtues which characterize the children of light are purity (1QS 4:5), wisdom (1QS 4:6), love (1QS 2:24; 5:4), humility (1QS 2:24), and faithful observance of the law (1QS 8:2; 10:25 f.), while among the many and various vices of the children of darkness particular prominence is given to immorality and impurity (1QS 4:10; CD 8:5; 19:17), lying (1QS 4:9; 10:20) and hatred (CD 8:6; 19:18). (On Qumran teaching see A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and Its Meaning, 1966.)

NT The term aretē does not play a crucial part in the vocabulary of the NT. It appears only once in Paul (Phil. 4:8), once in 1 Pet. (2:9), and 3 times in 2 Pet. (1:3, 5). More important are the catalogues of virtues (and vices), in which the virtues of the Christian (and vices of the non-Christian) are spelled out.

1. In 1 Pet. 2:9 and 2 Pet. 1:3 it is God's aretē that is mentioned. Since 1 Pet. 2:9 is a citation of the LXX version of Isa. 43:21, the acc. plur. aretas should be rendered as in Isa. (see above, OT 1), praiseworthy acts. These are to be proclaimed by the old people of God and by the new. More Gk. thought may be recognized in the sentence in 2 Pet. 1:3 f., which mentions, along with aretē, doxa (glory) and dynamis (power) (see above, CL 1). aretē here means God's attribute of perfection, which through its manifestations of power (dynamis) has granted gifts to men, by which they in their turn, as v. 4 puts it, are to become partakers of the divine nature (theias physeōs), i.e. likewise the divine virtue of perfection (cf. Matt. 5:48). In the background here is the Gk. idea of the relatedness of divine nature and human nature (cf. also Acts 17:28).

2. The two other instances (Phil. 4:8 and 2 Pet. 1:5) speak of human virtue. In both cases the term aretē forms part of a series in a comprehensive list of virtues, and both series have parallels in classical literature (with Phil. 4:8 cf. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5, 23, 67; with 2 Pet. 1:5 ff. cf. OGI § 438). aretē is used in both these passages not, as in 4 Macc. (see above, OT 2) of loyalty to the faith (thus O. Bauernfeind, TDNT I 460 f.), but as a general term for good and correct behaviour in Christians.

3. The connexion between individual words for virtue in the NT and corresponding lists in non-Christian Gk. literature is indisputable. Thus, for example, Paul speaks quite unreservedly about "what is good" (Rom. 12:9), or about "whatever is just, whatever is honourable, whatever is lovely" (Phil. 4:8), as the goal which Christians ought to strive to attain. The earliest church was thus fully aware of good qualities in the heathen, and brought → conscience (Rom. 2:14) and virtue into its Christian proclamation. On the other hand, we should not overlook the differences between Stoic and Christian catalogues of virtue, or between the Gk. and NT concepts of virtue. The Platonic scheme of the four cardinal virtues (see above, CL 2) does not appear in the NT catalogues. Instead, all the virtues, though individually drawn in part from Gk. lists, are brought under the main concepts of love (Gal. 5:22; Eph. 4:32–5:2; Col. 3:12) or of faith (Eph. 4:2 ff.; 2 Pet. 1:5) and are controlled by these. Nor does the NT know the Aristotelian distinction between practical and theoretical virtues (see above, CL 2). It stresses rather the totality of our actions, both as practical acts and as expressions of obedience. Finally – and this is of great importance – it must be said that the Stoic's view of himself as autonomous in his virtues (see above, CL 3), is one completely foreign to the NT. Here the virtues are the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22), subservient to mutual love and the glorification of God. Hence, the NT virtues are not derived from the harmony of the soul (Plato) nor from the quality of the man (Aristotle), but are seen as gracious gifts (charisma) of the divine Spirit: they are the actions and the marks of God's new creation.

4. The infrequent occurrence of the term aretē, and still more the different basis and composition of the catalogues of virtue, mean that in the NT – and therefore also in reformed theology – "virtue" in its autonomous, secular sense has no place. Attempts have been made again and again, to combine the Gk. concept of virtue with Christian theology, e.g. by Ambrose (De Officiis Ministrorum 1, 24–49), Augustine (De Libero Arbitrio 1, 27), and Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologiae 1a 2ae. 55–67; 2a 2ae. 101–22), right up to Schleiermacher and some recent Catholic writing (J. Pieper); but such attempts remain highly problematical. In Pauline and reformed theology the place of autonomous virtue, based on a rationalist ethic, is taken by the Spirit-given freedom of the Christian, which is both developed and maintained in love.

H.-G. Link, A. Ringwald

Haustafeln

1. Definition. By this term, which derives from Luther (see B. J. Kidd, Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation, 1911, 220–22), NT scholarship means a body of formalized ethical teaching by which members of the early communities were expected to conform to the standards of their contemporary society, but with a Christian motivation. In particular, the imperatives are addressed to husbands, wives, parents, children, masters and slaves. The purpose of the Haustafeln (lit. “house-tables”) was to ensure the good ordering of the various relationships in which members of the household or family stood.

2. Virtues and Vices. Included under the fabric of Haustafeln are catalogues of virtues and vices which most likely are indebted to Jewish proselyte catechism as the church took over lists of ethical qualities required by its self-understanding as a neo-levitical community (P. Carrington, A Primitive Christian Catechism, 1940, developed from G. Klein, Der älteste christliche Katechismus und die jüdische Propaganda-Literatur, 1909). This suggested origin has been challenged in more recent times, mainly by those who have traced the origin of such ethical lists to Stoicism (A. Vögtle, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament, 1936) or even to Iranian influences, mediated through sectarian Judaism (S. Wibbing, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament, 1959). Finally, E. Kamlah (Die Form der katalogischen Paränese im Neuen Testament, 1964) has sought to combine the two separate strands of the exhortation (i. promises and threats, partly based on lex talionis: “destruction to the destroyer”: see E. Käsemann, “Sentences of Holy Law in the NT”, New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 66–81; and ii. the themes of deponentes/induentes, i.e. putting off the old life as a prelude to putting on a new life, which he traces to the hellenistic syncretism of the mystery cults). But D. Schroeder (“Lists, Ethical”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 546) argues against this on the ground of the more likely background in the ethical dualism of the OT. There apocalyptic promises and threats contain lists of blessings and curses (Deut. 27 ff.).

The lists of vices and virtues found in Gal. 5:19–23; Phil. 4:8; Col. 3:5, 12 (cf. 2 Cor. 12:20) owe only formal similarities to OT and contemporary models, whether in Stoic moral philosophy or the Dead Sea scrolls (see Wibbing), and there are no parallels to the “fruit of the Spirit” in Stoicism, just as there are observable transferences of meaning. For instance, → “humility” (tapeinophrosynē) is a term of opprobrium in Greek thought (W. Grundmann, TDNT VIII 2), whereas in the Dead Sea Scrolls (1QS 5:3 f.; cf. 1QS 2:24; 4:3 f.; 5:25) and in Paul (e.g. Phil. 2:3; Col. 3:12) it connotes a practice of living together in community before God in such a way that other people are given a dignity and respect as they too are seen in God’s sight (Rom. 12:3, 10). The “humility” of Christ becomes a model by which human conduct is shaped by the Christian's conformity and obedience (see 2 Cor. 10:1; Phil. 2:4 ff.). Thus → "love" (agapē) – especially of one's enemy (Rom. 12:19–21), a thought absent from the Dead Sea Scrolls – becomes the norm to distinguish virtue from vice, especially as that love is seen in "life in Christ" and its social implications.

In the Pastorals, the ethical lists are extended and their range enlarged to include both virtues to be practised and sins to be avoided by church leaders (1 Tim. 3:1–13; Titus 1:5–9), but occasionally the list reaches out to include a more general coverage (Titus 3:3). The indictment of Gentile sins derives from Wis. 14:23–26; cf. Rom. 1:26–32; 1 Cor. 6:9–10; Col. 3:5; 1 Peter 4:3 (Vögtle, op. cit., 96 ff.). Women members are especially singled out in the Pastorals, based on Plutarch, Praec. conj. 139–41 (ibid., 81, 91). The good qualities expected of the ruler (ibid., 73 ff.), the king (ibid., 74), the general (ibid., 80) and the midwife (Soranos, Gynaecia I–II, c. A.D. 100; ibid., 80) are displayed in the tables in B. S. Easton, The Pastoral Epistles, 1948, 201.

Virtues and vices recur in a formalized "Two Ways" scheme, found in Didache 1–5; Barn. 18–20 and Hermas, Man. 6, 1, cf. Ignatius, Magn. 5; 2 Clem. 4. Many think that there is, underlying these documents, a Jewish proselyte-catechism (evidence for which is in Test. Levi 19:1, Test. Judah 20:1, which teaches two ways of light and darkness, governed by two spirits of truth and deceit: this suggestion is now confirmed by IQS, though the contrast is typically OT, e.g. Ps. 1:6; Jer. 21:8; Prov. 4:18, 19).

The conclusion of this discussion is to shift the origin of ethical lists in early Christianity away from Hellenistic sources (where, to be sure, the rudimentary lists of good versus evil are attested in the Orphics and Pythagoreans and go as far back as to Heracleitus' antitheses) to the OT-Jewish tradition. Deissmann's ingenious suggestion that 1 Cor. 6:9, 10 was based on the practice of children's moral instruction where counters, as separate discs, were labelled with vices and shuffled in a game (Light from the Ancient East, 1927³, 316) is less cogent than it seems in view of the common catalogue of virtues and vices in proselyte mission-propaganda which, in turn, derived from the OT tradition.

3. House-tables. In the strict sense of the term, the rules formulated to govern behaviour patterns within the Christian household are limited to specific classes. These appear in the earliest attested Christian Haustafel (Col. 3:18–4:1: so E. Schweizer, Der Brief an die Kolosser, 1976, 159) as: wives, husbands, children, parents, slaves, masters. The best description of these injunctions (set in the imperative mood) is station code (Schroeder). That is, Christians are addressed according to their station in life, and especially within the Christian household. Each party is named, a command is given, and a motivation for behaviour is supplied (W. Lillie, "The Pauline House-tables", ExpT 86, 1974–75, 180). The same pattern recurs in Eph. 5:22–6:9 (which represents a redaction of the Colossian Haustafel); 1 Pet. 2:18–3:7; Tit. 2:2–10; 1 Tim. 2:9–15; cf. 1 Clem. 21:6–8; Ignatius, Poly. 4:1–6:2; Polycarp, Phil. 4:2–6:1. The key thought in the NT examples is submission, though there is a reciprocity between the members (e.g. Eph. 5:21), not found outside of the NT; and the primary motive behind these admonitions is that such an attitude expresses subordination to Christ's Lordship (so W. Schrage, "Zur Ethik der neutestamentlichen Haustafeln", NTS 21, 1975–76, 1–22, though more specific and concrete reasons have been suggested, as we shall observe later).

Other blocks of similar material contain encouragements addressed to Christians who are called to be submissive to their church leaders (“overseers”, “elders”, “deacons”, based on earlier teaching in 1 Thess. 5:12, 13; Heb. 13:17: the leaders are commended as worthy of respect and obedience in the Pastorals, e.g. 1 Tim. 3; Tit. 1:6 ff., though in 2:2 ff. the admonition shades into a general call to the “older men” in the congregation). Widows are a particular responsibility in these paraenetic sections (1 Tim. 5:3–16) that are more properly called “church codes”. The summons in 1 Tim. 2:1 ff. to pray for public officials in the state is another aspect of these “tables” (Rom. 13:1–7 uses the key-verb, “be submissive” to the ruling authorities, a theme enforced in 1 Pet. 2:13–17).

4. Backgrounds to the House-tables. “Historical study of the Christian Haustafeln is at an impasse” (J. E. Crouch, The Origin and Intention of the Colossian Haustafel, 1972, 32). The reason for this negative assessment is that, in a field of diverse and competing theories, no one hypothesis can be supported by indisputable evidence that is unambiguous and explains all the features. A survey of the leading suggestions made to account for the presence of this standardized teaching in the NT epistles confirms this statement.

At least at one point there is a consensus. The use of paraenetic material in Col. 3:18–4:1 is not occasioned by the local situation of Onesimus’ return to Philemon at Colossae. See F. F. Bruce, Colossians, 1957, 293 n. 153 and R. P. Martin, Colossians and Philemon, 1974, 123 f. 147, citing Col. 3:25 and Phm. 17, 18. The content of the Colossian Haustafel is traditional teaching, brought over and used by Paul for other reasons. Most plausibly its function is to repel false ideas that derived from the gnostic heresy at Colossae (see below). But what may be known of the pattern of ethical teaching on which the Colossian code as an independent, self-contained unit is based?

(a) A view, stated by M. Dibelius (H. Greeven, An die Kolosser, 1953, 48–50) and elaborated by his pupil K. Weidinger, Die Haustafeln, 1928 (on this see W. K. Lowther Clarke, New Testament Problems, 1929, 157–160), found the origin of the Christian house-tables in Hellenistic, specifically Stoic, moral philosophy. Key phrases, such as “it is proper” (anēken, Col. 3:18), “it is pleasing” (to God) (euareston, Col. 3:20), are appealed to in support, since these rubrics are found in Stoic literature. Moreover, “in the Lord” (v. 20) is only loosely attached to the second phrase, and this suggests an added Christian pendant. The Pauline version represents a bold appropriation of a Hellenistic code that is taken over and “Christianized” (Verchristlichung is Dibelius’ term, op. cit., 49).

There is undoubtedly a pagan model in the background. Duties (what the Greeks called “unwritten laws”, nomima agrapha) to the gods, heroes, the aged, parents, friends, one’s country are commonplace (Diogenes Laert., 7, 117–25; 8, 22 ff.). Stobaeus preserves fragments of a different kind in which duties (Stoic kathēkonta) to family members – parents, brothers, wife, children and slaves – are covered (Weidinger, 27–34, 41 f.). Several writers mention similar obligations in tabulated form (especially Aristotle, Pol. 1, 2; Seneca, Ep. 94; Plutarch, Lib. Ed. 10; cf. Epictetus, Dissertationes 2, 10, 3, 7). No one list is exhaustive, but a skeletal basis has been inferred, to be clothed by different writers (Weidinger, 38 f.). The reason for the Christian adoption of such a scheme was found in a waning of an imminent parousia (Dibelius), and the need to regulate the inner life of the church on a non-enthusiastic, non-eschatological basis (Weidinger, 9).

The popularity of this theory has been considerable (Crouch, 21 n. 42), but it is open to criticism, especially to do with the reason why Christians needed to borrow from contemporary sources. Weidinger is vulnerable to the charge that the differences between non-Christian and Christian material are greater than he allows. Motivations are different, and the whole setting of the specific rubrics is unparalleled in Stoic writing. Words such as “pleasing” (euarestos) are not unique to the Haustafeln (Eph. 5:10; Rom. 12:2; 14:18; 2 Cor. 5:9; Heb. 12:28; 1 Clem. 35:5; 41:1; 62:2).

(b) At the opposite end of the scale, K. H. Rengstorf (Mann und Frau im Urchristentum, 1954) and D. Schroeder have pleaded the cause of the Haustafeln as being uniquely Christian. To be sure, different models are proposed. Rengstorf looks back to the infancy narratives of Luke 1, 2 where the home-life of John and Jesus are described. Joseph like Zechariah is paterfamilias, and the boy Jesus is submissive (hypotassesthai in Luke 2:51 – the key term in the epistles). Schroeder postulates multiple roots of the codes, reaching back to the OT apodictic law, to Judaic tradition and most importantly to the Jesus-tradition underlying 1 Cor. 7:10; cf. Eph. 4:20. Both views are to be seriously questioned (Crouch, op. cit., 24–31), though there is no denying the primacy and uniqueness of the agapē-motif in Paul’s counsels, a motif that does ultimately stretch back to Jesus’ self-giving in the incarnation.

(c) More likely is the cluster of views that begin with the place of obedience to God’s will, seen first in Jewish prescriptions (E. Lohmeyer, Die Briefe an die Kolosser, etc., 1930) and extended to form part of the outreach in Gentile missionary propaganda on the part of hellenistic Judaism (Crouch, ch. 6). The main authorities are Philo, Hypothetica 7:1–9 (cf. Decal. 165 ff.), Josephus, Ap. 2, 190–219 and ps.-Phocylides, an Alexandrian Jew (Weidinger, 23). These writers show some hint of the so-called Noachian laws by which the conduct of Gentiles was to be governed in matters of elementary morals (concerning immorality, idolatry, dietary rules). There is a link between the Noachian laws and the “unwritten laws” – basic moral and family precepts among the Greeks. Here was a meeting place between Judaism and Hellenism, and in both cultures a listing of social duties is common.

The Jewish missionary concern to influence Gentiles in the direction of ethical monotheism found greatest success among those disposed to accept a summary of duties and obligations as minimal, even if they stopped short of complete conversion as proselytes. The class of Gentile “God-fearers” is well-known in Judaism and the NT. It is highly probable that, as Judaism’s offshoot, the primitive church reached out to evangelize, it would be this class that would naturally respond and need the codification of the apostolic decree (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25 on which see M. Simon, “The Apostolic Decree”, BJRL 52, 1969–70, 437–60). Later a Christianized version of a proselyte catechism that originally was used in Jewish-Hellenistic mission evangelism emerged as we have seen. It is in this confluence of materials – Greek “divine laws” (cf. Antigone, 11, 450 ff.) as modified by Stoic idealism, Jewish missionary tracts aimed at potential adherents, and a Christianized application to the new life in Christ – that the origin of the NT Haustafeln may be traced.

5. Haustafeln as used by Paul and his Disciples. J. E. Crouch has offered the most convincing raison d’être of Paul’s use of Haustafeln. We may take up and extend his thesis. He notes the importance of the teaching in Gal. 3:27–29 to the effect that in Christ the disabilities that Judaism imposed on Gentiles, women and slaves are removed. It is reasonable to suppose, given the nature of Corinthian gnosticizing enthusiasm whose watchwords were “freedom”, “gnosis”, and “spiritual”, that the Pauline statement of religious equality in Christ would be heard as a promise of social egalitarianism. So Paul modifies and corrects this tendency in 1 Cor. 7:17–24 (remain in your station) and 14:33–38 (women are to stay in their place). The effect of the Haustafeln is to confirm this restriction as binding and to safeguard the good order of the church against revolutionary attempts to undermine it by a false claim to unbridled freedom in the name of gnostic enlightenment and licence. The Haustafeln are therefore a counter-measure in the name of Pauline “orthodoxy” to keep the social fabric in check, partly on the theological ground of the creation ordinances of the Torah, and partly on the pragmatic level which requires that the Christian is not at liberty to overturn the social framework by denying the Jewish basis of the faith, by getting involved in a slave-uprising of the Spartacus type or by promoting a feminist movement. There are indications that Paul’s controls were so understood in Eph. 5:22–6:9, 1 Tim. 2:9–15, and 1 Peter 3:1–7 (written under Pauline influence).

R. P. Martin

→ Defile, → Guilt, → Love, → Punishment, → Pure, → Righteousness

On aretē, anenklētos and aspilos:

(a). O. Bauernfeind, aretē, TDNT I 457–61; W. Grundmann, anenklētos, TDNT I 356 f.; and memphomai etc., TDNT IV 571–74; A. Oepke, aspilos, TDNT I 502.

(b). J. Gründel, “Tugend”, LTk X 395 ff.; M. Hoffmann, Ethische Terminologie bei Homer, Hesiod, Jambikern und Tragikern, (Dissertation, Tübingen) 1914; E. Kamlah, Die Form der katalogischen Paränese im Neuen Testament, WUNT 7, 1964; A. Kiefer, Aretalogische Studien, (Dissertation, Freiburg) 1929; J. Klein, “Tugend”, *RGG*³ VI 1080 ff.; S. Reiter, “Aretē und der Titel von Philo ‘Legatio’”, in Epitymbion. Heinrich Swoboda dargebracht, 1928, 228–37; J. Stenzel, Studien zur platonischen Dialektik . . . Aretē und Diairesis, 1917; A. Vögtle, “Tugendkataloge”, LTk X 399 f.; S. Wibbing, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament und ihre Traditionsgeschichte unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Qumran-Texte, BZnW 25, 1959.

On Haustafeln in addition to the articles mentioned in the text of the article see the following:

(a). D. Daube, “Haustafeln”, in The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 90–105; B. S. Easton, “New Testament Ethical Lists”, JBL 51, 1932, 1–12; A. M. Hunter, Paul and his Predecessors, revised edition 1961, 52–57, 128–31; K. E. Kirk, The Vision of God: The Christian Doctrine of the Summum Bonum, Bampton Lectures for 1931, 1932²; L. H. Marshall, The Challenge of New Testament Ethics, 1956; J. N. Sevenster, Paul and Seneca, Supplement to NovT 4, 1961.

(b). H. Conzelmann, Exkursus “Die Haustafeln” zu Kol. 3, 18 ff., in An die Kolosser, 1976¹⁴; L. Goppelt, “Jesus und die ‘Haustafel’-Tradition”, in Orientierung an Jesus. Festschrift J. Schmid, 1973, 93–106; W. Schrage, Die konkreten Einzelgebote in der paulinischen Paränese, 1961; E. Schweizer, “Die Weltlichkeit des Neuen Testaments: Die Haustafeln”, in Beiträge zur alttestamentlichen Theologie. Festschrift W. Zimmerli, 1977; H.-D. Wendland, Ethik des Neuen Testament, Eine Einführung, 1970, 67 ff., 93 ff.

W

Walk, Run, Way, Conduct

ἀναστρέφω ἀναστρέφω (anastrephō), to upset, overturn, turn back, turn round; fig. act, behave, conduct oneself, live; ἀναστροφή (anastrophē), turning back; fig. way of life, conduct, behaviour.

CL anastrophē is the noun derived from the compound anastrephō, from strophō, to turn, turn round. From Homer onwards, it has a great range of meaning in Gk. The vb. has the transitive meaning of to upset, to turn upside down, and the intransitive of to turn back, to turn round. In the middle and passive forms, too, the meaning of turning round, return, is to the fore (Homer, Il. 23, 436); thence follows the meaning of turning back and forth (in a place) or dawdling around, and lingering (Homer, Od. 13, 326), and finally the figurative meaning of human behaviour, to walk, to conduct oneself, to live in a particular way (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 2, 1p, 1103b, 20; Epictetus, Dissertationes 3, 15, 5). The noun, found from Aeschylus and the Pre-Socratics onwards with several meanings, denotes intransitively a turning round or a turning movement, a resting-place in later poetic speech only, and then also the figurative sense of way of life, conduct (Polybius, 4, 82, 1).

From there anastrophē and anastrephomai have an ethical sense, which is found throughout the whole ancient world, and in no way needs to be explained simply from the Heb. hālak. The kind of behaviour is more precisely described by adv., adj., or prepositional expressions, followed by en, in. In Gk. inscriptions from Roman times, conduct of life is judged by particular standards and distinguished by value-predicates such as “good and praiseworthy”, “at all times blameless and fearless”, “good, responsible and worthy of the city [axiōs]” (cf. Die Inschriften von Pergamon in M. Fraenkel, ed., Pergamon VIII, Nos. 459, 5; 470, 4; 496, 5 ff.).

OT In the LXX the vb. anastrephō stands 87 times for Heb. šūb, to turn round, to return, but only in the literal sense. Eight times the Heb. equivalent is hālak, walk, but only in 1 Ki. 6:12; Prov. 8:20; 20:7 does the figurative sense of walking (in God’s commandments, in righteousness, etc.) apply. “Walking rightly”, anastrephomenon orthōs, in Ezek. 22:30 (LXX) is a free translation of the Heb. text: there is no corresponding Heb. vb. The noun anastrophē is encountered only in the Apocrypha (3 times) and only with the figurative meaning (Tob. 4:14, to show oneself well brought up in one’s whole way of life; 2 Macc. 5:8, bad manner of life; 6:23, impeccable conduct from boyhood). The Hellenistic stamp of the term is here very clear.

In later Jewish writings, and also in the Dead Sea Scrolls, the Heb. hālak, corresponding with Gk. anastrephō, is used frequently everywhere, and that both in positive and negative senses, often in connexion with the figurative use of “way” as walking in the way of God or in the way of sin (cf. IQS 1:6, 8, 15, 25; 2:2, 14, 26; 3:9, 18, 20 f. and often).

NT In the NT the vb. occurs only 9 times, the noun 13 times. Both words are totally absent from the four Gospels, occur seldom in Paul, and more frequently in the post-Pauline writings; 1 and 2 Pet. and Heb. are the areas of chief concentration. The literal sense of the verb is found only in Acts 5:22 and 15:16; otherwise only the figurative meaning is found. Apart from Heb. 10:33, where the vb. stands generally for living, taking place, the word-group is used throughout to designate way of life, and thus clearly belongs to the realm of paraenesis.

1. (a) Since noun and vb. are in themselves neutral terms, which only gain positive or negative valuation by means of attributes, they can designate a pre- or non-Christian (Jewish, Gal. 1:33; heathen, Eph. 2:3) way of life just as much as a Christian (2 Cor. 1:2). The kind of life led depends on what determines a man's thoughts and actions. The determining factor can be an ethical value-system (cf. Gk. inscriptions) or the Jewish faith which effects a corresponding Jewish way of life (Gal. 1:13). Lack of any obligation leads to an unbridled manner of life, where a man follows only his desires (1 Pet. 1:14; 2 Pet. 2:7) and finally destroys himself (Eph. 4:22).

(b) Turning to Christ implies a simultaneous turning away from a man's previous way of life, for which Christ frees and enables him. We see here – as the distribution of the word-group already indicated – the problems of the second and third generation, who are not only occupied with the missionary impetus but also concerned with the maintenance of faith in the community. The main point is to translate knowledge into practice. By → faith and → baptism man is introduced into the domain of power of Jesus Christ; he lives “in Christ” and thus in a new fellowship with God. The knowledge of the earlier perversity of his way of life (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14 ff.; Gal. 1:13; Eph. 2:1 ff.; 4:22; Col. 1:21 ff.; 3:1–17) makes him conscious of the new, and helps him to set aside the old. It is the person and work of Jesus Christ, or God who through Christ has freed him for a new life of obedience, piety and holiness (2 Cor. 1:12; 1 Pet. 1:15, 17; 3:16), which determines and stamps the new style of Christian conduct. Growing as it does out of the life bound to God or Christ, this kind of conduct can itself assume exemplary significance (1 Tim. 4:12; Heb. 13:7), and be crowned by an appropriate end of life (Heb. 13:7). For such a walk in the Christian community as the “household of God” (1 Tim. 3:15) the First Letter to Timothy intended to give instructions.

Such Christian conduct, however, is threatened continuously by a double danger: reversion to heathen modes of conduct (2 Pet. 2:8), and legalism, where in place of adherence to the person of Christ impersonal norms, foreign to Christ, enter in as regulating points of conduct (cf. in 1 Tim. 4:11 ff. the struggle against false teachers who wish to make celibacy and abstention from certain foods compulsory; cf. M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 65 ff.).

2. The word-group has particular significance in the paraenesis of 1 Pet. Here the present, in which Christians live in the world “as aliens and exiles”, is seen as a time of testing for faith (1 Pet. 2:11 f.). The exhortation to live in a Christian way is thereby grounded (a) in their having been eschatologically called out by a holy God;

(b) by invoking the Father, who is also Judge of all and cannot be bribed, and (c) on the sacrificial death of Jesus, understood as a ransom “from the futile ways inherited from your fathers” (1 Pet. 1:15–18). But the exhortation to a way of life in conformity with Christ is also important for this reason, that the Christians are living under the critical eyes of a heathen environment. As Paul in 2 Cor. 3:2 can call the Corinthian community his “letter of recommendation” (in contrast with the written letters of commendation hawked about by his opponents), so it now becomes increasingly important that the Christians’ way of life counts as a touchstone for the power of the gospel to which they bear witness. It can contradict the suspicions and slanders of the heathen environment and perhaps even gain the opponents and slanderers (1 Pet. 2:12; 3:1; 3:16).

3. Alternative terms for anastrophē are agōgē and peripateō.

(a) agōgē occurs only at 2 Tim. 3:10. The basic meaning is leading, especially in the sense of upbringing (cf. paidagōgos, custodian, → Teach) and then kind of life, conduct as the result of a particular upbringing (cf. K. L. Schmidt, TDNT I, 128 f.). 2 Tim. 3:10 (“You have followed my . . . conduct”) has a double sense: You have let me lead you – and now you are conducting your life just as I did, namely, as a Christian, “in Christ” (cf. vv. 12 and 14).

(b) → peripateō, which in the figurative sense is the most common NT word for designating manner of life, is used almost exclusively by Paul and John.

G. Ebel

ὁδός

ὁδός (hodos), way, road, highway, way of life; μεθοδεία (methodeia), method, in biblical and Christian literature only in an unfavourable sense, i.e. scheming, craftiness; (plur.) tricks; μέθοδος (methodos), planned procedure; εἴσοδος (eishodos), entrance, access; ἐξοδος (exhodos), departure, exit; ὁδηγός (hodēgos), leader, guide; ὁδηγέω (hodēgeō), to lead, guide; καθοδηγός (kathodēgos), guide, leader.

CL 1. In Gk. hodos stands for the missing abstract of ienai, to go; the element of action could thus be the primary one in the word. It denotes a walk, a journey or a voyage by land or sea, as actions, from Homer onwards; in the local and spatial sense, the way, the path or the road as the place where one goes, drives or marches; also the passage a ship takes (Homer onwards; and inscriptions and papyri). The goal of the way is in Homer defined by eis, towards, and later also epi ti, towards, or the gen. The term is already used early on in a pictorial or figurative sense. Since one uses or must go by some way in order to reach a goal, hodos can acquire the meaning of the means and way of reaching or carrying out something, measures, procedure, the style and way in which one does something and in which one lives. Life is occasionally compared to a way, but not designated as a way (Democritus, Frag. 230). hodos biou does not mean the way of life, but the kind of life (Plato, Rep. 10, 600a; → Life, art. bios); incorrect behaviour in individual cases is described as “going a wrong way” (Thuc., 3, 64, 4).

hodos already stands for the intellectual-philosophical path of investigation and knowledge in Parmenides. Elsewhere, from Plato onwards, systematic and clear-sighted procedure is denoted by methodos (and methodeuō; not before the LXX). But this then also comes to have the negative meaning (first in Plutarch) of cunning, deception, craftiness.

The noun eishodos (Homer onwards) denotes in the verbal sense entering, going into, entry; in the spatial sense the entrance or access to a place or building, the door (also figurative). exhodos constitutes the opposite of this, going out, departure; spatially, exit, door, opening; figuratively, passing away, disappearing, and frequently, the outcome of an event, the end. In the sense of the end of life, death (cf. Lat. exitus), it is rare. Anyone who does not know the way needs a hodēgos (not before Polybius), a leader to guide him and to show him the way (hodēgeō, Aeschylus onwards). The noun and the vb. are mostly used in their literal, rarely in a figurative sense (instructor, leader or to lead, to instruct). In the Corp. Herm. it is the nous, the mind, which leads to the “doors of knowledge” or to the “light of knowledge” (7, 2; 10, 21), where there are underlying spatial conceptions. hodēgeō, to lead, also occurs here in the context of the journey of the → soul to heaven (4, 11; 12, 12).

2. In Gk. literature one frequently encounters the picture of the two ways (Hesiod, Works 287 ff.; Theognis, 911 f.), which is particularly well-known from the Prodicus-fable of Hercules at the crossroads (Xen., Mem. 2, 1, 21–34). The grown man is faced with the problem of making a decision with reference to his conduct: aretē → virtue, and kakia, badness, represent the two possible choices. Whoever decides for virtue must, according to one of Socrates’ theses, be ready to undertake hard work and exertion. For “only at the price of hard work do the gods sell us goodness”. The motif of the two ways is frequently used in subsequent times with reference to the ethical decisions of mankind, right up to modern, popular philosophy and Christian literature (cf. W. Michaelis, hodos, TDNT V 43–8).

One also frequently meets with the conception of the two ways in the underworld: the way to the right leads to the place of the pious, the left-hand road to the place of punishment for the unrighteous. Here the thought is of real ways which men travel after → death to their varying fortunes (→ Resurrection, art. anastasis CL).

3. Significant in the history of religion is the occurrence of hodos in connexion with the idea of the ascent of the soul to the heavenly world, although other terms are also found for this (e.g. anabasis, ascent). The way to the → truth (right thinking) – “which carries the man who has knowledge far above all dwellings” – is depicted as the way to the divine light (Parmenides, Frag. 1). In the Hermetic writings the way is gnōsis, → knowledge. Anyone who has attained the goal of gnōsis, divinization and participation in immortality, sets out to draw the others out of their ignorance by serving them as a kathodēgos, a guide, a leader (Corp. Herm. 1, 26–29).

In Christian gnostic texts, such as the Odes of Solomon and the Naassene hymn, there is mention of the way which is opened to men by the Redeemer, who mediates gnosis to them (Od. Sol. 7:13 f.; 15:22 f.). The way or path plays a very large part in Mandaean gnōsis. The gnostic is on the “way of life” or “the way of the perfect”, which is also designated as an ascent. The redeemer is regarded as leader and helper, but is never denoted as the way. (For gnosticism see The Secret Book of John in R. M. Grant, Gnosticism: An Anthology, 1961, 79; W. Foerster, Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts, I, 1972; II, 1974, see index.)

OT In the LXX hodos is encountered very frequently (some 880 times) in both literal and figurative senses. It represents 18 Heb. equivalents, but corresponds in more than 600 references with Heb. derek, way.

1. (a) The use of the term in the OT is very strongly stamped by the fact that God led his people by a way – out of → Egypt, forty years in the → wilderness, and then into the promised land. The way through the wilderness, in particular, is viewed by Deut. 8:2 as a testing ground.

The vb. hodēgeō, to lead, is found 42 times and is universally used with reference to God (e.g. Exod. 13:17; 15:13), predominantly in the Pss. in confessions of God's leading in the individual life (e.g. Pss. 23[22]:3; 25[24]:9) and in requests for his care and leading (e.g. Pss. 5:9; 31[30]:4), also in the figurative sense of teaching and guiding. In Wisdom literature → wisdom takes over the place of God. The noun hodēgos, leader, is found in but few late passages and is only in Wis. 7:15 referred to God. In Deutero-Isaiah, the language of which is largely stamped by the Pss., God is seen as the One who makes a way, where it appears impossible for men: at the first Exodus in the sea (Isa. 43:16; 51:10; cf. Ps. 77[76]:20) and at the second Exodus in the wilderness (Isa. 43:19).

exhodos stands as a designation for the departure from Egypt (e.g. Exod. 19:1; Num. 33:38; 1 Ki. 6:1; Ps. 105[104]:38), whereas otherwise it is found with various meanings, often combined with ishodos, entering in, entrance, in the sense of going in and out, which denotes continuous fellowship, or all one's activities (e.g. 1 Sam. 29:6; Ps. 121[120]:8). Occasionally it refers also to birth and death (Wis. 7:6; Sir. 40:1).

Isa. 40:3 is probably referring to a road in the strict sense of the word. On this road in the desert, Yahweh's glory is to be revealed in leading the nation home from the Babylonian captivity (cf. also Mal. 3:1). Babylonian parallels to this divine highway have been adduced (cf. F. Stummer, "Einige Keilschriftliche Parallele zu Jes. 40–66", JBL 45, 1926, 171–89). But R. N. Whybray thinks it unlikely that the prophet would wish to draw a parallel between Yahweh and other gods; he thinks it more likely that he was thinking of the construction or repair of roads in preparation for the advance of conquering kings (Isaiah 40–66, New Century Bible, 1975, 50).

(b) From this point onwards, the term "the way of God" acquires its fullness and significance. It denotes in a special way the saving activity of God (mostly sing., e.g. Ps. 67[66]:3): "that thy way may be known on earth, thy saving power among all the nations", or more generally, God's deeds (e.g. Pss. 25[24]:10; 145[144]:17), the ways which he takes. They surpass the ways of men, and cannot therefore simply be apprehended by them without further ado (Isa. 55:8 f.; Ps. 95[94]:7–11).

(c) It is a different matter, however, with the ways (sing. and plur.) appointed by God when he bids men walk in his → commandments (e.g. Gen. 18:19). The frequently found expression, "to walk in the ways of God, or the LORD" (→ poreuomai), means to act according to the will of God revealed in commandments, statutes and ordinances (1 Ki. 2:3; 8:58). God's law is called "the way of the LORD" (Jer. 5:4) for which the prophets have to struggle to see that it is observed, because Israel again and again succumbs to the temptation to evade the demand of God (Exod. 32:8; Mal. 2:8). With the pictorial conception of the way (even whilst it is often totally faded) is connected the use in these contexts of expressions such as going, walking, straying, abandoning, deviating, etc. Alongside the confession of the individual in the Pss., “I have kept the ways of the LORD” (Ps. 18[17]:21; cf. Job 23:11), there stands the prayer “LORD, show me thy way” (Pss. 27[26]:11; 86[85]:11). This way is often given further precision by means of an explanatory genitive: “way of thy testimonies”, “way of truth”, “way of thy commandments” (Ps. 119[118]). Instead of “ways of the LORD”, there stands in Wisdom literature the phrase “ways of Wisdom” (e.g. Prov. 3:17; 4:11; Sir. 6:26).

2. (a) Human life as a whole or in its individual aspects can be called a way (Ps. 119[118]:105; Isa. 53:6). God’s eyes see all the ways of men (Jer. 16:17; 32:19). He has them in his hand (Dan. 5:23). Therefore, it is good to entrust one’s ways to him (Ps. 37[36]:5). Here the literal and pictorial senses often merge into one another. When a man dies, he goes “the way of all the earth” (1 Ki. 2:2), which all must go (Jos. 23:14), and from which one does not return (Job 16:22).

(b) “Way” also denotes in the LXX the deeds or behaviour of men, the living out of one’s life (Exod. 18:20). The ways are mostly qualified in some manner or other (often by an additional genitive), either positively (e.g. “the ancient paths where the good way is”, Jer. 6:16; “the right way”, Prov. 8:20) or negatively (“false” or “evil” ways, Jer. 25:5; Prov. 8:13). Sometimes the evaluation can only be deduced from the context (e.g. the way of Jeroboam, 1 Ki. 15:34). The real point of reference for evaluating the way which a man takes is the will of God. Where a man allows this to be the determining factor of his actions, he goes God’s way or in the ways of God. Everything else is a self-chosen way (Jer. 7:23 f.) or is “the way of sinners” (Ps. 1:1). This is where the prophetic call to repentance from evil ways has to begin (2 Ki. 17:13 f.; Jer. 25:5; Isa. 55:7), and where the devout man must ask for right guidance (Ps. 85[84]:11).

3. The way by which God leads his people has their salvation as its goal. The same applies to the ways which he enjoins on them (Deut. 30:15 f.). They are therefore “the ways of life” (e.g. Ps. 16[15]:11; Prov. 5:6). Turning away from these ways leads to destruction, and draws God’s judgment upon one (Deut. 30:17 f.). What was at first referred to the nation as a whole is later individualized in Wisdom literature and post-exilic piety. Wisdom maintains that wise conduct leads to a successful life, but that foolishness leads to death (Ps. 1). The crisis of this line of thought when taken in an unqualified way is evident in Ecclesiastes, Job and also Ps. 73.

4. Whereas Gk. thought saw in men the possibility of making free decisions concerning their way of life, the OT knows only of obedience or disobedience to God. Since God has made the → covenant with Israel and thus made his decision, Israel can now only decide for or against God, keep the covenant and thus gain life and blessing, or break it – which means curse and death (Deut. 11:26 f.; 30:15 ff.). Similar thinking in the antitheses of good and evil, righteous and godless are encountered in connexion with “way” particularly in Wisdom literature (Prov. 2:12, 20; 4:18 f.; cf. Ps. 1). Nowhere are two ways expressly mentioned; but later on the “two-ways” scheme was able to utilize this antithetical thinking.

5. Judaism. (a) In Philo “way” occurs frequently, but not often influenced by OT linguistic usage. It is much more strongly affected by general philosophical and paraenetic usage. The really important lines of OT usage (“ways of God”) find no continuation in him. He takes over the wandering motif from the OT and builds it into his basic philosophic theme of man’s stepping out on a road, which according to Num. 20:27 is called the “royal” road, because it leads to God, the king of the universe. This way is equated with Wisdom, by which the spirit reaches its goal, the knowledge of God (Migr. Abr. 195). In ethical statements the ascetic way to virtue plays an important rôle (Post. C. 154; Leg. All. 2, 98). For him, the way to virtue is philosophy.

Alongside other conceptions of the way, such as the middle way, one meets also in Philo the motif of the two ways. In its gnostic-dualistic contrast of flesh and spirit it points to non-Jewish influences. The way which is determined by virtue has life and immortality as its goal; on the other hand, the way determined by badness leads to flight from immortality and to death (Spec. Leg. 4, 108).

Philo also speaks of the necessity of a leader, since man of himself does not know the way (Migr. Abr. 170). Instead of hodēgos, Philo uses the phrase hēgemōn tēs hodou, leader along the way, in both the literal and figurative sense, for the Logos, and above all for God himself, who, as the compassionate redeemer, leads the nous, the mind, on the right way (Migr. Abr. 171; Praem. 117).

(b) In Josephus “way” predominates in the literal sense; only very occasionally is it found in figurative usage (TDNT V 64 f.). But here, too, there is no echo of the OT usage of “the ways of the Lord”.

(c) By contrast with Philo and Josephus, the effects of OT usage are felt in the rest of Jewish literature. For the way in which men are commanded by God to walk one finds at times the absolute expression “the way” (2 Esd. 14:22; CD 1:13; 2:6). The way of the Lord is the “way of the law” (Syr. Bar. 44:3) and is called “the way of righteousness” (Jub. 1:20; 23:26). Probably the earliest attested reference to the term “the two ways” within the area of Jewish writing is to be found in Test. Ash. 1:3: “Two ways hath God given to the sons of man, and two inclinations, and two kinds of action, and two modes (of action) and two issues” (cf. v. 5). Man can choose between light and darkness (in Sl. Enoch 30:15 the two ways are designated exactly thus), between the law of the Lord and the works of Beliar (Test. Lev. 19:1), but he is threatened by demons who wish to lead him astray (Test. Ash. 8:9; Test. Reub. 2 and 3).

(d) The Dead Sea Scrolls, with their dualistic background, also speak of two kinds of ways: the ways of truth and the deeds of corruption (1QS 4:16) or the way of wickedness (1QS 5:10 f.). The children of righteousness walk in the ways of light, the children of error walk in the ways of darkness (1QS 3:17 ff.). Here, too, demonic powers threaten to seduce. The angel of darkness brings about the straying of all children of righteousness. For the Qumran community the way of the Lord in the wilderness (Isa. 40:3) is the halachah constructed by the study of the law (1QS 8:13; cf. A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966, 221 f.; cf. also 142 f., 149, 231).

(e) The rabbis interpreted Deut. 11:26 and 30:19 to mean that God laid down two ways with blessing and curse, life and death. There was also a widespread conception of angels who conducted men on their ways and in their actions (B. Shab. 119b).

NT 1. (a) hodos in the literal sense is found 55 times in the NT, almost entirely in the Synoptic Gospels. The paths which Jesus took are not mentioned, although he was often en tē hodō, en route with his disciples (e.g. Matt. 5:25; 15:32; Mk. 8:3; 10:52), and events happened para tēn hodon, “along the way” (e.g. Matt. 20:30; Mk.

10:46). hodos ethnōn (Matt. 10:5) does not mean a heathen kind of life, but the road which led beyond and outside Israel to heathen territory. hēmeras hodos (Lk. 2:44) is the distance which one covers in one day, a day's journey. sabbatou hodos (Acts 1:12) denotes the distance a Jew was allowed to walk on the Sabbath without transgressing the commandment in Exod. 16:29 (cf. Num. 35:5), which was about 880 metres.

(b) The word "way" occurs 46 times, in a pictorial or figurative sense, spread over the whole NT. It stands in part, like the OT usage, for God's deeds and saving activity (e.g. Rom. 11:33; Rev. 15:3; Heb. 3:10), for God's will (e.g. Matt. 22:16; Mk. 12:14; Lk. 20:21; Matt. 21:32 also belongs in this context), very often in OT quotations and phrases (Acts 2:28; cf. Ps. 16:11; 13:10; cf. Hos. 14:9; Rom. 3:17; cf. Ps. 36[35]:1; Lk. 1:79; cf. Isa. 9:2), and also with the meaning of way of life (Acts 14:16; Rom. 3:16; 1 Cor. 4:17; Jas. 1:8; 5:20). On the other hand, John's Gospel (which uses hodos only 4 times) and Heb. use "way" in a sense somewhat different from the OT usage and which some scholars interpret in the light of Hellenistic-gnostic conceptions of the redeemer. A further peculiarity in the NT is the absolute use of "the way" in Acts as a designation for the Christian community and its preaching. (See below, 2 (c)–(e).)

(c) eishodos, entrance, access, approach, stands in 5 NT passages. They are: Heb. 10:19, "entrance into the sanctuary"; 2 Pet. 1:11, "entrance into the eternal kingdom"; Acts 13:24, the beginning of Jesus' appearance, his arrival; 1 Thess. 1:9 and 2:1, the "entrance" of Paul amongst the Thessalonians, the response which he found to the gospel there.

(d) exhodos is found in the NT in only 3 places (Heb. 11:22 of the exodus from Egypt; Lk. 9:31 and 2 Pet. 1:15 of death).

(e) diexhodos (Matt. 22:9) may mean a street crossing or the place where a street crosses a city boundary and goes out into the open country (Arndt, 193).

2. (a) In Matt. 3:3 par. Mk. 1:3, Lk. 3:4 (cf. Jn. 1:23), Isa. 40:3 is quoted with the call to prepare the way for the Lord (cf. OT 1 (a)). Through the transference of the kyrios-title to Jesus it becomes possible to see the work of John the Baptist as a fulfilment of the OT word. John, the forerunner, has prepared the way for Jesus by the announcement of his coming, by the call to repentance and baptism (cf. also the quotation from Mal. 3:1 in Mk. 1:2; cf. Matt. 11:10; Lk. 1:17, 76; 7:27).

(b) The Sermon on the Mount gives in Matt. 7:13 f. the double picture of the two ways and the two → gates. As in secular Gk., the goals to which the two ways lead are also brought into view. But here it is not the ethical problem of conduct, but the question of life or death, salvation or destruction, which is put before men in Jesus, though, to be sure, with a clear invitation to life ("Enter in . . ."). The picture of the two ways figures in both Jewish and early Christian writings (2 Esd. 7:7 ff.; Test. Ash. 1:3, 5; Pirke Aboth 2:12 f.; Did. 1:1; Barn. 18:1). "It may have been employed originally as a Jewish catechetical form and have been taken over as a pattern for Christian instruction" (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, 1972, 150; cf. P. Carrington, The Primitive Christian Catechism, 1940). Despite Gk. affinities with the picture, this saying is very closely related in essence to Deut. 30:19, although, as distinct from Deut. 30:19 (cf. Jer. 21:8; 1QS 3:20 ff.), it alludes to the eternal destiny of men. By contrast with Gk. thought (cf. Hesiod, Works 287 ff.) and Jewish thought (cf. 2 Esd. 7:7 f.), the two ways are not described in detail. Matt. 7:13 f. belongs to that circle of sayings, which, especially in Matt., speak of entering into the kingdom of heaven (e.g. Matt. 5:20), into life (e.g. Matt. 18:8 f.) or into the joy of the Lord (Matt. 25:21, 23).

(c) It is in connexion with the conception of the high-priesthood of Jesus Christ that Hebrews (9:8; 10:19 f.) speaks of the “way” or the “entrance into the sanctuary”, whereby hodos almost acquires the sense of eishodos, access. Jesus, the forerunner (Heb. 6:20) or the leader (Heb. 2:10; 12:2), has opened a previously non-existent and living way of access. This may be contrasted with the gnostic motif of the redeemer who prepares the way for his own; in Heb. the thought is linked with the sacrificial death of Jesus. The separating curtain through which Jesus has made the way is his flesh, an expression of the material which (in the gnostic understanding) bars the way to the heavenly world. But in that Jesus offers his flesh (and blood) as a sacrifice for sin, it becomes clear that (in the biblical understanding) it is not matter which separates men from God but sin. Only through Jesus’ death is an approach to God which is freed from an evil conscience made possible (Heb. 10:22; parallels in substance in Rom. 5:1 f.; Eph. 2:18 f.; 3:11 f.). The underlying imagery in Heb. is the day of atonement ritual (cf. Lev. 16) in which the high priest entered the holy of holies once a year by means of sacrificial blood making atonement for the unwitting sins of the people. Only he had such access to Yahweh under the old covenant (→ Temple, art. to hieron; → Tent). 2 Pet. 1:11 also belongs in this context.

(d) In John’s Gospel hodos, way, is applied to the person of Jesus, in a manner which is unique in the NT (Jn. 14:1–6). The whither of Jesus’ departure is not known to the disciples; therefore they also do not know the way. Jesus reveals himself to them as the only way which leads to the Father: “I am the way and the truth and the life; no one comes to the Father but by me” (Jn. 14:6). The goal of the way of Jesus is his being with the Father (cf. Jn. 14:6b with 20:17), and through it the way also of his disciples. According to R. Bultmann, the pictorial conception of the way in the Gospel has been sharply repressed by comparison with the gnostic schema of the way of the redeemer which he detects behind these statements (The Gospel of John, 1971, 603–12). But it should be noted that the evidence that Bultmann cites for gnostic parallels is of a much later date. The vbs. of motion linked with this conception (depart [→ Come, art. erchomai]; ascend [→ Heaven, art. anabainō]) express the distance between God and man, and between heaven (→ art. ouranos) and earth, which is overcome in Jesus. Only through him does fellowship with God come about, embracing present and future.

(e) In Acts hodos occurs at 1:12; 2:28 citing Ps. 16:11; 8:26, 36, 39; 9:2, 17, 27; 13:10; 14:16; 16:17; 18:25 f.; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22; 25:3; 26:13. hodoiporeō is a hapax legomenon occurring only at Acts 10:9, “as they were on their way”. Along with a use of the word defined by the OT (cf. 1 (b)), Acts demonstrates an absolute use of “way” (sing.), which is equally unique in the NT (e.g. Acts 9:2; 19:2, 23; 24:14). Perhaps we have here a term of missionary language, similar to the absolute use of logos, → word, for the early Christian preaching (e.g. Acts 4:4; 11:19). “It is clear from 24:14 that hē hodos was a designation applied to the Church by the Christians themselves whereas their opponents spoke of a hairesis [a sect]” (E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 320, n. 1). The origin of this self-designation has not yet been fully explained. E. Repo, Der “Weg” als Selbstbezeichnung des Christentums, 1944, traces it back through the group of disciples to the Qumran community; Qumran certainly provides a parallel to the Acts usage, but not necessarily its source.

Acts 16:17 (“way of salvation”) clearly concerns the Christian message, and Acts 18:25 (“way of the Lord”) and 26 (“way of God”) the proclamation concerning Jesus. Acts 13:12 speaks of the “teaching of the Lord”, following on immediately after the mention in Acts 13:10 of the “straight paths of the Lord” (cf. Hos. 14:9). If all these passages point in the direction of teaching and proclamation, the passages with the absolute use of “way” show, on the other hand, that there this understanding is insufficient, since the Christians themselves are also included. When Paul, according to Acts 22:4, persecuted “the way”, it is the Christian community and its message of the resurrection of the crucified one that is meant (→ Persecution, art. diōkō NT 1 (b)). It is therefore not permissible to construct false alternatives here by insisting that “way” must mean either teaching or the Christian community. Both are involved in the term and both belong together. We shall, therefore, be obliged to understand “way” in its absolute use in Acts as a designation for Christians and their proclamation of Jesus Christ, which includes the fact that this proclamation also comprises a particular walk of life or way.

(f) The “more excellent way” of which Paul speaks in 1 Cor. 12:31b means the living of the life which is governed by love, agapē, which is ranked above and before all aspirations after spiritual gifts (cf. 1 Cor. 14:1; Phil. 2:1 ff.; → Love, art. agapāō NT 3 (c)). We shall need to look at the “way” of 1 Cor. 12:31b together with 4:17, where Paul uses the expression “my ways in Christ”. There he is dealing with the way of life in conformity with Christ, which he not only teaches everywhere, but which is also evident in his own conduct. For this reason he can say “my ways” and summon the congregation to be his “imitators”, namely, in the way they live in accord with Christ (→ peripateō).

(g) In 2 Peter, in order to combat false doctrine, or heretical teachers, Christianity is called the “way of truth” (2:2; cf. Jas. 5:19 v.l.) and the “way of righteousness” (2:21). It is viewed very definitely from the angle of the new morality which it brings and demands (cf. 2 Pet. 2:20 f., the “holy commandment”), and which distinguishes it from paganism. The false teachers, with their scandalous conduct, have left the “straight” way (i.e. the way indicated and desired by God), and followed the “way of Balaam” (2:15), thus bringing Christianity into disrepute.

The expressions “the way of Balaam” and “the way of Cain” (Jude 11; cf. Gen. 4:3–8; Num. 22–24) should be understood less from the view-point of the OT (actions against the will of God) than from the later Jewish tradition which adhered to it (Cain and Balaam as the fathers and the teachers of all libertines and heretics; cf. Philo, Post. C. 38, 233; Pirke Aboth 5:19; on the thought of straying, → Lead Astray).

3. (a) The noun hodēgos, leader, guide, is found only 5 times in the NT (in Acts 1:16 of Judas), though also partly in pictorial expressions. The spiritual blindness of the → Pharisees to the essential will of God is exemplified by Jesus when calling them “blind guides” (Matt. 23:16, 24) or “blind leaders of the blind” (Matt. 15:14; cf. also Lk. 6:39). Similarly, in Rom. 2:19, Paul characterizes the Jew instructed in the law as one who presumes to be “a guide to the blind”. hodēgeō, to lead, guide occurs 5 times. In addition to Matt. 15:14 and Lk. 6:39, it is used in Jn. 16:13 with reference to the Spirit of truth, who will guide into all the truth (parallel in substance in Jn.

14:26), and in Rev. 7:17 of the → Lamb who will guide those who have been made perfect to springs of living water. The clearly figurative sense of guide as instruct occurs only in Acts 8:31, where it concerns guidance in understanding the Scriptures. What is therefore characteristic for the OT use of the vb. has scarcely any effect in the NT.

(b) methodeia, a word not attested before the NT, and synonymous with the older methodos, which is used in the late papyrus attestations in the neutral sense of proceedings in the case of the collection of taxes and debts, is encountered in the NT only twice in a negative sense: cunning (sing. Eph. 4:14), and wiles, tricks (plur. Eph. 6:11). The term stands here in connexion with statements concerning the threats to which a Christian is exposed, whether from men or seductive powers.

(c) euholdō means to be led along a good road, in the NT always fig., i.e. to get along well, prosper, succeed (Rom. 1:10; 1 Cor. 16:2; 3 Jn. 2).

G. Ebel

περιπατέω	περιπατέω (peripateō), go about, walk; ἐμπεριπατέω (emperipateō), go about, walk; πατέω (pateō), tread, trample.
-----------	---

CL pateō and its compounds denote in Gk. a stepping movement of the feet. pateō (not used before Pindar) means trans. to tread or tread on something, to set foot on or in, to trample under foot, to trample down; frequently also figuratively to treat contemptuously, to maltreat, to plunder; intrans. to go, to walk. katapateō, used from Thuc. onwards, denotes complete crushing or trampling down, often in the figurative sense of treating disdainfully, despising (e.g. the laws, Plato, Leg. 4, 714a).

peripateō (Aristophanes onwards) is found in cl. Gk. only with the literal meaning of strolling, stopping, (e.g. while one walks here and there in the market, Dem., Orations 54, 7); the figurative meaning of walking, with reference to conduct, is lacking. Only in Philodemus (1st cent. B.C.) does one find the meaning to live (De Libertate 23, 3). emperipateō, to go around, to walk about, is first attested in Plut. (1st cent. A.D.).

OT In the LXX peripateō is found in only 33 passages, of which more than half come from Wisdom literature. It stands – as also emperipateō (9 occurrences: exception, Job 9:8) – for Heb. hālak (mostly hith.), and means initially simply to go or to walk about (1 Sam. 17:39), generally with an indication of place (e.g. Exod. 21:11) or some other more precise information (e.g. Sus. 13, according to custom). Only in Jdg. 21:24 does it mean to go away. Several times God's walking or moving about is spoken of anthropomorphically (Gen. 3:8, 10; Ps. 103[104]:3), as also is → Satan's (Job 1:7; 2:2).

Only occasionally does peripateō denote in the figurative sense way of life (2 Ki. 20:3; Eccl. 11:9). The LXX prefers to use → poreuomai, to go, in combination with → hodos, way, because this can better express that one should conduct one's way of life in the paths indicated by God.

2. According to the Dead Sea Scrolls, God has set two spirits for men to walk in until the time of their visitation, namely the spirits of truth and of perversity (1QS

3:18 ff.; cf. A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966, 33–56, 143–61). The sons of righteousness walk in the ways of light (i.e. according to the will of God (1QS 5:10), the sons of perversity or of wickedness walk in the ways of darkness (1QS 3:20 f.). Man in his walk of life is exposed to seduction by demonic powers (angels of darkness), which try to lead him astray. Although man should decide upon the right way, this freedom of decision seems on the other hand to have been removed from him. “For mankind has no way, and man is unable to establish his steps since justification is with God and perfection of way is out of his hand” (1QS 11:10).

NT In the NT peripateō occurs 95 times, of which about half are in the literal and half in the figurative meaning – a striking contrast to the LXX. It occurs predominantly in the Gospels, Acts and Rev. in the sense of to go, walk about. In 1 Pet. 5:8 it is applied to the devil who is like a lion walking about, seeking whom he may devour. In Rev. 2:1; 3:4; 21:24, it denotes walking in the perfection and light of the heavenly → Jerusalem. The hapax legomenon emperipateō occurs in 2 Cor. 6:16 (cf. Lev. 26:12) of God’s covenant relationship with his people, in which he walks about among them. This now applies to the church. The simple form pateō, tread, trample, is found at Lk. 10:19; 21:24; Rev. 11:2; in each case with overtones of judgment and power, for invading armies or the Gentiles trampling over Jerusalem or the temple, or the Seventy trampling upon serpents and scorpions. katapateō means to tread underfoot (Matt. 5:13; 7:6; Lk. 8:5; 12:1), to despise (the Son of God, Heb. 10:29).

In the figurative sense of to walk (as a designation for conduct of life) peripateō is found chiefly in the Pauline (except for the Pastorals and Phlm.) and Johannine writings. Exceptions are Matt. 7:5; Acts 21:21; and Heb. 13:9, where it refers to the observance of Jewish traditions and customs. It obtains an outstanding significance as a term for denoting way of life; the nature and the manner of the way of life make it clear as to what governs a man in his being and acting. Therefore, the vb., which in itself is neutral, is always more precisely fixed (by kata, according to, en, in, axiōs, worthily, or a dat.) and thus qualified positively or negatively.

1. In the Pauline writings two ways of life stand fundamentally opposed to one another: the (former) heathen way of life (Eph. 2:2; walking “according to the flesh”, Rom. 8:4; “like ordinary men”, 1 Cor. 3:3), and the (present) walk in Christ (Col. 2:6; walking “according to the Spirit”, Rom. 8:4; “in the Spirit”, Gal. 5:16; “guided by love”, Rom. 14:15 [NEB]; “in love”, Eph. 5:2; “as children of light” Eph. 5:8).

Since the proclamation of Christ desires to lead man from a life turned away from God and dominated by a self-seeking “I” (Gal. 5:16), into a new life (Rom. 6:4) which is dominated and stamped by God and his will, “how you ought to live and to please God” (1 Thess. 4:1) is also part of this preaching, as is reflected in various ways in the Pauline exhortation.

Paul starts from the position that man under the law is under bondage, and is therefore not able to fulfil the will of God. By faith in Christ he is promised freedom from the compulsion of the norm and from his captivity to himself as a gift from God (Eph. 2:1 ff.). He can now serve God and his neighbour (Rom. 7:6; cf. 14:7 ff. and Gal. 5:13). But he must again and again be exhorted to live in this new reality, because he too as a believer still lives “in the flesh” (2 Cor. 10:3 AV) and thus remains open to the temptation to walk “according to the flesh” (1 Cor. 3:3), i.e. to act in a self-seeking way.

As long as the Christian walks “by faith and not by sight” he is to endeavour to please his Lord (2 Cor. 5:7 ff.). He must continually be re-examining “what is pleasing to the Lord” (Eph. 5:8 ff., 15), so that he may conduct his life in a way that corresponds with his calling (Eph. 4:1; 1 Thess. 2:12; Col. 1:10). This also means an attitude which pays attention to those who do not belong to the congregation, and to their judgments (1 Thess. 4:12; Col. 4:5), an approach which is not devious (2 Cor. 4:2), but “becomingly as in the day” (Rom. 13:13), so that there is no need to shun the light of day and the outside world. In 2 Thess. 3:6 the Thessalonians are urged to “keep away from any brother who is living in idleness and not in accord with the tradition that you received from us.” emperipateō, walk about, move, occurs only in 2 Cor. 6:16 quoting the promise of Lev. 26:12 that God will move among his people. Paul sees this → covenant promise fulfilled in the Christian community. Therefore, the community is now the temple of God, which also means that Christians must not indulge in pagan ungodliness.

2. In the Johannine writings peripateō occurs in both literal and figurative senses. Whereas in Jn. 11:9 f. Jesus is apparently speaking in the literal sense of walking about in day- or night-time, there is already a hint of the figurative sense of the vb. and the later gnostic-dualistic terminology, which John uses in order to bring into relief the two possibilities for human existence: the life of faith and life in unbelief. The expressions “to walk in the light”, “to walk in the truth”, and “to walk in darkness” do not mean moral or immoral behaviour, but existence governed by God and existence governed by the world. To walk in the light means to live with one’s face turned to God, by faith in Jesus Christ (Jn. 12:35 f.); to walk in darkness means to have one’s life closed to God.

The man who has his life closed to God misses real → life (Jn. 12:35; 1 Jn. 2:11). Jesus, however, has come as the light of the world, so that man may find real life through him (Jn. 8:12). He finds it when he hears the call of Jesus and follows him.

Walking in the light (in 2 Jn. 4, cf. v. 6, and 3 Jn. 3 f., the expression is “walk in truth”) has an ethical side. The Epistles of John show this clearly. Not mere words, but the whole way one lives one’s life proves fellowship with God (1 Jn. 1:6 f.). “He who says he abides in him ought to walk in the same way in which he walked” (1 Jn. 2:6; cf. 2 Jn. 6). This was clear for all to see in Jesus (Jn. 13:14; 1 Jn. 4:11, 19). This also means having fellowship amongst one another (1 Jn. 3:16 f.). It is thus a matter of total surrender to God and to fellow human beings.

Correspondingly, walking in darkness characterizes an expression of living which does not correspond with fellowship with God (1 Jn. 1:6), and is therefore not determined by love, but by hate (1 Jn. 2:11).

G. Ebel

πορεύομαι

πορεύομαι (poreuomai), go, to journey, to travel, to walk; τρέχω (trechō), run, move quickly; δρόμος (dromos), course, race; πρόδρομος (prodromos), running before, forerunner.

CL 1. poreuomai (Soph. onwards), to go, journey, travel, march, denotes by contrast with → peripateō, going in a particular direction or with a particular intention.

Figuratively – in phrases of travelling along the path of life (Plato, Rep. 2, 365b) or in ethical statements (Soph., OT 883) – it is found only rarely.

2. trechō, attested from Homer (Od. 23, 207; Il. 23, 392 f.) onwards, means to move quickly, to run, especially at a contest in the stadium (→ Fight, art. agōn). Influenced by the philosophical criticism of over-estimation of purely physical contests, trechō is also found in statements which express effort or achievement in respect of mental and spiritual matters.

OT 1. poreuomai, to go, to walk, is found some 750 times in the LXX, chiefly for Heb. hālak, to go, but also for other Heb. vbs.

(a) It often has the literal sense of going, journeying, travelling (e.g. Gen. 12:4 f.; Deut. 1:19, 33). Linked with opisō tinos, behind someone (Jdg. 13:11), it takes on the figurative sense of following someone (→ Disciple, art. opisō), i.e. obeying him (e.g. 1 Ki. 14:8). It occurs as a command of God, which sends man on a particular path (e.g. Gen. 22:2; 2 Sam. 7:5). It can also denote departure from life (1 Ki. 2:2; 2 Sam. 12:23) and in later times the journey to Sheol or Hades (→ Hell), as in Job 10:21; 16:22; Eccl. 9:10.

(b) By contrast with secular Gk. (see above, CL 1) the vb. frequently stands in the LXX in the figurative sense of way of life (e.g. 1 Ki. 3:14), especially in the characteristic combination with hodos, way, and “ways of God” or → commandments, used to designate the conduct ordained by the will of God (e.g. Deut. 8:6; 10:12; Jer. 7:23), which can also quite generally be called “walking before God” (1 Ki. 8:25). Corresponding to the figurative meaning of way (OT 1 (c), 2 (b)), other terms can also stand alongside poreuomai, such as “the law of the LORD” (Ps. 119[118]:1), “righteousness” (Isa. 33:15; Pss. Sol. 14:2), “truth” (Prov. 28:6) etc., mostly with en followed by the dat.

(c) This use of poreuomai is also found (in part further reinforced) in Test. XII, whereas Philo only has the figurative meaning on rare occasions, e.g. in the picture of the path of life (Migr. Abr. 133) or of the two ways (Migr. Abr. 204), and in connexion with the conception of travelling on the royal way of virtue.

2. trechō is attested some 60 times in the LXX mostly for Heb. rūs, to run, in the literal sense (e.g. Gen. 18:7; 1 Ki. 18:46). In the figurative sense it occurs in only a few passages: for the way of life according to the commandments of God in connexion with the typical OT concept of way (Ps. 119[118]:32), of “running into lies” (Ps. 61:5 LXX) and in the expression “running in the way of immortality” (4 Macc. 14:5, in the account of the martyrdom of the seven brothers).

NT 1. poreuomai is attested about 150 times in the NT, of which 83 are in the Synoptic Gospels, 37 in Acts, 13 in John’s Gospel, 8 in Paul, 9 in the other letters; the vb. is only used in the middle and passive. It mostly has the literal sense of to go (e.g. Mk. 9:30; the sending out of the disciples in Matt. 10:6 f.; and 28:19). It never occurs in connexion with the call to discipleship (→ Disciple art. akolouthēō). It also means to travel, to journey (e.g. Lk. 9:5); details of direction and goal are often given.

(a) The general use is variable and many-sided: for going in the sense of dying (Lk. 22:22); in Jn.’s Gospel for the departure of Jesus from his own and his return to the Father (Jn. 14:2 f., 12, 28; 16:7, 28; cf. → Heaven, art. anabainō); for departing into the eternal fire at the final judgment (Matt. 25:41); and in statements concerning the ascent of Jesus (Acts 1:10 f.; 1 Pet. 3:22) or his going to the “spirits in prison” (1 Pet. 3:19; → Hell, art. hadēs).

(b) By contrast with the LXX usage, poreuomai has the sense of walk surprisingly rarely in the NT. Apart from Lk. 1:6 and Acts 9:31 (possibly also Acts 14:16), where walking “in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord” or “in the fear of God” is spoken of, in the OT form of expression, the figurative use is lacking in the Synoptics, in John, and above all, in Paul, who uses → peripateō instead (32 times). In 1 Pet. 4:3; 2 Pet. 2:10; 3:3; and Jude 11, 16, 18 the vb. occurs in statements concerning a bad way of life.

2. trechō, to run, is found in the NT in the literal sense, including the disciples’ running to the empty tomb (e.g. Matt. 27:48; 28:8; Mk. 5:6; 15:36; Lk. 15:20; 24:12; Jn. 20:2, 4; Acts 19:28). In 2 Thess. 3:1 it is used of the word of the Lord (cf. Ps. 147[146]:4). It is found in Paul predominantly in the figurative sense. By using the vb., he expresses how the Christian life as a whole, like his apostolic service, is directed towards a goal (Gal. 2:2; 5:7; Phil. 2:16) and that, as in a contest in the stadium (see CL 2), what matters is applying all one’s strength and holding out to the end (1 Cor. 9:24 ff.; cf. Heb. 12:1). Rom. 9:16, by pointing to the mercy of God – which in the last resort, is alone decisive – represents the necessary corrective. It also occurs in Heb. 12:1 and Rev. 9:9. syntrechō, run together, occurs in Mk. 6:33; Acts 3:11 (of people); 1 Pet. 4:4 (fig. of people plunging together into the same stream of debauchery).

3. dromos, course, is used of a race in 2 Tim. 4:7, of Paul’s career and work as an apostle which is also compared with a fight; cf. Acts 13:25, of the course of John the Baptist’s life; Acts 20:24, of the course of Paul’s life, his sole object being to complete his ministry. prodromos, forerunner, occurs only at Heb. 6:20, where Jesus is seen as a forerunner on our behalf, having become a high priest for ever after the order of → Melchizedek. In the context, he has entered the inner sanctuary, i.e. the immediate presence of God, which is here pictured under the symbolism of the day of atonement ritual, according to which the high priest entered on behalf of the people annually (Lev. 16; → Tent; → Temple). By being a priest after the order of Melchizedek, Jesus belongs to an order superior to that of the Levitical high priests, who were mortal men who had to perform the rite annually. Christ’s priesthood is unique; his priestly work requires no repetition.

G. Ebel

→ Conversion, → Turn Away, → Virtue

(a). O. Bauernfeind, trechō, dromos, prodromos, TDNT VIII 226–35; G. Bertram, strepō etc., TDNT VII 714–29; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 330–40; II, 1955, 15–21; G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways: Studies in the Topography of the Gospels, 1935; S. M. McCasland, “The Way”, JBL 77, 1958, 222 ff.; W. Michaelis, hodos etc., TDNT V 42–114; H. Seesemann and G. Bertram, pateō etc., TDNT V 940–44.

(b). A. Kuschke, “Die Menschenwege und der Weg Gottes im Alten Testament”, StTh 5, 1951, 106 ff.; F. Nötscher, Gotteswege und Menschenwege in der Bibel und in Qumran, 1958; S. Wibbing, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament und ihre Traditionsgeschichte unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Qumran-Texte, BZNW 25, 1959; G. Wingren, “Weg, Wanderung und verwandte Begriffe”, StTh 3, 1951, 111 ff.

Wall, Hedge, Palisade

τειχος

τειχος (teichos), wall around city; τοιχος (toichos), wall of house; μεσότοιχον (mesotoichon), partition-wall.

CL teichos, wall, espec. around a city (Homer); hence a castle, fort (Hdt.), fortified town (Xen.). toichos, wall of a house, temple, enclosure, side of a tent; plur., the sides of a ship; proverbially, on the winning side. The distinction between teichos (city-wall) and toichos (house-wall) is usually maintained, just as in Lat. murus and moenia differ from paries. mesotoichon, partition-wall of a house, is found only in an inscription at Argos, where it is masc., and fig. of a boundary-line, in a fragment of Eratosthenes.

OT teichos occurs 193 times on the OT, and almost always translates the Heb. hômâh, derived from hamâh, to surround, and usually meaning the wall of a town or city (Isa. 22:10), occasionally of other buildings (Lam. 2:7), and metaph. of a chaste maiden difficult to approach (Cant. 8:9 f.). The dual hômôtayim is used for the double series of walls with which Jerusalem was protected on the south (2 Ki. 25:4).

toichos is found 88 times, and usually renders qîr, and means the wall of a house or room (Amos 5:19), of the temple (1 Ki. 6:5), or occasionally of a vineyard (Num. 22:25). The origin of qîr is uncertain, but possibly derives from the wall's transverse beams (qôrâh). mesotoichon does not occur in the LXX. Josephus uses the separate words ho mesos toichos for the inner wall of the temple (Ant. 8, 71).

NT In the NT teichos consistently means a city wall. To allow him to escape from Damascus, the local disciples lower Saul of Tarsus in a basket through a window in the city wall (teichos, Acts 9:25; 2 Cor. 11:33). In Heb. 11:30 teichos is used for the walls of Jericho collapsing before Joshua's army. In Rev. 21 teichos occurs six times in reference to the city wall of the new Jerusalem. The wall is described as great and high (21:12), symbolizing the eternal security of the inhabitants, and excluding those outside (22:15). The twelve foundations of the city and its twelve gates are inscribed with the names of the twelve apostles and the twelve tribes of Israel respectively, signifying the completeness of the number of the people of God under the two covenants. Twelve angels are on duty at the gates in the wall, but more to honour than to guard the entrances (21:25). The measuring of the wall by an angel (21:17) not only draws attention to its extraordinary height, but once more alludes to protection. When John himself had earlier been given a measuring-rod and told to measure the sanctuary, it was made clear that whatever he did not measure would be left exposed to godless attack (11:1 f.). The wall is said to be built of jasper and adorned with twelve different jewels (→ Precious Stones in Revelation), with each gate being made of a single → pearl (21:17–21). See G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974, 320–6.

toichos occurs only at Acts 23:3, in Paul's rebuke of the high priest Ananias as a whitewashed wall. The one who dispensed justice ought to be a wall firm and true, supporting the house of Israel, its laws, and all who lived within its shelter. The metaphor of the whitewashed wall suggests a structure whose precarious condition has been disguised by generous coats of whitewash (Ezek. 13:10–16). In spite of appearances, a man who behaved as Ananias did was bound to come to grief: his was the haughty spirit of Prov. 16:18 that goes before a fall (F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, 1968, 451). Nine years later, at the beginning of the Jewish rebellion against the Romans, Ananias, the son of Nedebeaus, a notoriously unscrupulous and rapacious politician, was dragged out of his hiding-place in an aqueduct and assassinated, probably by Zealots, on account of his pro-Roman policies.

mesotoichon is found only in Eph. 2:14. Paul declares that Christ has in his own person, by his incarnate life and death, destroyed the dividing-wall (mesotoichon) of (gen. of content: which consisted of) the barrier (→ phragmos) of separation, i.e. he has destroyed the enmity between men and God, and between Jews and Gentiles. Paul may have had in mind the four-foot wall (hêl) which separated the court of the Gentiles from the main part of the Jerusalem temple. That barrier carried warnings in Greek and Latin, inscribed in bold red letters on white limestone: Let no Gentile enter within the balustrade and enclosure about the sanctuary. Anyone who is caught doing so will have himself to blame for his ensuing death (Josephus, War 5, 193). Although Ephesus was a mainly Gentile city and far from Jerusalem, Paul's allusion to the mesotoichon in the temple would not have been lost on all the Ephesian Christians. They would know that Paul himself had narrowly escaped death two or three years before, when it was rumoured that he had violated the sanctity of the holy place in Jerusalem by taking the Gentile Trophimus, an Ephesian, into one of the inner courts (Acts 21:28 f.). (See also Temple, art. to mesotoichon; cf. M. Barth, Ephesians, Anchor Bible, I, 1974, 282–87; W. Hendriksen, Ephesians, 1967; C. Schneider, mesotoichon, TDNT IV 625.)

The barrier in the temple was a figurative reference to the Mosaic law (Eph. 2:15), and in particular to the setting up of boundary-marks at Sinai when that law was being given (Exod. 19:12). The function of the boundary then was to protect the people from the wrath of God. Later rabbis reversed the point of view: the fence (as it was now taken to be, rather than a mere boundary-mark) was deemed to be necessary to protect the law itself from the evil world. That fence was then interpreted by the rabbis, in its contemporary application, as the traditions of the elders, protective measures to safeguard the law itself from being transgressed, even if unwittingly.

The fall brought to men a twofold enmity, an enmity between themselves, and an enmity towards God (Eph. 2:16). The law clearly showed up both, on the one hand, by revealing the impossibly high standard demanded by God of men, if left to their own efforts, and on the other hand, by separating Jews from Gentiles, since salvation could not be attained without submitting to the legal requirement of circumcision. From the perspective of a Gentile Christian, the law with its commandments and ordinances had no positive, protective force. Rather, it was seen as a dividing wall, creating enmity between the Jews and the rest of mankind. Therefore, breaking through this wall, and indeed utterly destroying it, is no more to be understood as a crime, but as a saving deed of Christ. He did this "in his flesh" (2:14) "through the cross" (2:16), which means that he too had to pay for his action with his own life (O. Betz, "The Eschatological Interpretation of the Sinai-Tradition in Qumran and in the New Testament", Revue de Qumran 6, 1967–9, 105).

The wording of Eph. 2:14 presupposes a conception of phragmos which calls for the image of the cross as its counterpart. Paul's text in fact assumes a double phragmos, one that separates Jew from Gentile, and the other that separates the world below from the world above. This was a stock conception in the early church. It appears in a letter of Ignatius, in which he says that Christ “has made a breach in the wall of separation” (Trall. 9:4, long recension). Christ restores unity, therefore, in a double sense. He destroys both the vertical wall separating Jew from Gentile, and the horizontal wall separating man from God. He does this by the cross, representing the double work of Christ extending both vertically and horizontally (J. Daniélou, A History of Early Christian Doctrine. I: The Theology of Jewish Christianity, 1964, 279 f.).

N. Hillyer

φραγμός	φραγμός (phragmos), fence, wall, hedge; φράσσω (phrassō), fence in, stop, close.
---------	--

CL phragmos, a fencing in, blocking up (Soph.), thence a fence, paling, palisade (Hdt.), enclosure; fig. a bristly beard. The corresponding verb phrassō, Attic phrattō, means to fence in, hedge around, esp. for protection or defence; to fortify.

OT The 18 appearances of phragmos in the LXX translate a variety of Heb. nouns. gāḏēr and the fem. gāḏērāh are used for a literal hedge of briars and thorns (Mic. 7:4), a verse which also refers to the narrow path between the vineyards, “with a hedge on this side and a hedge on that”. The thorny hedge was needed to keep intruders at bay, especially the wild boar (Ps. 79:15; MT 80:13), jackals and foxes (Cant. 2:15), which, given the chance, would trample the vines and eat the grapes. Metaph. gāḏēr is used of a weak character, who is like an unsteady fence, and so a tempting target for evil to attack (Ps. 62:3). In the parable of Israel as the vine, hedge is mēšūkkāh, from sāḳak, to weave (Isa. 5:5). In Job 38:31 Yahweh demands to know whether Job is able to loose the cords (mōš'kōl) of Orion; i.e., has he the ability, as God has, of moving the stars around at will? The LXX text reads phragmon Oriōnos enoixas? Have you opened the barrier of Orion (i.e., let the stars loose)?

peres (from pāras, to break) means a breaking forth, i.e., in Gen. 38:29, to be the first from the womb at birth; hence, by wordplay, the child is named Perez. The LXX wording is a little different from the MT and asks, Why has the phragmos (barrier, i.e., of the womb) been broken through on your account? In 1 Ki. 11:27 the MT says that Solomon closed up the breach (peres) of the city of David, whereas the LXX speaks of completing the fortification (phragmos). The more usual meaning of phragmos as a hedge appears as the translation of peres in Ps. 143(144):14.

Although phrassō occurs only 8 times in the LXX, it renders 6 different Heb. words. 'ātam (Prov. 21:13) means to stop up (the ears), i.e. refuse to listen. sūg in Cant. 7:2(3) means lit. to shrink back, as from a prickly hedge, hence to be hedged about, and so, surrounded. A similarly sounding term sūk appears in Hos. 2:6(8), to hedge the way as with thorns, i.e. to block all movement. When Yahweh tells Job (38:8) that it is he who shuts in, fences in, the sea, the Heb. verb is the hiphil of sāḳak, lit. to weave, especially boughs in order to make a hedge. Daniel (8:26) is instructed to seal up (sātam, shut up, hide) the vision, i.e. keep its message secret. In Prov. 25:26 phrassō is used in the LXX to mean to stop a well, and corresponds to the MT nirpās, niphil of rāpās, lit. to tread, i.e. muddy, the water.

NT phragmos is used in Matt. 21:33 and Mk. 12:1 for the fence or hedge set up to protect the vineyard in the parable of the wicked tenants (cf. Isa. 5:2). This and the other precautions taken by the owner underline his care for his vineyard and his absolute proprietary rights over it (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, 1972, 299). The parable alludes to a common practice of the day, for the upper Jordan valley and much of the Galilean highlands were in the hands of foreign landlords at this time (W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, 1974, 417).

The messianic age will be inaugurated with a banquet (Isa. 25:6). In Jesus' parable alluding to this great feast, the master, on being rebuffed by those originally invited (= Jews), instructs his servant to go out to the highways and hedges (phragmous, Lk. 14:23), i.e. to those outside the city (= Gentiles) and to compel (anankason) all he found, however apparently ineligible, to come to the banquet. Physical force is not in mind (impossible for a single servant), but persuasion (cf. Mk. 6:45). The passage gives no sanction to religious persecution or to forcible proselytizing.

phrassō occurs three times in the NT. In Rom. 3:19 Paul concludes that one purpose of Scripture is to show that all men, Jews no less than Gentiles, stand condemned before God, so that every mouth may be stopped (phragē), i.e. silenced: no one can have anything to say by way of excuse or justification for his way of life when set against the standards required of him by a holy and perfect God. In 2 Cor. 11:10 Paul declares that no man will put a stop (phragēsetai) to his boasting, a metaphor from damming a river (Chrysostom; Prov. 25:26; Jdg. 16:3) or barricading a road (Hos. 2:6; Lam. 3:9). Heb. 11:33 refers to those who by faith drew upon the resources of the spiritual realm and so stopped (ephraخان) the mouths of lions, as in the case of Daniel (6:22; 1 Macc. 2:60; 4 Macc. 16:3, 21; 18:13), i.e. transmuted, at least for a sufficient time, the wild beasts' natural instincts, a foretaste of the messianic age (Isa. 11:6).

N. Hillyer

χάραξ

χάραξ (charax), pointed stake, palisade, rampart, mound.

CL charax, from charassō, to sharpen, means a pointed stake, especially a wooden support for vines; then, by extension, the collective singular noun means the timber used in constructing a palisade surrounding a city or camp.

OT charax occurs 15 times and renders 5 Heb. terms. Hezekiah is promised deliverance from the Assyrians threatening Jerusalem. Against the city the enemy shall not so much as make a rampart, sōl'lah, from sālal, cast up into a heap or mound (Isa. 37:33). sōl'lah appears also in Jer. 40(33):4; Ezek. 4:2; 26:8. In Ezek. 21:22(27) charax translates kar, battering-ram, derived, on account of the weapon's swinging movement, from kārar, to repeat, attack again, advance and retreat. Artificial mounds were raised up against the walls of cities by the Assyrians as a platform, from which they could employ their battering-rams to greater advantage against the upper and weaker portion of the wall. muṣṣāb, station, place where anything stands (Isa. 29:3), comes from nāṣab, to take an upright position. In Deut. 20:19 instructions are given to the people of Israel that when besieging an enemy city they are not, in a manner of speaking, to build a siege-mound (māṣōr) around the local fruit-trees, i.e. they are not to attack and destroy them even though this was contemporary custom. Israel's enemy was men not trees.

m^ešôdîm is more often used in the sense of nets, but in Eccl. 9:14 it means siegeworks, entrenchments, so called from being the place in which the besieging troops lie in wait to seize (šûd) the besieged as their prey.

NT charax occurs only at Lk. 19:43, where Jesus laments over Jerusalem's coming fate. Her foes will surround the city and cast up a charax about her, a protection for themselves and a site from which to launch their attacks. The prophetic element in Jesus' words is not in the vocabulary, for that could describe the usual course of any siege (Isa. 29:3), but in their application to Jerusalem. Forty years later the prophecy was fulfilled when the Roman army surrounded the city with siegeworks (Josephus, War 5, 262, 264), which must have contained much timber, for the Jews destroyed them with fire (War 5, 469 ff.), and the Roman general Titus had to replace the charax with a wall. This he threw up in three days, thus cutting off all hope of escape.

N. Hillyer

Want, Lack, Need

ὕστερος	ὕστερος (hysteros), what is behind, after, the latter, later; ὕστερον (hysteron), in the second place, later than, thereafter, finally; ὕστερέω (hystereō), come too late, to miss, fail to reach; to be in need of, lack; to be less than, inferior to; to fail, give out; to be lacking, come short of; ὕστερῆμα (hysterēma), need, want, deficiency, lack, shortcoming; ὕστερησις (hysterēsis), need, lack, poverty.
---------	--

CL From the time of Homer the adjective hysteros has the basic sense of what is behind or after, especially in reference to time. It comes to mean the second of two (Aristotle, Politics 5, 10, 1312A, 4), the "next" year (Xenophon, History of Greece 7, 2, 10), or "later". The adverbial use of hysteron runs parallel to the adjective throughout this period, meaning secondly, after, later, and finally in the spatial, temporal, or logical sense. The same range of nuances is amply attested for the Hellenistic period from the papyri.

The cognate verb hystereō was coined from the adjective, and occurs first in Euripides (Phoenicians 94 f.) and Herodotus with the meaning to come after or to come too late (Herodotus 6, 89: "they came one day after the appointed day"; Xenophon, Anabasis 1, 7, 12: "they came too late for the battle by five days"; cf. Oxyrhynchus Papyrus I, 118, 30 ff.: "it is no use if a person comes too late for what required his presence"). From this primary sense a metaphorical use of the verb developed, meaning to lag behind or to be inferior (Plato, Republic 484d, 539e), and a secondary nuance appears, signifying failure in something (Thucydides, 3, 1, 2: "he came too late to save Mytilene"; Hibeh Papyri 1, 43⁷: "take care that the oil-presses do not fail"). By the Hellenistic period hystereō comes to mean to lack something (Josephus, Antiquities 1, 98; 5, 214; 15, 200: "they lacked neither wine nor water").

No examples have been preserved of the nouns hysterēma and hysterēsis in classical literature or in Hellenistic literature earlier than the LXX. Among later examples of hysterēma may be cited two from the Corpus Hermeticum (4, 10; 13, 1), the second of which is particularly interesting because the initiate asks the mystagogue, “Will you supply [lit. fill up] those things which are lacking to me. . .?” The Greek version of the Testament of Benjamin 11:5, which speaks of a descendant of the patriarch who “will fill up that which is lacking to the tribe” is clearly a Christian interpolation intended to honour Paul and indebted to the apostle for the formulation (cf. 2 Cor. 11:9; Col. 1:24). Dio Cassius 44, 48, 2 states that no titles were spared Caesar. What any single title lacked as a complete expression of honour and authority was supplied by what the others contributed for mutual completion. In all of these instances the noun bears the sense of want, lack, need.

OT In the LXX hysteros (4 times) and hysteron (15 times) are always used in a temporal sense, after, later, then. The verb hystereō, however, which occurs 21 times, means primarily to have a deficiency, to lack, to have a need. In the year of release the prosperous Israelite is to lend generously to his poor brother who has a need (Deut. 18:5). The Israelites of the wilderness generation were sustained by God and lacked nothing (Neh. 9:21). God gives a man wealth, possessions and honours “so that he lacks nothing of all that he desires” (Eccl. 6:2). Of the fool, however, it must be said that his heart lacks sense (Eccl. 10:3). The Hebrew clause “let me know how fleeting my life is!” (Ps. 39:4 MT) is rendered “that I may know what I lack” (Ps. 38:5), i.e. that I may appear approved before God. Belshazzar’s kingdom has been weighed in the balances and has been found to be deficient (Dan. 5:27). The same nuances occur in the Greek translation of the Book of Sirach. Ben Sira reflects upon the man who toils but finds he is in want; yet an impoverished man, who lacks strength, is sustained by God in his need (Sir. 11:11–13). The scribe was moved to indignation by the sight of a warrior in want through poverty (Sir. 26:28).

Closely related to the idea of experiencing a lack is that of coming too late or failing. Certain men who have been defiled through contact with a corpse ask, “Why have we come too late for offering the Lord’s sacrifice at the appointed time?” (Num. 9:7). The man who fails to observe the Passover will be cut off (Num. 9:13). Although the fulfilment of what God has promised appears to delay, Israel must confidently wait for God to act (Hab. 2:3).

Although the noun hysterēma does not occur in contemporary secular literature, there are six examples in the LXX, where it means lack or need. A good land is a place where there is no lack of anything (Jdg. 18:10; cf. 19:19 f.). On the other hand, what is lacking cannot be numbered (Eccl. 1:15), i.e. when there is nothing present there is nothing to list. In two instances the nuance of hysterēma shades to want or poverty, as in the admonition “there is no want to those who fear the LORD” (Ps. 34:10 [MT 34:9]). In the second instance, the contrast between want and abundance is explicit in the antithetic parallelism of Prov. 21:5: “The plans of the diligent lead to abundance, but everyone who is hasty comes only to poverty.” The related noun hysterēsis, which occurs only in the Hexapla (e.g. Job 30:3 Aquila), always means want, need.

NT The adjective hysteros occurs only twice in the NT. In the parable of the two sons it bears a comparative sense, “the second one” of two, the latter son (Matt. 21:31 Codex B). In the other instance, however, 1 Tim. 4:1 it is used as a superlative, “in the last times” and is parallel to the recognizably eschatological formula “in the last days” which introduces a similar warning in 2 Tim. 3:1. The perspective is toward a future time when the church will be torn by false teachers intent upon subverting the faith of believers. The use of hysteros in this superlative sense became technical in a later period, as in the reference to “Christ . . . who is coming in the last times [hysterois kairois] for our salvation” (Acta Carpi 5).

The adv. hysteron, which occurs 10 times, is always used in a temporal sense. The dominant thought is of something which takes place afterward or later. It was after Jesus had fasted for forty days that he became hungry (Matt. 4:2; cf. 21:29, 32, 37; 22:27; 25:11; Jn. 13:36). All fatherly discipline is at the actual time painful, but later it produces righteousness in those who have been subject to correction (Heb. 12:11). In this instance hysteron stands in opposition to the present time. In Matt. 26:60 the adverb takes on a superlative nuance, in that hysteron means “at last”, “finally” two witnesses came forward whose testimony was regarded as significant by the court.

The verb hystereō, which occurs 16 times in the NT, has a broad range of nuances.

1. The basic sense is to come too late through one’s own fault, to fail to reach, and so to be excluded from privilege. After referring to the wilderness generation which forfeited its place in the promised land through rebellion and unbelief (Heb. 3:7 ff.), the writer to the Hebrews pleads with his readers to take care lest any one of them should fail to attain God’s promised rest (Heb. 4:1). What excludes a man is a persistent lack of faith in God’s word of promise (Heb. 4:2). Near the end of the letter the writer repeats this admonition, employing the parallel expression “fail to obtain the grace of God” (Heb. 12:15). The failure contemplated in each instance identifies a man as one who disparaged God and so excluded himself from participation in the divine provision. Paul concludes that there is no essential difference between Jews and Gentiles, for all men fall short of participation in the divine glory (Rom. 3:23). Once it is understood that salvation is achieved on the level of the glory of God, it becomes clear that it can never be man’s achievement but must be bestowed as the gift of God (cf. Rom. 3:21–26).

2. With reference to circumstances, hystereō means to lack. In Matt. 19:20 a wealthy young man affirmed to Jesus that he had kept the commandments and asked, “What do I still lack?” He has no awareness of an absolute lack which would exclude him from eternal life but only of some unfulfilled remainder which may be completed through the assumption of some task. In the parallel account in Mark, however, it is Jesus who speaks of a deficiency: “You lack one thing: go, sell all that you have . . . and come, follow me” (Mk. 10:21). The one thing the man lacked was the self-sacrificing devotion which characterizes every true disciple of Jesus. For this reason Jesus invited him to follow him and to experience the demands of life in the kingdom with the Twelve. Jesus’ summons in this context means that true obedience to the law is rendered ultimately in discipleship.

Perhaps the most common idea in the majority of cases in the NT is expressed in the contrast between abundance and lack. When famine struck, the prodigal son experienced a lack; he began to be hungry (Lk. 15:14; cf. Phil. 4:12). Although Jesus sent out his disciples on their preaching mission without purse or provisions, they did not lack anything (Lk. 22:35). The Corinthians had been enriched through the grace of God (1 Cor. 1:5) with the result that they did not lack anything in the realm of spiritual gifts (1:7). When Paul was in Corinth and experienced need, what he lacked was provided by the generosity of the brothers who came from Macedonia (2 Cor. 11:9). From the perspective of his own life Paul can speak of having learned the secret of enjoying abundance or experiencing lack with contentment (Phil. 4:12).

3. The verb also occurs in the derivative sense to be less than, inferior to followed by the genitive of comparison. When Paul affirms he is not “in the least inferior to” the superlative apostles (2 Cor. 11:5; 12:11) he means that he needs nothing to compensate for some deficiency exhibited by a comparison with them. In comparing the church to a human body Paul observes that God has so adjusted the body that greater honour is bestowed upon the inferior part (lit. “the part which is lacking”, 1 Cor. 12:24).

The cognate nouns hysterēma and hysterēsis are interchangeable, as a comparison of Mk. 12:44 with Lk. 21:4 will exhibit. Jesus contrasts the gifts to the temple treasury of the wealthy who gave from their abundance with the gift of an impoverished widow who gave everything she had. In this context hysterēsis (Mark) or hysterēma (Luke), as the antonym of abundance, does not denote the relative lack of something but rather want in general, poverty. A similar contrast between abundance and poverty is drawn by Paul in the context of encouraging Corinthian participation in the collection project (2 Cor. 8:14; 9:12). The general sense of need, lack, poverty is evident when the apostle responds to the gift he has received from Philippi. He does not complain of want, for he has learned the secret of self-sufficiency in every circumstance (Phil. 4:11).

hysterēma occurs twice in the stylized expression “to fill up the lack of someone” or of a larger group, where in each case the meaning is to make up for the absence by representing others who could not be present. Through their visit the elders of Corinth have made up for the absence of the Corinthians for whom Paul feels both affection and concern (1 Cor. 16:17). The Christians at Philippi were genuinely concerned for Paul, but it was their emissary Epaphroditus, who supplied what had been lacking to the community, the opportunity to labour by his side (Phil. 2:30). In that sense he has completed the service of the Philippians to the Apostle by compensating for their absence.

On two occasions Paul used hysterēma in the plural. In response to the report of Timothy, Paul wrote to the Thessalonians, affirming his deep desire to return to Thessalonica that he might complete the work he had begun there (1 Thess. 2:17–3:13). He states that he is praying earnestly night and day that he may see them once again “that we may supply what is lacking [Gk. ta hysterēmata] in your faith” (3:10). In this context the plural embraces specific areas in which their faith needed to be matured. Precisely which areas are indicated by 5:14 where Paul refers to the morally weak (cf. 4:1–8), the idle (cf. 4:9–12), and the faint-hearted (cf. 4:13–5:11). The employment of the singular would have suggested that the Thessalonians’ faith as such was defective. It was the apostle’s intention, however, to indicate certain deficiencies in the experience of faith, which he addresses with pastoral concern in the remainder of his letter. For that reason he cast the noun into the plural form. The clause may be rendered, “to help your faith in specific areas where there is still something lacking.”

The second passage, Col. 1:24, is difficult and its meaning continues to be debated. In the context of speaking of his share in the reconciling work of Christ, Paul affirms that he rejoices in the sufferings he has endured, for he is completing what is lacking in the afflictions of (the) Christ for the sake of his church. The deficiency contemplated cannot have reference to Christ's vicarious sufferings and death on the cross in the accomplishment of redemption. Paul makes it emphatically clear that reconciliation was truly and validly achieved through the death of Christ; no need exists for any supplementation from the apostle or any other (cf. Col. 2:11–14). Moreover, nowhere in the NT is the term "afflictions" (thlipsis) applied to the sufferings of Jesus during his ministry or upon the cross.

The key to the interpretation is provided by the phrase "the afflictions of [the] Christ," which occurs only here in the NT. The phrase is intelligible within the conceptual framework provided by early Christian apocalyptic, which spoke of the catastrophes and sufferings which preceded the end of the age and heralded the coming of the messiah (cf. Mk. 13:8). The measurement and extent of these afflictions, or messianic woes, has been determined and limited by God (Mk. 13:5–27; cf. Eth. Enoch 47:1–4; 2 Bar. 30:2). Once the decreed measure has been attained the old aeon, characterized by sin and suffering, will pass away and the new age will dawn. For the present, however, something is still lacking in the plurality of appointed sufferings which must be experienced prior to the end. In the sufferings which Paul endures in his own flesh in the course of his apostolic ministry to the Gentiles, he performs a vicarious service on behalf of the churches, completing what is lacking in the messianic afflictions appointed by God. By doing so, he brings closer the dawning of the new age in which Christ will return in glory (Col. 1:28 f.; 3:4). It is this prospect which accounts for Paul's joy.

W. L. Lane

χρεία

χρεία (chreia), need, necessity, lack, want; χρή (chrē), there is a need, it is necessary; χρῆζω (chrēzō), to have need of.

CL The noun chreia occurs from the time of the tragedians in the sense of need, want, necessity (Aeschylus, Prometheus 170, "will have need of my help"; Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus 1143, "considering in what great need we are"; Oedipus Coloneus 191, "to war with necessity"). The proverb that necessity is the mother of invention stems from the statement of Euripides that "necessity teaches wisdom even to the sluggish" (Fragment 715; cf. Electra 376). From this primary notion of need developed the derivative concepts of office, duty, service, business, or the matter at hand, as when Aristotle speaks of "the business of war and of peace" (Politics 254 B 32). This same range of nuance is amply attested for the Hellenistic period as well, where chreia designates need or necessity. Thus the king is instructed never to compel others to minister to his needs without compensation (Letter of Aristeas 258), while the patriarch Zebulun affirms that he offered fish to all men, "as every man had need" (Testament of Zebulun 6:5). But the noun also signifies now occasion of need, as in the instruction "send him some fish, for we have occasion of need of him" (Fayûm Papyri 117⁸). In conjunction with the verb "to have" chreia is treated as an active verb (Oxyrhynchus Papyri VII, 1068²⁰, "with anything else they may need from you").

The verb form chrē, meaning it is necessary, it needs, one must or ought to, is common in classical literature from the time of Homer, where it occurs in a variety of constructs (Odyssey 1, 124; 3, 14, 209; 4, 463, and often; Iliad 1, 216; 4, 57; 5, 490, and often). In Hellenistic Greek, however, it recedes into the background and is almost totally displaced by dei, which occurs in Homer only once (Iliad 9, 337, “why need the Argives fight?”). Its rare occurrence, as in the Letter of Aristeas 231 (“he ought never to do those things which cause his failure”) or a Berlin papyrus cited by A. Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 1927³, 367: “it is necessary . . . that the goddess be celebrated in festal procession”) suggests literary style. Not until Marcus Aurelius is chrē again used with relative frequency.

The parallel verb chrēzō occurs throughout the period with the meaning want, lack, and to have need of something (Homer, Iliad 11, 835; Odyssey 17, 121, 588). From the Hellenistic period we find the observation that the man who drinks wine needs much discretion (Testament of Judah 14:7) or the ethical injunction that if you have nothing to give to a man who has a need, show him compassion (Testament of Zebulun 7:3). In participial form the verb describes one who is poor or needy (Homer, Odyssey 11, 340; Hesiod, Works and Days 351).

OT The noun chreia is relatively rare in the canonical books of the LXX, but occurs with a high frequency in the books of the Apocrypha (20 times in Sirach alone). The primary meaning is necessity or need, often in the sense of having a need for something or of someone. Thus the Medes have no need of gold (Isa. 13:17); a fool has no need of wisdom (Prov. 18:2); Jeconiah is treated as a vessel for whom no one has a need (Jer. 22:28; cf. 48:38 where Moab is described in identical terms); God has no need of a sinful man (Sir. 15:12, and often). The secondary meaning of office, duty, service is also amply attested in the books of the Apocrypha, where we read of the service of the temple (1 Esdras 8:17; 2 Esdras 7:20; 1 Macc. 10:42), the fulfilment of duty (Sir. 32:2), the administration of public affairs (1 Macc. 10:37; 2 Macc. 7:24; cf. 15:5 “finish the king’s business”), or the holding of office (1 Macc. 13:15). From this last nuance it was easy to shift the focus from the office to the office-holders or officials who are designated by chreia (1 Macc. 12:45; 13:37; Judith 12:10).

Consistent with the linguistic evidence for the disuse of chrē in Hellenistic Greek, the verb occurs only once in the LXX, in the statement “it is not good to eat much honey, but it is necessary to honour with complimentary words” (Prov. 25:27; cf. 4 Macc. 8:26 Codex A). The more usual form chrēzō occurs only twice, in the question, “Why do you come to me now when you have need?” (Jdg. 11:7 Codex B) and in the instruction given to David to see how his brothers were faring (lit. “that you may know whatever they need”, 1 Sam. 17:18 Codex A). The relative disuse of chrēzō is supported by the Hexapla where the verb is attested only in Job 21:21; 22:3; Eccl. 12:1 Symmachus and 1 Sam. 17:18 Theodotion.

NT In the NT the noun chreia occurs both absolutely, with the meaning need, lack, want, difficulty, and in conjunction with verbal forms which signify the need for something or of someone.

1. In the primary sense of need, lack, want we read of David who was in need and was hungry (Mk. 2:25), of distribution made to Christians in Jerusalem, “as any had need” (Acts 2:45; 4:35), and of seeing one’s brother who has a need (1 John 3:17). Epaphroditus is described as the one who supplied Paul’s need (Phil. 2:25; cf. 4:16, 19). In the plural the noun designates needs or necessities (Acts 20:34, “these hands ministered to my needs”; 28:10; Rom. 12:13; Tit. 3:14).

2. In combination with the verb “to have”, chreia functions as an active verb “to need”, or literally “to have need of”. The healthy have no need of a physician (Mk. 2:17 par.); the owner has need of his animals (Mk. 11:13 par.); the court has no further need for witnesses (Mk. 14:63 par.). The church of Laodicea boasts, “I am rich . . . and have no lack of anything” (Rev. 3:17). This treatment of the noun as an active verb is widely attested in the papyri and accounts for the vast majority of occurrences of the expression in the NT.

3. The secondary meaning office, duty, service, which is common in the books of the Apocrypha and the papyri, is found only once in the NT, in reference to the seven Hellenistic leaders “whom we may appoint to this duty” (Acts 6:3).

The rare term chrē occurs only once in the NT, in the comment of James that “these things ought not to be so” (Jas. 3:10). The more usual verbal form chrēzō, to have need of, occurs only five times (Matt. 6:32 par. Lk. 12:30; 11:8; Rom. 16:2; 2 Cor. 3:1). It is evident that when speaking of need, it was far more common for the writers of the NT to employ the construction “to have a need” than it was to use the verbal form.

W. L. Lane

(a). J. A. Findlay, “Eph. 4:29”, ExpT 46, 1934–35, 429; W. R. G. Moir, “Colossians 1:24”, ExpT 42, 1930–31, 479 f.; N. B. Stonehouse, “The Rich Young Ruler,” in Origins of the Synoptic Gospels, 1963, 93–112; U. Wilckens, hysteros, TDNT VIII, 592–601; R. Yates, “A Note on Colossians 1:24”, EQ 42, 1970, 88–92.

(b). M. Bouttier, “Remarques sur la conscience apostolique de St. Paul”, in OIKONOMIA Heilsgeschichte als Thema der Theologie, Festschrift O. Cullmann, 1967, 100–108; M. Carrez, “Souffrance et Gloire dans les Épîtres Pauliniennes: Contribution à l’Exégèse de Col. 1, 24–27”, Revue d’Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 31, 1951, 343–353; G. Le Grelle, “La plénitude de la Parole dans la Pauvreté de la Chair d’après Col. 1:24”, Nouvelle Revue Théologique 81, 1959, 232–250; E. Kamlah, “Wie beurteilt Paulus sein Leiden? Ein Beitrag zur Untersuchung seiner Denkstruktur”, ZNW 54, 1963, 217–232; G. Kittel, “Kol. 1, 24”, ZSTh 18, 1941, 186–191; J. Kremer, Was an den Leiden Christi noch mangelt. Eine interpretationsgeschichtliche und exegetische Untersuchung zu Kol. 1:24^b, 1956; J. Schmid, “Kol. 1, 24”, BZ 21, 1933, 330–344; J. Schmid, “Das textgeschichtliche Problem des Parabels von den zwei Söhnen, Mt. 21:28–32”, Festschrift M. Meinertz, 1951, 68–84; M. Schmid, Die Leidensaussage in Kol. 1:24 (Dissertation, Vienna), 1956; B. N. Wambacq, “‘Adimpleo ea quae desunt passionum Christi in carne mea . . .’ (Col. 1, 24)”, Verbum Domini 27, 1949, 17–22; W. Zimmerli, “Die Frage des Reichen nach dem ewigen Leben”, EvTh 19, 1959, 90–97.

War, Soldier, Weapon

πόλεμος	πόλεμος (polemos), war, battle, fight, strife, conflict, quarrel; πολεμέω (polemeō), make war, fight; στρατεία (strateia), expedition, campaign; στρατεύμα (strateuma), army, detachment, troops; στρατεύω (strateuō), serve as a soldier; στρατηγός (stratēgos), general, chief magistrate, praetor; στρατιά (stratia), army; στρατιώτης (stratiōtēs), soldier; στρατολογέω (stratologeō), gather an army, enlist soldiers; στρατοπέδαρχης (stratopedarchēs), military commander, commandant of a camp; στρατόπεδον (stratopedon), camp, body of troops, army; εκατοντάρχης (hekatontarchēs), εκατόνταρχος (hekatontarchos), κεντυρίων (kentyriōn), centurion; μάχαιρα (machaira), sword; μάχη (machē), battle, fighting, quarrels, strife, disputes; μάχομαι
---------	--

(machomai), fight, quarrel, dispute; Ἄρμαγεδ(δ)ών (Harmaged(d)ōn), Armageddon; Γῶγ (Gōg), Gog; Μαγῶγ (Magōg), Magog; ὄπλον (hoplon), weapon; ὀπλίζω (hoplizō), equip, arm; πανοπλία (panoplia), full armour, panoply; θώραξ (thōrax), breastplate; θυρεός (thyreos), shield; περικεφαλαία (perikephalaia), helmet; βέλος (belos), arrow, dart; ῥομφαία (rhomphaia), a large, broad sword; παρεμβολή (parembolē), fortified camp, barracks or headquarters, army in battle array, battle line; παρεμβάλλω (paremballō), throw up a palisade.

The purpose of this article is to draw attention to the rôle of warfare and military terms in Scripture. It does not attempt to make a comprehensive survey of war and military practice in the ancient world. For the sake of convenience, in the case of terms which occur only rarely in the NT, relevant information about the term's significance in the ancient world will be given in the context of the NT section. An appendix discusses Jesus and Revolution.

CL The Homeric epic testifies to the close link between war and the rule of the gods, though it is an open question whether one can speak of gods of war in the strict sense (cf. O. Bauernfeind, polemos, TDNT VI 503; W. F. Otto, Die Götter Griechenlands, 1947³, 244). The shield of Achilles depicted Ares and Pallas Athene going before the host (Homer, Il. 18, 516). Hesiod reported how Athene rejoiced in war and battle (Theogony 926). Ares was a god of the earlier period who was never elevated into an Olympian deity. Alongside the glorification of the heroism of war may be found a detestation of the lack of fidelity which causes war through the breach of a treaty. "Zeus wills that men should be friends the one to the other and that none should be the enemy of another" (Dio Chrys., Orationes 1, 40). Bauernfeind sums up the ancient Gk. attitude by saying: "the guiding principle was that every peace was painfully won from the general state of war, and was like an island continually threatened by its floods" (TDNT VI 506). He goes on to link the establishment of the pax Romana by Augustus with emperor-worship. "It was not surprising, then, that the experience of peace was accompanied everywhere by a powerful resurgence of the worship of the divine rule which was by no means alien to Hellenism" (TDNT VI 507; → Gospel, art. euangelion CL 2 (c)). C. Brown

OT 1. In the LXX polemos commonly translates the Heb. milḥāmāh, war, battle; the corresponding vbs. are polemeō and lāham. machomai and machē are much less frequent. Also found is the Heb. šābāh, to assemble, muster troops, and the noun šbā'ōt, armies, hosts. For the title YHWH šbā'ōt Yahweh of hosts, or LORD of hosts, → God, art. theos OT 2.

2. War was a common experience of the peoples of the OT. Israel like the surrounding nations knew few periods of real peace. From the raiding party of the five kings against the cities of the plain (Gen. 14) to the siege of → Jerusalem by the armies of → Babylon's king (2 Ki. 25) the accounts of battles and wars extend. For the methods of warfare of the times and of their neighbours see L. E. Toombs, "War, Ideas of", IDB IV 791–801 and Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands, I–II, 1963.

The main theological interest centres on the rôle that God is shown to fill in war. The books of Deut., Jos., Jdg. and Sam. describe a form of warfare in which Yahweh takes the initiative and instructs the Israelite tribes to participate under strict and extraordinary conditions: they are to prepare themselves as they would for worship, and they are to take neither booty nor prisoners (cf. Deut. 7:1 f., 19–24; Jos. 6:1–8:29; 10:1–11:43; Jdg. 4:6–23; 6:33–7:25). This has come to be termed “holy war”. The form which such wars took varied considerably. Moreover, the practice of wars on these terms apparently ceased about midway through the reign of → David.

The “holy war” in David’s time and earlier was the voluntary collaboration of tribes related to one another in religious covenant to gain and defend “the living space of an egalitarian independence movement” (N. K. Gottwald, “War, Holy”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 942). With the consolidation of the state and the established authority of the king, the character of war changed, as did the nature of the society which supported it. Yahweh’s purposes could no longer be seen to be the essence of the king’s wars.

While the practice of “holy war” changed, the ideas which had supported it did not die. The view of God as “the Divine Warrior” (cf. Ps. 24[23]:8) continued in the title “Yahweh of hosts”. Yahweh was the commander of all supernatural powers as well as the armies of Israel.

This found expression in the earliest religious and cultic poetry as well as in the Pss. Deliverance from → Egypt is sung in such terms (Exod. 15). The phrase used of the exodus so many times, “with strong hand and outstretched arm”, fits the same category (cf. Jdg. 5:4 f.; Deut. 32:2 f.; Ps. 68[67]:8 f.; and later Hab. 3:3–6). The victories over Sihon and Og have the same emphasis (Num. 10:35 ff.).

The Pss. use the same language about the exodus and the occupation of Canaan (Ps. 132[131]:12, 16, 18). But they also begin to hint of primordial victories on which world order is based (Pss. 89[88]:9 f.; 93[92]:1–4; 98[97]:1).

Prophets continued to be consulted before joining battle (cf. 1 Ki. 20 and 22). They were also concerned about Yahweh’s control of world politics. They preached judgment to be accomplished through wars that he controlled and used (Amos 1–2; Isa. 13–23; Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–32). “Holy war” was originally conceived as Yahweh’s battle on behalf of his people. Prophetic insight challenged Israel’s right to continue to claim that status. Then they announced that Yahweh, the Divine Warrior, would direct battles against Israel to accomplish his downfall in judgment (cf. Amos 2:6–14; Ezek. 5; and Jer. generally). This, they announced, would be accomplished with the fall of → Jerusalem and the exile, which took place in 586 B.C. (cf. Isa. 40:2).

Israel’s relation to war changed after the exile. Israel was a religious group with very little political autonomy. Except for the brief Hasmonean period of independence after 165 B.C. and the revolts against Roman rule in A.D. 70 and 132, there was no need of or opportunity for military experience. But the ideology of the Divine King and Warrior did not fade. The faith that Yahweh ruled the powers of heaven and exercised authority over those of history continued. He was shown to control their political masters (cf. the books of Daniel and Esther). Yahweh’s care for his people could be accomplished even through such men as Cyrus of Persia (cf. Isa. 45).

With the birth of apocalyptic thinking, “holy war” and the concept of the “Divine Warrior” came into their own again, depicting God’s final triumph over all his enemies on behalf of those who confessed his sovereignty (cf. the Book of Daniel; and Isa. 24–27; Zech. 11–14; see further P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic, J. Watts (1975).

3. The intertestamental period saw no new guidelines, though there is sometimes considerable overlap of messianic and apocalyptic ideas. “Thus the war of extirpation against ungodly might (Test. Dan 5:10 f.; Test. Ash. 7:3) and against sin (Eth. En. 94) sometimes seems to be identical with the final day of judgment, or at least to be so closely related to it that one cannot differentiate between the situation of war and the act of judgment” (O. Bauernfeind, TDNT VI 511; cf. Eth. Enoch 94:7, 9; 100:1–5; and cf. 46, 51, 53 with 55 f. and 62). Sometimes men are summoned to participate (Eth. Enoch 90:19; 95:3; Jub. 23:30; Apc. Abr. 29; Test. Sim. 5:5; 1QSa 1:21, 26). But angels could also take part (1QSa 2:8 f.; 1QM 12:1). Both visible and invisible wars are mentioned together (Test. Reub. 6:12). But sometimes the war is waged by God (Eth. Enoch 94:10; Ass. Mos. 10:7–10; Test. Ash. 7:3) or the messiah (Pss. Sol. 17:21 ff.; 2 Esd. 12:33; Syr. Bar. 40:2 f.; CD 7:20 f.; 1QH 6:28 ff.; 1QSb 5:25) alone.

The Maccabean revolt was not an eschatological war but a fight to secure the integrity of Judaism from the control of the Syrian Seleucid empire in the 2nd cent. B.C. It began in 168 B.C. when an aged priest Mattathias killed an apostate Jew who was about to offer sacrifice on an idolatrous altar in the town of Modia. The four Books of Maccabees are named after the hero of the first two, Judas Maccabeus. The first three are included in the Apocrypha. For various resistance movements in the 1st cent. A.D. → Zeal.

The War Scroll of the Qumran community (1QM) consists of nineteen mutilated columns, proclaiming war against the Kittim (1QM 1), and giving details of the reorganization of temple worship (1QM 2), programme for the forty years’ war (1QM 2), details of trumpets, standards, dispositions, ages, the camp, duties of priests and Levites (1QM 3–9), addresses and prayers (1QM 10–14), and an account of the battle. The work draws inspiration from Dan. 11:40–12:3, and describes the final battle against the Kittim. It may have incorporated an account of a forty years’ war against the Gentiles (cf. G. Vermes, Scrolls, 122 f.; for fuller discussion of the scroll see Y. Yadin, The Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness, 1962). It is thought that the scroll was written in the middle of the 1st cent. B.C. in view of the influence of Roman equipment and practice in the description of the battle order. The symbolism of physical war depicts the eschatological battle between the “Sons of Light” (the Qumran community) and “the Sons of Darkness, the army of Satan” (1QM 1:1). The battle is predestined. The two sides are evenly matched. It is only by the intervention of God that the wicked are finally vanquished.

C. Brown

NT 1. polemos, which occurs in cl. Gk. from Homer onwards, means (a) war, battle, and (b) fig. strife, conflict, quarrel.

(a) According to Heb. 11:34, it was through faith that the great figures of the OT “quenched raging fire, escaped the edge of the sword, won strength out of weakness, became mighty in war, put foreign armies to flight.” The various phrases here doubtless allude to events in Israelite history as recorded in the OT and later writings (cf. F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 335 f.). The allusion to fire recalls Dan. 3:18. Several prophets escaped the edge of the sword: Elijah (1 Ki. 19:2 ff.), Elisha (2 Ki. 6:31 ff.), Jeremiah (Jer. 36:19, 26). Gideon was the least in his father's house and his family the poorest in Manasseh, yet Yahweh delivered Israel by Gideon and his three hundred (Jdg. 6:15 ff.). In commenting on Heb. 11:34, 1 Clem. 55:3 ff. instances Judith and Esther. But the author of Heb. may well have been thinking of numerous instances of victory from the days of Joshua down to the time of Judas Maccabeus. The Israelite belief that victory was in the last analysis the work of Yahweh is expressed by Jonathan: "For nothing can hinder the LORD from saving by many or by few" (1 Sam. 14:6). The battle was not theirs but Yahweh's (2 Chr. 20:15). One man could therefore put a thousand to flight and two ten thousand (Jos. 23:10; Deut. 32:30; Lev. 26:8).

Wars and rumours of wars (Matt. 24:6 par. Mk. 13:7, Lk. 21:9) are foretold in Jesus' eschatological discourse (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (a)). They precede the → judgment. This theme is also taken up by Rev., where war is also said to be made upon the saints (Rev. 11:7; 12:17; 13:7, cf. Dan. 7:21 Theodotion; 19:19).

Among the features of the eschatological conflict in Rev. is the reference to Armageddon: "And they assembled them at the place which in Hebrew is called Armageddon" (Rev. 16:16). There is some discrepancy in the readings of the various MSS as to the form and spelling of this term. The Westcott and Hort text construes it as Har Magedōn, and it has been thought to mean the Mountains of Megiddo and in particular Mount Carmel. Zechariah is the only prophet to mention Megiddo (Zech. 12:11). Zechariah spoke of all the nations battling against Jerusalem (Zech. 14:2), and afterwards of living waters flowing from Jerusalem (Zech. 14:8; cf. Ezek. 47:1–12; Rev. 22:1 f.). Zechariah deeply influenced the author of Rev., but the battle symbolism of Rev. is also influenced by the imagery of Ezekiel. The gathering of the kings at Armageddon takes up the picture of Ezek. 38–39 with its reference to Gog and Magog (cf. also Rev. 20:7–10), where Gog is the prince of Magog. The land of Gog is mentioned in Jub. 8:25; cf. 7:19; 9:8; Sl. Enoch 56:5 ff.; 2 Esd. 13:5 ff. and woes against Gog and Magog are proclaimed in Sib. 3:319 ff., cf. 662 ff. Perhaps in Ezek. Gog is intended also to personify a land or nation. Gog is used as early as the Tell el-Amarna tablets as a name for the nations of the North, and in Ezek. and Jewish apocalyptic writers it stands for the nations generally which combined in assault on Israel (G. R. Beasley-Murray, Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974, 297; cf. J. M. Ford, Revelation, Anchor Bible, 1975, 356 f. for Gog and Magog in rabbinic literature). This is the final eschatological battle after the release of Satan following his thousand-year bondage (Rev. 20:7). The enemies of the people of God will be destroyed by fire from heaven, and the devil will be thrown into the lake of fire with the beast and the false prophet.

polemos stands for a single battle in Rev. 9:7, 9; 12:7; 16:14; 20:8. In 1 Cor. 14:8 Paul asks: "And if the bugle gives an indistinct sound, who will get ready for battle?" The context is a discussion of speaking in tongues (cf. v. 6), and the illustration is one of several examples of unintelligibility, which therefore are of no practical value to the hearer. The gift of tongues may edify the speaker, but no one else unless there be someone to discern the significance of the tongue and interpret it for the edification of the hearers (cf. vv. 11 f., 23 f., 27 ff.).

(b) polemos is used in the fig. sense of strife, conflict, quarrel in Jas. 4:1: "What causes wars [polemoi], and what causes fightings [machai] among you? Is it not your passions that are at war [strateuomenōn] in your members?" For polemos in the sense of strife and quarreling cf. Philo, Gig. 51; Test. Sim. 4:8; Test. Gad 5:1; 1 Clem. 3:2; 46:5, and for machē in a similar sense cf. Test. Jud. 16:3; Test. Ben. 6:4; 2 Tim. 2:23; Tit. 3:9 (cf. M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, James, Hermeneia, 1976, 216).

2. (a) The cognate vb. polemeō means to fight, make war (Rev. 2:16; 12:7; 13:4; 17:14; 19:11). These passages all have strong symbolic overtones, and the subject can be either the opponents of the church or believers, the Spirit of Christ or the exalted Christ. machomai is used in the lit. sense of fight (between two persons) in Acts 7:26 (cf. Exod. 2:11–15; 21:22). The hapax legomenon theomachos means one who strives against God (Acts 5:39).

(b) polemeō is used of the disputes among Christians in Jas. 4:2 (cf. also Gal. 1:13 v.l.; 1:23 v.l.). Likewise machomai is used fig. in Jas. 4:2 and Jn. 6:52.

3. strateia is found in secular Gk. onwards and the LXX in the sense of an expedition or campaign. In 2 Cor. 10:4 it means warfare: "For the weapons of our warfare are not worldly [ta gar hopla tēs strateias hēmōn ou sarkika] but have divine power to destroy strongholds [ochyrōmatōn]." C. K. Barrett thinks that the verse is a probable allusion to Prov. 21:22: The wise man attacks strong (ochyras) cities, and destroys the stronghold (ochyrōma) in which the ungodly trusted (The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973, 251). A similar figure is used in attacks on sophistry (Philo, Conf. Ling. 129 ff.). The picture is that of a siege engine attacking an embattled position. Paul's opponents had evidently accused Paul of operating in a worldly way (cf. 2 Cor. 1:17), whereas they themselves were "spiritual" (cf. 1 Cor. 3:1). Paul's reaffirmation of his own preaching, work and life in the Spirit is comparable with 1 Cor. 2:4. Here in 2 Cor. 10:4 f., Paul is turning the tables on his opponents, implying that a pseudo-spirituality is an obstacle to the knowledge of God. Rebellious thoughts are taken captive to Christ. The cognate vb. strateuō, do military service, serve as a soldier, carry on a war, is found in the previous verse (2 Cor. 10:3). Both noun and vb. occur again in 1 Tim. 1:18, where Timothy is urged to fight the good fight (strateuesthai tēn kalēn strateian). M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann think that the use of such imagery arose against the background of the Qumran community's conception of the holy war, as set out in The Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness (The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 32). If this is so, Paul is deliberately developing the imagery in conscious contrast to that of Qumran. But, as Dibelius and Conzelmann observe, the idea of God as a commander-in-chief is amply attested in the Gk. world (Epictetus, Dissertationes 3, 23, 31; Sextus Empiricus, Adversus Mathematicos 9, 26; Philo, On Providence 2, 102; Maximus Tyrius, 4, 9; 10, 9; 13:3 ff.), as is that of the moral life as military service (Plato, Apol. 28; Epictetus, Dissertationes 3, 24, 34).

In addition to 2 Cor. 10:4, hoplon, weapon, occurs in Rom. 13:12: "The night is far gone, the day is at hand. Let us cast off the works of darkness and put on the armour of light." This mixed metaphor picks up the twin ideas that armour is worn during the daytime, as battles could be fought only while it was light, implying that the Christian is to take the offensive, and also that the Christian should wear armour appropriate to the light, in contrast with the works of darkness. In 2 Cor. 6:7 Paul speaks of "the weapons of righteousness for the right hand and for the left" in the context of a discussion of Christian virtues and attitudes in the face of opposition and adversity. hoplon is used lit. of weapons in Jn. 18:3, but in Rom. 6:13 it means a tool. The cognate vb. hoplizō occurs in 1 Pet. 4:1: "Since therefore Christ has suffered in the flesh, arm yourselves with the same thought, for whoever has suffered in the flesh has ceased from sin." The thought is explained in the preceding verses. The Christian is to follow Christ who has died, and is risen and ascended (1 Pet. 3:18–22). He belongs to him, and thus to a different way of life from that of the ungodly (cf. 1 Pet. 3:13–17; 4:2 ff.; see the discussion in E. Best, 1 Peter, New Century Bible, 1971, 150 ff.).

In 1 Cor. 9:7 Paul asks: "Who serves as a soldier at his own expense [tis strateuetai idiois opsōniois pote]? Who plants a vineyard without eating any of its fruit? Who tends a flock without getting some of the milk?" The questions come in the course of an argument against his detractors which maintains the right of the Christian worker to be supported by the Christian community. At the same time Paul points out that he has refrained from exercising his rights so that he could "make the gospel free of charge" (1 Cor. 9:18). In 2 Tim. 2:3 f. the same imagery occurs in an exhortation to single-hearted devotion: "Take your share of suffering as a good soldier [stratiōtēs] of Christ Jesus. No soldier on service [strateuomenos] gets entangled in civilian pursuits, since his aim is to satisfy him who enlisted [stratologēsanti] him."

Elsewhere stratiōtēs occurs in the lit. sense for Roman soldiers in Matt. 8:9; 27:27; 28:12; Mk. 15:16; Lk. 7:8; Jn. 19:2; Acts 10:7. strateuma means an army (Rev. 19:14, 19), a detachment (Acts 23:10, 27), and troops (Matt. 22:7; Lk. 23:11; Rev. 9:16). The vb. strateuō is used of the struggles of the passions in the Christian: "Beloved, I beseech you as aliens and exiles to abstain from the passions of the flesh that wage war [strateuontai] against your soul" (1 Pet. 2:11; cf. Jas. 4:1, see 1 (b) above; and also Rom. 7:7 ff.; and 1QS 3:17 ff.). stratēgos is found in the double sense of the popular name for the praetors or chief magistrates in the Roman colony of Philippi (Acts 16:20, 22, 35 f., 38; cf. Arndt, 778) and the captain of the temple (Lk. 22:4, 52; Acts 4:1; 5:24). stratia, army, is used in the sense of the heavenly host of angels (Lk. 2:13), and the host of heaven as an object of idolatrous worship (Acts 2:42; cf. Amos. 5:27 ff.). The fact that God gave the Israelites over to such worship is seen by Stephen as a divine judgment, illustrating his theme that throughout history Israel has repeatedly limited God by refusing him true spiritual worship. stratopedarchēs, military commander, commandant of a camp, occurs only in Acts 28:16 v.l. stratopedon means lit. a camp, and then a body of troops, an army, or legion (Lk. 21:20).

The Roman centurion (Lat. centurio, officer in charge of a hundred men) generally appears in a positive light in the NT. Three terms for the rank are given: hekatontarchēs (Acts 10:1, 22; 24:23; 27:1, 31); hekatontarchos (Matt. 8:5, 8, 13; 27:54; Lk. 7:2, 6; 23:47; Acts 21:32; 22:25 f.; 23:17, 23; 27:6, 11, 43; 28:16); and the transliteration kentyriōn (Mk. 15:39, 44 f.). Lk. even records the pronouncement on the faith of the centurion at Capernaum: "I tell you, not even in Israel have I found such faith" (Lk. 7:9 par. Matt. 8:10). The centurion had drawn an analogy between his own authority and that of Jesus. In both cases it was sufficient merely to give the word of command. Jesus could, therefore, heal merely by giving the word; the centurion did not consider himself worthy to receive Jesus under his roof. The Jews, by contrast, sought signs and argued with Jesus. Matt.'s account adds a comment which was particularly relevant to the Jewish nation: "I tell you, many will come from east and west and sit at table with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, while the sons of the kingdom will be thrown into the outer darkness; there men will weep and gnash their teeth." The comment of the centurion by the cross, "Truly this man was a son of God" (Mk. 15:39) stands in marked contrast with that of the chief priests and scribes (Mk. 15:31 f.). The version in Lk. 23:47, "Certainly this man was innocent", suggests that the comment in Mk. was not intended to be a full confession of divinity, but rather that Jesus was righteous and a true son of God in the sense in which believers address God as "our Father". By contrast the Jews, from the chief priests and scribes down to the crucified malefactors, had forfeited the right to be sons of God.

Military service is never something which is condemned per se in the NT. The soldiers who arrested and crucified Jesus were acting on order from their superiors who in turn were complying with the desires of the Jewish leaders. When soldiers came to John the Baptist to ask what they should do, he did not tell them to abandon their profession. Instead he said: "Rob no one by violence or by false accusation, and be content with your wages" (Lk. 3:14).

4. parembolē means a camp, especially a fortified camp. It is used of the Israelites' camp (e.g. Exod. 29:14; Lev. 4:12, 21; 10:4 f.), and has this sense in Heb. 13:11, 13: "For the bodies of those animals whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest as a sacrifice for sin are burned outside the camp. So Jesus also suffered outside the gate in order to sanctify the people through his own blood. Therefore let us go forth to him outside the camp, bearing abuse for him" (cf. Lev. 16:27). The author thus sees a heightened symbolism in the crucifixion of Jesus outside Jerusalem. The believer, therefore, should be willing to suffer the same rejection by the Jews. Instead of Jewish sacrifices, he is to offer the sacrifice of praise (v. 15). The present Jerusalem is "no lasting city" (v. 14); it is in fact a camp (v. 13). It is therefore better to suffer rejection with Christ, and be part of the true pilgrim people of God. The church is described as "the camp of the saints and the beloved city" in Rev. 20:9 which is surrounded in the final eschatological battle (see above, 1 (a)). Elsewhere parembolē means the barracks or headquarters of the Roman troops in Jerusalem (Acts 21:34, 37; 22:24; 23:10, 16, 32). The vb. paremballō is common in secular Gk. and the LXX, and has various meanings. In Lk. 19:43 it means to throw up a palisade, and occurs in the eschatological teaching of Jesus in the pronouncement of judgment on Jerusalem (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (a)).

5. Various weapons and items of armour are mentioned in the NT particularly in connexion with defence against spiritual attack. The theme of "the breastplate of faith and love" and the helmet of "the hope of salvation" (1 Thess. 5:8) is elaborated in Eph. 6:10–17 into a comprehensive description of the Christian's warfare and weapons in the fight against the supernatural powers of evil. The idea may have been suggested by the fact that Paul was himself a prisoner at the time (Eph. 4:1, cf. v. 8), and would no doubt be guarded by Roman soldiers. The "whole armour of God [tēn panoplian tou theou]" is needed in order to stand against the wiles of the devil (Eph. 6:11, cf. v. 13). panoplia means the full equipment of the soldier, including both offensive and defensive weapons. It is found at the introduction of lists of weapons or as a comprehensive term for them (Thuc., 3, 114; Isocrates 16, 29; Polyb., 6, 23; cf. M. Barth, Ephesians, II, Anchor Bible, 1974, 761). There is no exact Heb. equivalent. Barth thinks that the emphasis here is on the quality of the weapons rather than their complete number, and prefers the translation "splendid armour" (op. cit., 793 ff.). The loins are to be girded with truth (Eph. 6:14). Barth notes three types of girdle worn by Roman soldiers that Paul may have had in mind: a breech-like leather apron worn to protect the lower abdomen; the sword belt which was buckled together with the sword and also the dagger in the case of an officer; or the belt or sash designating an officer or high official. Barth prefers the last suggestion, as he sees the verse as an allusion to Isa. 11:5: "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his waist, and faithfulness the girdle of his loins." Truth is to be both the defence and mark of the Christian. In Eph. 6:14 Paul speaks of "the breastplate of righteousness [ton thōraka tēs dikaiosynēs]"; in 1 Thess. 5:8 he refers to "the breastplate of faith". In view of the link between righteousness and faith in Paul's thought, no doubt the same piece of armour could be viewed from these complementary perspectives. For → righteousness is the gift of God appropriate by faith. The same noun is used in the LXX for the high priest's breastpiece of judgment (Exod. 28:15 ff.; 39:8 ff.). If Paul is thinking about the Roman foot soldier's equipment, the thōrax probably denotes the metal breastplate which protected the soldier's chest. But if, as Barth contends, Paul is thinking of the saints as rich heirs and noblemen, he may have had in mind scale or chain mail that covered the chest and hips (op. cit., 769; cf. Eph. 1:8; 2:6; 3:8, 12; 4:1).

Eph. 6:15 speaks of the feet being "shod with the equipment of the gospel of peace [en hetoimasia tou euangeliou tēs eirēnēs]". hetoimasia normally means readiness or preparation. But equipment (i.e. boots) as in modern Gk. (Arndt, 316) is a widespread interpretation. However, Barth prefers to translate the phrase "steadfast because the gospel of peace is strapped under your feet" (op. cit., 770, cf. 797 ff.). He argues that the Gk. stem hetoim- frequently translates the Heb. kūn, to establish, and thinks that Paul had in mind the Roman caliga, or half-boot, which was made of leather but left the toes free, enabling him to move readily but also giving him a firm grip. He argues that Paul is thinking of Roman military equipment rather than the practice of running barefoot for speed, despite the allusion to Isa. 52:7 (cf. also Ps. 121:3; and also Isa. 59:7; Rom. 3:15 ff.). The "shield of faith [ton thyreon tes pisteōs], with which you can quench all the flaming darts of the evil one" (Eph. 6:16) is an allusion to the Roman scutum. It had an iron frame and sometimes a metal boss. thyreos is linked etymologically with thyra, door. It was a large door-shaped or vaulted shield in contrast with the small, round aspis or pelta. With its several layers of leather soaked in water before battle it was formidable protection against flaming darts (belē . . . pepyrōmena). For God as a protecting shield see Ps. 7:10, 13; Zech. 12:8; Wis. 5:19; and the protection of Yahweh sung in Ps. 18. The "helmet of salvation [tēn perikephalaian tou sotēriou]" (Eph. 6:17; cf. 1 Thess. 5:8) appears to combine the thought of Isa. 59:17 with the Roman soldier's armour. The helmet could be of leather or metal, lined with sponge or felt. Barth suggests that Paul has in mind the more ornamental helmet of victory, demonstrating that the battle has been won (op. cit., 775), though the need for the other armour indicates that heavy fighting must still be expected.

Finally, the believer is to take "the sword of the Spirit which is the word of God

[tēn machairan tou pneumatos ho estin rhēma theou].” The word machaira occurs at Matt. 10:34; 26:47, 51 f., 55; Mk. 14:43, 47 f.; Lk. 21:24; 22:36, 38, 49, 52; Jn. 18:10 f.; Acts 12:2; 16:27; Rom. 8:35; 13:4; Eph. 6:17; Heb. 4:12; 11:34, 37; Rev. 6:4; 13:10, 14. The word rhomphaia which denotes a large, broad sword is used in Rev. 2:12 (“The words of him who has the sharp two-edged sword”; cf. 2:17) and Rev. 1:16 (“from his mouth issued a sharp two-edged sword”). It is used symbolically for anguish and pain (Lk. 2:35) and literally in Lk. 21:24D and in the visions of Rev. 6:8; 19:15, 21. There is a certain irony in that men came against Jesus armed with swords and the fact that the sword is a symbol of authority (Rom. 13:4). Jesus responded to men with words; but his words are seen in the later NT writings as words of authority and judgment. Heb. 4:12 speaks of the word of God as “living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing to the division of soul and spirit, of joints and marrow, and discerning the thoughts and intentions of the heart.” Jesus’ reply to Peter in Lk. 22:38 is no doubt ironical. His initial remark about going out to buy a sword is probably an intimation of what is about to happen. Jesus is being treated as a transgressor (Lk. 22:37; cf. Isa. 53:12). The disciples must be ready for it. The production of two swords might suggest that some of the disciples had links with the zealots, or at least they were ready to resort to arms. The words, “It is enough”, may imply that that is enough of that kind of talk, or they may mean that the kind of resistance the disciples could put up with two swords against the trained Roman soldiers is so pathetically negligible as to be self-evidently futile and wrong. (On this saying and Mk. 10:34 par. Lk. 12:51 see below, Jesus and Revolution 3 (b) (iii).)

In the case of Eph. 6:17, the gen. tou pneumatos, “of the Spirit”, may be the equivalent of the adj. spiritual (cf. Eph. 1:3; 5:19; 1 Cor. 14:1) or it may be the gen. of origin (i.e. “the sword given by the Spirit”). Elsewhere Paul stresses faith and testimony as the gift of the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:1–16; 7:40; 12:3; ch. 14 passim; Gal. 3:1–5; Eph. 3:5), and if these are parallel to the present passage, it would support the gen. of origin (cf. M. Barth, op. cit., 776 f.). The fact that rhēma rather than logos is used here (cf. also Eph. 5:26) may focus attention on the weighty, revelatory, creative and prophetic utterances of the Spirit. Prophetic speech, hymns and prayers cannot be excluded (Eph. 4:25, 29; 5:13, 18 f.). But rhēma can mean the words of God found in the OT and the words of the Lord quoted by Paul (1 Thess. 4:15; 1 Cor. 7:10; cf. Acts 20:35; → Word, art. rhēma). There is a par. with Heb. 4:12 and Isa. 49:2 (“He has made my mouth like a sharp sword”). “Just like the Messiah in Isa. 11, so all the saints in Ephesus can wield the sword of the word only because they are inspired” (M. Barth, op. cit., 777).
C. Brown

Jesus and Revolution

1. The Contemporary Debate. Paul Tillich could say that theology must be done again in every age. This is primarily what the theologies of hope, revolution and liberation attempt to do. Born in a world of acute change, where history is being increasingly experienced as revolution (rooted in the tremendous upheavals taking place in every area of modern life, resulting from science and technology, and evident particularly in the west in the student unrest and civil rights movements of the 1960s and in the so-called Third World in the struggles against social and economic injustice and racial oppression around the globe, these theologies seek to focus attention on faith in action. Theology is not, so they say, concerned with reflecting on and interpreting faith, but reflecting on and interpreting faith in action. In this vein the Augustinian theology of history can be appealed to for support and The City of God cited as an example of theology based on “a true analysis of the signs of the times and the demands with which they challenge the Christian community” (Gustavo Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation, 1974, 6). It is at this point of action and change that exponents of these theologies find themselves in agreement with Karl Marx: although Marx owed a great deal to Ludwig Feuerbach, he had to criticize him for remaining a thinker instead of turning thought into action, a criticism epitomized in Marx’s famous dictum: “The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways; the point, however, is to change it” (Theses on Feuerbach, XI). So too, theologians must not stop at making theological assertions about the world; they must do something to change it.

(a) Theology of Hope. (i) Context. The theology of hope is primarily associated with the name of Jürgen Moltmann, although it gives inspiration to the thought of a variety of modern theologians, for example Josef Pieper (Hope and History, 1969), Rubem Alves (A Theology of Human Hope, 1969), and Major J. Jones (Black Awareness: A Theology of Hope, 1971).

One of the younger German theologians, Moltmann was a theological student in the years immediately following World War II. He sat at the feet of Gerhard von Rad, Ernst Käsemann, Hans Joachim Iwand, Ernst Wolf and Otto Weber at the University of Göttingen. While there, in his own words, he “imbibed the theology of the Confessing Church, inspired by Karl Barth and preserved throughout the years of struggle between the church and the Nazi state.” Imbued with hope for a new, more humane Germany, and for a liberated, liberating church of Christ, he could not become enthusiastic about the debate on existentialism and secularity provoked by Bultmann. His distinctive kind of theology was to await the stimulus of the Dutch Catholic writer, Arnold van Ruler, in 1957, followed soon afterwards by Ernst Bloch on the hope principle (Ernst Bloch, Das Prinzip Hoffnung, 1959). From Bloch he found himself recalled to understanding Christian faith as both world-transforming and world-overcoming. Moltmann then published his Theology of Hope (Theologie der Hoffnung, in German) in 1964.

The decade of the sixties had brought a new cultural and social situation where technology promised to provide an open future: great possibilities lay ahead in terms of economic planning, population control and direction, development and social projection. These years were years of hope, and it is no accident that they gave rise to “a theology of hope”. Moltmann would be the first to admit this: it is what he calls the context of his theology.

(ii) Text. Although it may arise in and from a concrete situation, in no sense is Moltmann’s theology of hope shaped by that situation, but rather by its text, the Bible.

The Bible is the text of the theology of hope. In the writings of the Old and New Testaments is to be found the history book of God’s promises. And these promises of God have been incarnated in the “promissory history” of Israel and in the “promissory history” of Jesus of Nazareth. The Bible tells the story of one who fulfils promises, the coming God. It is thus a story of hope for the world.

But if we begin to read the Bible as the book of God’s hope then in Moltmann’s words we will find that it is a highly revolutionary and subversive book: "The hope about which it speaks is valid for the hopeless and not for the optimists. It is valid for the poor and not for the rich. It is valid for the downtrodden and the insulted so that they will learn to walk uprightly, and all this as it will be in heaven, so already here on this earth. As the book of the promises of God, the Bible . . . points beyond itself into the future which does not yet fill our present" ("Introduction to the 'Theology of Hope'", in Jürgen Moltmann, The Experiment Hope, ed. and translated by M. D. Meeks, 1975, 46).

(iii) God of Hope – God of the Future. Christian theology speaks of God historically. It speaks of the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, of the God of the Exodus, of the God of the prophets, and of the God who raised Jesus from the dead. By so speaking it remembers these events and experiences and calls them to mind. But Christian theology also speaks of this history eschatologically: a future is awaited. What is unique then in the biblical message about God is this: it is a message which emerges from history and has the future and the end of history, that is liberation, as its goal.

Abraham heard God's promise and heeded it. To do this he had to leave his fatherland, forsaking the familiar patterns of life which had provided him with a home and security. And, in Moltmann's own words: "The Bible calls this 'faith': leaving the dwelling places of reality where one has peace and security and giving oneself over to the course of history, to the way of freedom and danger, the way of disappointment and surprise, borne along and led solely by God's hope" (loc. cit., 47 f.). Likewise, the tribes of Israel experienced in Egypt the reality of Yahweh in Promise and Exodus. When Moses asked the name of this God he was given the answer: "I am who I am" (Exod. 3:14). This formula can be translated, "I will be who I will be", and contains the future of God – a "God who has the future as the mode of his being" (Ernst Bloch).

So then, Abraham's God, Israel's God, was a "God with the future as the mode of his being" – a "God of hope". This biblical way of describing the divinity of God – the "coming God" – is very different from the essentially Greek description of the "eternal God" taken over by Christian theology. If we are to speak of the "coming God" his future becomes the source of the times. His coming continually creates new time in history. If his creation at the end of history means "Behold, I make all things new", we are able to anticipate in it that his grace is "new every morning".

(iv) Messiah of Hope. It is now right to ask whether this future orientation of the theology of hope is in accord with the New Testament, says Moltmann. He finds that it is. For the proclamation of Jesus: "The kingdom of God has come near. Repent; and believe in the gospel" is in fact eschatological proclamation. Moreover, its form is also eschatological anticipation. Jesus anticipates through his words, his deeds, and his life shared with others, what, according to the Old Testament expectancy, can only happen on the last day. Jesus does already today what is supposed to come tomorrow. He did not promise the kingdom only to the just and judgment to the unjust, as was usually the case (e.g. John the Baptist), but clearly and preferentially promises the kingdom to the poor and the unjust, not because of their injustice, but because of God's grace. He proclaimed the kingdom as prevenient and unconditional grace to the sinners and tax collectors, and his blessedness to the poor, to those who were grieving, and to those who were hungry. And thus he announced the kingdom, not as judgment but as joy.

But on what basis has he so proclaimed the kingdom? On the basis of being totally directed toward confirmation by God in the future. There was an inner contradiction "between Jesus' claim of anticipating God's kingdom" and his own poverty, as well as his association with the outcast and poor.

There is another side, however, to the story of Jesus: he was crucified because he proclaimed the justice of grace and, thereby, violated the religious, as well as the political, law and order. Yet in the light of Easter, the Christian proclamation becomes once more eschatological and thus proleptic proclamation of the coming of God. The resurrection of the crucified Christ reveals a new justice, the justification of the godless. Through the crucified Christ the future of resurrection and life, of freedom, joy and justice is opened up to those who live in guilt without hope and who must die in fear without a future. The future is inaugurated, not by way of examples and commands, but through the love, the patience, and the sacrifice of God.

(v) Community of Hope. Hope is to be seen in the "sons of Abraham", those who have made an exodus from the religious and political establishments which oppress the world today. These "sons of Abraham", the community of the people of God, follow Abraham, who left his fatherland for the sake of a promise of blessing for all people; Israel, who abandoned religious and political captivity in Egypt in order to find the land of freedom and righteousness; and the man of Nazareth, who was crucified by the priests and politicians of his people and by the imperial power of Rome.

The community of hope must not be "conformed to this world", as Paul says, but be "transformed by the renewal of their minds" (Rom. 12:2), for there is no "lasting city" but "one which is to come" (Heb. 13:14) – either in Rome, Germany, England or America. But if we seek the "city which is to come", the "promised land", where shall we go? To this question Moltmann promptly replies: "One does not move to another country to find freedom and God. One remains where one is in order to correspond to the conditions of the coming kingdom of God through the renewal of the heart and by practical transformation of social circumstances. The front line of the exodus is not emigration, but liberation through the transformation of the present. For in the present, where we always are, the powers of the past wrestle with the powers of the future, and fear and hope struggle for domination. By changing ourselves and the circumstances around us, by anticipating the future of God, we emigrate out of the past into the future" (loc. cit., 59).

(b) Theology of Revolution. (i) Praxis. When the optimism of the early years of the sixties gave way to the despair of its later years (1968 witnessed not only the end of the "Prague Spring" but the Paris student riots and the beginnings of violence in Northern Ireland), it was easy to dismiss the theology of hope as fine reading and call for action in its place. Moltmann did in fact commit himself. Quoting Walter Rauschenbusch's challenge to Christianity: "Ascetic Christianity called the world evil and left it. Humanity is waiting for a revolutionary Christianity which will call the world evil and change it", he declared: "The new criterion of theology and of faith is to be found in praxis" (action). To this end, in the struggles for freedom and justice, Christians were called on to side with the humanity of the oppressed.

(ii) Violence and Non-violence. Aware that such a summons raised the question of the use of violence, Moltmann was willing to go even further and assert that the problem of violence and non-violence is but an illusory problem for there is only the question of whether the means are proportionate to the ends. In order to see how he went on to develop this thesis it is worth quoting from his essay "Racism and the Right to Resist" translated, significantly, by the World Council of Churches (in The Experiment Hope, 131–46): "It is not the idealistic principle of nonviolence that is consonant with the gospel, but the responsible action of love. Love is divine power-in-weakness (2 Cor. 12:9). Responsible political action in love is selfless to the point of sacrifice of personal innocence, to the point of incurring guilt. From this we are led to the following conclusions: first, nonviolence in the sense of nonresistance cannot be justified in tyrannical situations, because it permits and encourages violence. It does not save the personal innocence of the individual, but leads to 'more irredeemable guilt'. Second, violence, construed as the love which desires to put an end to evil, cannot be approved but it can be answered for. Resistance may not triumph over its victims. It is revenge, not love, which does that. Guilt remains guilt, but in faith we can live with this guilt and need not commit suicide. The engagement to resist remains a 'bitter engagement'. But in this instance too the incurring of guilt in the responsible love which has recourse to counterviolence cannot be restricted to the case of resistance. It is only that the example of resistance reveals the factors which, secretly and often unconsciously, determine all political action. Third, it follows from this that action and failure to act are not the same in such situations in the sense that either way one incurs guilt. There is the 'more irredeemable guilt' which in most cases consists of sins of omission" (loc. cit., 143).

(iii) Marxist Analysis and a Socialist Society. But as Stephen Neill aptly remarks, in his recent book, Salvation Tomorrow, 1976, 85, Moltmann did not go far enough for some. For example, José Míguez Bonino, an Argentinian, serving in the Evangelical Faculty of Theology at Buenos Aires, and one of the presidents of the World Council of Churches, in his Revolutionary Theology Comes of Age, 1975, 144–52, makes one exception in his general condemnation of the European theological tradition: Jürgen Moltmann. Moltmann, we are told, at first appeared to share the vision of those having revolutionary thoughts and was in the process of becoming their prophet. But in his second major book, The Crucified God, 1973, he appears to Bonino to be receding from his previous position and to be uncertain of his revolutionary theology. Bonino summarizes the theology of hope succinctly by calling Christian hope "a constant disturbance of reality as it is and a call to move ahead to the future" and the theology of the crucified God clearly but not so succinctly: "God in Christ identifies himself utterly with man oppressed, destituted, and abandoned. He dies the death of the blasphemer, the subversive, the God-forgotten man. His cross marks therefore the bankruptcy of political and religious power, indeed of God conceived as a protective assurance against destitution and death. Here we meet the powerless, suffering, Godforsaken man as the last reality of God himself. Therefore all false optimism, all utopian hope is definitively shattered. But at the same time, we are called to this same identity in the double identification with the crucified Christ, and therefore with those with whom he himself was identified: the outcast, the oppressed, the poor, the forsaken, the sinners, the lost. This is the cradle of the Christian's identity and relevance. To be crucified together with Christ means to stand with those for whose sake God himself died the death of the sacrilege, the subversive, the Godforsaken one" (op. cit., 145f.).

Bonino concludes that Moltmann intends to become concrete, but that this would involve coming down on one side or the other in a given political situation. This Moltmann is clearly not prepared to do. He declares: "The crucified God is really a God without country and without class. But he is not an unpolitical God; he is the God of the poor, of the oppressed, of the humiliated" (The Crucified God, 305 [329]). Replies Bonino: "But the poor, the oppressed, the humiliated are a class and live in countries." Therefore, for Bonino personally, in the context of Latin American politics, it means coming down on the side of a Marxist analysis and a socialist society as the humanly right thing to do. One may not, says Bonino, as Moltmann does, "claim a solidarity with the poor and . . . hover above right and left as if that choice did not have anything to do with the matter" (Revolutionary Theology Comes of Age, 148).

Since Moltmann, many theologians have addressed themselves to the question of revolution, some in support, others from varying critical stances: in Germany Trutz Rendtorff (Theologie der Revolution. Analysen und Materialien, 1968), in North America Harvey Cox (The Secular City, 1965, 1968), in England José Míguez Bonino delivering the first of the London Lectures in Contemporary Christianity (later published as Christians and Marxists: The Mutual Challenge to Revolution, 1976).

(c) Theology of Liberation. (i) Context. The theology of liberation is connected particularly with the Latin American scene. It is primarily a movement, mainly associated with reflection groups which grew out of the Catholic Episcopal Congress held at Medellín, Colombia, in 1968. It is not unrelated to the theologies of hope and revolution, and José Míguez Bonino, for example, has claim to being called a theologian of liberation as well as of revolution.

For Latin Americans the latter years of the sixties became years of disillusionment with the pursuit of "developmentalism" as answering the needs of the Third World. Qualitative rather than quantitative change was needed. Even in Europe this was recognized in the use of the term "revolution" to describe transformation needed from within. It was because "revolution" held out for Europe frightening prospects that "developmentalism" caught on in the first place. Conversely in the Third World it was embraced because, as Frantz Fanon (The Wretched of the Earth, 1963) seemed to be saying, it was a more comprehensive way of dealing with the issue, at least when it was about humanization. But as the Third World began to realize that development was about quantitative rather than qualitative change, and that along the well-trodden paths of the developed world, it became necessary to coin a new term for a new concept. For in actual fact this is what "liberation" proved to be, a concept going further than development in being for qualitative as against mere quantitative change and being less superficial than revolution in the understanding of its nature and implications. Liberation would wrench the underdeveloped countries away from economic dependence on the rest, thus liberating them for development along their own lines. At this point liberation must include an element of revolution as there ought to be no illusions about the force which will be brought into play against the breaking of dependence. However, there are other forms of dependence apart from the economic, for example, the cultural dependence on alien thought and value systems: these too must be broken.

Orlando E. Costas (The Church and its Mission: A Shattering Critique from the Third World, 1974) notes the distinctive contributions of three theologians of liberation theology. Rubem Alves (A Theology of Human Hope, 1969) he calls the prophet of the movement; Hugo Assmann (Opresión-liberación: Desafío a los cristianos, 1971, Teología desde la praxis de la liberación, 1973) he terms the apologist of the movement; and Gustavo Gutiérrez (Teología de la liberación, Perspectivas, 1971) he distinguishes as the systematic theologian of the movement. It is to the last-named that we shall turn for an understanding of the theology of liberation.

(ii) Theology as Critical Reflection on Praxis. The classical tasks of theology Gutiérrez sees as spirituality and rational knowledge. To this he would want to add theology as critical reflection on praxis. He sees this latter function as rooted in the first centuries of the church's life. For example, as we have already noted in our introduction, the Augustinian theology of history found in The City of God is based, according to Gutiérrez, on a "true analysis of the signs of the times and the demands with which they challenge the Christian community." As over against its comparative neglect in the immediate past, the method is coming once again into its own with the more recent stress on the existential and active aspects of the Christian life. He cites several factors worth mentioning, as contributing to this:

(1) the rediscovery of charity as the centre of the Christian life, leading to a more biblical view of faith as a going out of one's self, a commitment to God and neighbour;

(2) the search for a spirituality of the laity and its culmination in studies on the religious value of the profane and in the spirituality of the activity of the Christian in the world;

(3) a general sensitivity to the anthropological aspects of revelation, viz. the discovery that "the Word about God is at the same time a promise to the world";

(4) the participation of Christians in important social movements, so that the presence and activity of the church in the world becomes a starting point for theological reflection and the very life of the church appears ever more clearly as a locus theologicus;

(5) philosophical trends reinforce the importance of human action as the point of departure for all reflection;

(6) to these factors can be added the influence of Marxist thought, focusing on praxis and geared to the transformation of the world;

(7) finally, the rediscovery of the eschatological dimension in theology has led to the consideration of the central role of historical praxis. If human history is, above all, an opening to the future, "then it is a task, a political occupation, through which man orients and opens himself to the gift which gives history its transcendent meaning: the full and definitive encounter with the Lord and with other men" (A Theology of Liberation, 10).

And so, for Gutiérrez, all these factors have contributed to a more accurate understanding that encounter with the Lord "inescapably means a Christian life centered around a concrete and creative commitment of service to others" (op. cit., 11). And they have led to the formulation of the function of theology as critical reflection.

In an effort to define theology as critical reflection on praxis Gutiérrez continues:

“Theological reflection would be . . . a criticism of society and the Church insofar as they are called and addressed by the Word of God; it would be a critical theory, worked out in the light of the Word accepted in faith, and inspired by a practical purpose – and therefore indissolubly linked to historical praxis” (loc. cit.). The church proclaims the kingdom, the Christian community professes the “faith which works through charity”. Theology is reflection; it follows; it is the second step. Theology does not produce pastoral activity but rather reflects on it. Therefore, a privileged locus theologicus for the understanding of the faith will be the life, preaching, and historical commitment of the church. But to reflect on the presence and action of the church in the world means to go beyond that. It means departing from the use of only revelation and tradition as starting points (as has been generally the way of classical theology) and beginning with facts and questions derived from the world and from history.

Such then is theology as critical reflection on praxis, the starting point and method of the theology of liberation. But where does it lead? According to Gutiérrez: “This kind of theology, arising from concern with a particular set of issues, will perhaps give us the solid and permanent albeit modest foundation for the theology in a Latin American perspective which is both desired and needed.” We cannot go into all this; what we can do is look at one of his conclusions.

(iii) Christ the Liberator. Gutiérrez’ conclusion is that “salvation embraces all men and the whole man; the liberating action of Christ – made man in this history and not in a history marginal to the real life of man – is at the heart of the historical current of humanity; the struggle for a just society, is in its own right very much a part of salvation history” (op. cit., 168).

It is Christ who liberates and he liberates from sin. But sin is not considered as an individual, private, or merely interior reality; it is a social historical fact, the breach of friendship with God and other men. There may be three levels of meaning to liberation – political liberation, the liberation of men throughout history, and liberation from sin – but these three levels mutually affect one another, and it is the third, sin, which is the fundamental obstacle to the kingdom and at the root of all misery and injustice. This root can only be dealt with through the acceptance of the liberating gift of Christ, but inversely, all struggle against exploitation and alienation is an attempt to banish selfishness, the negation of love, and is therefore liberating and a salvific work – although, of course, it is not all of salvation.

Both temporal progress (or the liberation of man) then and the growth of the kingdom are directed toward complete communion of men with God and of men among themselves. The same goal is sought but neither parallel nor even convergent paths are followed to achieve it: the growth of the kingdom occurs historically in liberation. Liberation becomes a precondition for the new society, although the new society is liberation plus the coming of the kingdom which is above all a gift.

Nothing escapes the salvific process, nothing is outside the pale of the action of Christ and the gift of the Spirit. This gives human history its profound unity. Those who reduce the work of salvation are those “who think that the work of Christ touches the social order in which we live only indirectly or tangentially, and not in its roots and basic structure” (op. cit., 177).

2. Implications of the Debate. (a) Situational Theologies. All three of the theologies considered are basically situational theologies. They arise in and take their bearings from specific situations. Moltmann acknowledges as much when he distinguishes between the living or historical context of his theology of hope and its text, the Bible. But not all of his followers do so and indeed the theologians of liberation can be said to go a step further and impose on their hermeneutical method a particular political stance, for example, the Marxist analysis, as does Gutiérrez, and to some extent, Bonino. It is this kind of hermeneutic which leads to what has become a widespread phenomenon, the use of the Exodus motif – for example in various black theologies – as a paradigm for liberation: “Let my people go!” The method is not new and irony arises when one observes the identical concept of “an oppressed chosen people” among Afrikaaners in South Africa at the turn of the century in their struggle with the British, and among the “blacks” of Southern Africa today in their struggle against the “whites”! (Cf. Irving Hexham, Totalitarian Calvinism in the Reformed (Dopper) Community in South Africa 1902–1919, Dissertation, Bristol, 1975.)

(b) Jesus the Liberator. However, it is not only the Exodus which is used as a paradigm but also the life and death of Christ. Note that Moltmann referred to Jesus’ dying as “blasphemer”, “rebel”, and “godforsaken”. Hence the criticism of Moltmann that not only was his theology too optimistic and utopian but that it was too biblicist and historicist. (Cf. M. D. Meeks, Origins of the Theology of Hope, 1974, 13.) Moltmann refers to Jesus Christ in his person and history as the touchstone by which to distinguish the spirit of eschatology from that of utopia. Surely, his person and history provide us also with the touchstone by which to judge revolution (or liberation), not only its nature but the means by which it is to be achieved. Is there not an inherent contradiction in the idea of a God crucified because he was a blasphemer, a rebel and godforsaken and a God who at the same time remains a God of love, justice and peace? The question must be faced: “Was Jesus a violent revolutionary?”

(c) The Whole Gospel. There is economic injustice, there is racial prejudice, there is suppression of human rights, there is political oppression. This is the kind of world the church finds itself in. Christians live in a world where the developed countries are on average twelve times richer than the underdeveloped – where the gross national product of Sweden is fifty times that of Malawi; where racism is not only tolerated but legislated for, as in apartheid; where Christians are committed to psychiatric hospitals because of their faith; where individuals are denied political and individual freedoms. Revolution can be defined as a transformation of the foundations of a system, whether of economics, politics, morality, or religion. The theologians of hope, revolution and liberation call for such a change, and appeal to the nature of the gospel as demanding it. If the person and history of Jesus Christ provide us with the touchstone has he anything to say to this? There is no doubt but that the Christian church has been found wanting: a major distinction has often been made between change in the individual and the change of a system. How far did Jesus go? Was Jesus a revolutionary? (Cf. P. Hebblethwaite, “How Liberating is Liberation Theology?” in Frontier, Winter 1975–6, where he claims that at the heart of Gutiérrez’ work lies “a refusal of all dualisms”: there is only one history in which God acts, there is only one gospel.)

3. Jesus and Violence. Was Jesus a violent revolutionary? My own belief, frankly, is that he was not and that, moreover, what he was not in his incarnation he did not expect his body, the church, to be. However, we must state and examine seriously the evidence put forward by those who claim that he was. To this end we shall consider S. G. F. Brandon's thesis (Jesus and the Zealots, 1967) and, among others, the counter-thesis of Martin Hengel (Die Zeloten, 1961; Was Jesus a Revolutionist?, 1971 [Ger. 1970]; Victory over Violence, 1973 [Ger. 1971]).

(a) The Concept of "the Pacific Christ". Brandon's thesis is dependent on certain theories concerning the composition of the Gospels. His theories relate to the place of origin, dating and purpose of each Gospel and diverge considerably from the consensus of scholarly opinion.

Mark is the earliest Gospel, written from Rome during a time of persecution. So far Brandon is in agreement with others. However, although Mark was written in a time of persecution it was not written just to comfort persecuted Christians but rather to show that Jesus had been loyal to Rome, and it was written after the Jewish War of A.D. 66–70 (not so most scholars; cf. John A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament, 1976). Mark is thus interpreted as having already suppressed material in the tradition which might be interpreted politically. For example, he omits references to Jesus' relationship to the Zealots and the disturbances caused by Pilate's government, thereby imposing an a-political and pacific interpretation on his source material. But because Mark's portrait of Jesus was the first to acquire literary form it became definitive for all subsequent portrayal.

Matthew's and Luke's Gospels then became modelled on Mark's and although they contribute two distinctive developments, they inherit Mark's characterization of Jesus as the pacific Christ. Matthew is claimed to be of Alexandrian origin, written between A.D. 80 and 85, with a very overt pacifist intent, because of the danger which was likely to be felt by Christians and Jews in Alexandria after the disaster that befell Israel in A.D. 70. The main shift of emphasis for Matthew comes in the trial of Jesus when blame is laid squarely on the shoulders of the Jewish people: the Romans could not be held responsible for the crucifixion of Jesus. Concludes Brandon: "Thus, motivated by the Sitz im Leben of the Christian community in Alexandria in the critical years following the fall of Jerusalem, Matthew was led to develop the Markan thesis, that Jesus had been innocent of sedition against Rome, into one more suited to the needs of his own church, namely, that of the pacific Christ who renounced all resort to armed force, whether human or angelic" (op. cit., 308). As Matthew, so Luke (written from Achaia some fifteen or twenty years after Mark). Although moved by different motives, he too was interested to emphasize the pacific character of Jesus. As shown by the Acts, he was concerned to present Christianity as a faith which the Gentiles welcomed and the Roman magistrates protected from Jewish malignity! However, he was not so near to the fall of Jerusalem as to feel threatened like Mark, and so recorded that one of Jesus' disciples was a Zealot and that Jesus allowed his disciples to arm themselves before going to Gethsemane. Yet from the very beginning of his Gospel, Luke sounds a note of peace, and his portrait of Jesus as pacific is not achieved by overt suppression of material but by utilizing such eirenic traditions as the parables of the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son, Jesus' rebuke to the disciples on their wanting to call down fire on the unwelcoming Samaritan villagers, his warning against the consequences of violence in the Tower of Siloam discourse, the sounding of the note of peace in the story of the triumphal entry to Jerusalem, and the lament over the city's coming fate.

Finally, John gives the definitive endorsement to the concept of the pacific Christ by recording the dominical pronouncement: "My kingship is not of this world; if my kingship were of this world, my servants would fight . . ." (Jn. 18:36–7, Brandon's rendering; op. cit., 318).

Brandon himself sums up the thesis as follows: "The authors of Matthew, Luke and John, each in his own way and for his own purpose, elaborated the Markan portrait of Jesus, as one innocent of sedition against Rome, into that of the pacific Christ, who taught his followers to love their enemies and rejected all resort to armed violence" (op. cit., 320).

It is important to note two things as we proceed to examine specific passages in the Gospels appealed to by Brandon, and often accepted uncritically by others: (i) acceptance of the thesis outlined above is crucial to his arguments; (ii) the thesis lacks support at many critical junctures (for a list of scholarly reviews, predominantly critical, see Martin Hengel, Was Jesus a Revolutionist?, 5 f.).

(b) A Violent Jesus? S. G. F. Brandon was by no means the first scholar to argue for an essentially violent revolutionary interpretation of Jesus' mission. He was preceded by Hermann Samuel Reimarus (The Goal of Jesus and His Disciples, published in German in 1778; ET ed., G. W. Buchanan, 1970; and also in Fragments, ed. C. H. Talbert translated by R. S. Fraser, 1971) and Robert Eisler (Jésous Basileus ou basileusas, 1929–30). A summary of their combined findings gives us the following main points: Little evidence is to be found in the proclamation of Jesus, so the events of the last days in Jerusalem are pursued relentlessly. The impetus was given by Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, "a demonstration of Jesus' messiahship, carefully planned by him in advance" (Brandon) and thus a clear challenge to the leaders of the people and the Romans. An even greater provocation was the assault on the temple, in which he was assisted by the disciples and the masses, an assault attended by bloodshed and pillage. At the same time, apparently also at the instigation of Jesus, a Zealot revolt took place in the city, during which Barabbas and the "criminals" who were crucified with Jesus were taken into custody. True, Jesus could not remain in the temple and consequently withdrew with his disciples, but the farewell discourse, recorded in Lk. 22:36 ff., when Jesus urges his disciples: "Let him who has no sword sell his cloak and buy one", indicates that he reckoned with an armed confrontation. In Gethsemane, the disciples, surprised by their opponents, offered appropriate armed resistance, the extent of which can no longer be precisely determined. After a hearing before the Jewish authorities in which, above all, his attack on the temple and his messianic claims were discussed, Jesus was condemned to death by Pilate as a self-confessed "originator of sedition", for, according to all four Gospels, Jesus answered in the affirmative Pilate's enquiry as to whether or not he was the king of the Jews. Hence he merited the punishment of any resident of the provinces who might be convicted of insurrection, and accordingly suffered crucifixion, the most gruesome death known to antiquity, and that between two apparently Zealot criminals.

What can we say in reply? Let us look briefly at some selected passages.

(i) The Cleansing of the Temple. At this time in the history of Palestine there was stationed a Roman cohort of at least 500–600 men in the tower of Antonia to the north-west of the outer court of the Herodian temple. The precincts of the temple were easily accessible to the soldiers by way of a broad staircase connecting the Antonia tower and the temple. There is therefore no doubt that any considerable uproar would have led inevitably to intervention by Pilate, as he was not squeamish on such points. Moreover, it would not have been possible for Jesus to have thrown out all those who sold and the money-changers without a large contingent of troops and a corresponding general riot. The purpose of the cleansing is not our immediate concern but it is most likely that it was concerned with what Jesus considered the proper use of the temple courts; thus he revealed his theocentric concern. (Cf. M. Hengel, Was Jesus a Revolutionist?, 15–18; E. Schweizer, The Good News according to Mark, 1971, 230 ff.).

(ii) The Arrest in Gethsemane. Basically, the solitary sword-thrust in Gethsemane, as recorded in Mk. 14:47, is a sign that no meaningful, organized resistance of any kind was offered (Hengel, op. cit., 18 f.). Indeed, as Eduard Schweizer says: “It seems . . . reasonable to understand this move as symbolic of Jesus’ deliberate defenselessness since it was so ridiculously ineffective” (op. cit., 318). Furthermore, the disciples fled without being apprehended: Jesus alone stood trial. And for forty years until the Neronian persecution only the Jewish, and not the Roman, authorities opposed the spread of Christianity.

(iii) The “Dagger” Sayings. After the death of Jesus the disciples must no longer go out unequipped, without money, traveller’s bag, or sandals, but rather with everything, including a sword (Lk. 22:35–8). There is a simple answer for those who appeal to this passage in support of violence. The dagger or short sword belonged to the Jewish traveller’s equipment as protection against robbers and wild animals. Even the “peace-loving” Essenes took “weapons on account of robbers” when they journeyed (Josephus, War 2, 8, 4 [2, 125]). As for Eisler’s wholly congenial interpretation of the disciples’ reply “Lord, here are two swords”, viz. “They answer by showing him – each of them, naturally – two swords”, Alan Richardson (The Political Christ, 1973, 48) dismisses it as “absurd” with the remark: “Eleven men encumbered by a sword in each hand would soon have been despatched by the soldiers.”

The second saying of Jesus concerning a dagger (or sword), “Do not think that I have come to bring peace on earth; I have not come to bring peace but a sword” (Matt. 10:34), is generally-speaking indisputably taken to mean that Jesus came not to bring peace but “division” – an interpretation given support by a translation variant of the original Aramaic (in Lk. 12:51), viz. diamerismos, meaning “division” or “conflict”.

(iv) The “Social” Sayings. All the sayings of Jesus concerning poverty and riches – take for example the beatitude “Blessed are the poor . . .” (Matt. 5:3; Lk. 6:20), the warning about riches and the kingdom (Mk. 10:17 ff.), the parables of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk. 16:19–31) and the rich farmer (Lk. 12:16–21) – although they attack the greed and corruption of riches, are best interpreted as directed towards man’s attitude to riches and the attendant effect on a person’s relationship with God. Jesus’ teaching appears to be theocentric at this point and not addressed specifically to socio-ethical issues. In stark contrast was the teaching of Zealots who included a strong social component corresponding to the social message of the OT.

(v) The Saying about Tribute Money. The saying is a familiar one: “Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s, and to God the things that are God’s” (Mk. 12:17).

Brandon believes that, as originally stated by Jesus, this saying was intended “to rule that the payment of tribute to Caesar was an act of disloyalty to Yahweh” (op. cit., 348). Once again he is in disagreement with most scholars. The method by which he comes to his conclusion is basically to be seen in the following three steps: (1) Mark has good apologetic reasons for depicting Jesus as being tested on the most vital issue in Roman-Jewish relations at the time – the question of paying the poll tax imposed since A.D. 6: he wants Jesus to endorse the payment of tribute to Rome; (2) therefore Mark introduces the Pharisees and Herodians “to entrap” Jesus (to support this point Brandon appeals to Bultmann who considered vv. 14–17 a unity, incidentally contra C. E. B. Cranfield, The Gospel according to St Mark, 1959, 369, who considers the whole passage comprising vv. 13–17 a unity); (3) every devout Jew had no doubt about what belonged to God, and the usual reason advanced by Zealots for not paying tribute money was that it meant giving to Caesar what belonged to God.

To go along with Brandon here would mean rejecting the consensus of scholarly opinion and, moreover, making the first sentence of the saying redundant.

A much more likely interpretation is that of Martin Hengel (op. cit., 33 ff.), supported by Eduard Schweizer (op. cit., 242–5) and at places by C. E. B. Cranfield (op. cit., 371 f.). First to be noted is that no Zealot would have taken in his hand a silver Roman denarius, as Jesus did. Secondly, if the conjunction kai is taken in its adversative sense, the saying is more satisfactorily translated: “Render to Caesar what belongs to Caesar, but to God what belongs to God.” It then follows that, although conceding Caesar his due (like any other person entitled to the return of his property whether acquired justly or not), Jesus is saying that the second statement takes precedence over the first – everything belongs to God, he must be at the centre of our concern. Thereby, unlike Zealots and Apocalyptists, Jesus refuses to recognize separate spheres of “sacred” and “profane”. He also refuses to give a ready-made answer, a fact which calls forth the following comment from Eduard Schweizer: “Ultimately, neither the Pharisees’ truce with the Romans nor the rebellion of the Zealots, neither political conservatism nor revolution, is justified in every situation . . . Jesus does not relieve man of the responsibility to choose. . . . Instead, he confronts him with God before whom man must decide” (op. cit., 244; → Tax).

(vi) Jesus’ Conscious Rejection of Violence. In his temptation Jesus rejected outright the bringing in of the kingdom by means of political force (Matt. 4:1–11; Lk. 4:1–13). Similarly, in addressing his disciples on the subject of “position” in the kingdom he declared that, as he came to serve, so their authority must be exercised through service (Lk. 22:25–7 and parallels Mk. 10:42–5, Matt. 20:25–8; cf. Mk. 9:35; Lk. 9:48; 13:32 f.). Furthermore, in a society in which a Jew’s friend was his neighbour, and an Essene’s duty was to “love all the children of light . . . and hate all the children of darkness”, Jesus’ command to turn the other cheek and to love one’s enemies was a rejection of violence, to say the least (Matt. 5:38 ff.; Lk. 6:27 ff.).

4. Jesus and Revolution. If then we must reject the thesis that Jesus was a violent revolutionary, must we also reject the view that his message had social implications? I think not. Jesus was unmistakably a revolutionary for his time. It is evident both from what he said and from what he did. So often, in our efforts to redress the lost balance resulting from inadequate emphasis on atonement in some theologies, we have been pre-occupied with the death of Jesus to the almost total neglect of the significance of his life. Yet, if we examine his sayings and deeds we shall observe his peculiar concern for the so-called “outsiders” or social outcasts of Palestine in his day.

(i) Jesus and Sinners. The Gospels are shot through with Jesus’ unorthodox behaviour in eating and drinking with tax collectors and sinners. Numbered among his disciples were a tax collector and a Zealot (Lk. 5:27–32; 6:12–16); numbered among his friends and acquaintances were adulterers and robbers, for example Mary Magdalene and Zacchaeus (Matt. 26:6–13 and parallel Mk. 14:39, Lk. 19:1–10). Incidentally, no self-respecting Jewish nationalist would have any dealings with tax collectors who were denounced as traitors by the Zealots.

(ii) Jesus and Foreigners. In Jewish society both → Samaritans and → Greeks were considered outsiders and despised for racial and religious reasons. Jesus, on the other hand, was prepared to go out of his way to have dealings with both. He spoke to the Samaritan woman at the well (Jn. 4:1–42); he refused to call down fire from heaven on the unwelcoming Samaritan villagers (Lk. 9:51–6); and he singled out for commendation the “foreign” Samaritan leper (Lk. 17:11–19); and as if this were not enough, he told a parable in which the hero was a “good Samaritan” (Lk. 10:25–37). Likewise, he responded favourably to the request of the Syro-phoenician woman whose daughter was ill (Mk. 7:24–30 and parallels) and to the centurion whose servant was paralysed (Matt. 8:5–13). And again, incidentally, Zealots had a special loathing for the mixed-blooded Samaritans.

(iii) Jesus and Women. It is seldom realized what a blow Jesus dealt for the “liberation” of → women. To go out in public unveiled, to speak to men in the street, to initiate divorce proceedings – all of these and more were forbidden to women except in very exceptional circumstances. (Cf. Joachim Jeremias, “The Social Position of Women”, in his Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 359–76.) Jesus’ teaching on divorce (Mk. 10:2–9; Matt. 5:31f.; 19:1–9), his relationship with women – the woman at the well of Samaria (Jn. 4:1–42), Mary and Martha and the “other women” (Jn. 11; 12:1–11; Lk. 23:26–31, 50–56) – are all examples of his flagrant flouting of convention and thus indicative of his sense of “justice and equality”. When, on the issue of divorce, Jesus appealed to the Genesis creation narratives (Gen. 1, 2) it was to point out that man and woman were made in the image of God. It was not simply a question of whether or not divorce was possible but whether easy divorce such as that allowed by the school of Hillel was a basic infringement of human rights. “Male and female created he them”, said Jesus, quoting Genesis 1:27.

(iv) Jesus and the Needy. The whole ministry of Jesus is an example of care for the sorrowful, the sick, and the suffering. He preached a whole gospel and he practised it: “For truly, I say to you, whoever gives you a cup of water to drink because you bear the name of Christ, will by no means lose his reward” (Mk. 9:41 par. Matt. 10:42).

5. Conclusion. If revolution has a habit of “devouring its children” and violence tends to breed violence there is reason enough, humanly speaking, for rejecting violent revolution, except in extreme circumstances. If, furthermore, having explored the subject of Jesus and revolution, we have come to the same conclusion as Hans Küng (On Being a Christian, 1976, 570): “No strategy of violence, but only one of non-violence, can be deduced from the example of Jesus Christ”; there is even more reason, theologically speaking, for rejecting violence. However, we would not be true, either to the example and teaching of Jesus Christ, or to the demands of a God of justice and love, if we did not seek to advance the kingdom by recognizing the rule of God and by working for a more just and humane society. M. Langley

→ Fight, → Peace, → Present, → Zeal

On polemos etc.:

(a). F. E. Adcock, The Greek and Macedonian Art of War, 1957; R. H. Bainton, "The Early Church and War", HTR 39, 1946, 189–212; and Christian Attitudes to War and Peace: A Historical Survey and Critical Re-evaluation, 1960; K. Barth, CD III, 4, 450–70; M. Barth, Ephesians, Anchor Bible, I–II, 1974; O. Bauernfeind, polemos, polemeō, TDNT VI 502–15; machomai etc., TDNT IV 527 f.; and strateuomai etc., TDNT VI 701–13; C. J. Cadoux, The Early Christian Attitude to War, 1925²; H. von Campenhausen, "Christians and Military Service in the Early Church", in Tradition and Life in the Church: Essays and Lectures in Church History, 1968, 160–70; D. L. Christensen, Transformations of the War Oracle in Old Testament Prophecy, 1975; F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic, 1973; "The Song of the Sea and Canaanite Myth", Journal for Theology and the Church 5, 1968, 1–25; and "The Divine Warrior in Israel's Early Cult", in A. Altman, ed., Biblical Motifs, 1966, 11–30; N. K. Gottwald, "Holy War in Deuteronomy", Review and Expositor 61, 1964, 296–310; and "War, Holy", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 942 ff.; G. H. C. Macgregor, The New Testament Basis of Pacifism, 1953; P. D. Miller, The Divine Warrior in Ancient Israel, 1973; A. Oepke, hoplon etc., TDNT V 292–315; G. von Rad, Studies in Deuteronomy, SBT 9, 1953; Deuteronomy, 1966; R. Smend, Yahweh, War and Tribal Confederacy, 1970; L. E. Toombs, "War, Ideas of", IDB IV 791–801; Y. Yadin, The Art of Warfare in Biblical Lands in the Light of Archaeological Study, I–II, 1963; and The Scroll of the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness, 1962.

(b). O. Betz, "Jesu heiliger Krieg", NovT 2, 1957, 116–37; W. Bienert, Krieg, Kriegsdienst und Kriegsverweigerung, 1952; E. Bilabel, "Strategos", Pauly-Wissowa, IVa, 183–252; W. Caspari, "Was stand im Buch der Kriege Jahwes", ZWT 54, 1912, 110–58; H. Fredriksson, Jahweh als Krieger, 1945; A. Fridrichsen, Krig och Fred i Nya Testamentet, Uppsala Universitets Årsskrift 3, 1940; H. Fuchs, Antike Gedanken über Krieg und Frieden, 1946; A. von Harnack, Militia Christi, 1905; P. Honigsheim, H.-J. Kraus, O. Michel, H. Gollwitzer and H. H. Schrey, "Krieg", *RGG*³ IV 62–77; O. Kern, Krieg und Kult bei den Hellenen, Rektoratsrede Halle, 1915; H. Kruse, Ethos Victoriae in Vetere Testamento, 1951; J. Lasserre, Der Krieg und das Evangelium, 1956; M. Launey, Recherches sur les Armées Helléniques, I–II, 1949–50; J. Leipoldt, "Das Bild vom Kriege in der griechischen Welt", in Gott und die Götter. Festgabe für Erich Fascher, 1958, 16–30; D. Loenen, Polemos. Een Studie over Oorlog in de Griekse Oudheid, Mededelingen der Koninklijke Nederlandse Akademie van Wetenschappen, Afd. Letterkunde, NR 16, 3, 1953; E. Müller, Friedens- und Wehrbereitschaft der Christen, 1956; W. F. Otto, Die Götter Griechenlands, 1947³, 222–56; G. von Rad, Der heilige Krieg im alten Israel, AThANT 20, 1958³; A. Schlatter, Die beiden Schwerte, BFChTh 20, 6, 1916; W. Schwahn, "Strategos", Pauly-Wissowa, Supplement 6, 1071–1158; F. Schwally, Semitische Kriegsaltertümer, I, Der heilige Krieg im alten Israel, 1901; E. Seckel, Über Krieg und Recht in Rom, 1915; F. Stolz, Jahwes und Israels Kriege, AThANT 60, 1972; H. Trümper, Kriegerische Fachausdrücke im griechischen Epos, (Dissertation, Basel) 1950; M. Weippert, "Heiliger Krieg in Israel und Assyrien", ZAW 84, 1972, 460–93; H. Windisch, Der messianische Krieg und das Urchristentum, 1909.

On Jesus and Revolution:

(a). R. Alves, A Theology of Human Hope, 1969; and Tomorrow's Child, 1972; H. Arendt, On Revolution, 1965; H. Assmann, Practical Theology of Liberation, 1976, U.S. edition Theology for a Normal Church, 1976; K. Barth, The Church and the Political Problems of our Day, 1939; and CD IV, 1–4, see index; L. Boff, "Salvation in Jesus Christ and the Process of Liberation", Concilium 6, 10, 1974, 78–91; J. M. Bonino, Revolutionary Theology Comes of Age, 1975, U.S. edition Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation, 1976; and Christians and Marxists: The Mutual Challenge to Revolution, The London Lectures in Contemporary Christianity, 1976; S. G. F. Brandon, The Fall of Jerusalem and the Christian Church, 1951; and Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factors in Primitive Christianity, 1967; H. Camara, Church and Colonialism, 1969; E. Castro, Amidst Revolution, 1975; J. H. Cone, A Black Theology of Liberation, 1970; Black Theology and Black Power, 1969; and God of the Oppressed, 1975; O. E. Costas, The Church and its Mission: A Shattering Critique from the Third World, 1974; J. G. Davies, Christians, Politics and Violent Revolution, 1976; J. Ellul, Hope in Time of Abandonment, 1973; and Violence: Reflections from a Christian Perspective, 1970; F. Fanon, The Wretched of the Earth, 1963; J. Ferguson, The Politics of Love: The New Testa- ment and Non-Violent Revolution, n.d.; A. Fierro, The Militant Gospel, 1977; P. Freire, Pedagogy of the Oppressed, 1970; S. Galilea, "Liberation as an Encounter with Politics and Contemplation", Concilium 6, 10, 1974, 19–33; J. Goldingay, "The Man of War and the Suffering Servant: The Old Testament and the Theology of Liberation", TB 27, 1976, 79–113; G. Gutiérrez, "Liberation, Theology and Proclamation", Concilium 6, 10, 1974, 55–77; M. Hengel, Was Jesus a Revolutionist?, 1971; Victory over Violence, 1973; and Christ and Politics, 1977; A. van den Heuvel, These Rebellious Powers, 1966; A. Holl, Jesus in Bad Company, 1972; A. Kee, A Reader in Political Theology, 1974; P. Lehmann, The Transfiguration of Politics, 1974; J. M. Lochman, "Ecumenical Theology of Revolution", SJT 21, 1968, 170–86; J. B. Metz, "The Church's Social Function in the Light of 'Political Theology'", Concilium 6, 4, 1968, 3–11; and Theology of the World, 1969; J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope, 1964; Hope and Planning, 1971; The Experiment Hope, 1975; The Crucified God; The Cross of Christ as the Foundation and Criticism of Christian Theology, 1974; and The Church in the Power of the Spirit, 1977; B. Moore, ed., Black Theology: The South African Voice, 1973; J. Miranda, Marx and the Bible: A Critique of the Philosophy of Oppression, 1974; A. Richardson, The Political Christ, 1973; J. A. T. Robinson, On Being a Christian in the World, 1960; J. L. Segundo, "Capitalism – Socialism: A Theological Crucifixion", Concilium 6, 10, 1974, 105–23; and The Liberation of Theology, 1976; J. R. W. Stott, Christian Mission in the Modern World, 1975, 15–34, 82–108; P. Tillich, Love, Power and Justice, 1967; J. H. Yoder, "Exodus and Exile: The Two Faces of Liberation", Missionalia 2, 1974, 29–41; and The Politics of Jesus: Vicit Agnus Noster, 1972.

(b). H. Assman, Opresión-Liberación: Desafío a los Cristianos, 1971; and Teología desde la Praxis de la Liberación, 1973; G. Gutiérrez, Teología de la Liberación. Perspectivas, 1971; M. Hengel, Die Zeloten. Untersuchungen zur Freiheitsbewegung in der Zeit von Herodes I bis 70 nach Christi, Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Spätjudentums und des Urchristentums 1, 1961; T. Rendtorff, Theologie der Revolution. Analysen und Materialien, 1968.

Water, Lake, Sea, Well, River

Resembling somewhat the ambivalence of → fire, which the ancients encountered as a beneficial force providing light and heat, but also as a deadly and consuming destructive power, water was regarded under the double aspect of life-bringing and thirst-quenching, on the one hand, and fearful and threatening on the other. It is, like fire, for the whole of the pagan and ancient world both the site and the accompanying manifestation of an epiphany of the High God and also the abode, vehicle and attribute of demonic powers. As the element of → demons, water – again like fire – could be employed in the ancient world in homoeopathic, apotropaic magic for purposes of healing or cultic purification: the baleful demons and defilers were put to flight by having their own weapons turned against them. In the Bible water (hydōr) is not only necessary to life. Special interest is attached to its natural manifested forms in rain (e.g. Lev. 26:4), sea (thalassa), spring (pēgē) and river (potamos). In the dreaded flood-catastrophe (kataklysmos), rainfall and rivers work together (e.g. Gen. 7:11 f.; Matt. 7:25, 27); the anti-demonic purificatory and medicinal water of lustrations (ablutions) is mostly the "living" (flowing) water of rivers and springs, more rarely the still water of cisterns and ponds.

θάλασσα

θάλασσα (thalassa), sea, lake.

CL thalassa, Attic thalatta, obviously identical with dalancha, which Hesychius hands down as a Macedonian word, appears to be of pre-Gk. origin. From Homer onwards (Il. 2, 294), it denotes in Gk. the ocean, the open sea. Attempts at etymological clarification, such as a derivation from the root dhala, to deepen (cf. thalamos, haunt, lair) remain hypothetical.

OT In some 370 passages the LXX translates Heb. OT statements about the sea with the Gk. word thalassa; in by far the greater majority of cases (some 360 times) it corresponds with Heb. yām, sea. There is a particular accumulation of references in Exod. (36), Jos. (46), Pss. (39), Isa. (29) and Ezek. (55).

The OT linguistic usage does not differentiate between the open sea and inland lakes. The Mediterranean (e.g. Jos. 1:4; 19:26 LXX; Ezek. 48:28) and the Red Sea (Exod. 23:31; Num. 33:10 f.; Jdg. 11:16; 1 Ki. 9:26) are called thalassa, but so also are the Dead Sea (Gen. 14:3) and the Lake of Gennesaret, the Sea of Chenara (Chinnereth, Num. 34:11; Jos. 12:3; 13:27; cf. Matt. 4:18 par. Mk. 1:16), the Sea of Galilee.

1. (a) In accord with the general conception of the ancients, the OT pictures the earth as disc-shaped, surrounded by sea (Gen. 1:9) or water (→ hydōr). Itself a creation of God (Pss. 104[103]: 24 ff.; 146[145]:6; Neh. 9:6), water once covered the whole earth (Gen. 1:2; cf. Ps. 104[103]:6), but Yahweh drove it back and put it in check (Gen. 1:9 f.; Ps. 104[103]:7; Job 38:8 ff.). God has founded "his" earth firmly on the seas and rivers (Ps. 24[23]:2).

(b) Because of its relation to Chaos (Gen. 1:2, Gk. abyssos, the abyss, the underworld for Heb. ʾhôm, primeval water, ocean; cf. Gen. 7:11; 8:2) the sea became the embodiment of the sphere of disaster. In the sea the power of water hostile to God and men opposes the people of Israel (cf. Jer. 51:42; Pss. 46[45]:3 f.; 65[64]:8). The sea is the habitat of the → Dragon who is God's enemy (Job 7:82), and of the four demons in the form of beasts in Daniel's vision (Dan. 7; cf. Rev. 13:1).

(c) But the sea has to tremble before Yahweh (Hab. 3:8; Ps. 77[76]:17) who fights and vanquishes its demonic monsters, Leviathan and the Dragon (Isa. 27:1; 51:9 f.; Ps. 74[73]:13 f.). Yahweh is the Lord of the sea (cf. Isa. 50:2; Pss. 65[64]:8; 146[145]:6; Prov. 8:29; Job 9:8; 38:8–11; Neh. 9:6). God can command the annihilating flood to liberate the earth in judgment from a humanity which has lapsed into wickedness (Gen. 6–8). Indeed, Yahweh makes use of the sea in order to drown his enemies (Exod. 14:23, 28; 15:1, 4 f., 10, 21). Conversely, the pious man experiences Yahweh's help in dangers of water and → fire (Isa. 43:2; Ps. 66[65]:12), salvation by the hand of Yahweh "out of great waters" (Ps. 18[17]:17).

2. In the literature of Judaism, the sea retains its threatening rôle for men, only now demonic powers are named even more clearly as having command over the sea, partly on behalf of God (cf. Eth. Enoch 60:16; 61:10; 66:2; 69:22; Sl. Enoch 19:4; rabbinic examples in SB III 819 f.). The wave of the sea which sinks a ship is demonic, and the magical practices of a threatened seafarer are anti-demonic (Baba Bathra 73a; cf. SB I 490). By analogy with the victory of Yahweh over the sea, the power of chaos in primeval time (Sir. 43:23[25]; Man. 3 f.), Judaism expected the destruction of the might of the sea monsters (such as Leviathan, Eth. Enoch 60:7) by God in the final time, whereas the waters of the sea and rivers will rage against the godless (Wis. 5:22[23]).

NT The occurrences of thalassa in the NT are distributed very unevenly among the individual books. A profusion of references in Matt., Mk., Acts and Rev. contrast with only a very few in Lk., Jn. and the NT epistles.

1. In the NT, as in the OT and in Judaism (cf. SB I 184 f.), open sea and inland lake are not differentiated. The Mediterranean Sea (Acts 10:6, 32; 17:14; 27:30, 38, 40; 28:4) and the Red Sea (Acts 7:36; 1 Cor. 10:1; Heb. 11:29, each time with reference back to the OT → miracle of the crossing of the Red Sea; 1 Cor 10 is typologically interpreted with reference to → baptism) and the Sea of Galilee, the Lake of Gennesaret (Matt. 4:18 par. Mk. 1:16; Mk. 4:1, 35 ff.; cf. Matt. 13:1; 8:23; Lk. 5:1; 8:22; Matt. 8:32 par. Mk. 5:13, Lk. 8:33; Matt. 14:22–23 par. Mk. 6:45–52; Jn. 6:1, 16 ff.; 21:1) are all equally called thalassa. Only Lk. deliberately calls the Lake of Gennesaret a → limnē, an inland lake, which explains the small number of occurrences of thalassa in Lk. thalassa consistently means the Lake of Gennesaret in Mk. and the Matthean parallels, but the Mediterranean in Acts. An abundance of references to thalassa are provided for the Gospels by life on sea and lake alike (cf. Matt. 17:22 par. Mk. 9:42; and Matt. 23:15 or the parabolic language of Matt. 21:21 par. Mk. 11:23, Lk. 17:6).

2. The cosmological rôle of the sea is essentially the same as in the OT. God is the Creator of the tripartite world consisting of heaven, earth and sea (Acts 4:24; 14:15; Rev. 10:6; 14:7). The sea of glass, thalassa hyaline (Rev. 4:6; 15:2; cf. Gen. 1:7; Pss. 104[103]:3; 148[147]:4; Sl. Enoch 3:3; Test. Levi 2:7; Jub. 2:4), is the transparent surface of the vault of heaven with the heavenly ocean which was thought to be the source of rain; the fire of this sea (Rev. 15:2) is the flashing lightnings of the heavenly thunderstorm, here probably understood as the introduction to the → judgment. (See further R. H. Charles, The Revelation of St. John, ICC, 1920, I, 117 f.; II, 34.) The scene of the victors standing on the heavenly sea recalls Israel's song of triumph over → Egypt by the Red Sea (Exod. 15).

3. In the NT, too, the sea threatens life (e.g. that of a seafarer, Acts 28:4; 2 Cor. 11:26) and so belongs on the side of the demonic (→ Demon) and that which opposes God. The Revelation of John, in particular, extends traditions of Jewish apocalyptic, in its conception of the sea as a personal power (Rev. 7:2 f.) which will be overcome in the last days, so that it, too, like Thanatos (→ death, art. thanatos) and Hades (→ Hell, art. hādēs), must surrender its dead (Rev. 20:13) and finally possess no more right to existence (Rev. 21:1). As in Jewish apocalyptic (cf. Dan. 7:3), so for Rev. the sea is the home of demonic monsters (Rev. 13:1; cf. the → dragon discharging water, Rev. 12:13 ff.). In the plagues of the final times, the water of the sea will be turned into → blood (8:8; 16:3; cf. the rivers and springs 8:10; 16:4); the plagues in → Egypt from the early days of the nation figure in the background here (cf. Exod. 7:14 ff.).

Lk. also passes on apocalyptic traditions when he (by contrast with the parallels Matt. 24 and Mk. 13) introduces the “roar and surge of the sea” (Lk. 21:25 NEB) amongst the eschatological powers of chaos.

4. Like the open sea, the “Sea” of Galilee is also controlled by demonic powers which, together with the storm (for the combination of sea and storm cf. also Jas. 1:6; Rev. 7:1; for the combination of river and storm, Matt. 7:25, 27), endeavour to destroy Jesus' disciples, but are obliged to obey Jesus' authoritative word in the stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:23–27 par. Mk. 4:35–51, Lk. 8:22–25). Jesus' walking on the sea (Matt. 14:22–33 par. Mk. 6:45–52, Jn. 6:16–21) may also be understood as a victory over the demonic powers localized in the water (cf. also the drowning of the Gadarene swine in Matt. 8:32 par. Mk. 5:13, Lk. 8:33). The pericope also shows that, according to the NT conception, water is a specially favoured locality for a theophany. This may be compared with the calling of the first disciples at the Lake of Gennesaret (Matt. 4:18–22 par. Mk. 1:16–20; cf. Lk. 5:1–11; Jn. 1:35–51), and the story of the stater in the fish’s mouth which is peculiar to Matt. (Matt. 17:24–27; → Tax).

5. There is evidently also symbolic meaning in the sea (Lk. limnē; Jn. thalassa) when Peter was given such a magnificent catch of fish (Lk. 5:1–11; Jn. 21:1–11). E. Hilgert sees it as symbolizing the apostle’s mission-field (“Meer”, BHHW II 1181). On the other hand, allegorizing speculations on the stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:23–27 par. Mk. 4:35–41, Lk. 8:22–25) as the world ruled by evil powers, and Jesus walking on the sea (Matt. 14:22–33 par. Mk. 6:42–52, Jn. 6:16–21) as death defeated by Christ (cf. Hilgert, ibid.) are misjudged. It is true only in general terms that Jesus’ power means the end of the domination of demonic and Satanic powers (cf. Matt. 12:28 par. Lk. 11:20).

, O. Böcher

πηγή

πηγή (pēgē), spring, source; ποταμός (potamos), river, stream.

CL pēgē, current in Gk. from Homer onwards (e.g. Il. 20, 9) as a designation for the source of streams or rivers, has not yet been given any satisfactory etymological explanation. From Homer (e.g. Il. 21, 196) onwards, potamos denotes flowing water, primarily greater and, in certain cases, dangerous rivers or streams. Rivers, potamoi, rise from springs (pēgai, Eur., Hercules Furens 1297). pēgē can thus assume the general figurative meaning of source. Early on in popular Gk. belief, rivers and springs were personified as inferior divinities.

OT pēgē, spring, is the LXX rendering some 50 times for Heb. expressions which etymologically mean much the same as eye (‘ayin, and the derivative ma‘yan). This may be because springs were once regarded as the weeping eye of mother earth. In 14 places in the LXX pēgē corresponds with Heb. māqōr (twice in Lev., 4 times in Jer., twice in Pss., 4 times in Prov.), 3 times (Isa., Eccl.) with mabbua‘, meaning spring, and twice (Pss.) with ‘apīq (originally river-bed, channel).

potamos, river, stands in the LXX 112 times for Heb. nāhār, stream, river, and 14 times (Dan.; Ezr.) for the corresponding Aram. word n‘har. In 54 passages potamos replaces Heb. y‘ōr and y‘ōr (equally meaning river) of which 27 alone are in Gen. and Exod.; Heb. naḥal, originally torrent-valley, wady, is rendered by potamos 9 times.

1. (a) For Israel rivers possessed special significance in geographical, political and civilizatory respects. Settlements were established by rivers; which were often bitterly fought over as boundaries and providers of water. The rivers most frequently called potamoi are the Nile (14 times alone in Exod; then e.g. Isa. 7:18; 19:5–8), the Euphrates (e.g. Isa. 7:20; 8:7; 11:15; 27:12; Ps. 72[71]:8), the Jordan (Num. 13:29;

cf. 2 Ki. 5:12), the Chebar (LXX Chobar, e.g. Ezek. 1:1, 3; 3:15, 23; 10:15, 20), or, more generally, the rivers of the Babylonian exile (Ps. 137[136]:1).

(b) Springs and rivers, together with the sea, belong to the mass of water created by God, on which he has founded the earth (Ps. 24[23]:2), and over which he rules as he wishes (Exod. 7; cf. Ps. 78[77]:44; Isa. 41:18; 42:15; 43:20; 44:27; 50:2; Pss. 74[73]:15; 107[106]:33). But if the rôle of the sea is qualified chiefly in negative terms, it is understandably different with the water of springs and rivers. Here the positive aspect predominates; fresh ("living") and sweet water makes human, animal and plant life possible, and so men see in it a gift of the deity. Yahweh causes the springs to flow, and men and beasts to quench their thirst (Ps. 104[103]:10 f.); the river of God waters the land and provides nourishment and prosperity (Ps. 65[64]:10). A wealth of water-springs denoted the fertility of an area (e.g. Exod. 15:27; Num. 33:9; Deut. 8:7), and important decisions were made at the well (pegē or phrear: Heb. b^eēr), as in Gen. 24:11–18; 29:1–4; Exod. 2:15–21. Through bathing in the Jordan, Naaman was healed of his → leprosy (2 Ki. 5:1–19). Popular belief localized inferior divinities – originally the possessors and providers of the water – in springs and rivers. Later Israel ascribed such possession and provision to Yahweh (Gen. 16:7–14; 32:23–33). By the river Chebar the prophet Ezekiel received his call-vision (Ezek. 1:1 ff.) and message (Ezek. 3:15 ff.). As creations of Yahweh, rivers are summoned to join in praising their Creator (Ps. 98[97]:8).

(c) Several times in its history Israel had experience of Yahweh as the Lord of springs and rivers, and gratefully testified to these facts of its salvation-history (Ps. 66[65]:1, the miracle of the Red Sea and the crossing of the Jordan). In particular, the provision of water to drink for the generation in the wilderness from the spring in the rock (Exod. 17:5 f.) is the object of continually repeated praise (Pss. 74[73]:15; 78[77]:16; 105[104]:41; 114[113]:8). The hope of thirst-quenching water in plentiful abundance forms, by analogy, an essential component part of eschatological statements concerning the coming reign of peace (Isa. 12:3; 30:23–25; 35:7; 41:18; 49:10).

2. (a) Spring-water is also part of the OT conception of → Paradise. According to Gen. 2:10–14, the river which rises in Eden divides into the four branches of Pishon, Gihon, Hiddekel (the Tigris) and Euphrates. Since the last days are depicted in terms analogous to the original state (though of course auspiciously excelling it) the eschatological speculations of OT and Jewish literature attach themselves to this river in Eden. The eschatological river rising in the temple and banked by trees of life (Ezek. 47:1–12) serves for purification and irrigation (Joel 4:18 [EVV 3:18]; Zech. 13:1 f.; 14:8). Without direct reference to Gen. 2:10–14, there are prophecies in Isa. 12:3; 43:19–21; 44:3 (cf. Joel 3:1 [EVV 2:28]); 55:1; 58:11 (cf. Ezek. 47:1–12 and Joel 4:18 [EVV 3:18]) of the irrigating and thirst-quenching function of rainfalls, rivers and streams in the last days (cf. also Sir. 24:30–33 [40–46]; Eth. Enoch 48:1; 1QH 8:4–14). The prosperity of the last days will also surpass the garden of → paradise in respect of the plentiful supply of fresh water.

(b) The demonic and destructive power of water can also be ascribed to rivers. The life of the psalmist is threatened by stream and river-water (Pss. 18[17]:5; 124[123]:4 f.; cf. Ps. 69[68]:2 f., 15 f.); but here, as in the raging of the sea, the righteous man can expect the help of Yahweh (Ps. 18[17]:7; cf. Isa. 43:2).

3. Finally, there is the figurative use of spring and river to consider. God's blessings flood his people and land like the irrigating river (Isa. 66:12), and the God-given peace of the righteous is like a peacefully flowing river (Isa. 48:18); Yahweh himself can be called a fountain of living water (Jer. 2:13), whereas the compassionate man can be compared with a well-watered garden and a never-failing spring of water (Isa. 58:11). Of course, God's wrath (LXX; the Heb. text reads God himself) comes "like a rushing stream" (potamos biaios) upon his enemies, sweeping them away with elemental power (Isa. 59:19).

pēgē, too, is used to mean source, in a substantially weakened sense, largely disconnected from the picture of water. Frequently encountered is the phrase pēgē zōēs, fountain of life; God is the source of life (Ps. 36[35]:10), but the Torah (teaching), understanding, wisdom and the fear of God are also a fountain of life (Prov. 10:11; 13:14; 14:27; 16:22; 18:4 LXX). For the prophetic identification of water and Spirit (Isa. 44:3; Ezek. 36:25–27) → hydōr or 2.

NT In the NT by far the largest number of attestations of both pēgē, spring, and potamos, river, are found in Rev. (5 times and 8 times respectively). The Synoptic Gospels contain 6 instances of potamos. Mk. 5:29 (pēgē of the woman's haemorrhage) does not belong in this context. Jn.'s Gospel produces pēgē twice and potamos once. "Spring" appears once each in Jas. (3:11) and 2 Pet (2:17), and "river" once each in Acts (16:13) and 2 Cor. (11:26).

1. potamos, river, as a purely geographical designation, is found for the Jordan (Matt. 3:6 par. Mk. 1:5), the Euphrates (here already in the context of eschatological pictures of the future, Rev. 9:14; 16:12) and the little stream, the Angites, on whose banks there was the place of prayer in Philippi (Acts 16:13).

2. (a) As far as theological statements about springs and rivers are concerned, they are clearly dependent on the OT-Jewish background. God has not only created heaven, earth and sea but also the fountains of water (pēgai hydatōn, Rev. 14:7). God has full right of disposal over rivers and fountains of water, so that in the eschaton he can either in part or in whole revoke the blessing and gift of drinking-water (Rev. 8:10; 16:4; cf. 11:6 and Exod. 7:14–25) or cause rivers to dry up (Rev. 16:12; cf. Ps. 107[106]:33). Jesus reveals himself to the → Samaritan woman at Jacob's Well (pēgē tou Iakōb, Jn. 4:5 ff.). From the water in the well he refers her to the water of life which is eternally brimming over (Jn. 4:13 f.; → hydōr). The Jordan, celebrated from the Elisha tradition as having healing and purifying powers (2 Ki. 5:1–19) becomes the place for the prophetic symbolic action of the Baptist (Matt. 3:6 par. Mk. 1:5) and thus also the scene of Jesus' baptism (Matt. 3:13 par. Mk. 1:9) and God's self-revelation in Spirit and in Word (Matt. 3:16 par. Mk. 1:10 f., Lk. 3:22, Jn. 1:32 f.; cf. Ps. 2:7; Isa. 42:1).

(b) The experience of the dangerous threat to life caused by swollen rivers (Matt. 7:25, 27 par. Lk. 6:48 f.; cf. 2 Cor. 11:26) leads to regarding streams of water as the instrument of demonic powers (Rev. 12:15 f.). Here the hapax legomenon potamophorētos, swept away by a river, which is found in the papyri, is used to describe the dragon's intention to do away with the woman who has borne the male child who symbolizes the mother of Jesus and the church.

(c) Eschatological speculation, linking on to prophetic promises (Ezek. 47:1–12; Joel 4:18 [EVV 3:18]; Zech. 13:1 f.; 14:8), is naturally more interested in the healing character of the river which surpasses the river of → paradise in Gen. 2:10–14 and will at the end of time both quench thirst and spread abroad life, salvation and purity (Rev. 22:1 f., 17; cf. 7:17; 21:6).

The throne of God and of the → Lamb (Rev. 22:1) takes over the place of the → temple of Ezek. 47:1 as the source of the river: God himself henceforth pours out in Christ the water of life (Rev. 21:6). Jn. 7:37 f. should be similarly understood (as in RSV mg. punctuation): "If anyone thirst, let him come to me, and let him who believes in me drink. As the scripture has said, 'Out of his heart shall flow rivers of living water.'" The scriptural word (Ezek. 47:1) is interpreted of Jesus (cf. also Isa. 44:3; 55:1; 58:11). This water of life quenches thirst for all time and, as a spring of life, flows out from the one who has previously drunk it (Jn. 4:13 f.).

(d) The literal meanings of the terms spring and stream have clearly been left behind long ago. Earlier prophecy had already used irrigation as a picture of an eschatological endowment: of God's Spirit (Isa. 44:3; Ezek. 36:25–27). It is, therefore, not surprising that Jn. 7:39 expounds the streams of living water expressly in terms of the → Spirit, which passes from Jesus to those who believe in him. Traces of the OT identification of water and Spirit also remain when the NT compares heretics with waterless (2 Pet. 2:17) or salt springs (Jas. 3:11 f.): the heretics lack God's Spirit, since they are possessed by a false (brackish) devilish spirit (cf. 1 Jn. 4:1; Rev. 16:13).

O. Böcher

ὑδωρ

ὑδωρ (hydōr), water.

CL hydōr is attested from Homer (Il. 16, 385; Od. 3, 300) as a designation for water.

The word belongs to the common stock of Indo-European words: Eng. water, Ger. Wasser and Lat. unda, wave, are all cognates. The plur. hydata generally denotes in cl. Gk. the waters (of a river), only rarely (as in Rev. 11:6; 16:5) water generally.

OT hydōr is used some 460 times in the LXX to render Heb. mayim, water; twice (Exod. 15:8; Ps. 78[77]:16) hydōr represents the pl. part. (= streams) of Heb. nāzal, to flow. Over 100 instances are accounted for by the Pentateuch alone, and over 50 by the Pss.

1. (a) Water (drinking-water) is a vital necessity for men (for bread and water as basic presuppositions of human life see, e.g., Exod. 23:25; 1 Sam. 30:11 f.; 1 Ki. 18:4, 13) and cattle (e.g. Gen. 24:11–20; 30:38), but also for irrigating vegetation (for the high esteem of rain see Deut. 11:11; 1 Ki. 18:41–45). Therefore men think of the precious water as the beneficial gift of Yahweh. It is he who, according to the account of creation in Gen. 2:10–14, turned the previously dead earth into fertile land by means of surging spring-water (→ pēgē), just as it is precisely the abundance of water, indicated by the four-branched river of Paradise, which characterizes the orchard of Eden. From the period of the wandering in the wilderness Israel gratefully acknowledges Yahweh's miraculous provision of water (Exod. 17:5 f.) which is remembered again and again in paraenesis (e.g. Deut. 8:15; Ps. 78[77]:15 f.) and in songs of praise (e.g. Ps. 74[73]:15). As for the promise of the land (Num. 24:7; Deut. 8:7; 11:11), so for eschatological statements, abundance of sweet fresh water is of decisive significance (cf. Isa. 12:3; see the previous articles).

(b) At the same time hydōr is viewed under the negative demonic aspect of something threatening. In the roar of the sea and the waves of rushing rivers Israel discovered deadly powers of which God can make use when he causes the annihilating flood to cover his adversaries (cf. Gen. 6–8; Exod. 14 f.). Such a flood (abyssos) and so much water (hydōr poly) is synonymous with the kingdom of the dead (Ezek. 26:19 f.).

2. Not least for this reason, therefore, water (along with blood, oil and fire) is in the OT, as in the whole of the ancient world, the most preferable means of lustration (cf. homoeopathic magic). Ablutions (→ Baptism, art. louō; → Pure) are part of the consecration rules for → priests and → Levites before entering on their vocation (Exod. 29:4; Num. 8:5–22). In the cultic cleansing of the priest's hands and feet, water is used (Exod. 30:17 ff.; 40:30 ff.); similarly his lustration on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:4, 24; cf. 16:26, 28). After sexual discharge (Lev. 15; cf. Deut. 23:11 f.), after a birth (Lev. 12:1 ff.) and → leprosy (Lev. 14:8 f.; cf. 2 Ki. 5:10, 14) water-baths erased the impurity; and the defilement which had arisen through contact with corpses was removed with water to which had been added the ashes of the red heifer (Num. 19:11 f.). Judaism understood the flood (Gen. 6–8) as a comprehensive lustration for an earth contaminated by sexual wickedness. For the final future of their nation the prophets hoped for an eschatological sprinkling with God's purifying water which would cleanse both land and people, set idolatry aside and put a new Spirit in their hearts (Isa. 44:3; Ezek. 26:25 ff.; Zech. 13:1 f.). Here water has become a picture for the Spirit of Yahweh who brings cleansing and eradicates wickedness.

3. The prophetic spiritualization of cleansing continued in Hellenistic and apocalyptic Judaism. Philo and Josephus interpret purification by water as a symbol for the purification of the soul and the conscience (cf. Philo, Vit. Mos. 2, 138), and the Essenes, with all their strictness in cathartic observance (cf. Josephus, War 2, 129 and 149), stress the superiority of the converted way of life to the lustral water-bath (1QS 3:4–12; cf. 4:21 f.; 5:13 f.; cf. L. Goppelt, TDNT VIII 321). By contrast, the Pharisees and their disciples built up the OT prescriptions of Lev. 11–15 into a complicated system of ritual lustrations (cf. the Mishnah tractates Tohoroth, Mikwaoth, Niddah), which has retained its validity in orthodox Judaism right up to the present day.

NT The NT offers more than 70 attestations for hydōr, water. The word occurs with particular frequency in the Johannine literature (20 times in the Gospel, twice in 1 Jn., 17 times in Rev.), in greater number than in the whole of the rest of the NT. hydōr is not infrequently found connected with → pēgē, spring (e.g. pēgai hydatōn, fountains of water, Rev. 8:10 ff.; 14:7; 16:4) or potamos, river (cf. Rev. 12:15; 22:1) and can also be used synonymously with → thalassa, sea (cf. Mk. 4:39, 41 par. Lk. 8:24 f.).

1. (a) The NT essentially reflects the OT findings. Drinking-water is still as ever a highly-treasured commodity (Mk. 9:41; cf. Matt. 10:42 v.l.; Lk. 16:24). Giving a drink to the thirsty, therefore, counts as a work of particular compassion (Matt. 25:35, 42). The use of water for secular cleaning is also attested (Lk. 7:44; cf. Jn. 13:5). The preciousness of water and its vital necessity for life suggest various pictorial usages of the word (Jn. 4:7, 13 f.; Rev. 7:17).

(b) That God also created water is no less obvious in the NT than it was in the OT, even if express considerations on the subject are lacking. Nevertheless, Rev. 14:7, after mentioning heaven, earth and sea, also names the fountains of water as God's creation, and 2 Pet. represents OT cosmology (cf. Gen. 1:2, 6, 9; Ps. 24[23]:2). Heaven and earth derived their existence, through God's word, from water and by water, until the then-existing world perished in the waters of the flood.

(c) As in Judaism, angelic or demonic powers shelter under the waters (Rev. 16:5, angelos tōn hydatōn, the angel of the waters). The healing power of individual springs or pools is the gift of these supernatural beings (Jn. 5:4, 7). The picture of many waters, hydata polla, is the seer's description of the numinous power of heavenly voices (Rev. 1:5; 14:2; 19:6; cf. Ezek. 1:24; 43:2). The demon throws the possessed lad into fire and water in order to injure him (Matt. 17:15 par. Mk. 9:22), and the demons plunge into the water – as it were, their own original and particular element, drowning the animals in which they dwell at the same time (Matt. 8:32; cf. the par. Mk. 5:13, Lk. 8:33). The walking on the “sea” (Matt. 14:22–33 par. Mk. 6:45–52; Jn. 6:16–21, of Jesus) was for Peter a walk on the waters (epi ta hydata, Matt. 14:28–31). Peter's walk is recorded only in Matt. The Master allowed his disciple, in so far and so long as he maintained faith, to share in his victory over the demonic powers personified in the water and wind (Matt. 14:30).

2. (a) The significance of water as a Jewish means of lustration is also familiar in the NT (Jn. 2:6; cf. Mk. 14:13 par. Lk. 22:10). Water in particular serves for the ritual washing of the hands (Mk. 7:3 f.; → Pure) and vessels (Matt. 23:25 f. par. Lk. 11:39 f., Mk. 7:4). Pilate's symbolic washing of his hands is also in keeping with OT custom (Matt. 27:24 f.; cf. Deut. 21:6; Pss. 26[25]:6; 73[72]:13). The place of prayer near the river (Acts 16:13) may mean that ritual baptism was practised. The baptism of John (see potamos in art. → pēgē) carried out with the water of the Jordan (Matt. 3:13–17 par. Mk. 1:8 ff., Lk. 3:21, Jn. 1:26, 31, 33; Acts 1:5; 11:16), despite its ethical intention, retains formal affinities with the lustral dippings, especially the proselyte baptism of Judaism.

(b) Whereas Jesus absolved his disciples from the Pharisaic prescription of hand-washing before and after meals (Matt. 15:1–20 par. Mk. 7:2–23, Lk. 11:37–41; → Hand), and according to Jn. 2:1–11 even changed the water of Jewish purification into wine, the baptismal practice of John the Baptist found its continuation in Christian → baptism. It, too, takes place in water (Acts 8:36, 38 f.; 10:47), and its effect is still described as cleansing (Eph. 5:26; Heb. 10:22; cf. Acts 22:16; 1 Cor. 6:11). Prophetic eschatological hopes are thus fulfilled; the cleansed person receives God's → Spirit (cf. Acts 2:38; 1 Cor. 6:11; Heb. 6:4). Water (baptismal water) develops in the NT its greatest dignity, although of course no longer in the sense of a means of lustration, in 1 Cor. 10:1 f. where the Red Sea and, in 1 Pet. 3:20 f., the flood, appear as prototypes of the water of baptism. A magical understanding of the sacraments (cf. 1 Cor. 15:29) is expressly repudiated (cf. 2 Pet. 2:22), since baptism does not take place to eradicate fleshly impurities (1 Pet. 3:21).

(c) Instead, the Johannine literature in particular sees the decisive significance of baptism in its christological and pneumatic aspects. The pericope of the foot-washing (Jn. 13:1–20) has been understood as a disguised account of an institution of baptism by Jesus. “Blood and water” – Lord's Supper and Baptism – flow from Christ himself (Jn. 19:34; cf. 1 Jn. 5:6, 8). The → Lamb leads us (Rev. 7:17) to springs of living water which rise from the throne of God and of the Lamb (Rev. 22:1, 17; cf. 21:6). Christ pours out this water (Jn. 4:10–15; 7:37 f.), which is God’s Holy Spirit (Jn. 7:39). In this way Jewish eschatology reaches its goal; for all who believe and are baptized, the river of the water of life is already flowing now – free of charge (Rev. 21:6; 22:17).

O. Böcher

κατακλυσμός

κατακλυσμός (kataklysmos), a deluge, flood.

CL This term was used after the time of Homer in both a literal and figurative sense to signify a deluge, and this meaning has survived into modern Greek. One doubtful occurrence in the papyri is possibly contained in a document written close to the time of Christ’s birth.

OT The LXX employed kataklysmos in almost consistent reference to the Noachian flood (Gen. 6:17 etc.; Ps. 29[28]:10; Sir. 40:10; 44:17 ff.), but in Ps. 32[31]:6; Sir. 21:13; 39:22 the references are of a metaphorical nature. The two Hebrew words used for deluge were mabbûl, describing the Noachian flood in terms of the “waters above the earth”, and then of the entire inundation, and šetep̄ (Ps. 32:6; Ps. 27:4, etc.; → Noah).

NT The word occurs four times only in the NT (Matt. 24:38 f.; Lk. 17:27; 2 Pet. 2:5) referring in each instance to the devastation of the Noachian deluge.

R. K. Harrison

Ἰορδάνης

Ἰορδάνης (Iordanēs), the river Jordan.

OT This was the Gk. name for the river which descended from Lake Huleh through the deepest rift-valley depression on earth. It was the principal river of Palestine, and outnumbered all others in the Near East in biblical references and allusions.

As found in the LXX, the name is the Greek equivalent of the MT yardēn, an Aramaic form derived from an earlier Canaanite yardôn. This latter evidently comprised the basis of the Egyptian ya-ar-du-na, which occurred in Nineteenth Dynasty lists. The meaning of the MT yardēn depends on whether it is considered Indo-Aryan or west Semitic in origin. If the former it would mean (perennial) river, but if the latter, descender, from the root yrđ, to go down. Both of these meanings can be supported philologically. Of the OT incidents relating to the Jordan, its crossing by the Israelites was the most notable (Josh. 3:16). Its waters were also used in the miraculous healing of Naaman (2 Ki. 5:14).

NT In the NT, the celebrated river was the site of John the Baptist’s ministry (Matt. 3:6; Mk. 1:5; Jn. 1:28; 3:26), and the place where Jesus was baptized (Matt. 3:13; Mk. 1:9; Lk. 4:1). Aside from references to Christ exercising his ministry on the far side of Jordan (Matt. 19:1; Mk. 10:1), and returning on one occasion to the site of his baptism (Jn. 10:40), there is no other NT passage which directly involves the Jordan in any events important for early Christianity.
R. K. Harrison

λίμνη

λίμνη (limnē), lake.

CL Originally limnē probably described a salt-water marsh or a lagoon formed by the ocean. In Homer and elsewhere the term was used of a fresh- or salt-water pool or marsh, but in addition, Homer and other Greek poets used limnē of the sea. Gk. papyri from the 3rd century B.C. onwards employed the word in the more modest sense of lake.

OT limnē occurred occasionally in the LXX, as in Pss. 107[106]:35; 114[113]:8; Cant 7:4[5]; 1 Macc. 11:35; 2 Macc. 12:16. In the references in the Psalter the Hebrew word 'agām, swamp, pool of reeds, was used, while b'ṛēk'āh, pond (cf. Egypt. brkt, Lat. piscina) occurred in Cant. 7:5.

NT In the Lucan writings limnē was used of fresh-water lakes, being associated with the Sea (→ thalassa, so the references in Matt. and Mk.) of Galilee (Lk. 5:2; 8:22 ff.) and the Lake of Gennesaret (Lk. 5:1). Metaphorically, limnē occurs in Rev. 19:20; 20:10 ff.; 21:8, to describe the fiery lake of brimstone established for the destruction of the ungodly.

R. K. Harrison

→ Baptism, → Fire, → Hand, → Pure

(a). B. W. Anderson, "Water", IDB IV 806–10; D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible, 1974²; A. Büchler, "The Law of Purification in Mk. vii. 1–23", ExpT 21, 1909–10, 33–40; T. Canaan, "Water and the 'Water of Life' in Palestinian Superstition", Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society 9, 1929, 57–69; S. Cohen, "Jordan", IDB II 973–78; C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, 1953, 297–300; M. Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion, 1958, 188–215; The Sacred and Profane: The Nature of Religion, 1959; and Birth and Rebirth: The Religious Meanings of Initiation in Human Culture, 1958, reprinted as Rites and Symbols of Initiation, 1965; N. Glueck, The River Jordan, 1946; and "The Geography of the Jordan", National Geographic Magazine 86, 1944–45, 719–44; L. Goppelt, hydōr, TDNT VIII 314–33; L. H. Grollenberg, Atlas of the Bible, 1956; R. W. Hamilton, "Water Works", IDB IV 811–16; A. King, Holy Waters: A Short Account of the Use of Water for Ceremonial and Purificatory Purposes in Pagan, Jewish and Christian Times, 1926; W. Kornfeld, "Water", EBT III 961 ff.; J. J. McGovern, "The Waters of Death", CBQ 21, 1959, 350–58; H. G. May, "Some Cosmic Connotations of MAYIM RABBIM, 'Many Waters'", JBL 74, 1955, 9–21; K. H. Rengstorff, potamos, potomophorētos, Iordanēs, TDNT VI 595–623; J. A. T. Robinson, "The Significance of the Footwashing", in Neotestamentica et Patristica. Eine Freundesgabe Herrn Professor Dr. Oscar Cullmann überreicht zu seinem 60. Geburtstag, Supplements to NovT 6, 1962, 144 ff.; P. Wernberg-Møller, "Water, Wind and Fire (Lk. 3:16) and Orphic Initiation", NTS 3, 1956–57, 69–79.

(b). J. P. Audet, "La Soif, l'Eau et la Parole", RB 66, 1959, 379–86; G. Bertram, "Le Chemin sur les Eaux Considéré comme Motif de Salut dans la Piété Chrétienne Primitive", Jubilé A. Loisy, I, 1928, 137–66; O. Böcher, "Wasser und Geist", in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Veritas, Festschrift G. Stählin, 1970, 197 ff.; H. Bonnet, "Die Symbolik der Reinigungen im ägyptischen Kult", Angelos 1, 1925, 103–21; W. Brandt, Die jüdischen Baptismen oder das religiöse Waschen und Baden im Judentum mit Einschluss des Judentums, BZAW 18, 1910; and Jüdische Reinheitslehre und ihre Beschreibung in den Evangelien, BZAW 19, 1910, 5–55; F. M. Braun, "L'Eau et l'Esprit", Revue Thomiste 49, 5–30; J. Chaine, "Cosmogonie aquatique et Conflagration finale d'après la Deuxième Épître de S. Pierre", RB 46, 1937, 207–16; J. Daniélou, "Le Symbolisme de l'Eau Vive", Revue des Sciences Religieuses 32, 1958, 335–46; O. Eissfeldt, "Gott und das Meer in der Bibel", Studia Orientalia J. Pedersen Dicata, 1953, 76–84; H. Frisk, Griechisch etymologisches Wörterbuch, 1960 ff., I, 649; II, 525, 585, 957 f.; I. Goldziher, "Wasser als Dämonen abwehrendes Mittel", ARW 13, 1910, 20 ff.; H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit, 1893; F. Hartung, "Das Wasser im alten und neuen Ägypten", Naturwissenschaftliche Rundschau 10, 1957, 373–78; A. Herrmann, "Der Nil und die Christen", Jahrbuch für Antike Christentum 2, 1959, 30–69; M. L. Henry, "Meerungeheuer", BHHW II 1181; E. Hilgert, "Meer", BHHW II 1181; T. J. Jones, Quellen, Brunnen und Zisternen im Alten Testament, Morgenländische Texte und Forschungen, I, 6, 1928; O. Kaiser, Die mythische Bedeutung des Meeres in Ägypten, Ugarit und Israel, BZAW 78, (1959) 1962²; E. R. Lange, "Quellen", *RGG*³ V 734 f.; F. M. T. Liagre-Böhl, "Lebenswasser", *RGG*³ IV 257 ff.; M. Ninck, Die Bedeutung des Wassers in Kult und Leben der Alten, 1921; H. Pfannenschmidt, Das Weihwasser im heidnischen und christlichen Kultus, 1869; E. Rácz, Kultische Waschungen bei den Ägyptern und Juden und ihr Verhältnis zur urchristlichen Taufe mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Qumran-Sekte, (Dissertation, Vienna) 1958; P. Reymond, L'Eau, sa Vie, et sa Signification dans l'Ancien Testament, Supplements to VT 6, 1958; and "Wasser", *RGG*³ VI 1549 ff.; G. Spaltmann, Das Wasser in den religiösen Anschauungen der Völker, (Dissertation, Bonn) 1939; J. Thomas, Le Mouvement Baptiste en Palestine et Syrie, 1935; C. Westermann, l'hôm, THAT II 1026–31; R. Wolf, Aqua Religiosa. Die religiöse Verwendung von Wasser im frühen Christentum und in seiner Umwelt, (Dissertation, Leipzig) 1956; A. Wünsche, Die Sagen vom Lebensbaum und Lebenswasser, 1905.

Weakness, Sickness, Disease, Paralysis

Weakness is the opposite of → strength, and embraces the full range of physical, emotional, social, economic and even spiritual incapacity. All these notions can be expressed by the words of the asthenēs group. A particularly important part is played by bodily weakness, i.e. disease, which is dealt with in a separate article under the heading of nosos.

ἀσθένεια

ἀσθένεια (astheneia), weakness, sickness, disease, timidity; ἀσθενής (asthenēs), without strength, weak; ἀσθενέω (astheneō), to be powerless, weak; ἀσθενῶν (asthenōn), sick person.

CL This group of words is formed from its opposite sthenos, strength, with the Alpha-privative prefixed. It conveys the meaning of powerlessness, weakness, lack of strength, and includes particularly the vb. astheneō (Eur., Thuc.), the noun astheneia (Hdt., Thuc.) and the adj. asthenēs (Pindar, Hdt.). All three denote primarily bodily weakness, i.e. sickness (Hdt., 4, 135; cf. also Josephus, War 1, 76), and overlap here with the specific meaning of → nosos. In more general contexts, the astheneia word-group can be used in a wider sense as the opposite of dynamis, power (→ Might), or ischyros, strong, to express other sorts of weakness, e.g. the frailty of woman, the weakness of human nature (Plato, Leges 854a), or of human life (Hdt., 2, 47; 8, 51), but also economic weakness, i.e. lack of influence, or poverty (Hdt., 2, 88). Only rarely is it used for lack of conviction, moral weakness (Thuc., 2, 61, 2; Epictetus, Dissertationes 1, 8, 8; cf. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1150b 19).

OT 1. In the LXX astheneō and asthenēs are used to render a confusingly large number of Heb. equivalents; astheneia occurs only 7 times. In the Pentateuch asthenēs occurs only twice (Gen. 29:17, Leah's weak eyes; Num. 13:18, the question whether the inhabitants of Canaan are strong, ischyroi, or weak). The remaining historical books likewise use this group of words infrequently, and in very different contexts. The sense of sickness is not attested, and is found in other parts of the OT only very rarely (e.g. Dan. 8:27; cf. → nosos); but we do find the general meaning, human weakness (Jdg. 16:7, 11, 17). Jdg. 6:15 refers to the social insignificance of Gideon's family; 2 Sam. 3:1 to the political weakness, of the house of Saul.

2. astheneō first acquires a specific character in the prophetic literature. Here it is used chiefly to translate verbal forms of the root kāšal, to stumble, stagger, while astheneia renders the corresponding noun miḳšōl, hindrance, stumbling-block (Jer. 6:21; 18:23). In prophetic texts the vb. is found chiefly in prophecies of → judgment, describing in a figurative sense the people which has rebelled against Yahweh and which will therefore stumble and fall (Hos. 4:5; 5:5; Jer. 6:21; 18:15). Frequently it is expressed in the future tense as an announcement of judgment to come: asthenēsousin, they will be weak, i.e. stumble, fall (e.g. Nah. 2:5; 3:3; Zeph. 1:3).

3. In the Pss. and in the Wisdom literature, astheneō is sometimes used as in the prophets to express the stumbling of the ungodly and of enemies (Pss. 9:3; 27[26]:2; 58[57]:7; 107[106]:12; cf. Job 28:4). On other occasions it expresses human poverty and human wretchedness (Pss. 6:2; 31[30]:10; 88[87]:9; 109[108]:24; cf. Job 4:4; Prov. 21:13; 22:22). It remains to be noted that Theodotion is clearly particularly fond of using astheneō (e.g. Dan. 11:14, 19, 33 ff., depicting the fate of wise and powerful men in the end-time). The fact that astheneō is used in the LXX to denote human stumbling, disaster, a sense which goes beyond the genuinely Gk. meaning of human weakness, is probably to be explained by the link-word in the translation, the Aram. ʿqal, which means both to stumble and to be weak (cf. G. Stählin asthenēs, TDNT I 490).

NT Broadly speaking, we may say that the astheneia word-group is found in its literal sense chiefly in the Synoptic Gospels and in Jn., whereas the figurative sense, resulting from theological reflection, occurs predominantly in the Pauline literature.

1. asthenēs is used in the general sense of weakness, when in 1 Pet. 3:7 women are spoken of as the weaker sex (cf. P. Lond. 971, 4), and when Paul's personal appearance in Corinth (2 Cor. 10:10) is described as weak. The general weakness of man is the subject of the epigrammatic saying in Matt. 26:41 par. Mk. 14:38, which is not to be understood in terms of Pauline theology, but rather of OT anthropology: "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak" (cf. 1QS 3:24 ff.; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 242). Gal. 4:9 (cf. Arndt, 115) is probably also to be included in this category: the elemental spirits of the cosmos are here described as poor (or wretched) and weak, i.e. disarmed and therefore powerless (cf. Col. 2:14). Economic weakness in the sense of need, poverty, is meant in Acts 20:35: the wealthy are to take care of the needy, for "it is more blessed to give than to receive" (→ Poor; → Possessions).

2. The Gospels use the words in the great majority of cases in the specific sense of bodily weakness or sickness (e.g. Matt. 10:8; Lk. 13:11; Acts 9:37; Jn. 4:46). In this aspect, astheneia is identical in meaning to → nosos. The words of the asthenēs group are usually used absolutely; only occasionally is an explanatory tēs sarkos, of the flesh, added (Gal. 4:13). The present part. is also found as a noun; asthenōn, sick person (Jn. 5:7), usually in the plur. asthenountes, sick people (e.g. Mk. 6:56; Jn. 6:2).

3. In Paul, the terms in this group have undergone far-reaching theological reflection, and are developed in relation to man's sinful nature, to christology, and to ethics.

(a) In Rom. 6:19 astheneia tēs sarkos, weakness of the flesh, refers – as is made clear by the phrase anthrōpinon legō, I speak as a man, in the context – to the natural weakness of → man (cf. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 232–39). Rom. 8:26 defines astheneia as human powerlessness over against God, needing the help of the Spirit's power (dynamis). 1 Cor. 15:43 extends these sayings about the nature of man to the → creation: weakness is made parallel to phthora, impermanence, while its opposite, the → might of God, is made parallel to aphtharsia, imperishability.

In Rom. 8:4 Paul develops the concept of weakness still further by bringing it into association with the → law: "For God has done what the law, weakened by the flesh, could not do." The basic relation between flesh, weakness and law is summed up in a sentence by O. Michel: "Man's inability to do what is good necessarily reveals a weakness also in the law" (Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4, 1966¹³, 160). The exegetic construction relating ēsthenei, it was weak, showed itself weak, to adynaton, impotent, makes it clear that Paul does not use weakness in the sense of a relative quantity, but of an absolute one: incapability (cf. the corresponding statements about the weakness of the law in Heb. 7:18). Paul's strongest formulation comes at Rom. 5:6, where he equates the astheneis, weak, with hamartōloi, sinners (v. 8, the same gen. absolute construction), and asebeis (v. 6), ungodly (cf. also Heb. 4:15 and 7:28, where weak, i.e. sinful, men are contrasted with the perfect Son).

(b) While, on the one hand, Paul points to astheneia as the sphere of impermanence in the created order, powerlessness of the law, and human incapability in the face of God, he introduces another train of thought in seeing it as the place where God's might is exhibited. In the course of arguing against his opponents in Corinth, for whom the cross of Christ is no longer of decisive importance, the apostle unfolds, as is well known, his theologia crucis, theology of the cross. In this context Paul interprets astheneia as the → suffering and → death of Christ and his disciples. Christ was crucified in (lit. from) weakness and in this Crucified One the weakness of God comes to light, which to men's eyes appears to be powerlessness and folly (1 Cor. 1:25, 27). Since, however, God has demonstrated his might in weakness, i.e. in the death of Christ, by raising him from the dead (2 Cor. 13:4), it is in the very sufferings of his followers that God's creative, life-giving power is revealed. Paul regards his own weakness, which is under severe attack from his opponents in Corinth, as a mark of discipleship and fellowship in Christ's sufferings (1 Cor. 2:2 f.; 4:10; 2 Cor. 13:4). At the same time the power (→ Might), dynamis, of God is at work in the weakness amid the conditions of suffering and alienation. Thus Paul arrives at the paradoxical statement that he would rather boast of his weakness (2 Cor. 11:30; 12:5, 9 f.; 13:9), for God's "power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12:9; on Paul's thorn in the flesh → Fruit, art. skolops).

(c) In a third line of thought, in hortatory contexts, Paul distinguishes between the strong (Rom. 15:1, dynatoi) and the weak (Rom. 14:1, asthenōn, or plur. asthenountes) in faith. In this context weakness does not mean either (a) human powerlessness when compared to God, or (b) the sufferings of Christ or his disciples. Rather (c) it follows from the direct use of the terms strong and weak, in the form of catchwords or familiar slogans that Paul is here taking up, which were used by the various groups within the churches of Corinth and Rome (cf. 1 Cor. 8:10; Rom. 14:1–15:13). The group known as the "weak" is characterized by a weak → conscience (syneidēsis, 1 Cor. 8:7), and has not yet reached a full knowledge of the faith

(1 Cor. 8:11). This is expressed in abstinence from meat and perhaps wine (Rom. 14:2), especially from meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8:7), in observance of certain days (perhaps → sabbaths and fast days; Rom. 14:5), and also in certain ascetic and legalistic tendencies. The strong, on the other hand, have come to realize that nothing is unclean in itself (Rom. 14:14), since they know only one Lord, from whom all things come (1 Cor. 8:6). Hence, they will eat anything (Rom. 14:2), even meat offered to idols (1 Cor. 8:1), and they regard all days alike (Rom. 14:5). Although Paul regards himself as belonging to the “strong” group (1 Cor. 8:4; Rom. 14:14; 15:1), he does not in this case engage in further discussion of the content of the respective → knowledge (gnōsis) of the two groups, but stresses the importance of strong and weak living together in love (1 Cor. 8:1 ff.) before their common Lord (Rom. 14:6 ff). The important thing for the strong is that they should not place a stumbling-block (proskomma, 1 Cor. 8:9; Rom. 14:13, 20) in the way of the weak, nor cause them → offence (skandalon, Rom. 14:13), thus troubling their conscience (1 Cor. 8:13), leading them astray (1 Cor. 8:10; Rom. 14:23), causing them to fall (Rom. 14:21), and finally bringing about their ruin (1 Cor. 8:11; Rom. 14:21). The association of astheneia with proskoptō, to give offence, and skandalizō, to set up a stumbling-block, recalls the prophetic use of astheneia (cf. OT 2). Over and above the differences in knowledge between strong and weak, Paul sets the power uniting the two groups, → love.

H.-G. Link

νόσος

νόσος (nosos), illness, sickness; νοσέω (noseō), to be ill, be ailing.

CL 1. The noun nosos (Homer) and the vb. noseō (Aesch., Hdt.) carry primarily the concrete meaning of illness (e.g. Homer, Od. 9, 411; Hdt. 1, 22; Hesiod, Works 92; cf. also → malakia, softness), and to be ill (e.g. Hdt., 1, 105; 3, 33; Plato, Gorgias 496a). nosos can be used specifically to mean calamity (Soph., Antigone 421; cf. also mastix, scourge, e.g. Homer, Il. 12, 37), torment (Hesiod, Theogony 527), addiction (Plato, Theaetetus 169b), lasciviousness (Eur., Hippolytus 765 f.), madness (Aesch., Persae 750). On the other hand, it can be used in a general sense or figuratively, e.g. for a plague afflicting a city (Plato, Protagoras 322d), chronic disease of the state (Plato, Laws 919c), weakness of character, depravity (so frequently in Philo). The later and rarer noun nosema (tragic poets and Thuc.) can be used both in literal and transferred senses (e.g. Plato, Gorgias 480b) as a synonym for nosos, and is found particularly often in the writings of Philo (but cf. also Josephus, Ant. 8, 45; Ap. 1, 282). noseō occurs more frequently than nosos in general contexts and in metaphorical expressions, e.g. to suffer from lack of education or wickedness (Eur., Ion 620; Xenophon, Memorabilia 3, 5, 18; Hdt. 5, 28), to be filled with a feverish longing for glory (Plutarch 2, 546 f.; cf. also Philo, Leg. All. 3, 211; Josephus, Ant. 16, 244; 18, 25).

2. With their prescientific mythical view of the world, the Greeks drew the analogical conclusion that visible diseases were to be attributed to the attacks of invisible deities (e.g. Homer, Il. 1, 9 ff.), whose wrath they sought to appease by means of sacrifice and similar ritual practices (cf. Diog. Laert. 1, 110, 3). This conclusion was modified by critical reflection on the part of the philosophers, who explained disease in anthropological terms: the outward (accidental) disease corresponds to an inward (substantial) → suffering (pathos), which consists of ignorance (agnoia) (Plato, Republic 10, 609c ff.; Sophista 228a). Medicinal therapy and philosophical instruction and virtue are thus closely related (cf. → Heal, art. iaomai).

OT 1. In the LXX nosos occurs surprisingly seldom (some 15 times), and noseō only 3 times. The thing signified, sickness and being ill, is rendered in the LXX rather more often by malakia, but chiefly by arrōsteō and the nouns arrōstia and arrōstēma, occasionally by enochleō, to molest, and → astheneō; in Amos 6:6 by paschō. The fact that the term illness is not found very frequently in the LXX may be due to the OT tendency to be concerned less with the general phenomenon than with its concrete manifestation (e.g. leprosy, lepra in the LXX, cf. Lev. 13 f.). Behind the above-mentioned Gk. terms there is most often a verbal or substantival form of the Heb. root ḥālāh (noun ḥēlā), which in almost every case carries its literal, concrete meaning, and only rarely (e.g. Hos. 5:13) a figurative one. This observation enables us to see how difficult Israel found it to come to terms with the fact of disease: so difficult, that it was scarcely possible to rise to a figurative or spiritualized understanding of illness.

2. The OT view of sickness fits first and foremost into the pattern of the general understanding of disease in the ancient orient. Thus in the OT disease, like sexual discharges, and death, belongs to the sphere of the unclean (→ Pure, art. katharos στ). When healing takes place, there has to be a corresponding purificatory rite (cf. the treatment of lepers, Lev. 13 f.; Lk. 17:12). There is a further link, for example, with the Babylonian penitential Psalms (cf. A. Oepke, nosos, TDNT IV 1093 f.), in that sin and disease are brought into causal relation with each other (Pss. 32[31]:1 ff.; 38[37]:3 ff.; 41[40]:4; 107[106]:17 ff.; cf. G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 272–89). The prophets compare Israel in his sin to a man who is mortally ill (Isa. 1:5 f.; Jer. 30:12 f.; Hos. 5:13). Sin and disease are very nearly inseparable as a condition outside of salvation (cf. A. Oepke, TDNT IV 1093). This recognition that even disease is ordained, or at least permitted, by Yahweh leads the OT believer to see disease as a divine judgment upon sin (2 Sam. 12:15 ff.; 24:10 ff.; Pss. 39[38]:9, 12; 88[87]:7 f., 15 ff.). Recovery, on the other hand, leads to thanksgiving for the forgiveness of sin (Isa. 38:17; Ps. 103[102]:3; cf. → Heal, art. iaomai).

The subject of Job's complaints is the problem why the righteous have to suffer disease and pain. Job's rebellion against the retribution theory of his friends demonstrates the limitations of the view of disease and sin as causally related, a view which could not remain the final answer.

3. In Judaism the dogma of retributive suffering reaches its most consistent extreme (cf. Jn. 9:2). From the effect, conclusions are drawn as to the cause. The rabbis were able to name the sin which corresponded to every disease, a teaching which led to grotesque and absurd theories, such as regarding the sin of the embryo in the womb as a cause of illness (SB II 193 ff., 527 ff.).

At the same time, however, the Jews developed the concept of discipline imposed out of love; and with this came encouragement to visit the sick, to pray for them, and to help them, since God is especially near to those who are ill (SB I 495; IV 573 ff.).

NT 1. In the NT nosos and the other words normally used to describe sickness (cf.

OT 1) occur almost exclusively in the Gospels and Acts. Whereas nosos is found only in the literal sense, the single occurrence of noseō (1 Tim. 6:4) has a figurative meaning. The NT thus retains the realism of the OT: the problem of disease is primarily that which concerns its concrete manifestations. Other elements taken over from the OT view are the idea of the influence of demonic powers (Lk. 13:11, 16; 2 Cor. 12:7; Acts 12:23; Rev. 16:2), and the connexion between disease and sin (Jn. 5:14; 1 Cor. 11:30).

2. Although sickness is viewed occasionally in the NT as a divine punishment or judgment (Jn. 5:4, nosēma, though the best MSS omit this verse; 1 Cor. 11:32; Rev. 6:8; cf. → Death), the NT also contains the Gk. concept, familiar to the rabbis, of beneficial chastening resulting from God's love (Heb. 12:4 ff., mastigoō, to chasten, and paideia, discipline, chastening; cf. Prov. 3:11 f.). The primary insight of the NT, however, is that disease and disease-bringing demons, even if they are permitted to act by God (Acts 12:23; 2 Cor. 12:7 ff.), have to do with the power of hostile forces which oppose the rule of God (Mk. 1:23 f.; 3:27). Jesus' fight against disease accords with this. On the one hand, he breaks through the terrible connexion of sin and disease (Mk. 2:5 ff.) by his assurance of → forgiveness; on the other, he brings in the dawn of God's kingdom by casting out demons and healing the sick (Mk. 5:1 ff.; especially Lk. 11:20; cf. → Heal, art. iaomai NT).

3. (a) In Matt. 9:12f. par. Mk. 2:17, Lk. 5:31, sinners (hamartōloi) are described figuratively as the sick (kakōs echontes) (cf. Isa. 1:5 f.). Jesus' commission in coming to the earth (ēlthon, "I came") is to transform the plight of man which expresses itself in sin and disease, by his call to repentance and his works of healing, into the salvation which belongs to God's kingdom.

(b) Matt. 8:17 takes up Isa. 53:4, summing up Jesus' work of healing in the sentence: "He took our illnesses [astheneias] and bore our diseases [nosous]." Matt. interprets this verse as referring not to the suffering of disease by the Servant, or Jesus, but to the removal of disease by the power of Jesus (cf. H. J. Held in G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963, 171 f.). K. Stendahl holds that Matt. himself translated the Heb. of Isa. 53:4 literally (The School of St Matthew and its Use of the Old Testament, 1954, 106 f.). As R. H. Gundry points out, for both the prophet and the evangelist sin was the root cause of disease (The Use of the Old Testament in St. Matthew's Gospel, Supplements to NovT 18, 1967, 230).

(c) In Jn. 9:2 ff. the Jews' question about the cause of the man's blindness is dismissed as inappropriate, and replaced by an indication of the purpose of the disease: the blind man was not blind from birth because he or his parents sinned, but rather "that the works of God might be manifest" (cf. Jn. 11:4; Lk. 13:1 ff.).

(d) Paul regards his infirmity (Gal. 4:13 f.; 2 Cor. 12:7 ff.) which has been interpreted as some form of epileptic or hysterical attacks (cf. H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Galater, KEK 7, 1971¹⁴, 211; but → Fruit, art. skolops NT on his "thorn in the flesh"), along with persecutions and other troubles (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23 ff.), as part of the → suffering laid upon the followers of Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 1:5 ff.), in which by a dialectic process God's power becomes apparent: "For when I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor. 12:10; → astheneia, NT 3 (b)).

(e) The use of noseō in 1 Tim. 6:4 corresponds to the Hellenistic use of the vb.

Craving for controversy and disputes about words point to a sick condition in the inner man (cf. Plato, Philo; see above, CL). The comparison of the spreading nature of false teaching with the progress of a cancerous tumour (2 Tim. 2:17) likewise belongs to the realm of Hellenistic thought.

H.-G. Link

μαλακία

μαλακία (malakia), weakness, softness, sickness.

CL In the cl. authors the term originally meant softness, but it also came to be used of effeminate men. In the medical writers it described generalized weakness or illness. Late Greek usage connected it with nosos, disease, to indicate bodily sickness.

OT malakia occurs in the LXX as a general term for sickness (cf. Deut. 7:15; 28:61; Isa. 38:9; 53:3), and was represented by several Heb. words as follows: 'āsōn, serious accident; maḥ^alāh, maḥ^aluyīm, disease(s); taḥ^aū'im, ailments; ḥ^olī, weakness, sickness, serious illness; maḥ^aōb, pain. References such as Deut. 7:15 emphasize the punitive function of illness, but this view was modified in the work of the divine Servant (MT Isa. 53:4) who bore our diseases and carried our pains. If this is a foreshadowing of the vicarious atonement of Christ on Calvary, as the traditional Christian interpretation of that passage has maintained, it indicates that divine healing is an integral part of his saving work (cf. Matt. 8:17; → nosos NT 3 (b)).

NT The term is found 3 times only in the NT (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 10:1) in the sense of weakness or sickness. The healing of the physical conditions involved was for Matt. an important feature of the Gospel of the kingdom. He also associated malakia with nosos to describe illness in a comprehensive manner. R. K. Harrison

παραλυτικός

παραλυτικός (paralytikos), paralytic.

CL This word was seldom used in secular Gk., and appears only once in the papyri.

Where paralytic disability was being described, medical authors such as Hippocrates and Galen preferred the more technical term parelymenos, a word used also by Luke (5:18, 24; Acts 8:7; 9:33). The kind of paresis indicated by these references is uncertain, but the passive form of the verb paralyō suggests a chronic condition with concomitant organic degeneration.

OT paralytikos does not occur in the LXX, the nearest approximation to the condition being conveyed by the verb xērainō, to dry up, shrivel, wither, as in the account of Jeroboam's paralysis (LXX 1 Ki. 13:4). The MT equivalent of this was yāḥēš, to become dry, wither.

NT In the NT, paralytikos as descriptive of one form or another of paresis occurs only in the first two Gospels (Matt. 4:24; 8:6; 9:2, 6; Mk. 2:3 ff.). In Matt. 8:6; (cf. Lk. 7:1 ff.) the paralysis may have been that described by Landry, in which the disability commences in the legs and proceeds quickly to the arms and neck, generally terminating fatally within three weeks. The paralysis of Matt. 9:2 (cf. Mk.

2:3 ff.; Lk. 5:18 ff.) was probably an instance of paraplegia, in which the paralysis affected the lower half of the person's body.

R. K. Harrison

→ Blind, → Deaf, → Ecstasy, → Fruit, art. skolops, → Heal, → Lame, → Leper, → Offence

(a). G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963; C. J. Brim, Medicine in the Bible, 1936; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 232–39; R. K. Harrison, “Disease”, IDB I 847–54; and “The Christian Interpretation of Disease”, The Churchman 62, 1953, 220–27; L. Köhler, Hebrew Man, 1956, 46–60; F. MacNutt, Healing, 1974; F. Mussner, “Sickness”, EBT III 846 f.; H. P. Newsholme, Health, Disease and Integration, 1929; A. Oepke, nosos etc., TDNT IV 1091–98; J. C. Peddie, The Forgotten Talent, 1961; W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971; A. R. Short, The Bible and Modern Medicine, 1953, 47–123; C. R. Smith, A Physician Examines the Bible, 1950; G. Stählin, asthenēs etc., TDNT I 490–93; R. R. Willcox, “Venereal Disease in the Bible”, British Journal of Venereal Disease 25, 1949, 28 ff.; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974.

(b). H. Doebert, Das Charisma der Krankenheilung, 1960; K. F. Euler, Die Verkündigung vom leidenden Gottesknecht aus Jesaja 53 in der griechischen Bibel, 1934; F. Fenner, Die Krankheit im Neuen Testament, 1930; H. Greeven, Krankheit und Heilung nach dem Neuen Testament, 1948; E. Güttgemanns, Der leidende Apostel und sein Herr, FRLANT 90, 1966; E. Haenchen, Der Weg Jesu, (1966) 1968²; J. Hempel, “‘Ich bin der Herr dein Arzt’ (Exod. 15:26)”, TLZ 82, 1957, 809–26; “Heilung als Symbol und Wirklichkeit im biblischen Schrifttum”, Nachrichten von der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen, Philosophisch-historische Klasse, 1958, 3, 237–314; J. Köberle, Sünde und Gnade im religiösen Leben des Volkes Israel bis auf Christum, 1905; A. Lods, Les Idées des Israélites sur la Maladie, ses Causes et ses Remèdes, BZAW 41, 1925; J. Preuss, Biblich-talmudische Medizin, 1911; M. Rauer, Die “Schwachen” in Korinth und Rom nach den Paulusbriefen, BSt 21, 2/3, 1923; J. Scharbert, Der Schmerz im Alten Testament, 1955; F. J. Schierse, “Hat Krankheit einen Sinn?”, Stimmen der Zeit 84, 1959, 241–55; E. Stiglmayr, N. H. Søm, D. Rössler, “Krankheit”, *RGG*³ IV 36 ff.; G. Uhlhorn, Die christliche Liebestätigkeit in der alten Kirche, 1882.

Weather

ἀστραπή	ἀστραπή (astrapē), lightning; ἄνεμος (anemos), wind; βρέχω (brechō), to rain; βροχή (brochē), rain; βροντή (brontē), thunder; εὐδία (eudia), fair weather, a good day; ἶρις (iris), rainbow; λαίλαψ (lailaps), a tempestuous wind; νεφέλη (nephelē), cloud; νότος (notos), south wind; ὄμβρος (ombros), rain storm; ομίχλη (homichlē), mist, fog; ὄψιμος (opsimos), late (rain); πρόϊμος (proïmos), early (rain); ριπίζω (rhripizō), blow; ὑετός (hyetos), heavy shower; χάλαζα (chalaza), hail; χιών (chiōn), snow.
---------	--

CL & OT In neither Greek nor Hebrew is there a word corresponding to our word “weather”, but the ancients used a variety of terms with which they discussed aspects of weather and clearly some of those aspects mattered to them very much. To the Greeks weather appeared as a secular phenomenon and we miss the thought so typical of the OT that God uses the weather to bring about his purposes. This is not to say that the Greek gods did not make use of meteorological phenomena. They did. They might use clouds for concealment when watching a battle here on earth or when making love on a mountain top, or they might use them as chariots. Sometimes meteorological phenomena are personified as with Iris (“rainbow”) the messenger goddess, or Nephelē (“cloud”), mother of the Centaurs.

But there is much more than this in the OT. There God makes constant use of the weather to set forward his purposes. An instructive example is Deut. 11:13 ff. where Yahweh says that if the people love him and serve him well he will give them rain, both the early and the latter rain to yield crops and pasturage, whereas if they worship other gods he will withhold rain, the land will give no fruit and they will perish. This link between the people's religious life and the weather is often found. Great deliverances like that under Deborah and Barak are due to storms (Jdg. 5:20 f.; cf. the hailstones of Jos. 10:11). The Psalmist sums it up with, "fire and hail, snow and frost, stormy wind fulfilling his command!" (Ps. 148:8). Meteorological phenomena such as clouds are associated with theophanies, as when the Lord said to Moses, "Lo, I am coming to you in a thick cloud" (Exod. 19:9; cf. Exod. 24:16; 34:5; Lev. 16:2; Ps. 97:2). God makes the clouds his chariot and the winds his messengers (Ps. 104:3 f.). Isaiah sees him as riding on a swift cloud (Isa. 19:1) and Joel speaks of the coming great "day of the LORD" as "a day of clouds and thick darkness" (Joel 2:2; → Present, art. hēmera). The lightning is his weapon (2 Sam. 22:15; Ps. 144:6) and the thunder his voice (Job 37:5; cf. Pss. 77:18; 104:7). He is often pictured as sending the wind or using it, as the east wind that brought up the locusts upon Egypt (Exod. 10:13) and the west wind that blew them away (Exod. 10:19), the wind that caused the Egyptians to be drowned (Exod. 15:10), and the wind that brought up the quails (Num. 11:31). He flew on "the wings of the wind" (Ps. 18:10), and used the east wind to break the ships of Tarshish (Ps. 48:7). Wind is the instrument of his wrath (Ezek. 13:13). Rain was vital to the life of the people of Palestine and when it came, God had sent it (Lev. 26:4; 1 Ki. 17:14; Ps. 68:9; Jer. 5:24). When the people sinned he sometimes withheld it (Amos 4:7; 1 Ki. 8:35). The OT is full of the thought that God is ceaselessly active and often he uses the weather to set forward his purpose.

NT 1. The word astrapē means "lightning", but it is also used of a beam of light. It has classical use, but Moulton and Milligan can cite it only in a magical papyrus. In the OT lightning is God's weapon, and it brilliantly lightens up the world (Ps. 77:18), or it may be connected with rain (Jer. 10:13). In the NT it denotes the suddenness and the visibility of the coming of the Son of man (Matt. 24:27; Lk. 17:24) and occurs in comparisons as when Satan's fall (Lk. 10:18) or an angel's countenance (Matt. 28:3) is likened to it. Once a lamp is said to give light with its astrapē (Lk. 11:36). There are four occurrences of the term in Revelation (4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18) and each time it is linked with other phenomena; in all four with voices and thunders, in two with an earthquake as well (8:5; 16:18), and once with an earthquake and hail (11:19). One of these expressions comes at the end of each of the three great series of judgments, the seals (8:5), the trumpets (11:19) and the bowls (16:18), so they have some connexion with the climax and with God as Judge (cf. the connexion with God in the OT). The God who is supreme over the forces of nature is the God who judges men. There are some resemblances to the accounts of the plagues in Egypt and this may be meant to bring out the truth that God has judged great nations before. He will surely do it again.

2. The normal use of the term anemos is for the winds that blow on the earth, whether this be in the Greek writings generally, in the OT or the NT. This is far and away the most common use of anemos in the NT as for the storms that beat against the houses built on rock and on sand (Matt. 7:25, 27 and parallels) or the great storm that shipwrecked Paul (Acts 27:4, 7, 14, 15). But we should notice that the Synop- tists make it clear that Jesus was supreme over the elements as they tell the story of the stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:26 f.; Mk. 4:37, 39; Lk. 8:23 ff.) and of Jesus com- ing to the disciples walking on the sea (Matt. 14:24 ff.; Mk. 6:47 ff.). That God is in control of the winds comes out also in the passage in Revelation in which angels are depicted as holding back the four winds so that they should not blow on the earth (Rev. 7:1). The word is used metaphorically of “every wind of doctrine” (Eph. 4:14) where the thought is that one who is not well established in the faith may well depart quickly from sound doctrine without great cause, like something light driven by the wind.

3. In all our sources rain (brochē; cf. the vb. brechō) is normally used for precipitation from the clouds, and metaphorically for what comes upon men in abun- dance. In the NT there are two metaphorical uses, when there is a reference to the “fire and brimstone” that rained upon Sodom (Lk. 17:29) and when Luke speaks of the sinful woman whose tears “rained” on Jesus’ feet (Lk. 7:38, 44). In all the other passages literal rain is meant. Jesus uses the fact that God makes rain fall on the just and the unjust alike to teach the universality of God’s love (Matt. 5:45). Rain is here symbolic of God’s gifts in general. Sometimes there is the thought that God is in control as when Elijah prayed that it might not rain and it did not (Jas. 5:17). With this we should class the power of the two witnesses to prevent rain (Rev. 11:6) for the meaning surely is that it is in this way that the purpose of God is worked out.

4. brontē, thunder, normally refers to the meteorological phenomenon in all our sources (though Moulton-Milligan do not find it in the papyri; derivatives are found, however). In the NT the term is used for a mighty voice on a number of occasions, as Jn. 12:29, where the voice from heaven is taken by some of the bystanders to be thunder and several times in Revelation (6:1; 10:3 f.; 19:6). In that book it is linked with “lightning” on four occasions (4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18). The one other use of the term is as an explanation of the name “Boanerges” applied to the sons of Zebedee (Mk. 3:17). The accuracy of the translation scarcely concerns us here: the meaning “thunder” is plain enough, though there is room for discussion about what “thun- derous men” might mean.

5. The term eudia appears to be derived from eu and Dios, genitive of Zeus, to give the meaning “a good sky” and so “fair weather”. Its only NT occurrence is as a v.l. in Matt. 16:2 where it refers to the ability of the Pharisees and the Sadducees to predict the coming of good weather as contrasted with their inability to discern what are much more important, “the signs of the times”. There is important theological meaning in the passage, but it does not come from eudia. That term signifies no more than “fair weather”, “a good day”.

6. The word iris is used for the rainbow from early times, and figuratively for a halo or for the “iris” of the eye or for a plant (the only one Moulton and Milligan find in the papyri). The Greeks personified the bow round heaven and earth as the messenger goddess Iris. In the OT the rainbow appears as a sign of God’s → cove- nant that he will no longer send floods to destroy the earth (Gen. 9:13). There seems no doubt that the rainbow is meant, but the Hebrew term is qešet, which is normally used for the bow of a warrior. In line with this LXX has toxon, not iris. In fact LXX has iris once only, as the name of a plant in Exod. 30:24. The use of the warrior’s bow set in the clouds may be to indicate that the bow is put away, so to speak, and there will be peace. Be that as it may, the context clearly indicates that the rainbow is to be taken as a sign of God's covenant, a sign that God is gracious to his people and will continue to be so. It is this that gives us the clue to its use in the NT. There it is found only in Rev. 4:3; 10:1. The first of these speaks of a rainbow (or halo) round God's throne "in appearance like an emerald" which seems to mean that it was green. The second refers to a strong angel robed in a cloud with a rainbow round his head. We should probably understand the rainbow in both places to symbolize the permanence of God's covenant and his will to be gracious to men. K. H. Rengstorf can say, "the witness of this sign is that one alone brings salvation, namely, God. The goodness and patience of God precede all the good works of man" (TDNT III 342).

7. The word lailaps indicates a tempestuous wind, whipping up so great a storm that the boat began to fill (Mk. 4:37), and the disciples were in danger (Lk. 8:23). The only other NT occurrence of the term is that in which certain false teachers are likened to mists driven by a lailaps (2 Pet. 2:17).

8. nephos means a cloud or cloud mass. As we noted earlier, clouds are linked with the divine in both the classical writers and the OT. It is thus significant that in the NT clouds are most often associated in some way with Jesus Christ. This is not invariable, for we have a reference to the weather (Lk. 12:54), to false teachers as like clouds without water (Jude 12), and to the cloud under which the fathers were baptized into Moses (1 Cor. 10:1 f.). But all three Synoptists tell of the cloud at the → Transfiguration which was plainly linked with the presence of God and from which the heavenly voice greeted Jesus as "my beloved Son" (Matt. 17:5; Mk. 9:7; Lk. 9:34 f.). At the ascension a cloud received Jesus out of the sight of the disciples (Acts 1:9). And when he comes again at the parousia there will be clouds (Matt. 24:30; 26:64; Mk. 13:26; 14:62; Lk. 21:27; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 1:7). There are further references to a reaper sitting on a cloud at the judgment (Rev. 14:14 ff.) which some identify with Christ, but probably wrongly.

9. notos means "the south wind" and from that "the south". The term does not appear to have a heavy freight of theological meaning in the NT. It is used of the south wind (Lk. 12:55; Acts 27:13; 28:13), of the south as a direction (Lk. 13:29; Rev. 21:13), and of a land to the south (Matt. 12:42; Lk. 11:31).

10. The term ombros signifies a "rain storm" and it is used in this way as a weather note in its only NT occurrence (Lk. 12:54).

11. The word homichlē means mist or fog, being used of something not as dense or heavy as a cloud (nephelē). It is used of the false teachers who are compared to mists driven around by a strong wind and who accordingly have nothing substantial about them (2 Pet. 2:17).

12. The term opsimos simply means "late", but it was commonly used in the LXX in conjunction with proimos to indicate the late (and early) rains. In Palestine the early rains are important to get the crops started and the late rains to mature the grain before the dry season starts when there will be no more rain. Both are important. The only NT occurrence of either is in Jas. 5:7 of these two rains, quite in the OT manner.

13. The word rhipizō conveys the notion of "blow" (of winds etc.) and its one NT occurrence likens the doubter to a wave blown about by winds (Jas. 1:6). The thought is that of instability.

14. hyetos denotes a heavy shower as against ombros (which is continuous rain) and psekas (drizzle) as Liddell and Scott point out. In the NT it is once used of rain as unpleasant (Acts 28:2), but otherwise in one way or another it is a good gift of God. Thus it is given by God from heaven (Acts 14:17), in response to prayer (Jas. 5:18). It is linked with the blessing of God (Heb. 6:7) and it is withheld in fulfilment of God's purpose for his witnesses (Rev. 11:6).

15. Hail (chalaza) is mentioned in the NT only in Revelation. There it follows the blowing of the first trumpet (Rev. 8:7), is one of the meteorological phenomena which followed the opening of the ark of God's covenant in heaven (11:19) and specially heavy hail is the last of the horrors that followed the pouring out of the seventh bowl (Rev. 16:21). The violence of a mighty hailstorm is a suitable picture of the power of God and underlines the truth that his judgments are irresistible.

16. Snow (chiōn) is used in the NT only as a way of indicating whiteness. It is the colour of the angel's robe (Matt. 28:3) and that of the hair of the glorious Lord (Rev. 1:14).

L. L. Morris

Wilderness, Desert, Lay Waste, Mountain, Plain

ἐρημος	ἐρημος (erēmos), abandoned, solitary, desolate, deserted; ἐρημος (erēmos), ἐρημος τόπος (erēmos topos), ἐρημία (erēmia), desolate place, desert, wilderness; ἐρημόω (erēmoō), lay waste, devastate, make desolate, depopulate; ἐρήμωσις (erēmosis), devastation, desolation, destruction.
--------	---

CL The etymology of erēmos, solitary, desolate (adj.), or a desert (noun) – a word used from Hom. onwards (e.g. Il. 10, 520) – has not been clarified with precision. Suggested roots are era, ra, ar, to separate. Cognates include Lat. rarus, scattered, rarely, and Old High German aram, poor, needy. erēmia, a desolate area, is attested in the Tragedians (e.g. Aesch., PV 2; Eur., Troades 26). erēmōsis, devastation, is first found in the LXX. The vb. erēmoō in non-biblical Gk. can also mean to set free, to hand over, to leave alone (e.g. Aesch., Supp. 516). “Desert” (erēmos and erēmia), for the ancient world, is not only land that is without water and vegetation and therefore uninhabited, but also an area that has been laid waste and depopulated, a settlement or pasture that has been abandoned, a derelict site. The ancient Graeco-Roman world awaited the revelation of the divinity in a lonely spot (e.g. Eur., Bacch. 874 ff.), and it feared the desert as the habitat of demons (e.g. Lucian, Vitarum Auctio 9).

OT 1. (a) The LXX uses erēmos to render 241 of the total 345 occurrences of Heb. midbār, desert (which also means a steppe, grassland, e.g. Gen. 37:22). erēmos also stands 32 times for derivatives of the Heb. root ḥārēb, be waste, desolate, 25 times for šamem, be appalled, devastated, desolate, and its derivatives, and 10 times for neḡēb, parched land. 120 of the uses of erēmos are found in the Pentateuch, since Exod. to Deut. (109 attestations) recount Israel's wandering in the wilderness. In the Pss. too (21 times), Isa. (45 times), Jer. (28 times) and Ezek. (38 times) the term erēmos plays an important rôle.

(b) erēmia, by contrast, appears in the LXX extremely rarely. In the writings of the canonical OT this form is encountered in only 3 places: in Isa. 60:12 and Ezek. 35:4 for Heb. ḥārōb and ḥorbâh; and in Ezek. 35:9 for Heb. šim^amâh.

(c) The vb. erēmoō, to devastate, appears in the LXX a total of 60 times for Heb. words, of which the most predominant are forms of the Heb. root ḥārēb (29 times) and šāmēm (17 times). The vb. is most frequently attested in Isa. (17 times), Ezek. (17 times) and Jer. (6 times).

(d) The noun erēmōsis, devastation, derived from erēmoō, is encountered in 18 passages in the OT canon of the LXX; of these 18, 6 are in Jer. and 8 in Dan. The LXX renderings are of Heb. ḥorbâh (6 times) and derivations of the Heb. root šāmēm (11 times).

2. Just as with mountains and → water, the desert in the OT has the double aspect of the holy: it is the place where Yahweh reveals himself (→ Revelation), but it is also the abode of → demons, who threaten human beings with impurity, sickness and death.

(a) The positive valuation which is given to the “holy place”, the desert, is represented by the numerous accounts which concern theophanies in the desert. In the desert an → angel strengthened → Elijah with nourishment, as he fled from Jezebel (1 Ki. 19:4–6). God’s appearance at Horeb (Exod. 3:1 ff.; 1 Ki. 19:11–18) and Sinai (Exod. 19) is not only a mountain- but a desert-theophany. Israel’s forty years of wandering in the wilderness (Exod. to Deut.; cf. Deut. 8:2) was counted as a time of particular closeness to Yahweh (Hos. 9:10; cf. 11:1; 12:10[12:9]; 13:4 f.); and above all in the Pss., Jer., Isa., and Ezek. The paraenetic references back to Yahweh’s faithfulness (and Israel’s unfaithfulness: Pss. 78[77]:17, 40; 95[94]:7–11; 106[105]:13–33; Ezek. 20; cf. Num. 13 f.) in the wilderness take up a comparatively large amount of space (e.g. Pss. 78[77]:15, 19, 40, 52; 95[94]:8; 106[105]:7–12; Isa. 48:21; 63:13; Jer. 2:6; Ezek. 20:10–26,36). The → hope of eschatological salvation is also linked with speculations involving the desert (Isa. 40:3; Jer. 31[38]:2; Ezek. 34:25; Hos. 2:16–25). Anyone who wished to live close to Yahweh at that moment chose a life in an artificial desert-situation like the Rechabites, whose origins lie in a prophetic revival movement of Elijah’s time. They lived in → tents instead of in houses (Jer. 35:7, 9 f.). At least once a year all Israelites lived as if in the desert, as their forefathers did, when they celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles in “tents” (Lev. 23:34–36, 42 f.; Deut. 16:13–17).

(b) At the same time the desert is a place of deadly danger, of separation from God, and of demonic powers (Deut. 8:15; cf. Num. 21:4–9; Isa. 30:6). The tension between cultivated land and desert becomes the contrast between the lands of Canaan and → Egypt; “Egypt” can be used specifically as a synonym for the (demonic) desert (Tob. 8:3; cf. Ezek. 20:36 and Matt. 2:15; though cf. also Hos. 11:1). Yahweh’s terrifying east wind, like all winds which are conceived in personal terms, comes out of the desert (Hos. 13:15). The scapegoat is chased into the desert to the demon Azazel (Lev. 16:10, 21 f.). Desert demons take possession of the ruins of Babylon (Isa. 13:21 f.) and Edom (Isa. 34:13–15). Contemporary desolation and misery are seen as devastation (e.g. Isa. 1:7; 54:3; Jer. 2:15; Ezek. 19:13), and future destruction of cities and land is threatened in the form of imminent devastation (e.g. Isa. 5:9; Jer. 4:26 f.; Ezek. 5:14). The drying up of the → water, in particular, characterizes the transformation into desert (Isa. 37:25; 44:27; 51:10; Jer. 51[28]:36; Ezek. 29:10; 30:12).

The words erēmoō, to devastate, and erēmōsis, devastation, are used almost exclusively of punitive destruction of houses, cities and lands (e.g. Isa. 6:11; 54:3; Jer. 4:7; 7:34; Ezek. 26:19).

The statements of Daniel concerning the erēmōsis of the sanctuary in Jerusalem (Dan. 8:13) show that such devastation is to be understood as the victory of demonic powers; the Gk. bdelygma [tēs] erēmōseōs or tōn erēmōseōn, → abomination of desolation(s) in Dan. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; 1 Macc. 1:54 is a trans. of the Heb. equivalent šiqqūs (m^e)šōmēm. This refers to the transference under Antiochus IV Epiphanes (167 B.C.) of the altar of Yahweh at Jerusalem to that of Zeus Olympios (ba'al šamem), who was equated with Yahweh. In Aram. there is a play on words – šmayn, heaven, and m^ešōmēm, desolating (E. Nestle, “Zu Daniel”, ZAW 4, 1884 248), implying that pagan gods are demons.

On the basis of its demonistic qualifications the desert, exactly like the “many waters” of Ezek. 26:19 f., can stand as a picture for the underworld (“eternal solitudes”, Ezek. 26:20 JB). One can think of Yahweh’s punishing demons which reside in the desert (Num. 21:4–9), when Yahweh finally threatens to settle accounts with his people in the desert once and for all (Ezek. 20:35). It is of course true that Israel will finally find salvation in the desert (cf. Ezek. 34:25; Hos. 2:16; see above, 2 (a)); but this can only mean that the desert will be for ever overcome. It will become arable land, water will flow in it, roads will be opened, desolated towns re-built (Isa. 32:15 f.; 35:15 f.; especially the later chapters of Isa., e.g. 41:18; 43:19 f.; 58:12; 61:4; 62:4; Jer. 33[40]:10–12; Ezek. 36:10, 33 ff.; 38:8, 12; Dan. 9:27; cf. Hos. 14:5–10). In this context belongs a passage like Isa. 40:3 (→ Walk, art. hodos or 1 (a)). Where roads are constructed through the desert (Isa. 43:19), there Yahweh’s lordship has dawned. If God also pleases to reveal his glory in the wilderness, it is still, in the last resort, a place which is hostile to God, an evil, demonic locality. God’s victory over his enemies and the enemies of his people is thus also a victory over the desert.

(c) When post-biblical Judaism works within the compass of the Hoseanic desert-typology, it awaits the redemption of Israel from the desert (rabbinic attestations in SB I 85–88). That is why messianic disturbances originate in the desert (Josephus, War 2, 258–63). The Essenes understood their secession into the wilderness of Qumran eschatologically, i.e. in the sense of preparing the way (cf. 1QS 8, 12 ff.; 9:19 f.), and the same applied to John the Baptist (Josephus, Ant. 18, 116–119). Similarly, according to Mart. Isa. 2:8–11, the prophets Isaiah, Micah and others migrated to a “mountain in desolate surroundings”. In the messianic speculation of Judaism concerning the desert, particular significance is attached to the passages Hos. 2:16; 12:10, Job 30:4 and Isa. 40:3, the latter being encountered in Qumran as well as in John the Baptist. After the destruction of the temple the Jews prayed for an untroubled departure with wife and children “into the desert” (Josephus, War 6, 351), doubtless in order to be especially close to God there.

But demons, too, live in the desert. Behemoth (cf. Job 40:15–24) is, according to Eth. Enoch 60:8, a desert demon. Malevolent spirits which are being punished are sent into the desert by way of its being a compulsory place of residence (Tob. 8:3; Eth. Enoch 10:4; cf. Matt. 12:43 par. Lk. 11:24).

The fact that fear of desert demons and the high theologico-eschatological regard for the desert are not mutually exclusive is shown both by the Qumran sect, with its continual anti-demonic ablutions (→ Water; → Baptism, art. louō), and by the secession of the prophets of Mart. Isa. 2:8 ff., who by prayer and fasting, struggle for (anti-demonic) purity. In the desert the ascetic fights with evil spirits in order to be deemed worthy of an appearance of the Godhead.

NT 1. In the NT the word group erēm- is represented 46 times (counting Synoptic par. instances as only one attestation each). Of these, 37 are of erēmos, desert, 3 of erēmia, desert, 4 of erēmoō (only in the pass. form erēmousthai, to be devastated), and 2 for erēmōsis, desolation. By far the largest number of occurrences (20) is offered by the Synoptics (including erēmos 16 times and erēmia once, for desert), followed by Acts (9 times) and Rev. (3 times each for noun and vb.). Three attestations each of the word-group are found in Paul and Heb.; erēmos is found 5 times in Jn.'s Gospel.

2. (a) The NT estimation of the desert (chiefly erēmos or erēmos topos; erēmia only in Matt. 15:33 par. Mk. 8:4; 2 Cor. 11:26; Heb. 11:38) is none other than that of the OT and Judaism. As ever, Israel's forty years of wandering in the desert is counted as a momentous fact of God's historical activity (Jn. 3:14; 6:31, 49; Acts 7:30 ff.; 13:18; 1 Cor. 10:5; Heb. 3:8, 17), and the idea that eschatological movements begin in the desert is still alive (Matt. 24:26; Acts 21:38). The apocalyptic flight of the woman into the desert (Rev. 12:6, 14) is to be explained from the high regard in which Israel's time in the wilderness was held, and simultaneously attests the expectation that the messiah will come from the desert (cf. Matt. 2:15; Hos. 11:1; → Egypt for the ambivalent rôle of Egypt in Scripture). The youthful John the Baptist is hidden in the desert (Lk. 1:80), and he then develops his area of effective work in the desert (Matt. 3:1 par. Mk. 1:4, Lk. 3:2; but cf. Isa. 40:3; Matt. 11:7 par. Lk. 7:24). As in Judaism prophets belong in desert places and on mountains, as was proper for ascetics (Mart. Isa. 2:8–11), so Heb. 11:38 localizes the OT prophets and ascetics in deserts, mountains and caves. Linking up with the desert-wanderers and desert-dwellers of the OT the new Israel is able to understand itself, by way of antitype, as the wandering people of God (Heb. 3 f.; 11:8–10; 12:18–24; cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–13; cf. E. Käsemann, Das wandernde Gottesvolk. Eine Untersuchung zum Hebräerbrief, 1957²).

(b) In so far as Jesus' significance is described as prophetic and messianic, the desert also has its place. Jesus comes forth in analogy to → Moses, in the prophetic interpretation of this leader-figure of Israel's time in the wilderness (Acts 3:22 f.; 7:37; though cf. Deut. 18:15), but of course, as an antitype, surpassing him (cf. Heb. 3:1–6). The Synoptic stories of Jesus' childhood have his messianic honour proclaimed to the men of the steppes and solitude, the "shepherds in the field" (Lk. 2:8–14), and, by means of the flight to Egypt (Matt. 2:13–15, 19–21), render possible the arrival of the messiah from the Egyptian desert (the messianic interpretation of Hos. 11:1 by Matt. 2:15; in Tob. 8:3 Egypt signifies the desert). It is in the desert that Jesus defeats the Satanic temptation (Matt. 4:1–11 par. Mk. 1:12 f., Lk. 4:1–13; → Tempt), and it is there that Jesus miraculously (cf. 2 Ki. 4:42–44 with Elisha) feeds his followers (Matt. 14:13 par. Mk. 6:32; in addition Lk. 9:12, and Matt. 15:33 par. Mk. 8:4). Several times Jesus lingers in the desert to pray and fast there (apart from Matt. 4:1 f. par. Lk. 4:1 f.; cf. Mk. 1:35, 45 par. Lk. 4:42; 5:16) – and not only in order to come particularly close to God, but also in order to break the power of the demons (Mk. 1:12 f. par.). The desert is still a favourite place for visions (Rev. 17:3; cf. Acts 8:26). Perhaps it was for this reason that Paul sought out the Arabian desert (Gal. 1:17), but perhaps also simply in order to escape from the clutches of his opponents (cf. 1 Ki. 19:3 ff. and Rev. 12:6).

3. The desert is qualified negatively where the sin and failure of the wilderness-generation (see above OT, 2) is spoken of (Acts 7:41–43; 1 Cor. 10:5; Heb. 3:8, 17). Demonic dangers threaten in the desert (2 Cor. 11:26; cf. Lk. 15:4), for that is where demons (Matt. 12:43 par. Lk. 11:24, Mk. 1:12 f.) and madmen (Lk. 8:29) live. The aetiological demon-saga seizes on desolate localities (Acts 1:18–20; but cf. Ps. 69:26 [Matt. 27:3–10 otherwise]; cf. Papias, Frag. 3).

As in the OT devastation (erēmoō, to lay waste, pass. erēmousthai, to be devastated) of houses, cities and land is reckoned to be conquest by demonic powers carrying out God's → judgment of → punishment (Matt. 12:25 par. Lk. 11:17; cf. Matt. 23:38 par. Lk. 13:35 and Acts 1:20). The wanton, i.e. idolatrous, city of → Babylon (= Rome) will be devastated (Rev. 17:16; 18:17, 19) by punishing demons (Rev. 18:2; cf. 17:16): again there are OT models in the background (cf. OT 2 (b)).

Abhorrence of pagan divinities, equated with demons (1 Cor. 10:20; Rev. 9:20; cf. 2:13), also gave form to the expression → “abomination of desolation” (bdelygma tēs erēmoseōs, Matt. 24:15 par. Mk. 13:14). The literary original (see above, OT 2 (b)) is taken by Matt. and Mk. to be a prediction of the eschatological handing-over of → Jerusalem to the demons of the pagans; the par. passage Lk. 21:20 has abandoned the OT reference and thinks of military devastation (erēmōsis) of the city of Jerusalem. The fulfilment of Jesus' prediction against Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37 f. par. Lk. 13:34 f.; cf. Jer. 9:10 f.) will thus compare the disobedient city of God with the whore of Babylon (Rome; cf. Rev. 17:16–18; 18:2–24).

Apart from those passages in which reference is made to the saving period of Israel's wandering in the wilderness, the desert in the NT is more of a demonic place. Even where Jesus reveals his glory in the desert, it is in his victory over demonic powers that this takes place. Only where God's judgment has fallen is there victory over the desert and its maleficent spirits.

O. Böcher

The topographical descriptions in the New Testament provide both historical realism and theological symbolism. Perhaps none is more striking in both respects than that which refers to the presence or absence of mountains. Further, the writers of the Synoptic Gospels stand in contrast to each other in several notable places with respect to their mention or omission of reference to a mountain and possibly also, in a measure, with respect to their concepts of symbolic imagery.

ὄρεινος

ὄρεινος (oreinos), hilly, mountainous.

oreinos is often used substantivally without the accompanying chōra, countryside. It signifies territory with rugged features in contrast to level ground (e.g., Jos. 9:1 LXX). Its only New Testament use is in Luke's birth narratives. Twice (Lk. 1:39, 65) it describes the area where John the Baptist was born. This hill country of Judea lies to the west and north of the Dead Sea and includes Jerusalem and Bethlehem. It was to here that Mary travelled to visit Elizabeth, and, after John's birth, word of what God was doing spread throughout that territory.

W. L. Liefeld

τόπος πεδινός

τόπος πεδινός (topos pedinos), level place.

This expression is used in contrast to "mountain" (Jer. 17:26 LXX), to "hill country" (see the above paragraph) and to the rocky terrain which characterized the Judean desert (Deut. 4:43 LXX). Its one occurrence in the New Testament, Lk. 6:17, has properly received much attention. If the Beatitudes of Lk. 6 were spoken on the same occasion as those of Matt. 5, as is generally supposed, one must take note of the fact that while Matthew only says that Jesus went up "on a mountainside" (NIV), Luke indicates that he came down to a level place from a higher location where he had spent the night in prayer (Lk. 6:12, 17). It has often been supposed that the two accounts are in contradiction, though the Lucan account allows for the Beatitudes (and the ensuing Sermon on the Mount) to have been given at a level part of the mountainous territory described by Matthew. Recently, however, the difference between Matthew and Luke has been taken by many to be a deliberate theological construction. (See the discussion below under the term oros.) It is important to note that theological symbolism need not rule out geographical accuracy, although that assumption is often made, for one must realize that not only can a symbolic meaning be attached to an actual place or event, but also the place may have been deliberately chosen, by Jesus in this instance, for its potential symbolic value.

W. L. Liefeld

ὄρος, ὑψηλός

ὄρος (oros), mountain, mountain chain or region; ὑψηλός (hypsēlos), high.

CL & OT 1. The Mesopotamians were conscious of the height and power of the mountains and the Greeks viewed Olympus as the supreme home of the gods (cf. W. Foerster, oros, TDNT V 475–79). In the Ras Shamra texts, Zaphon, a hill north of Ras Shamra, is the abode of Baal.

2. In the LXX oros generally translates har. On the significance of Mount Sinai → Sina. Mountains and ravines could be an obstacle to communication (2 Ki. 19:23; Isa. 37:24). Growth of grass on them for pasture is a sign of God's love (Ps. 147:8). Most of the hills in Palestine do not rise above 3000 ft., and so could be used for beacons. The use of the beacon as a signal of invasion is used in an oracle of judgment (Isa. 13:2; cf. 30:17). The view which Moses had from the top of Pisgah was a revelation of all that God would give Israel (Deut. 34:1–4), though Moses was not allowed to set foot in the promised land. Prophecy and parable could be delivered from mountains (Jdg. 9:7) and people addressed from them (2 Sam. 2:25 f.; 2 Chr. 13:4). Mountains could be places of refuge (Jdg. 6:2; Ps. 11[10]:1).

3. Mountains are frequently associated with Yahweh's presence. Isaac was to be offered on a mountain (Gen. 22:2). During the battle with the Amalekites Moses prayed on top of a hill (Exod. 17:9 f.). Elijah climbed to the top of Mount Carmel to pray (1 Ki. 18:42). Blessing and curse were invoked from Mount Ebal and Mount

Gerizim (Deut. 11:29; 27:12 f.; Jos. 8:33). The circumcision of the Israelites took place on Haaraloth (Jos. 5:3). The ark was set on a hill (1 Sam. 7:1; 2 Sam. 6:3), and sacrifice was offered on high places, bāmôṭ (1 Sam. 9:12 ff.; 19:25; 1 Ki. 3:4; 1 Chr. 16:39; 21:29; 2 Chr. 1:3, 13). “The prophetic protest against the cult in high-places, which led to cultic centralization in Jerusalem (Deut. 12:2–9), was not directed against the siting of cultic centres on mountains but against Canaanite ideas and acts associated with the centres” (W. Foerster, TDNT V 481 f.). David had captured the Jebusite fortress at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:6–10) which subsequently became the site of the → temple erected by Solomon. (For Zion → Jerusalem.)

4. Especially in the Pss. and the prophetic writings mountains are expressive of Yahweh’s power. He made them and was before them, and has power to destroy them even though they are rooted in the earth (Job 28:9; cf. Deut. 32:22; Jdg. 5:5; 1 Ki. 19:12; Job 9:5; Pss. 65[64]:6; 83[82]:14; 90[89]:2; 95[94]:4; 104[103]:32; Isa. 40:4, 12; 41:15; 63:19 f.; Jer. 4:24; 51:25; Ezek. 38:20; Mic. 1:4; Nah. 1:5; Hab. 3:6).

5. Mountains also figure in eschatological expectation. They will drip with wine as a symbol of plenty (Amos 9:12; Joel 3:18). The levelling of hills and valleys is a symbol of God’s overruling in return from exile (Isa. 40:4; 45:2). The Mount of Olives, overlooking the temple, will be split (Zech. 14:4). Mount Zion will be higher than other hills and the Gentile nations will stream to it (Isa. 2:2–4; Mic. 4:1–3). Here Zion is seen as the focal point of meeting with Yahweh. The Gentiles will be included with Israel as they seek the ways of Yahweh, and universal peace shall reign.

C. Brown

NT 1. The adjective “high” modifies the word “mountain” four times in the New Testament, once to describe the mount of → temptation (Matt. 4:8), twice in reference to the mount of → transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2) and once to describe a vantage point to which, in a vision, the seer John was taken (Rev. 21:10). Used alone, hypsēlos twice describes the sphere of Christ in his present exaltation in Hebrews: absolutely, in 1:3 (“in heaven”, NIV) and as a comparative, in the phrase “above the heavens” (7:26, NIV). In Rev. 21:12 it describes the high walls of the new Jerusalem. Several times it has a metaphorical use (Lk. 16:15; Acts 13:17; Rom. 11:20; 12:16).

2. The use of the term “mountain” itself ranges from the simple geographical, including several references to the Mount of Olives, to passages of great theological significance. Jesus apparently often sought the isolation of rugged elevated locations in order to pray or to be alone with his disciples (Lk. 6:12; Matt. 14:23; Mk. 3:13; 6:46, paralleled in Matt. 14:23, where the words “by himself” are added). In Lk. 9:37 it is observed that, on leaving the mount of transfiguration, Jesus is confronted by crowds, a comment which emphasizes his previous isolation which, according to Lk. 9:28, was for the purpose of prayer. The identification of the mount of transfiguration is unknown. Mt. Tabor was occupied by a fortress in Jesus’ day and Mt. Hermon seems too far away both for the great crowd at its base, which included some scribes (Mk. 9:14), and for the reference to the return trip being “through Galilee” (Mk. 9:30). The highest mountain in Galilee (and in the boundaries of modern Israel) is Mt. Meron (3,926 feet), which fits the description of Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2. The definite article “the” in Lk. 9:28 represents too common a use for a specific mountain or a mountain range to suppose that it hints at a well-known location.

3. More important is the question of whether this or other mountains mentioned in the Gospels have a distinctively theological symbolism. Certainly the associations with Mount Sinai are strong in the transfiguration narrative: the appearance of Moses, the cloud, reference to tabernacles and mention of Jesus’ approaching death (Lk. 9:31, lit. “exodus”) among others. Other associations can be established with an eschatological motif, but these would not invalidate the clear allusions to Sinai. Likewise, the mountain on which Jesus gave his Sermon with its authoritative comments on the law (Matt. 5–7) may represent a new Sinai (→ Sina), though this association rests on other assumptions regarding the intention of Matthew to establish an exodus motif in his narrative, with some uncertainties in this regard preventing a dogmatic conclusion (cf. W. D. Davies, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount, 1964, 99).

The question of a distinctive viewpoint on Matthew’s part enters at this point. Luke, as noted above, does not mention a mountain in his introduction to the sermon material (Lk. 6:16). He also omits reference to the Mount of Olives when introducing the apocalyptic discourse (compare Lk. 21:5–7 with Matt. 24:1–3 and Mk. 13:1–4). The account of Jesus’ final words to his disciples at “the mountain where Jesus had told them to go” (Matt. 28:16) is not found in Luke. Do Matthew and Mark present a symbolism of the mountain as a place of revelation? It is interesting to note also that the sequence of Jesus’ temptations in Matt. 4:1–11 concludes with the vision from the “very high mountain”, with Jesus being alone and receiving the ministry of angels. Luke concludes with the temptation in Jerusalem (Lk. 4:9–12), a focus which may have significance in connexion with Luke’s special concern elsewhere for Jerusalem.

4. Is it significant that Luke mentions swine on a hillside, as does Mark (Lk. 8:32; Mk. 5:11), while Matthew does not locate these unclean animals there, only saying that the pigs were “some distance from them” (Matt. 8:30), almost as though he were reluctant to think of them in (holy?) mountainous territory? In such cases, one must always allow for merely stylistic or even more prosaic reasons for omissions and emphases.

5. Luke’s reference, through his quotation of Isaiah 40:3–5, to the levelling of mountains and hills at the coming of the Lord (Lk. 3:4–6) and his omission of the Mount of Olives in Lk. 21:5–7 have raised the question as to whether he envisions an eschatological landscape without mountains. It seems more reasonable to assume that he shares the biblical view of God’s sovereignty over even the majestic mountains. As the Lord brings “salvation” (Lk. 3:6, emphasizing a major theme in Luke’s theology), everything must make way for his coming. Flight to the mountains in time of eschatological distress (Matt. 24:16; Mk. 13:14; Lk. 21:21) is a normal reference to hills and their caves as places of refuge. The metaphorical reference to moving even towering mountains by faith in prayer is also a figure which would be understood by Jesus’ contemporaries who, more than we, were dwarfed and awed by their majesty and seeming permanence. This underscores the strong imagery of mountains in the Bible, where geography and symbolism seem to be blended together.

W. L. Liefeld

6. The saying about the power of faith to remove a mountain (Matt. 17:20) may well have as its background a proverbial expression for overcoming difficulties (cf. Isa. 40:4; 49:11; 54:10), but in context “this mountain” may signify the mount of the transfiguration, to which all three Synoptic evangelists refer (Matt. 17:1 par. Mk. 9:2, Lk. 9:28; Matt. 17:9 par. Mk. 9:9, Lk. 9:37). The saying is, however, omitted by Mk. and the mountain is replaced by “this sycamine tree” in Lk. 17:6. The mountain is traditionally Mount Tabor, but some scholars prefer Hermon or Meron. In view of the associations with the transfiguration, the power ascribed to faith to remove “this mountain” is all the more striking. Mk., however, gives the saying in connexion with the cursing of the fig tree and the power of prayer (Mk. 11:20–26; → Fruit, art. sykē; → Prayer, art. proseuchomai NT 2). The context in Mk. suggests that “this mountain” is the Mount of Olives; W. Manson saw an allusion here to Zech. 14:4 (Jesus the Messiah, 1943, 29f.). H. Anderson conjectures that the Marcan form of the saying might at first seem to imply that lively faith is a human accomplishment: “make the effort of faith and obstacles will be overcome” (The Gospel of Mark, New Century Bible, 1976, 268). But such an inference, he points out, is avoided by that Matthean version which, he thinks, may be more original, though Mk. says essentially the same thing. For there faith is compared with the minute mustard seed. The call is not to a greater or stronger faith but to “a faith to which everything has been promised just because it expects everything from God and nothing from itself” (E. Schweizer, Jesus, 1971, 234). In Mk. the fig tree withers because of the power and judgment of God. Faith is the response of man to God who invites intercessory prayer and mutual forgiveness among men (which in context removes sins which are comparable with removing mountains).

7. The Sermon on the Mount contains the statement: “A city set on a hill cannot be hid” (Matt. 5:14b). It immediately follows the saying: “You are the light of the world.” It is followed by the saying about putting a lamp on a lampstand and the exhortation: “Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 5:16). The saying about → salt (Matt. 5:13) focuses on the usefulness of salt. The sayings about light and the city focus on the raison d’être of the disciples. Because of their calling they cannot remain obscure; the character of their lives should be such that men will have cause to glorify God. There is a hint of Isa. 2:2, 5: “It shall come to pass in the latter days that the mountain of the house of the LORD shall be established as the highest of the mountains, and shall be raised above the hills; and all the nations shall flow to it. . . . O house of Jacob, come, let us walk in the light of the LORD” (cf. Mic. 4:1–3). The eschatological promise is to be fulfilled in the body of disciples. Perhaps too we are to see here the fulfilment of the promise to Abraham, that in him all the nations of the earth would be blessed (or bless themselves) (Gen. 12:3; 18:8; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14; cf. Acts 3:25; Gal. 3:8). As the light is manifested in the community of disciples as the people of God, so the nations will come to them as the new Jerusalem to receive blessing and glorify God.

The saying in P. Oxy. appears to be a mistaken gloss on this text: “A city which is erected on the top of a high mountain and firmly established can neither fall nor remain hidden” (Henn. Schn., I, 109 f.; cf. D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 116). For it places emphasis on the invincibility of the church, whereas the saying in Matt. emphasizes the fulfilment of prophecy and the glorification of God.

8. Rev. 8:8 is probably an allusion to the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79, seen as a fulfilment of Jer. 51:25 (cf. also the vision of the angel casting the great millstone [mylinon megan] into the sea, as a symbol of the overthrow of Babylon, Rev. 18:21; → Rock). Rev. 17:9 takes up into the symbolism of world-powers the seven hills on which Rome was founded. Rev. 6:14 and 16:20 go beyond the OT expectation of the levelling of the mountains; they will disappear, heralding a new heaven and earth (cf. Rev. 20:11; 21:1).
C. Brown

Σινά

Σινά (Sina), Sinai.

OT The indeclinable proper name Sina is derived from the Heb. sînay. As such it occurs in Exod. 16:1; Deut. 33:2; Jdg. 5:5; Pss. 68:8; 69:9; Sir. 48:7. Other expressions for Mount Sinai are: to oros to Sina (Exod. 19:11, 20, 23; 24:16); (to) oros Sina (Exod. 19:16; Lev. 7:38; 25:1; 26:46; Num. 3:1; 2 Esd. 19:13; Sib. 3, 256). Sinai is the name of the sacred mountain used in passages attributed to J and P, before which Israel encamped when Yahweh made Israel his → covenant people (Exod. 19–24). Moses ascended the mountain in order to speak with God (Exod. 19:3, 10; 24:9), and descended in order to communicate God's word to the people (Exod. 19:14). After the conclusion of the covenant Moses ascended another forty days and nights (Exod. 24:18; cf. ch. 32). In revealing his presence to the people, Yahweh did so with thunders and thick cloud, with trumpet blast to warn the people not to touch the mountain (Exod. 19:16–24). This is the setting of the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20; cf. Deut. 5). While Moses was on the mountain the people induced Aaron to make the golden calf (Exod. 32). Yahweh's glory was revealed to Moses in a cleft of a rock (Exod. 33:17–23). A second set of tablets was made on the mountain to replace those broken on the foot of the mountain, when Moses saw the golden calf (Exod. 34:1 ff.; cf. 32:19).

In passages ascribed to the Elohist stratum and in Deuteronomic literature the sacred mountain is called Mount Horeb (Heb. ḥôrêb; LXX Chôrêb). No distinction between the two mountains can be discerned in the geographical descriptions, and the two names are synonyms (cf. Exod. 3:1; 18:5; Deut. 1; 4:10; 5:2). Deut. 1:2 says that it was eleven days' journey from Horeb by way of Mount Seir to Kadesh-barnea. Num. 33:16–36 gives a detailed list of stations between the mountain and Kadesh, which may have been preserved for the sake of pilgrims. Elijah found refuge in Horeb in his flight from Jezebel after his contest with the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Ki. 19:1–18). Here he found restoration, a fresh revelation from Yahweh and his final commission.

The exact site of Mount Sinai has been much debated. Traditionally it is located at Jebel Musa among the high mountains at the apex of the Sinai peninsula. Alternative sites include Ras es-Safsaf, and the region of north-west Arabia, near the biblical land of Midian. This has been favoured because of the volcanic activity in the area which fits the descriptions of Exod. 19, and because of Moses' association with the Midianites (Exod. 3:1; 18:1). A third site is one of the mountains in the region of Kadesh-barnea (cf. Deut. 33:2; Jdg. 5:4 f.; Num. 20:16). (For summary of the arguments see G. E. Wright, IDB IV 376 ff.)

NT Sinai is mentioned twice each in Acts and Gal., and is alluded to in Heb. 12.

1. The speech of Stephen prior to his martyrdom gives a résumé of Israel's history which E. Lohse thinks may well have been taken over from Jewish tradition with only slight adaptation (TDNT VII 285). In both passages an → angel is mentioned as speaking to Moses, first at the burning bush in the wilderness of Mount Sinai (Acts 7:30; cf. Exod. 3:1 f.), and then in the giving of "living oracles" (Acts 7:38; cf. Exod. 19; Deut. 32:47). Sinai thus plays a prominent part in the salvation history of Israel. The implication which Stephen draws from his survey is that the present Jewish leaders have failed to understand the workings of God.

2. In Gal. 4:21–31 Paul identifies the present stubborn and disobedient Israel with Hagar (Gen. 16:15; 21:2, 9) and Mount Sinai (Gal. 4:24 f.) as symbols of standing outside the covenant promises and being in bondage to the law, respectively. Together they are typified by the present Jerusalem which is in bondage, as contrasted with "the Jerusalem above" which is "free" and our "mother" (v. 26). (For discussion → Parable, art. parabolē, NT 9.)

3. In Heb. 12:18–29 Mount Sinai (though it is not mentioned as such by name) is contrasted with Mount Sion, representing the old and new covenants. The description of the former, drawn from the account of Exod. 19 and 20, stresses the holiness and inaccessibility of the mount for ordinary people, whereas the latter stresses that believers have come to the great host of the assembly of "the first-born who are enrolled in heaven" (v. 22), "and to Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant, and to the sprinkled blood that speaks more graciously than the blood of Abel" (v. 24, the latter crying out for vengeance, Gen. 4:10). There is, therefore, all the more reason not to "refuse him who is speaking" (v. 25). "Therefore let us be grateful for receiving a kingdom that cannot be shaken, and thus let us offer to God acceptable worship, with reverence and awe; for our God is a consuming fire" (vv. 28 f.). C. Brown → Elijah, → Height, → Jerusalem, Zion, → Moses, → Tempt, → Walk

(a). M. Avi-Yonah, "Mount Carmel and the God of Baalbek", Israel Exploration Journal 2, 1952, 118–24; D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible, 1974²; G. W. Van Beek, "Carmel, Mount", IDB I 538; G. W. Coats, "The Wilderness Itinerary", CBQ 34, 1972, 135–52; G. I. Davies, "The Wilderness Itineraries: A Comparative Study", TB 25, 1974, 46–81; W. Foerster, oros, TDNT V 475–87; R. W. Funk, "The Wilderness", JBL 78, 1959, 205 ff.; G. Kittel, erēmos etc., TDNT II 657–60; W. Kornfeld, "Mountain", EBT II 297 f.; E. Lohse, Sina, TDNT VII 282–87; J. Mánek, "On the Mount – On the Plain (Mt. v.1.–Lk. vi. 17)", NovT 9, 1967, 124–31; V. U. Mauser, Christ in the Wilderness: The Wilderness Theme in the Second Gospel and its Biblical Tradition, SBT 39, 1963; E. W. Nicholson, Exodus and Sinai in History and Tradition, 1973; G. von Rad, "City on a Hill", in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1966, 232–242; H. Riesenfeld, "The Messianic Character of the Temptation in the Wilderness", in The Gospel Tradition, 1970, 75–94; G. E. Wright, "Sinai, Mount", IDB IV 376 ff.

(b). F. von Andrian, Der Höhenkultus asiatischer und europäischer Völker, 1891; H. Bardtke, "Wüste und Oase in den Hodajoth von Qumran", in Gott und die Götter, Festschrift E. Fascher, 1958, 44 ff.; R. Beer, Heilige Höhen der alten Griechen und Römer, 1891; O. Böcher, Dämonenfurcht und Dämonenabwehr. Ein Beitrag zur Vorgeschichte der christlichen Taufe, BWANT 90, 1970, 65 ff., 311 ff.; P. Bonnard, "La Signification du Désert selon le Nouveau Testament", in Hommage et Reconnaissance . . . à Karl Barth, 1946, 11 ff.; O. Eissfeldt, Baal Zaphon, Zeus Casios und der Durchzug der Israeliten durchs Meer, 1932; and Der Gott Karmel, 1953; R. Frieling, Der heilige Berg, 1930; V. Fritz, Israel in der Wüste. Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung der Wüstenüberlieferung des Jahwisten, Marburger theologische Studien 7, 1970; K. Gallig, "Der Gott Karmel und die Achtung der fremden Götter", in Geschichte und Altes Testament, Festschrift A. Alt, 1953, 105–25; M. Hengel, Die Zeloten. Untersuchung zur jüdischen Freiheitsbewegung in der Zeit von Herodes I. bis 70 nach Christi, 1971, 255 f.; S. Herrmann and B. Reicke, "Wüste", BHHW III 2193 f.; J. Jeremias, Der Gottesberg, 1919; H. H. Mallau, Die theologische Bedeutung der Wüste im Alten Testament, (Dissertation) 1963; F. Mussner, "Hagar, Sinai, Jerusalem – Zum Text von Gal. 4, 25a", ThQ 135, 1955, 56–60; S. Riva, "Il Sinai egizio e cristiano", Ricerche Religiose 9, 1933, 12–31; M. Rohrer, Berglieder der Völker, 1928; W. Schmauch, "In der Wüste", in In Memoriam E. Lohmeyer, 1951, 213 ff.; and Orte der Offenbarung und der Offenbarungsort im Neuen Testament, 1956, 27 ff., 51 ff.; P. A. van Stempvoort, De Allegorie in Gal. 4, 21–31 als hermeneutisch Problem, 1953; G. Westphal, Jahves Wohnstätten nach den Anschauungen der alten Hebräer, BZAW 15, 1908, 98–118; W. Wiebe, Die Wüstenzeit als Typos, 1943.

Will, Purpose

Human will or volition can be represented, on the one hand, as a mental act, directed towards a free choice. But, on the other hand, it can be motivated by desire pressing in from the unconscious. Both kinds of volition are rendered by the word-groups associated with boulomai and thelō. A clear terminological distinction between boulomai (originally volition as a mental act) and thelō (originally instinctive desire) is no longer possible after the very early overlap of the areas covered by the words and is excluded at the time of the NT by their largely synonymous usage.

βούλομαι	βούλομαι (boulomai), to will, wish, want, desire; βουλή (boulē), will, resolve, purpose; βούλημα (boulēma), will, intention, purpose.
-----------------	---

CL 1. boulomai, attested from Homer onwards, meant originally to prefer, to favour (Il. 1, 117), then to want, to have in view (Il. 1, 79), to elect, to be determined to (Eur., Iph. Taur. 61), to decide (Demetrius 2, 20; 19, 23). It is suggested that boulomai was originally more the willing which arises out of conscious consideration free from emotion, an endeavour, by contrast with the more emotionally stressed willing rendered by ethelō. Thus, Il. 1, 112: I did not wish (ouk ethelon) to accept any substitute, for I intend (boulomai) to have her at home with me; and Plato, Gorg. 522c: if you want (ei de boulei) . . . I am ready (ethelō). But boulomai and ethelō were soon used synonymously. Whereas boulomai still occurs relatively rarely in Homer, it is prominent from Hdt. onwards (especially in prose), and then again largely suppressed by ethelō in Hellenistic Gk.

2. The noun boulē, similarly Hom. onwards, derived from boulomai, denotes an intention, a deliberation. It also stands for the result of a deliberation in the sense of a decision of the will, a resolution, a counsel or an edict. So already in Homer (Il. 2, 53) an assembly of men is called a boulē, when it became an institutional body (e.g. the Council of the Five Hundred in Athens, Hdt. 5, 72; 9, 5).

A later derivation is boulēma (Aristotle onwards), describing the will more as a purpose, an intention, a tendency (Plato, Leg. 6, 769d; Isoc., 3, 15, Aristotle Eth. Nic. 2, 1).

OT 1. boulomai, like → thelō, is found over 100 times in the LXX. This almost equal distribution “is not merely due to the fact that the LXX belongs to the age when the distinctions were being obliterated by the struggle between the terms. It also owes something to the fact that the Canon includes both historical and poetical sections, so that the words preferred by both the prose authors (. . . Polyb., Diod. S.) and the poets are accepted” (G. Schrenk, TDNT I 630). boulomai is thus encountered more frequently in Exod., 1 Sam. and Job. It stands in particular for Heb. hāpēs (26 times), to like, to want (Isa. 1:11; Job 21:14), to find pleasure in (e.g. 2 Sam. 24:3; Isa. 65:12; 66:4; Jer. 6:10), to desire (Job 13:3; Isa. 53:10); ’ābāh (17 times), to want, to be willing (e.g. Gen. 24:5; Exod. 10:27; 1 Sam. 15:9; 22:17; 31:4), and – with the negative – for mā’ēn (13 times), be unwilling, refuse (e.g. Exod. 4:23; 9:2; 10:3 f.; 16:28; Ps. 78[77]:10).

boulomai can express the most varied nuances of meaning in general human volition, but is also very commonly used for the will of God (e.g. Isa. 1:11; 53:10, 1 Sam. 1:25).

boulē also occurs well over 100 times in the LXX by contrast with thelēma (only some 25 times), mainly for Heb. ’ēšāh (74 times). It denotes (a) the weighty pre-consideration which precedes the effecting of the will (e.g. Deut. 32:28). It can even be found in the sense of “wisdom” (e.g. Prov. 2:11; 8:12). The Spirit “of counsel”, i.e. of considered reflection, is a gift of God (Isa. 11:2); (b) counsel (e.g. Isa. 9:6 as a characteristic of the messiah) and advice, whether good (Gen. 49:6; 1 Ki. 12:8) or foolish (Ps. 1:1; Isa. 19:11); (c) as in secular Gk., the council as a political institution, e.g. the assembly of the people (1 Macc. 14:22), the deliberations of such a board (Jud. 2:2), and the resolution of an assembly (3 Macc. 7:17); (d) also, and above all, the counsel or purpose of God (e.g. “The LORD brings the counsel of the nations to naught . . . the counsel of the LORD stands for ever”, Ps. 33[32]:10 f.; “Thou dost guide me with thy counsel”, Ps. 73[72]:24). God’s purposes are trustworthy and true; Israel can therefore rely on them (Isa. 25:1). His purpose includes Israel’s salvation (Isa. 14:26; cf. also Isa. 5:19; Mic. 4:12).

2. The divine will and purpose plays a special part in the Dead Sea Scrolls. In the “fellowship of unity”, the elect according to God’s will represent the true Israel (1QS 7:6; 9:15). In the precepts and commands they find the will of God which they must perform (1QS 9:13, 23, CD 3:15). The thought of a fixed predestination is again and again expressed in the words: “Apart from thy will nothing takes place” (cf. 1QS 11:17; 1QH 10:2); “. . . nothing is known” (1QH 1:8; 10:9). God’s will is thus the irrevocable prerequisite for every insight into right action (1QH 14:13); the one who does his will is the elect man (4Qp Ps. 37:5).

NT 1. As in secular Gk. literature, so in the NT boulomai (37 times) has been heavily suppressed by thelō (207 times). The terms are thus almost entirely interchangeable. But it is nonetheless striking that it is Acts that produces most attestations (14). “This is linked with the fact that Ac. is stylistically more akin to narrative prose such as that of Polybius, Diod. S. and Josephus, who still like boulomai even in the period of transition to ethelō” (G. Schrenk, TDNT, I 632).

In the NT boulomai can designate both sorts of volition, as it does in Hellenistic Gk. and in the LXX.

(a) boulomai can thus denote conscious volition in consequence of definite reflection, a decision of the will. Such volition always presupposes the possibility of freedom of decision. (i) It denotes human volition (1 Tim. 2:8; 5:14; Tit. 3:8, “I desire you to . . .”, the apostolic demand); but mostly without any theological significance (Mk. 15:15, “Pilate wishing to satisfy the crowd . . .”; Acts 12:4, “intending after the Passover to bring him out to the people”; Jas. 4:4, “whoever wishes to be a friend of the world makes himself an enemy of God”). (ii) But it can also denote the volition of God (Lk. 22:42; Heb. 6:17; Jas. 1:18; 2 Pet. 3:9) or Jesus (Matt. 11:27 par. Lk. 10:22) or the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:11). (Cf. below, 2).

(b) It can designate a wish determined by personal inclinations (Acts 25:22, “I should like to hear the man myself”; Phlm. 13, “I would have been glad to keep him with me”; 1 Tim. 6:19, “those who desire to be rich fall into temptation”).

boulē is also found in the latter sense in 1 Cor. 4:5 (the Lord will “reveal the secret intentions of men’s hearts” (JB), i.e. the volitional impulses concealed in the innermost depths of the psyche, of which men do not necessarily have to be conscious). As a rule, however, it is used as a noun from boulomai, referring to the free decision of the will which is prepared to carry it out: (i) of human beings, e.g. the ship’s crew (Acts 27:12) and the mercenaries (Acts 27:42) and a plan; Joseph of Arimathea had dissented from their resolution (Lk. 23:51); (ii) of the counsel or purpose of God (in 7 out of the total of 12 occurrences: Lk. 7:30; Acts 2:23; 4:28; 13:36; 20:27; Eph. 1:11; Heb. 6:17; cf. Lk. 23:51; Acts 5:38; 19:1; 20:27; 27:12). It is particularly used in this sense by Lk. (5 out of 9 references; cf. below, 2). In the NT, as outside it, boulēma (only 3 times), by contrast with boulē, stresses the will more as mental direction and is therefore to be translated by intent, intention (Acts 27:43; Rom. 9:19; cf. below, 2; 1 Pet. 4:3).

2. Theological significance is found especially in those passages where the word-group speaks of the counsel, intention or will of God (or Jesus or the Holy Spirit). It is always a case of an irrefragable determination.

(a) In the Lucan writings the terms boulomai and boulē elucidate vital aspects of Lk.’s christological proclamation as the fulfilment of God’s purpose.

Lk. 10:22 (“anyone to whom the Son chooses to reveal him”; cf. Matt. 11:27) shows the indivisible unity between Father and Son. In the weakness and humiliation of Jesus – the point at which the wise and clever go astray (cf. v. 26) – man encounters God’s sovereign purpose and will. The death on the → cross does not contradict the divine authorization of Jesus; it is God’s own purpose, foretold in the Scripture (Acts 2:23; 4:28, both times boulē). But though Jesus fell into the hands of the Jews in accordance with God’s will, this specifically does not absolve them from the fact that they crucified him (Acts 2:21). The leaders of Israel could have perceived God’s purpose already in the appearance of John the Baptist (Lk. 7:30). But their closed hearts showed that they were blind to God’s further plan. The Jews did not realize, for instance, that the promises given to → David (Acts 13:34 ff.; cf. Ps. 13:10; → Resurrection) point away beyond him to God’s plan with Jesus; for David fell asleep according to the will of God (tē tou theou boulē) and was gathered to his fathers and saw corruption. But the One whom God raised did not see corruption (13:36 f.).

It is one’s attitude to the Humiliated and Crucified One which now decides to whom the revelation will be disclosed. “To whom the Son will reveal him” (Lk. 10:22) means, therefore, first, that with respect to knowledge of God, all human willing here reaches its limits; and secondly, here is no rule of arbitrary predestination, but rather, in the encounter with the message of Jesus the decision about the revealed will of God is made. Lk. 22:42 makes it clear that Jesus in unity with the Father carries out only the divine will: “Father, if thou art willing [ei boulei] remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will [thelēma], but thine be done” (cf. Acts 13:22).

In the Lucan apologia of Paul (Acts 20:26 ff.), the apostle, taking leave of his congregation, emphatically points out yet again with regard to threatening heresies that he in his preaching testified to the whole purpose of God (tēn boulēn tou theou, v. 27), namely, God’s gracious approach to sinners in the sacrifice of his Son (v. 28). “The boulē fills up the whole content of the apostolic preaching” (G. Schrenk, TDNT I 635).

(b) In the whole of the rest of the NT the word-group is used only a further 7 times for the will and purpose of God (or Jesus or the Holy Spirit; → thelō). In Rom. 9:19 it is noticeable that, when Paul has the Gentiles speaking of the will of God, he makes use of boulēma (the opponent gives the excuse “Who can resist his will?”) whereas in v. 18 where he himself speaks as a believer of the double will of God, he uses thelō (or, in other places, prothesis, → foreknowledge, Rom. 8:28; 9:11). Since boulēma expresses more an intent or intention, which is often found to be dark and impenetrable, the word can often take on the tone of arbitrary wilfulness, or caprice in the mouth of an opponent (Rom. 9:19). In 1 Cor. 12:11 Paul points out that all gifts in the community derive from the one Spirit of God. They are apportioned to the individual charismatics in the freely willed decision of the Spirit (kathōs bouletai). boulē is found in Eph. 1:11 and Heb. 6:17, meaning the purpose of God (cf. 2 (a)). “In him [Christ], according to the purpose of him [kata prothesin tou] who accomplishes all things according to the counsel of his will [kata tēn boulēn tou thelēmatos autou], we who first hoped in Christ have been destined and appointed [prohoristhentes] to live for the praise of his glory” (Eph. 1:11 f.). H. Schlier is probably right in seeing this as a reference to the Jewish Christians who had already been destined for the inheritance according to God’s purpose, even before Christ came (cf. Eph. 2:11–22; Der Brief an die Epheser, 1963⁴, 66 ff.). The life of faith under the old → covenant already points to Christ. That was God’s will (→ thelēma) which fixed God’s purpose (boulē), according to which everything is now being fulfilled. The purpose of divine election far precedes the act of historical election. Heb. 6:17 uses boulē similarly for the irrefragable purpose of God: the troubled community is told that God wanted (boulomenos) to reinforce the inviolability of his saving will (to ametatheton tēs boules) by an oath (→ Swear). The conception of the inviolability of God’s saving will is found especially in the Dead Sea Scrolls.

God’s promise has not been made questionable by the long lapse of history; his will is the salvation of all (2 Pet. 3:9). We have been born of his saving will (Jas. 1:18), and because God himself is the unalterable one (cf. Jas. 1:17), his gracious will cannot be overthrown.

D. Müller

θέλω

θέλω (thelō), wish, want, desire, will, take pleasure in; θέλημα (thelēma), will, intention; θέλησις (thelēsis), will.

CL thelō – originally and especially in Hom. and in early Attic inscriptions ethelō – means: (a) to be ready (Homer, Il. 7, 364; Epict., Dissertationes 1, 119); to prefer, to be inclined (Homer, Il. 23, 894; Plato, Theaet. 143g); (b) to wish (Hdt. 2, 2), to desire (e.g. “he desired to see”, Homer, Od. 11, 566; also in the sexual sense, Homer, Od. 3, 272); (c) to have in mind (Homer, Il. 1, 549); (d) to will, both as determining and coming to a decision; and in particular (e) to will, in the sense of compelling, and overbearing the will (Homer, Il. 14, 120; 19, 274; Plato, Phdr. 80d). The noun thelēma, derived from thelō and attested from Antiphon the Sophist onwards, but used very rarely in secular Gk., correspondingly denotes intention, wish, and then chiefly will.

OT 1. In the LXX thelō, like → boulomai, is attested over 100 times (and very often of an aspect of God’s character), and has essentially the same Heb. equivalents, chiefly: hāpēš (44 times), to take pleasure in, delight in (e.g. Ps. 18[17]:19, “he [God] delighted in me”; Ezek. 18:23, “have I any pleasure in the death of the wicked?”); ’ābāh (33 times), to will, to be willing (Deut. 10:10, Yahweh “was unwilling to destroy you”); negative mā’ēn (20 times), to refuse (Gen. 37:35, “but he refused to be comforted”). thelēma (some 25 times) stands predominantly for the divine good-pleasure (e.g. Ps. 40[39]:8; Jer. 9:23; Mal. 1:10), but also for the will of God (Ps. 103[102]:7; Isa. 44:28), and especially of doing the will of God (e.g. Pss. 103[102]:21; 143[142]:10; cf. the use in Jn. and Heb., see below, NT 2 and 4). When thelēma is used of human beings, it can denote a wish (e.g. Ps. 107[106]:30), the will (e.g. of the king, Dan. 11:3 LXX), and also, negatively, ill-will, arbitrary behaviour (Jer. 23:26; Sir. 32:17).

2. For Qumran → boulomai OT 2.

NT thelō is attested 207 times in the NT (→ boulomai has already definitely receded into the background) and thelēma 62 times. It is found most frequently in the Synoptics (94 times; thelēma only 11 times) and the Pauline writings (61 times and 24 times). Since thelēma is the more theologically significant word (generally used for the will of God), the theological emphasis lies primarily in Paul and Jn. (23 times thelō, 11 times thelēma) who focus on this theme.

thelō frequently appears in the NT in a quite secular sense for general willing, desiring (e.g. Matt. 20:21; Matt. 26:17 par. Mk. 14:12), resolute willing (e.g. Matt. 25:15; Jn. 7:44), finding pleasure in, liking (e.g. Mk. 12:38 par. Lk. 20:46), claiming (2 Pet. 3:5); thelēma, by contrast, only rarely (e.g. 1 Cor. 7:37; 16:12).

1. (a) In the Pauline writings thelō and thelēma are frequently used to describe the will of God, and especially to describe the real source of the whole event of salvation in Christ. Christ’s act of self-sacrifice for the sake of our sins is necessarily kata to thelēma tou theou, and is thus the act of God himself (Gal. 1:4). By this act we are called to sonship (Eph. 1:5) in accord with his comprehensive saving will (to thelēma), in order to have disclosed to us the → mystery of his saving will (Eph. 1:9), since it is his will that all things should be united in him (cf. v. 10). On the basis of this saving will, his own people have had their eyes opened to the wisdom of creation in Christ, which is now manifested in the communities formed out of both Jews and Gentiles. The resolve to make Israel his inheritance in his free predestination, and to succeed in his all-embracing working, is also consonant with his will (1:11). The thelēma tou theou denotes here God’s eternal and providential saving will. It is to this overall saving will of God alone that Paul owes his apostolate (cf. 1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 2:1; Eph. 1:1; 2 Tim. 1:1; → Apostle).

The exegesis of Rom. 9:14 ff. has always caused difficulties. How are the will of man and the will of God related to each other? The attempt has repeatedly been made to understand this passage from the perspective of human free will and responsibility. But Paul does not go into the question of human responsibility here at all (cf. for this Rom. 10:16 ff.). It is not human volition (thelein) which is decisive for God's action; it is God's saving will which is the pre-condition for all human volition. The freedom of divine compassion is not dependent on human exertion, and just as little dependent on human resistance (cf. v. 17). God accomplishes his will in history precisely in that he harnesses both obedient and obdurate into his saving plan (v. 18). "The Pauline exegesis is not open to rational analysis; it puts deliberate obstacles in the way. The statement 'God hardens' now threatens everyone, including the Jews (Rom. 9:24 ff.), just as God's compassion is now perceptible to everyone, including the reprobate (9:22). The OT stumbling-blocks enabled Paul to make intelligible the way of the Gospel in the present time. For it is in the stumbling-block that God's mystery lies (9:33)" (O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4, 1966¹³, 241). The "[God] wanted" (thelōn) in 9:22 is not to be understood concessively ("although God, yet he has borne them patiently") but causally (because, with the intention of). The forbearance of God is the way which leads God to the revelation of his wrath (cf. G. Bornkamm, Das Ende des Gesetzes, I, 1966⁵, 91). It is God's will to make known his compassion precisely in forbearance and wrath; the ultimate goal of his will is in fact not the "vessels of wrath". Rather he has borne them for the revelation of his grace. It is the goal of his will that all men should be helped and come to the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4).

The fact that the ultimate intention of God's will is the revelation of his glory in Christ is stressed particularly in Col. 1:27. In the will of God this whole space-time continuum is moving towards the point when the mystery of God's saving will is to be unveiled for the believer in the Christ-event. Even if this will, for the time being, has been correctly apprehended only by the believer, yet it is still directed towards the redemption of all men (1 Tim. 1:14). By sharp contrast with the teaching of the Qumran community (→ boulomai, οἶ), the synagogue and the gnostics, the NT church does not acknowledge a double predestination in the will of God, whereby from the beginning one section of humanity is excluded from salvation.

1 Cor. 15:38 is concerned with God's will as Creator: the new resurrection body cannot be compared with anything that we can conceive of in nature; the will of God will be creatively active in a new way.

The revelation of the mystery, i.e. the understanding of the saving will of God, is for the believer the pre-condition of a right attitude and right behaviour in the age of salvation, which has already dawned. Those who are unwise and lack understanding miss the insight into the divine will and corresponding behaviour (Eph. 5:17 f.). Paul elaborates this with particular sharpness in Rom. 2:17 ff. with regard to Jewish teachers of the law. The scribe thinks that he knows God's will from the law, and that he is able to be a guide for the blind. But the very contradiction between his teaching and his own behaviour betrays the fact that God's will has not yet been understood here. For Christ is the day-break of the new age, and this requires a renewal of the mind (Rom. 12:2), i.e. thinking which is transformed by the bestowal of the Spirit, which is part of a continual endeavour to understand the thelēma tou theou. What in God's will is good (to agathon), well-pleasing (euareston) and perfect (teleion) should lead the believer to appropriate behaviour (Rom. 12:2). Paul extols such an approach, deriving from the will of God, in the congregations of Macedonia (2 Cor. 8:5). Paul has to point out to the church at Corinth that their conduct in the matter of the charismatic gifts must not be understood as an achievement deriving from their own will. Since all such charismatic gifts stem from the determinative will of the Creator, no one in the community has any right to be arrogant (1 Cor. 12:18, cf. v. 11 → boulomai; cf. vv. 6, 24). Passages such as Rom. 1:10; 15:32; 1 Cor. 4:19 (cf. Acts 18:21) show that human volition in the believer is not simply invalidated, but rather embraced, by the will of God. Paul plans in accord with his own will, but expecting that God's will is able to place him in a quite different situation, which will demand from him an alteration of his own plans.

(b) (i) Where thelō is used in Paul with religious significance, referring to human beings, it is also always linked with verbs of doing: poieō (e.g. 1 Cor. 7:36; 2 Cor. 8:10; Gal. 5:17); energeō (e.g. 2 Cor. 8:11; Phil. 2:13; → Work). Since the believer no longer stands in contradiction to the will of God, God becomes the one who is acting in him. Willing and working become the gifts of God (Phil. 2:13). All human volition and behaviour are thus to take place out of obedience to God, and in accord with his saving will (e.g. 2 Cor. 8:10 f.; 1 Cor. 7:36). But where → Spirit and → flesh are still at variance with one another, i.e., where the Spirit has not yet fully gained acceptance, thelein does not turn into poiein (Gal. 5:17).

(ii) There is considerable disagreement over the understanding of the contrast between volition and action in the exegesis of Rom. 7:15 ff. According to the general view, the contrast is seen as being in the subject of man. On the one hand, he would like to fulfil the will of God which confronts him in the law, but on the other he again and again falls short of the will of God, because he is bound to the → flesh. "The fragmentation in man does not permit fulfilment of the law . . . the split in man is to be sought for radically in his being man" (O. Michel, op. cit., 186). Man cannot overcome this fragmentation of himself (and even the believer can fall back into it); he can do so only when, according to the promise of God, he comes under the law of the Spirit, who gives freedom and life in Jesus Christ (Rom. 8:2). Bultmann, Bornkamm and others, however, take the contrast to be the discrepancy between what I, as an individual, deep down really want and what actually results in my actions. I want what is good (kalon vv. 18 f.), but the result of all my actions is evil (kakon, vv. 19, 21). The split in man does not consist in his consciousness, which can accuse itself or be detached from itself, but in the fact that man does the opposite of what he wills, that is to say of what he really, fundamentally wills – but not of what he from time to time wills in actual practice (cf. R. Bultmann, "Romans 7 and the Anthropology of Paul", Existence and Faith, 1960, 147–57).

It should, however, be remembered that the section Rom. 7:7–13 reaches the conclusion in the thought that sin works death in one through the good (G. Bornkamm, "Sin, Law and Death (Romans 7)", Early Christian Experience, 1969, 87–104). This may suggest that Paul is speaking of the unredeemed man, whose radical failure "is disclosed only in faith" (G. Bornkamm, op. cit., 96; cf. E. Fuchs, Die Freiheit des Glaubens, Römer 5–8 ausgelegt, 1949, 72) by the dichotomy between unwilling deeds and unproductive volition. (For further discussion and literature → I Am, art. egō eimi NT 2(c).)

(c) thelō is encountered frequently as a declaration of the will of the apostle to his congregations in phrases such as: “I wish” (1 Cor. 7:7; 14:5; Gal. 3:12); “I do not want to leave you in ignorance” (e.g. Rom. 1:13; 1 Cor. 10:1); or “I want you to understand” (1 Cor. 11:3). In many places thelō assumes the weight of apostolic authority (e.g. Rom. 16:19; 1 Cor. 7:32).

2. thelō and thelēma play an especial rôle in John. Repeated stress is laid on the fact that Jesus, the One who is sent, does not act according to his own will (Jn. 5:30a; 6:38a), but that the will of the Father is accomplished in the work of the Son (Jn. 5:30b; 6:38b). Jesus is absolutely and entirely the bearer of the Father’s will (Jn. 4:34). God’s will is that Jesus, the Saviour (sōter, cf. Jn. 3:17), does not lose those who are appointed for life (Jn. 6:39); and those who are appointed for life in the divine will are those who perceive salvation in Jesus and take hold of it, i.e. believe on him (Jn. 6:40). Again, John can interpret faith as the doing of the divine will (Jn. 9:31; 1 Jn. 2:17), the congruence of human volition with the divine will being revealed in Jesus (1 Jn. 5:14 ff.). This is not possible by natural stimulation of the will (Jn. 1:17; cf. 2 Pet. 1:21). “The wind blows where it wills” (Jn. 3:8), i.e. salvation is impossible as a human possibility: but it is possible as divine possibility (cf. R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 138 ff.). This divine possibility confronts us in the Son. The Son gives life to whom he will (Jn. 5:21; cf. 6:27, 57). The sole criterion for establishing the legitimacy of the Revealer is the doing of his will (poiein to thelēma autou, Jn. 7:17). But it is not as though ethics take precedence over faith in John. Rather, the doing of his will again means the faith to which knowledge is given in obedience. It is for this faith that Jesus asks when he says to the sick man “Do you want to be healed [theleis hygiēs genesthai]?” (Jn. 5:6).

3. (a) In the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, apart from Matt. (thelēma 6 times for the will of God) the word-group is found only rarely for direct description of the will of God. In passages such as Matt. 7:21; 12:50 (par. Mk. 3:35) one meets as in Jn. the formula “he who does the will of God [or of the Father] . . .” (cf. Matt. 21:31). But here again one must not distinguish a will of God concerned with ethics and another one concerned with a saving purpose. There is only one all-embracing will of God with which alone corresponds an equally comprehensive attitude to life by the believer (thelō also has this sense in the OT quotation: Matt. 9:13; 12:7; cf. Hos. 6:6). So, too, the third petition in the Lord’s Prayer (Matt. 6:10), as the prayer in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:39, 42; Mk. 14:36, Lk. 22:42), is not to be understood as an acquiescent accommodation to some unalterable power, but as an active affirmation which helps to realize the divine willing (his saving plan) and to lead towards the goal (→ Prayer, art. proseuchomai NT 2; so also Acts 21:4; cf. Matt. 21:31). Doing the divine will is closely knit with knowledge of the divine will (Acts 22:14; see above 1 (a)).

(b) thelō occurs with especial frequency in the Gospels in the mouth of Jesus. Alongside purely secular usage it stresses in some passages the authority of Jesus (e.g. Matt. 15:32; 20:32; Matt. 8:3 par. Mk. 1:41, Lk. 5:13; 3:13; 7:24) or the authority of the Lord recognized in the faith of other people (e.g. Lk. 5:12); but also the decision of the will which is demanded of the hearer on the basis of this authority (e.g. Matt. 16:24 f.; 19:17, 21; Mk. 10:43 f.).

4. In the non-Pauline writings of the NT thelō is found in Heb. 10:5, 8; Jas. 4:15; 1 Pet. 3:10, 17; 2 Pet. 3:5; Rev. 2:21; 22:17; thelēma in Heb. 10:7, 9f., 36; 13:21; 1 Pet. 2:15; 3:17; 4:2, 19; 2 Pet. 1:21; 1 Jn. 2:17; 5:14; Rev. 4:11; and thelēsis once (Heb. 2:4, of gifts of the Spirit distributed according to God's → Spirit).

The interpretation of Ps. 40:7 ff. in Heb. 10:5–10 corresponds with the Johannine thinking concerning the will of God and its fulfilment in the work of the One who has been sent. Some exegetes suppose that Heb. understands Ps. 40:7 ff. as a dialogue between the pre-existent Christ and God. This would mean that the principle is here enunciated by which Christ comes into his world and by which his whole earthly life is determined: exclusive fulfilment of the will of God (vv. 7, 9), i.e. repudiation of cultic sacrifice (vv. 5 ff.), fulfilment of Scripture (v. 7) and the presentation of his own life as a sacrifice (v. 10). In v. 10 our sanctification is grounded in the fulfilment of this will of God in Christ (→ Sacrifice, art. thysia; cf. F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 231–36). In the sacrifice of Jesus Christ the will of God has been so completely fulfilled that a transformation of man in sanctification has become possible (Heb. 13:21). This transformation, i.e. fulfilment of the promise, is again the “doing of the will of God” by the believer (10:36). Very much as in John the doing of the will of God consists of undivided obedience to this will. 1 Pet., in particular, stresses that this obedience according to the will of God can include suffering (3:17; 4:2, 19).

D. Müller

(a). G. Bornkamm, “Sin, Law and Death (Romans 7)”, in Early Christian Experience, 1969, 87–104; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964; R. Bultmann, “Romans 7 and the Anthropology of Paul”, in Existence and Faith, 1960, 147–57; and The Gospel of John, 1971; G. Schrenk, boulomai etc., TDNT I 629–37; and thelō etc., TDNT III 44–62.

(b). G. Bornkamm, “Paulinische Anakoluthe im Römerbrief”, in Das Ende des Gesetzes, I, (1952) 1966⁵, 91 ff.; L. Cerfaux, “La Volonté dans la Doctrine Paulinienne”, Recueil Lucien Cerfaux. Études d'Exégèse et d'Histoire Religieuse, III, 1962, 297 ff.; E. Echnernach, Wille und Vorsehung, 1951; K. E. Logstrup, “Wille”, *RGG*³ VI 1716 ff.; O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4, 1966¹³; H. Riesenfeld, Zum Gebrauch von theō im Neuen Testament, Arbeiten und Mitteilungen aus dem neutestamentlichen Seminar Uppsala 1, 1936.

Wisdom, Folly, Philosophy

μωρία	μωρία (mōria), foolishness, folly; μωραίνω (mōrainō), make foolish, pass. be foolish; μωρός (mōros), foolish, stupid; ἄφρων (aphrōn), foolish, senseless; ἀφροσύνη (aphrosynē), lack of sense, folly, foolishness.
--------------	--

CL 1. mōros means foolish, stupid and, like mōria, foolishness (Soph. onwards) denotes inappropriate behaviour, thought or speech, both of single lapses of sense as well as in the sense of a permanent attribute. It is concerned as much with lack of knowledge as with lack of discernment. The use of the word for the state of mental derangement (Soph., Aj. 1150) or for a man's behaviour when acting under the influence of his desires (Eur. Hippolytus 966; Soph., Ant. 469 f.) suggests the thought of a power which dominates man. mōrainō means to be foolish or to act foolishly, and also (later, after the LXX) to make foolish, to show to be foolish. As a special meaning with reference to food, mōros can mean insipid, the pass. mōrainesthai, to become insipid.

2. aphrōn, senseless, foolish and aphrosynē, lack of sense, foolishness (both words from Hom. onwards) indicate by the use of the Alpha-privative that the term is essentially defined by a lack or a negation, i.e. lack of insight and reason. But the possible development of a diseased mind is not excluded here either (Homer, Od. 23, 10–14). aphrōn can thus mean infatuated (Homer, Od. 21, 102) and aphrosynē can be referred back to mania (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 7, 6, both times, incidentally, through active intervention of the gods). But the words chiefly describe deficient perception of value and truth.

OT 1. The Heb. words for fool, foolish and folly are predominantly rendered in the LXX by aphrōn (115 times, of which 19 have no equivalent) or aphrosynē (31, and 5 instances in the Apocrypha without equivalent). The commonest equivalents are the words derived from the root kāsal (possibly originally meaning sluggish, foolish, and only then insolent, godless), which occur altogether 64 times, of which 40 are in Prov., 21 in Eccl. With one exception (Ps. 94[93]:8 LXX) they are always translated by aphrōn or aphrosynē. The older nāḅal, also fairly common (same original meaning), is rendered by aphrōn only in Job and Pss., but always by mōros in Prov., Deut. and Isa. mōros, indeed, is found a total of only 6 times for a Heb. equivalent, but 28 times in the Gk., Sir. without equivalent and similarly the noun twice in Sir. without equivalent. The occurrences are as follows.

aphrosynē stands for 'iwwelet, foolishness, at Pss. 38(37):5; 69(68):5; Prov. 18:13; 19:3 (18:22); 26:4 f.; 27:22; kēsīl, kesel or kislāh, stupidity, at Job 4:6; Eccl. 4:17, 25(26); 9:17; ḥālāh, senselessness, at Deut. 22:21; Jdg. 19:23 f.; 20:6, 10; 2 Sam. 25:25; sāḳal or sīklūt, fool(ish), folly, at Eccl. 2:12 f.; 10:1, 3, 13; pefē, a simple youth, Prov. 9:6(4, 16); tāpēl or tiplāh, tasteless, unseemliness, at Job 1:22; Lam. 2:14; and zimmāh, shameless conduct (mostly in sexual affairs), at Jdg. 20:6. It is without equivalent at 1 Sam. 25:5; Job 21:23; Prov. 5:5; 18:2; Wis. 10:18; 12:23; Sir. 8:15; 47:20, 23.

aphrōn stands for wīl* or 'iwwelet, awkward, useless, at Prov. 12:15 f.; 14:1, 3, 9, 29; 15:5; 16:22; 20:3; 27:3; 'āwen, uncanny, wickedness, at Job 34:36; Isa. 59:7; bōš, put to shame, at Prov. 17:2(?); b'liyya'al, wicked, at Prov. 6:12; 16:27; 19:28; bā'ar or ba'ar, behaving as brutish or stupid, at Pss. 49(48):10 v.l.; 92(91):6; 94(93):8; Prov. 12:1; 30:2 (24:25); lō' ḥākām, not wise, at Prov. 20:1(?); ḥ'sar-lēb, lacking in heart, i.e. without sense, at Prov. 17:18; kēsīl or kēsīlūt, insolent (in religion), stupid (in practical affairs), at Prov. 10:1, 18, 23; 12:23; 13:16, 20; 14:7 f., 16, 24, 33; 15:2, 7, 20; 17:10, 12, 16, 21, 24 f.; 18:6 f.; 19:10, 13, 29; 21:20; 23:9; 26:1, 4–11; 28:26; 29:11, 20; Eccl. 2:14 ff.; 4:5, 13, 17; 5:2 f.; 6:8; 7:4 ff., 9 (5 ff., 10); 10:2, 12, 15; kēsīlūt, insolence, stupidity, at Prov. 9:13; lūs, scoff, at Prov. 1:22; nāḅal, senseless, foolish, stupid, at 2 Sam. 13:13; Job 2:10; 30:8; Pss. 14(13):1; 39(38):8; 53(52):1; 72(73):18, 22; Prov. 17:7, 18; Jer. 17:11; sāḳal or sekel, fool(ish), at Eccl. 2:19; 10:3, 6, 14; Jer. 4:22; 'āṣēl, sluggish, lazy, at Prov. 24:30 (45); and pefē, a simple youth, at Prov. 7:7; 9:4, 16; 14:18. It occurs (not always with equivalent) at Prov. 10:4, 23; 18:7; Eccl. 2:15; Wis. 1:3; 3:2, 12; 5:4; 12:24; 14:11; 15:5, 14; Sir. 16:23; 19:23; 20:7, 14, 22; 21:23; 22:13; 27:11; 34(33):1; 31(34):7, 30.

mōria is found only at Sir. 20:31 and 41:15 (for Heb. 'iwweleṭ in the latter place). The vb. mōrainō is rare, standing in the niphāl for bā'ar, behave as brutish or stupid (Isa. 19:11; Jer. 10:14; 51[28]:17), and kāsal, be stupid (2 Sam. 24:10; Isa. 44:25), and without equivalent (Sir. 23:14). mōreuō stands for kāsal at Isa. 44:25. mōros stands for 'wīl, awkward, useless (Isa. 19:4); nāḅāl or n'ḅālāh, senseless, foolish, stupid (Deut. 32:6; Isa. 32:5 f.); sākal, foolish (Jer. 5:21); and sākal, have insight (with negative, Ps. 94[93]:8). But most often mōros is found in Sir. where the Heb. original is not always extant (Sir. 4:27; 16:23; 18:18; 19:11 ff.; 20:13, 16, 20; 21:14, 16, 18, 20, 22, 26; 22:7 f., 11 f., 14, 18; 25:2; 27:13; 33[36]:5 f., 1; 42:8; 50:26).

The instances based on nāḅāl are quite unequivocal in insisting that foolishness is not lack of knowledge but rebellion against God (→ Sin). Hence, the term fool gains the associated sense of one who denies God, a blasphemer (classic references are Pss. 14[13]:1; 53[52]:2; but cf. also Ps. 74[73]:18, 22; Job 2:10; Isa. 32:5 f.; Sir. 50:26). The fool who rebels against God also destroys fellowship with man: he lets the hungry starve (Isa. 32:6); earns riches by unjust means (Jer. 17:11); and slanders his fellow-men (Ps. 39[38]:9). In later Wisdom literature, too, where the term rather pales, the associated sense of culpable behaviour is still retained.

2. For the Qumran community the one who remains outside the fellowship is counted a fool (CD 15:15). Wisdom and folly lie struggling together in the heart of man (1QS 4:24). In the catalogues of sins (1QS 4:9–11) folly appears amongst others. The hope of the pious is for the ultimate annihilation of folly (1QS 4:8).

NT In the NT aphrōn is found 11 times, of which 7 instances occur in Paul (aphrosynē 4 times, of which 2 are in Paul), whereas the mōria-group numbers 14 attestations for the adj. (4 in Paul), 5 for the noun (all in Paul) and a further 4 for the vb. (2 in Paul). The striking point is its forceful usage by Paul and the predominance of the adj. mōros in Matt.

1. In the Synoptic Gospels (occurrences: 1 in Mk., 3 times in Lk., 7 times in Matt.; mōros 6 times) the words appear with varying meanings.

(a) The picture of → salt becoming insipid (mōrainesthai, Matt. 5:13; Lk. 14:34) might have as its background one of Jesus' words of promise: the → gospel, like salt, can never lose its force. Salt does not undergo any chemical change; one cannot season it. As it stands, the saying is shaped as a word of warning: take care that you do not let the salt become insipid.

(b) The interpretation of the term of abuse mōre, "you fool!" (Matt. 5:22) is disputed (cf. G. Bertram, mōros TDNT IV 839 ff.; → Curse, art. rhaka). The most natural interpretation still appears to be a filling-out of the word fool with the associated sense of "godless" (cf. Matt. 23:17; similarly aphrones, Lk. 11:40).

(c) mōros is used in parables by Matt. as an opposite to phronimos, wise (Matt. 7:24–27; 25:1–13). Here, too, the associated sense deriving from the OT content of the word could play a rôle: foolishness is not stupidity, but rebellion against God. It is not fate, but guilt. A man proves himself foolish when he declines God's offer. He falls into judgment. Obedience is the prudence of believers (a similar use of aphrōn in the parable of the rich fool, Lk. 12:20).

2. (a) Paul uses mōria and mōros to characterize the preaching of the → cross over against the wisdom of the world, which is exhibited in the rejection of the cross of Christ by Jews and Greeks (1 Cor. 1:23), and expressly in Corinth in the authoritarian piety of the Corinthian spiritual party which despised the lowliness of the apostle. This wisdom God has turned into foolishness in Christ's death on the cross (1 Cor. 1:20; 3:19; on the whole context → sophia NT 2).

The other side of this is that the preaching of the cross, which appears so foolish to men, is in fact foolish. This is not, of course, in the sense that it is unintelligible, or that it demands a sacrificium intellectus. The foolishness of the preaching lies in its content, in the cross of Christ. "Christ the Crucified One is the radically Weak One, whence also the Christian who exists in him must of necessity be weak. . . . The cross is the radical crisis even of Christ himself" (U. Wilckens, Weisheit und Torheit, 1959, 218). But the Corinthian spiritual party cannot and will not allow this. Paul, therefore, contradicts them by saying that the "foolishness of God [to mōron tou theou]" (which is not an attribute of God, but his freely chosen way of dealing with the world in the cross of Christ) "is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men" (1 Cor. 1:25). To share in the folly of degradation of the cross means to share in the power of God. "For the word of the cross [ho logos gar tou staurou] is folly to those who are perishing, but to us who are being saved it is the power of God [dynamis theou]" (1 Cor. 1:18). God's "power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12:9; → Fruit, art. skolops). This is why Paul can offer the paradoxical advice that one should become foolish in order to become wise (1 Cor. 3:18), and why he can call himself a "fool for Christ's sake" (1 Cor. 4:10).

(b) The use of aphrōn and aphrosynē in 2 Cor. 11 and 12 is as undialectical as the use of mōros and mōria in 1 Cor. is dialectical. The boasting to which Paul's Corinthian opponents, who wish to be wise (phronimoi ontes, 2 Cor. 11:19), have forced him (2 Cor. 12:11) is designated by him as foolishness (2 Cor. 11:1, 16 f., 21). If it is all right, in a foolish way, to boast, the apostle can go along with them: but he boasts of his → weakness (2 Cor. 11:30), and that is enough (2 Cor. 12:9). Here also he makes a connexion with the preaching of the cross.

3. (a) In the paraenesis of Eph. the congregation is called upon not to be foolish, but to inquire after the will of the Lord (Eph. 5:17). aphrones stands here close to asophoi, unwise (which is found only at Eph. 5:15); obviously the Christians are intended to be guarded from undisciplined behaviour.

(b) 2 Tim. 2:23 warns against "stupid senseless controversies [mōras kai apaideutous zētēseis]" – unprofitable discussions over hair-splitting minutiae such as genealogies and the law (Tit. 3:9) which only lead to quarrels (cf. mōrologia, silly talk, Eph. 5:4). apaideutos which occurs only at 2 Tim. 2:23 means uninstructed, uneducated, hence, stupid.

(c) 1 Pet. 2:15 urges the congregation, by its good deeds, to "put to silence the ignorance of foolish men" and so to do God's will. J. Goetzmann σοφία (sophia), wisdom; σοφός (sophos) wise; σοφίζω (sophizō), make wise, teach, instruct; mid. to reason out, devise craftily.

σοφία

CL The adj. sophos, used frequently from Pindar onwards, and the noun sophia, found from Homer onwards, always denote in Gk. an attribute, never an activity (in contrast with synesis, → reason). They indicate unusual ability and knowledge, earlier in the practical sphere as well (the sophia of a carpenter, Homer, Il., 15, 41 f.), but later concentrated on theoretical knowledge. The members of the college of the Seven Sages were renowned for their worldly wisdom and political discernment (Plato, Prt. 343a), whereas the sophia of a later time (the Sophists) was regarded as knowledge which could both be taught and acquired. Socrates' wisdom consisted in the fact that he knows that he knows nothing (Plato, Ap. 21). All authoritarian wisdom is in reality no wisdom at all. In Plato the content of wisdom is related to his view of forms or ideas. Ultimately, it is a property of the form of the good alone (Symp. 204a). For Aristotle, sophia and → philosophia were identical (Met. 1, 1; 5, 1). With the Stoics theory and practice coincide: wisdom is realized knowledge. The conduct of the wise man is sophia. The sophos himself, in his conduct, is the necessary subject of Stoic philosophy.

OT 1. As a rule, the word group occurs in the LXX as a rendering of words from the stem hkm. In accord with their significance almost three-fifths of the references are found in Wisdom literature (Prov., Job, Eccl. and Pss.; in Sir. and Wis. there are over 100 references with no Heb. equivalent in Wis., but not always in Sir.). Here the term acquires a specific stamp.

sophia stands predominantly for hokmâh: Exod. 28:3 v.l.; 31:3; 35:26, 31 v.l.; 35:35; 36:1; Deut. 4:6; 2 Sam. 14:20; 20:22; 1 Ki. 2:6; 5:9 f., 14 (4:29 f., 34); 5:26(12); 10:7; 1 Chr. 28:21; 2 Chr. 1:10 f.; 9:3, 5, 6 f., 22 f.; 2 Esd. 7:25; Job 4:21; 11:6; 12:2; 12 f.; 13:5; 15:8; 26:3; 28:12, 18, 20, 28; 32:7, 13; 33:33; 38:36 f.; 39:17; Pss. 37(36):30; 49(48):3; 51(50):6; 90 (89):12; 104(103):24; 107(106):27; 111(110):10; Prov. 1:2, 7, 20; 2:2, 6, 10; 3:13, 19; 4:5, 11; 5:1; 7:4; 8:1, 11 f.; 9:1, 10; 10:13, 23, 31; 11:2; 14:6, 8, 33; 15:33 (16:4); 16:16; 17:16; 21:30; 24:3, 7, 14; 28:26; 29:3, 15; 30:3 (24:26); Eccl. 1:13, 16, 18; 2:3, 9, 12, 13, 21, 26; 7:10 ff., 19, 23, 25 (11 ff., 20, 24, 26); 8:1, 16; 9:10, 13, 15 f., 18; 10:1, 10; Isa. 10:13; 11:2; 29:14; 33:6; Jer. 8:9; 9:22(23); 10:12; 49(29):7; 51(28):15; Dan. 1:4; 2:20 f., 23, 30; 5:14. It also stands for bînâh, understanding (Prov. 2:3; 3:5); tʿhûnâh, understanding (1 Ki. 3:1; cf. 5:9 [4:29]; Prov. 18:2); daʿat, knowledge (Prov. 1:7, 29); mûsar, chastening, discipline, exhortation (Prov. 8:33 v.l. for paidian); mahʿšebet, thought, device (Exod. 35:33); and śekel, insight, prudence (1 Chr. 22:12). But apart from occasional instances where there are no parallels in the Heb. text (Exod. 36:2; Job 8:10; 11:20; Prov. 6:8; 8:12; 17:28; 20:29; 22:24; 31:5 [24:73]; Isa. 50:4; Dan. 1:17), a large proportion of the instances occur in the apocryphal writings: 1 Esd. 3:7; 4:59 f.; 8:23; Wis. 1:4–6; 3:11; 6:9, 12, 20–23; 7:7, 12, 15, 22, 24, 28, 30; 8:5, 17; 9:2, 4, 6, 9, 17 f.; 10:4, 8 f., 21; 14:2, 5; Sir. prol. 4, 10; 1:1, 3 f., 4, 6, 14, 16, 18, 20, 24 ff.; 4:11, 24; 6:18, 22, 37; 8:8; 11:1; 14:20; 15:3, 10, 18; 18:28; 19:20, 22 f.; 20:30 f.; 21:11, 18; 22:6; 23:2; 24:1, 25; 25:5, 10; 27:11; 31(34):11; 34(31):8; 37:20 f.; 38:24; 39:1, 7, 10; 40:20; 41:14 f.; 42:21; 43:33; 44:15; 45:26; 50:27; 51:13, 17.

sophos stands chiefly for hākām, wise: Gen. 41:8; Exod. 28:3; 35:10, 25; 36:1, 4, 8; Deut. 1:13, 15; 4:6; 16:19; 32:6; Jdg. 5:29; 2 Sam. 13:3; 14:2, 20; 20:16; 1 Ki. 2:9; 3:12 v.l.; 1 Chr. 22:15; 2 Chr. 2:6 f., 11 ff. (7, 12 ff.); Job 5:13; 9:4; 15:2, 18; 34:2, 34; 37:24; Pss. 49(48):10; 107(106):43; Prov. 1:5 f.; 3:35; 9:8 f.; 10:1, 8, 14; 2:15, 18; 13:14, 20; 14:1, 3, 16, 24; 15:2, 7, 12, 20; 16:14, 21, 23; 18:15; 20:26; 21:11, 20, 22; 22:17; 23:24; 24:5, 23 (38); 30:24 (24:59); 25:12; 26:5, 12, 16;

28:11; 29:8 f., 11; Eccl. 2:14, 16, 19; 4:13; 6:8; 7:4 f., 7, 19 (5 f., 8, 20); 8:1 (7:30); 8:5, 17; 9:1, 11, 15, 17; 10:2, 12; 12:9, 11; Hos. 14:10; Obad. 1:8; Isa. 3:3; 19:11 f.; 29:14; 31:2; Jer. 4:22; 8:8 f.; 9:16, 22 (17, 23); 51(28):57; Ezek. 27:8 f.; 28:3. The Aram. equivalent in Dan. is hākīm (Dan 2:12, 21, 27 and further instances in the version of Theodotion). sophos is used to translate bîn, understand (1 Sam. 16:18); hartôm, soothsayer priest (Dan. 2:10); nākōah, straight, right (Prov. 24:26[41]); hākam, be wise (Job 32:9; Prov. 6:12; 13:20; 20:1; cf. also the expressions in Prov. 1:5; 6:6; 9:9; 19:20; 23:15, 19; 27:11). It is without equivalent in 1 Ki. 4:20 (3:1); Job 21:22 v.l.; 33:31; Ps. 58(57):5; Prov. 10:4; 13:10, 13, 17; 14:7; 17:24; 24:7; 31:26(27); Ezek. 28:3. It is also found in the Gk. apocryphal books: 1 Esd. 3:5, 9; 4:42; 5:6; Wis. 4:17; 6:24; 7:15; Sir. 1:8; 3:29; 6:33 f.; 7:19; 8:8; 9:14, 17; 10:1, 25; 18:27; 20:5, 7, 13, 27, 29; 21:13, 15, 26; 27:11 v.l.; 33(36):2; 37:22 ff., 26; 44:4; 4 Macc. 7:23.

The vb. sophizō which is much less common stands chiefly for hākam, be wise: 1 Ki. 5:11 (4:31); Pss. 19(18):7; 105(104):22; 119(118):98; Prov. 8:33; Eccl. 2:15, 19; 7:16(17), 23(34). It stands for bîn, understand, at 1 Sam. 3:8; and has no equivalent at 1 Ki. 5:11(4:31); Prov. 16:17; Sir. 18:29; 32(35):4; 38:31; cf. Sir. 7:5; 10:26; 37:20; 38:24 f.; 47:14; 50:28, where there is a corresponding Heb. text.

Here one must note the spread of meaning in the word-group. sophia denotes e.g. specialist knowledge in a particular field, such as in handicraft or in art (Exod. 36:1 f.), but equally in economic shrewdness (Prov. 8:18, 21), the art of government (Prov. 8:15) or education (1 Ki. 5:9–14 [EVV 4:29–34]). Over and above this, it is concerned quite generally with the sagacious behaviour which enables a man to master life (Prov. 8:32–36). Here it depends on right conduct in obedience to the will of God rather than on theoretical insight. Wisdom is accordingly connected with the fear of Yahweh: “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom and the knowledge of the Holy One is insight” (Prov. 9:10; cf. 1:7; 15:33; Ps. 111[110]:10; Job 28:28). Here also is developed the distinctive aspect of the understanding of wisdom in Israel: wisdom is rooted in adherence to God. “The thesis that all human knowledge comes back to the question about commitment to God is a statement of penetrating perspicacity. . . . One becomes competent and expert as far as the orders in life are concerned only if one begins from knowledge about God” (G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel, 1972, 67). “This idea is among the most characteristic of Israelite religion. Non-Israelite wisdom is unaware of this kind of almost programmatic rooting of wisdom in the fear of God” (op. cit., 66, n. 11; cf. S. Plath, Furcht Gottes, 1962, 70).

2. (a) The OT is aware, even if in critical utterances, of wisdom in the surrounding nations, e.g. in → Babylon (Jer. 50:35; 51:57; cf. Isa. 47:10) and in Egypt (1 Ki. 5:10). Astonishing parallels can be exhibited between Egyptian texts and Heb. Wisdom literature, e.g. between Prov. 22:17–23:11 and the Egyptian book of the Wisdom of Amenemope (cf. E. Würthwein, “Egyptian Wisdom and the Old Testament”, in J. L. Crenshaw, ed., Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, 1976, 113–33). In adopting these texts, of course, Israel brought them firmly into line with its own religious convictions. One can also recognize a kinship with ancient oriental phenomena in the fact that the royal palace may count as a special place for the growth of Wisdom literature and its organized transmission. As in Egypt wisdom texts served in the training and education of future palace officials, so at Solomon’s court such texts were collected for the training and education of the rising generation of royal advisers (cf. A. Alt, "Solomonic Wisdom", in J. L. Crenshaw, op. cit., 102–12). The beginnings of a descriptive natural science in the form of the so-called scientific catalogues (cf. 1 Ki. 5:12 f. [EVV 4:32 ff.]) have their place equally at Solomon's court as in Egypt and Mesopotamia. The figure of Daniel and his companions is also to be reckoned as belonging to these courtly circles (Dan. 2:48; 5:11 f.).

(b) Over all acquired and transmitted wisdom, however, stands the wisdom which is given as a gift by God to King → Solomon (1 Ki. 3:5–14), which finds expression in judicial shrewdness (1 Ki. 3:16–28) and also leads, in later minds, to admiring recognition by Israel's neighbours (1 Ki. 5:11, 14, 21 [EVV 4:31, 34; 5:7]; 10:1–9, 23 f.). Here is reflected not only the longing of later generations for the splendour and security of Solomon's reign, but also Israel's conviction of the transcendence of Yahweh over other gods. It is no wonder that the same tendency ascribed the authorship of Israel's proverbial wisdom to Solomon (1 Ki. 5:12). It is equally comprehensible that wisdom was expected in the hoped-for messianic king (Isa. 11:2).

(c) The concept of wisdom is theologically very pervasive in post-exilic times. Wisdom, conceived in personal terms, becomes the mediator of revelation and a teacher (Prov. 8:1–21) who summons (Prov. 1:20 ff.; 8:32 ff.) and invites men (Prov. 9:1 ff.). Created prior to all the works of creation (Prov. 8:22–31), she discloses to men the original order inherent in creation. She thus gains the rôle of a divine principle implanted in the world, which is nevertheless (according to Job 28) accessible to God alone.

3. (a) This understanding of wisdom found expression in the ideas of a generally wide-spread myth (as much Jewish as gnostic), in which wisdom sought for a dwelling among men, but, unable to find one, returned to heaven. In later times this myth was articulated without any embarrassment (Eth. Enoch 42) and re-interpreted to glorify the law. Wisdom finds a resting-place in Israel and is identified with the → law (Sir. 24:8 ff., 23 ff.). In Hellenistic Judaism the personification of wisdom is carried even further. The student of wisdom follows her like a lover, and wins all the bliss of dwelling with her (Sir. 14:20–27). In the Wisdom of Solomon wisdom is not only present at the creation but is herself creator as the "mother" of all good things and innumerable riches (Wis. 7:12). She sits on the throne of God (9:4), mediating God's salvation (7:27). Similar ideas are found in Philo (Migr. Abr 218; cf. U. Wilckens, sophia, TDNT VII 500 f.), whereas Josephus gives preference to an identification of wisdom and law (Ant. 18, 59 and 82; War 2, 118; cf. TDNT VII 502 f.).

(b) For rabbinic Judaism, wisdom and scriptural erudition are essentially identical. Pre-existent wisdom is understood to be the Torah and the relevant passages correspondingly interpreted (cf. SB I 7a ff., 974 f.; II 353 f.).

4. In the Dead Sea Scrolls the term ḥokmâh emerges relatively rarely and is influenced by the dualism of the sect's theology. God's all-embracing plan for the world, the goal of which is the annihilation of the wicked, is determined by wisdom (1QS 4:18). The elect are allotted the wisdom of the sons of heaven by the Spirit of truth (1QS 4:21 f.). By contrast, the terms related to ḥokmâh – dā'at, bîn and śēkel, insight, knowledge – which in Qumran denote the wisdom of God or insight into God's saving plan, can be found extremely frequently. Commenting on 1QH 12:11 ff.; 2:13 f.; 1QS 4:20, 22, E. E. Ellis sees striking resemblance to the pneumatics of the Pauline community ("Wisdom and Knowledge in 1 Corinthians", TB 25, 1974, 95).

NT In the NT terms from this word-group are found chiefly in 1 Cor. 1–3 (25 times), whereas the Gospels use them relatively rarely and unevenly (Mk. only once; Jn. not at all; Matt. 5 times and Lk. 7 times; and in addition 4 times in Acts). The word-group is found 8 times in the later Pauline writings, 3 times in Jas., once in 2 Pet. and 4 times in Rev.

1. (a) The use of the word-group in the Gospels is in general tied to the traditional OT and Jewish conception, where wisdom is man's approach to life, arising out of his life in the covenant bestowed by God, and so must be regarded as the gift of God. Thus, according to Lk. 2:40, 52, the twelve-year-old Jesus grew in wisdom and insight, and distinguished himself by his exceptional knowledge of the law (a reminder of the Jewish idea that wisdom and knowledge of the law are identical). Mk. 6:2 depicts the astonishment of the inhabitants of Nazareth at the wisdom given to the carpenter's son (cf. Matt. 13:54). In Acts, too, Stephen is represented as a man equipped by God with the Spirit and wisdom, whose testimony cannot be contradicted for this very reason (Acts 6:3, 10). Express reference is made to OT precedents (Acts 7:10; cf. Gen. 39:2 f., 21; 41:40–46; Ps. 105:21). The promise of wisdom for defence speeches in the persecutions of the coming final days (Lk. 21:15) is also formulated in the same terms.

(b) Another – equally Jewish – conception had an effect on a group of sayings which possibly all originate from the Logia-source. The tradition of a personally understood Wisdom, who calls men to her, quite possibly lies behind the remarkable statement that “Wisdom is justified by her deeds” (Matt. 11:19, par. Lk. 7:35 “by her children”). Jesus (and John his witness) are understood as the mouth of Wisdom, who brings salvation. If one includes the introduction to the word of judgment on “this generation”, which in Lk. 11:49 is introduced as a word of the Wisdom of God, but in the par. Matt. 23:34 ff. is understood as a word of Jesus, Jesus could be understood as Wisdom come to earth. When “this generation” is confronted with the Queen of the South who came from the ends of the earth in order to hear → Solomon's wisdom, the implied rebuke is corroborated with the comment, “Behold, something greater than Solomon is here” (Matt. 12:42 par. Lk. 11:31; cf. 1 Ki. 10:1–10; 2 Chr. 9:1–12). This can be understood most easily by thinking of the heavenly Wisdom whom men despise (cf. OT 3 (a)): in Jesus this wisdom has finally appeared. It seems justifiable to speak of a sophia-christology.

2. The same religio-historical material, though according to W. Schmithals and others, with stronger gnostic colouring, plays a rôle in Paul's confrontation with the Corinthian spiritual party whom Schmithals identifies as gnostics (Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971).

(a) In a fundamental and far-reaching exposition in which he develops his theology of the cross, Paul contrasts the wisdom of the world with the message of the cross. God has turned the wisdom of the world into foolishness (1 Cor. 1:20; cf. 3:19). This did not take place with words or arguments, where sentences of worldly wisdom were confronted with sentences of Christian wisdom. Rather, it was through an action, namely through the death of Christ on the → cross, that God has turned the wisdom of the world to foolishness. For as wisdom is not essentially the accumulation of a body of knowledge, but a mode of existence before God, so, too, folly is not a lack of knowledge, but the absence of this mode of existence. Since, however, in God's will “Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God” (1 Cor.

1:24; cf. 1:30) has been revealed, revealed in fact as the Crucified One, and only as the Crucified One (1 Cor. 1:23; 2:2), worldly wisdom which rejects the cross, whether in its Jewish or Greek variety, is objectively proved to be that which it always was: foolishness, i.e. rebellion against God, in the form of human self-exaltation and boasting (1 Cor. 1:29, 31). Men have closed their minds to the wisdom of God as they encountered it in the works of creation, and instead attempted to create their own wisdom (1 Cor. 1:21; cf. Rom. 1:18 ff.). But God has chosen to save those who believe through the foolishness of the preaching of the cross. Every attempt to demand a proof for the truth of God (1 Cor. 1:22) is as condemned to failure as is every attempt to boast of oneself (1 Cor. 3:18 ff.). "Believers are wise in the sense of 3:18 f. They do not advance beyond the situation of hearing and believing (2 Cor. 5:7)" (H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians, Hermeneia, 1975, 48; cf. Rom. 1:16 f.). In this way, however, the very universality both of the event of salvation and of the offer of salvation is preserved. The expression tous pisteuontas, "those who believe" (1 Cor. 1:21), "sets aside every human barrier to salvation" (H. Conzelmann, op. cit., 46; → Faith).

Both the character of the Corinthian congregation and the manner of the apostle's preaching confirm his interpretation of the event of salvation. The election by God of the foolish, weak and despised, which can be seen from the composition of the community in Corinth, shows that God puts to shame those who count as wise by human standards (1 Cor. 1:26 ff.). God's will, announced in the OT word as judging man's pride (1 Cor. 1:19, 31; 3:19 f.), is thus fulfilled. Paul's renunciation of "lofty words of wisdom" (1 Cor. 2:1; cf. especially 2:4 f., 13; 2 Cor. 1:12) serves the sole saving work of the cross, which may not be emptied of its power (1 Cor. 1:17). Yet Paul can still say that he speaks wisdom "among the mature [or perfect, teleiois]", but it is God's wisdom, hidden in the mystery (1 Cor. 2:6 f.). This is due to the fact that Paul takes up ideas of his opponents and tries to put them to a positive use. This is why scholars see reminiscences of the gnostic myth and terminology of the mysteries in this section (1 Cor. 2:6–16). Paul obviously intends to say that rejection of the world's wisdom and emphasis on the cross of Christ does not exclude the experiences and endowment of the Spirit of God (cf. logos sophias, the word of wisdom, in the catalogue of the gifts of the Spirit, 1 Cor. 12:8). While making use of his opponents' scheme of revelation (→ Knowledge, art. ginōskō), Paul is insistent that God's hidden wisdom is revealed by the Spirit, and that those with the gift of the Spirit can discern everything, because they possess the mind of Christ (1 Cor. 2:10–16). Such wisdom, bestowed by the Spirit, does not, however, ignore the offence of the cross, but finds its criterion in it.

(b) This is also the place to inquire about the particular nature of the wisdom advocated in Corinth and contested by Paul. That Paul wished only to reject Gk. philosophy and rhetoric, i.e., that his fight is directed simply against percipient → reason, is difficult to accept. "It is not accidental that the teaching of 1 Cor. 1:18 ff. is found in a context where Paul is laying a carefully worked-out foundation. . . . The paradox of the divine activity is intended to be understood!" (G. Bornkamm, Studien zur Antike und Urchristentum. Gesammelte Aufsätze, II, 1963², 120 f.).

Perhaps one may suppose that the polemic of the apostle is directed against an over-subtle extension of the sophia-christology and the resultant disregard of the cross of Christ, along with the ensuing growth of factions. The Corinthians believed that they shared in the wisdom which came into the world in Christ. As the people who had reached perfection, they had been exempted from the degradation of the cross. They therefore strove for personal perfection in the gifts of the Spirit, in knowledge and in wisdom, neglecting their responsibility to build up the whole congregation (1 Cor. 14). It was only Christ, who disregarded worldly concerns and drew others away from the world, who was of interest to them – not the Crucified One. Jesus thus served as an example of the earthly Pneumatic (a point disputed by Paul in 2 Cor. 5). This foolishness leads to pride and party division in a community. The preaching of the cross (and thus the paradoxical way to wisdom via the foolishness of preaching, 1 Cor. 3:18) is therefore the call to freedom from self-glorification and adherence to party division. It is thus the foundation and guarantee of the unity of the Christian community (1 Cor. 3:18–23).

(c) In the hymn which concludes the exposition of the mystery of Israel's election, Paul praises "the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God" (Rom. 11:33). It is revealed in his inscrutable judgments and ways (Rom. 11:33 f.; cf. Isa. 40:13 f.), and is thus not to be extolled in speculation, but experienced in history. This salvation-history reference, along with the reminiscences of Prov. 8, allows us to understand wisdom here as the work of the Creator, who is at the same time the Lord and Perfecter of history. There is then no contradiction with the statement in 1 Cor. 1:24, 30 that Christ is the wisdom of God.

(d) That Paul can use sophos in its ordinary non-technical sense is shown by 1 Cor. 3:10, where he describes himself as a "wise master-builder" of the community, and possibly also by the question in 1 Cor. 6:5, as to whether there was in the community no wise man able to give judgment, so that the community need not make a claim on heathen courts.

3. In the later Pauline Epistles, wisdom is understood as a gift of the grace of God (Eph. 1:8, 17; Col. 1:9, along with synesis, insight, understanding, and phronēsis, insight, understanding), in which the believer may grow. The content of this teaching of wisdom revealed by the Spirit, to which belongs a corresponding manner of life (Col. 1:10; 4:5; Eph. 5:15), is the → mystery of God – Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col. 2:3). The christology developed here links on to the OT and Jewish conception of Wisdom hidden in God before the creation of the world (Prov. 8; Sir. 24). Within the scope of the divine economy (→ House, art. oikonomia NT), this wisdom will be revealed in the fullness of time in Christ through the church (Eph. 3:9 f.; 1:10).

4. For James wisdom is demonstrated in good behaviour by works of kindness (Jas. 3:13). The letter obviously has to deal with opponents who (like those in Corinth) claimed for themselves wisdom "from above", but caused wrangling and strife (Jas. 3:15 f.; cf. M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, James, Hermeneia, 1976, 210 ff.). Jas. does not go into the convictions underlying this claim, but describes wisdom as peaceable, full of compassion and without hypocrisy (Jas. 3:17; → Humility, art. prays). For such wisdom one must pray to God (Jas. 1:5).

5. In Revelation sophia is praised in two hymnic texts as an attribute of God (Rev. 7:12; cf. also Rom. 16:27); it is also to be attributed to the slain Lamb at his exaltation (Rev. 5:12). The exalted Christ has the same power and wisdom as God. In the two other passages (Rev. 13:18; 17:9), sophia is the secret knowledge of Christians, on the basis of which they can interpret the apocalyptic mysteries and events of their time.

J. Goetzmann

6. For detailed examination of the idea of the pre-existence of wisdom see R. G. Hamerton-Kelly, Pre-Existence, Wisdom, and the Son of Man: A Study of the Idea of Pre-Existence in the New Testament, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 21, 1973. The author defines pre-existence as “a mythological term which signifies that an entity had a real existence before its manifestation on earth, either in the mind of God or in heaven” (op. cit., 11). Some entities may be said to pre-exist because they exist with God before their own manifestation. The Logos in Jn., on the other hand, is seen as existing before the manifestation of anything at all. For Bultmann the pre-existence of Christ signifies only that the proclamation which Christ’s presence caused has its origin outside this world (op. cit., 271; cf. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1951, 305). Hamerton-Kelly sees the clearest expression of pre-existence teaching in Philo, Jn. and Heb., the two latter drawing directly on Jewish apocalyptic and wisdom traditions and also Hellenistic Judaism. But Jn. and Heb. are not the only sources of such interest in the NT. Summing up the rôle of wisdom in biblical thought, Hamerton-Kelly writes: “Wisdom in early Judaism might be said to be the essence of the creation, its inherent form. It was the blueprint according to which the universe was created. To that extent it could be regarded as a determinant of history from the beginning rather than the future. In this respect it should be compared with the idea of the plan of God in apocalyptic. The idea of a primordially given plan of which history is simply the outworking is indeed present in the thought of early Judaism and the New Testament. Does this rob history of its ‘newness’ and the future of its power? We think not. Wisdom as the essence of the universe and also the true man is chiefly to be revealed in the end. Its prior manifestation in Christ is preliminary and provisional – it does not impose a pattern on history ‘from behind’... Paul emphasized this especially – true humanity lies in the future and is not a return to a primordial state. There is also in apocalyptic the idea that all history has been arranged from the beginning, and this cannot be minimized. However, from the point of view of man in time, history is still spontaneous and new since the plan is not known to him” (op. cit., 279 f.).

7. The vb. sophizō is found in the act. in Pss. 19(18):8; 105(104):22; 119(118):98 in the sense of “make wise”. It is used of wisdom in 1 Ki. 5:11; Prov. 16:17; Sir. 50:28, and with negative overtones in Eccl.7:16; Sir. 7:5; 32:4. Its use in 2 Tim. 3:14 f. is similar to that in the Pss.: “But as for you, continue in what you have learned and have firmly believed, knowing from whom you have learned it and how from childhood you have been acquainted with the sacred writings which are able to instruct you for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus [ta dynamena se sophisai eis sōtērian dia pisteōs tēs en Christō Iēsou]” (→ Scripture). It occurs in the pass. in 2 Pet. 1:16 in insisting that the faith proclaimed is not based on myths but on personal and historical encounter: “For we did not follow cleverly devised myths [ou gar sesophismenois mythois exakolouthēsantes] when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses of his majesty.”

C. Brown

φιλοσοφία

φιλοσοφία (philosophia), love of wisdom, philosophy; φιλόσοφος (philosophos), philosopher.

CL 1. philosophia, a compound of philos, friend, and sophia, wisdom, means love of wisdom, the sciences, or aspiration towards it. The noun philosophos can be found first in Heracl. (Frag. 35d), the vb. philosophēō in Hdt. (1, 30). However, according to ancient tradition (e.g. Diog. Laert., Prooem. 12; 8, 8), Pythagoras is said to have used the noun philosophos previously.

2. In Gk. and Hellenistic philosophy the following nuances in the meaning of the word philosophia can be shown:

(a) Amongst the Pre-Socratics philosophia initially means striving towards any kind of scientific activity. The term philosophy was then narrowed down and used for the question as to the origin of the world from a single primary substance (natural philosophy).

(b) Classical philosophy. (i) In Socrates the whole weight falls on the first half of the word philo-sophia, and so more on the act itself than on the result. Philosophy became the aspiration to wisdom, generally, of course, combined with the knowledge that one never attains to this. (ii) According to Plato, philosophy is the knowledge of reality, the eternal and immortal. He differentiated between Sophists, philosophers and wise men; the sophistēs is the one who believes that he possesses wisdom, and who pretends to be able to teach it. The philosophos, on the other hand, is the modest man who knows that he knows nothing, but seized by love for wisdom, searches after it his whole life long without ever entirely attaining to it. The designation sophos, wise, befits the gods alone. (iii) Aristotle understood philosophy in the narrowest sense to mean metaphysics, the investigation of the cause and principles of things or of the world of appearances (Met. 1, 3, p. 983b, 2 and p. 983a, 24 ff.).

(c) In Hellenistic philosophy the term philosophia acquired an almost religious significance. Its goal is happiness (Eudaimonism). This the philosophers (Stoics, Epicureans) propagate, wandering around as itinerant teachers. Philosophy as the way to happiness thus consists, for the Stoics, in striving for theoretical and especially practical excellence, i.e. for → virtue.

The Epicureans, on the other hand, define philosophia as the pursuit of happiness by means of, and allowing the possibility of, → reason. Here practical philosophy (ethics) dominates, to which rationality (logic) and the physical sciences are made subservient. (On philosophy in the ancient world generally see O. Michel, philosophia etc., TDNT IX 172–79; F. C. Copleston, A History of Philosophy, I, Greece and Rome, 1966².)

3. In the mystery religions and gnosticism philosophia is no longer concerned with the rational understanding of the world (in the sense of classical Gk. tradition) but depicts reality from the religious viewpoint. It therefore runs into religious speculation for which the gnostic Hermetic writings are exemplary. In the tractate Asclepius the true philosophy is defined as the quest for religious knowledge. Philosophy should thus fulfil the function of a spiritual worship and be entirely subsumed in such religious practice. It is hence the task of the prophet to nourish the soul by philosophy and magic (Corp. Herm. 23).

OT 1. Both the noun philosophia and the vb. philosopheō are found in the LXX only in 4 Macc. (1:1; 5:10, 22; 7:9, 21; and 5:6, 11; 7:21, 24 respectively). They are thus without Heb. equivalent. By contrast philosophos occurs as the equivalent of ʾaššāp, Aram. enchanter, in Dan. 1:20, where, judging by the context, conjurers must be meant. It is also found in 4 Macc. 1:1; 5:35; 7:7.

2. In developed Judaism philosophia is known as a word and a concept. Indeed, Hellenistic Judaism presented itself as philosophy:

(a) For Philo philosophia is synonymous with religion. He describes the Mosaic law as hē patrios philosophia, “the ancestral philosophy”, i.e. the way of salvation (Leg. Gai. 156). He can therefore with pride call all Jews philosophers (Mut. Nom. 39).

(b) For Josephus, too, the Jewish religion and philosophy are identical. He therefore presents the communities of Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes as three philosophical schools (War 2, 119; Ant. 18, 11).

(c) Philosophy and the Jewish religion are also equated in 4 Macc. The tyrant Antiochus is able to ridicule Judaism as “preposterous philosophy” (4 Macc. 5:10). Conversely, the martyrs appear as the representatives of “divine philosophy” (4 Macc. 7:9).

NT 1. In the NT the term philosophia occurs only in Col. 2:8, where a warning is given against it. The specific nature of this philosophia is characterized by the apposition kata ta stoicheia tou kosmou, “according to the elements of the world”. (On the meaning of “elements” → Law, art. stoicheia; cf. also E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon, Hermeneia, 1971, 94–99.) The elements of the world are thus the most important characteristic of this Colossian philosophy, which had become widespread in the Asia Minor community. With these elements of the world we are concerned not with natural components of Being, in the sense of scientific analysis and philosophical knowledge of the laws of the world, but with personal powers (Col. 2:18), which constrain people under fixed precepts. In the view of the representatives of this philosophy, the → body of Christ constitutes the unity of these elements of the world, i.e. Christ is the embodiment of the elements of the world.

The religio-historical background stems from a gnosticized Judaism, in which Jewish and Iranian-Persian ideas, and perhaps also Chaldaean astrology, have been intimately woven together and linked with Christianity. In Iranian thought, in particular, there is the myth of a divinity whose body is composed of the elements of the universe.

Paul therefore combats this Colossian philosophy, because its adherents looked for fulfilment in the elements of the world and not in the saving deeds of the death and resurrection of Christ. Thus the warning against philosophy in Col. 2:8 does not refer to classical Gk. philosophy, nor to the scholastic philosophy of Hellenism, but to a common speculative doctrine which found expression in gnosticism (cf. M. Dibelius, An die Kolosser, Epheser, an Philemon, HNT 12, 1953³; E. Lohmeyer, Die Briefe an die Philipper, an die Kolosser und an Philemon, KEK 9, 1948¹⁴; but for further discussion see M. D. Hooker, “Were there False Teachers in Colossae?”, in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament. In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973, 315–32, who contends that there was no Colossian error).

However, there may be allusions to philosophia in the NT even where the word itself is not mentioned. Perhaps, philosophy is meant in 1 Cor. 3:19; this is not a polemic directed against philosophical endeavour as such, but only against its being a way to salvation (para tō theō, with God, from God's perspective). The Bible does not reject philosophy per se: only its false self-assessment as a way of salvation.

2. The noun philosophos is used only in Acts 17:18 in the Lucan account of the Areopagus speech. The Epicurean and Stoic philosophers confronted Paul before the beginning of his speech on the Areopagus. Whereas one group (Luke probably thinks of the Epicureans) bluntly rejected the apostolic message, the others (the Stoics) showed a certain interest towards the Christian proclamation. But in the end it remained incomprehensible to them as well, and they rejected it. (For literature and interpretations of Paul's address → God, art. theos NT 4 (b); Knowledge, art. agnōō NT 2 (a).)

H. Weigelt

→ Curse, → Fear, → Knowledge, → Mind, → Reason, → Secret, → Spirit, → Think, → Truth, → Word

(a). G. Barth, "Matthew's Understanding of the Law", in G. Barth, G. Bornkamm and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963, 58–164; G. Bertram, mōros etc., TDNT IV 832–47; and phrēn etc., TDNT IX 222–35; S. H. Blank, "Wisdom", IDB IV 849–61; G. Bornkamm, "Faith and Reason in Paul", in Early Christian Experience, 1969, 29–46; "The Revelation of God's Wrath (Romans 1–3)", ibid., 47–70; and "The Heresy of Colossians", in F. O. Francis and W. A. Meeks, eds., Conflict at Colossae: A Problem in the Interpretation of Early Christianity Illustrated by Selected Modern Studies, Sources for Biblical Study 4, Society for Biblical Literature, 1973, 123–46; R. E. Brown, The Gospel according to John, Anchor Bible, I, 1966, cxxii–cxxv; W. Brueggemann, In Man We Trust, 1972; G. E. Bryce, "Omen-Wisdom in Ancient Israel", JBL 94, 1975, 19–37; H. Conzelmann, syniēmi etc., TDNT VII 888–96; 1 Corinthians, Hermeneia, 1975; "The Mother of Wisdom", in J. M. Robinson, ed., The Future of our Religious Past. Essays in Honour of Rudolf Bultmann, 1971, 230–43; and "Wisdom in the New Testament", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 956–60; J. L. Crenshaw, ed., Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, 1976; "Wisdom", in J. H. Hayes, ed., The Old Testament and Form Criticism, 1974, 225–64; and "Wisdom in the Old Testament", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 225–64; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology, 1955², 147–76; M. Dibelius, "Paul on the Areopagus", in Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, 1956, 26–77; C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, 1953; T. Donald, "The Semantic Field of 'Folly' in Proverbs, Job, Psalms and Ecclesiastes", VT 13, 1963, 285–92; E. E. Ellis, "Wisdom and 'Knowledge' in 1 Corinthians", TB 25, 1974, 82–98; R. Gordis, "The Social Background of Wisdom Literature", Hebrew Union College Annual 18, 1943–44, 77–118; E. I. Gordon, Sumerian Proverbs, 1959; and "A New Look at the Wisdom of Sumer and Akkad", Bibliotheca Orientalis 17, 1960, 122–52; R. M. Grant, "The Wisdom of the Corinthians", in F. C. Grant, The Joy of Study, 1951, 51–55; N. C. Habel, "The Symbolism of the Book of Proverbs", Interpretation 26, 1972, 131–57; R. G. Hamerton-Kelly, Pre-Existence, Wisdom and the Son of Man, 1973; J. R. Harris, "Athena, Sophia and the Logos", BJRL 7, 1922, 56 ff.; M. D. Hooker, "Were there False Teachers at Colossae?", in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament. In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973, 315–32; D. A. Hubbard, "The Wisdom Movement and Israel's Covenant Faith", TB 17, 1966, 3–33; H. Jaeger, "The Patristic Conception of Wisdom in the Light of Biblical and Rabbinical Research", in F. L. Cross, ed., Studia Patristica, TU 79, 1961, 96–106; D. Kidner, The Proverbs, TC, 1964; J. A. Kirk, "The Meaning of Wisdom in James: Examination of a Hypothesis", NTS 16, 1969–70, 1–23; W. L. Knox, "The Divine Wisdom", JTS 38, 1937, 230–37; W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature, 1960; M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature, I–II, 1973–76; D. B. Macdonald, The Hebrew Philosophical Genius, 1936; W. McKane, Prophets and Wise Men, SBT 44, 1965; and Proverbs: A New Approach, 1970; J. L. McKenzie, "Reflections on Wisdom", JBL 86, 1967, 1–9; O. Michel, philosophia etc., TDNT IX 172–88; M. Noth and D. W. Thomas, eds., Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East, (Essays presented to H. H. Rowley) Supplements to VT 3, 1955; W. O. E. Oesterley, The Wisdom of Egypt and the Old Testament, 1927; H. P. Owen, "The Scope of Natural Revelation in Rom. 1 and Acts 17", NTS 5, 1958–59, 133–43; B. De Pinto, "Word and Wisdom in St. John", Script. 19, 1967, 19–27; J. B. Pritchard, ed., "Didactic Wisdom and Literature", ANET 405–52; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 418–59; "Job XXXVIII and Ancient Egyptian Wisdom", in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1966, 281–91; "The Joseph Narrative and Ancient Wisdom", ibid. 292–300; and Wisdom in Israel, 1972; O. S. Rankin, Israel's Wisdom Literature, 1936; H. Ranston, The Old Testament Wisdom Books and their Teaching, 1930; H. Ringgren, Word and Wisdom: Studies in the Hypostatization of Divine Qualities and Functions in the Ancient Near East, (Dissertation, Lund) 1947; J. M. Robinson, "Logoi Sophōn: On the Gattung of Q", in J. M. Robinson, ed., op. cit., 84–130; J. M. Robinson and H. Koester, Trajectories through Early Christianity, 1971; H. H. Rowley, Job, New Century Bible, 1970; J. C. Rylaarsdam, Revelation in Jewish Christian Literature, 1946; W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971; R. B. Y. Scott, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Anchor Bible, 1965; "The Study of the Wisdom Literature", Interpretation 24, 1970, 20–45; and The Way of Wisdom in the Old Testament, 1971; R. Scroggs, "Paul: Sophos and Pneumatikos", NTS 14, 1967–68, 33–55; W. K. Simpson, ed., The Literature of Ancient Egypt, 1973; J. G. Snaith, Ecclesiasticus or the Wisdom of Jesus Son of Sirach, 1974; P. W. Skehan, Studies in Israelite Poetry and Wisdom, 1971; N. B. Stonehouse, Paul before the Areopagus and Other New Testament Studies, 1957; M. J. Suggs, Wisdom, Christology and Law in Matthew's Gospel, 1970; R. N. Whybray, Wisdom in Proverbs, SBT 45, 1965; and The Intellectual Tradition in the Old Testament, BZAW 135, 1974; U. Wilckens and G. Fohrer, sophia etc., TDNT VII 465–528; R. J. Williams, "Wisdom in the Ancient Near East", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 949–52; G. Ziener, "Wisdom", EBT III 969–76; F. Zimmermann, The Inner World of Qohelet, 1973.

(b). E. G. Bauckmann, "Die Proverbien und die Sprüche des Jesus Sirach. Eine Untersuchung zum Strukturwandel der israelitischen Weisheitslehre", ZAW 72 (Neue Folge 31), 1960, 33–63; C. Bauer-Kayatz, Einführung in die alttestamentliche Weisheit, 1969; R. Baumann, Mitte und Norm des Christlichen, NTAbh 5, 1968; W. Baumgartner, Israelitische und altorientalische Weisheit, 1933; J. Becker, Gottesfurcht im Alten Testament, 1965; G. Bornkamm, "Der Lobpreis Gottes (Röm. 11, 33–36)", in Das Ende des Gesetzes. Paulusstudien. Gesammelte Aufsätze, I, BEvTh 16, 1961³, 70–75; E. Brandenburger, Geist und Fleisch, WMANT 29, 1968; F.-M. Braun, Jean le Théologien dans l'Antienne Église, II, 1964; and "Saint Jean, la Sagesse et l'Histoire", in Neotestamentica et Patristica. Eine Freundesgabe, Herrn Professor Dr. Oscar Cullmann zu seinem 60. Geburtstag überreicht, Supplements to NovT 6, 1962, 123–33; E. Bresciani, Letteratura e Poesia dell'antico Egitto, 1969; A. de Buck, "Het religieuze Karakter der oudste Egyptische Wijsheid", Nieuw theologisch Tijdschrift 21, 1932, 322–49; W. Burkert, "Platon oder Pythagoras? Zum Ursprung des Wortes 'Philosophie'", Hermes 88, 1960, 159–77; W. Caspari, "Über den biblischen Begriff der Torheit", Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift 39, 1928, 668–95; F. Christ, Jesus Sophia. Die Sophia-Christologie bei den Synoptikern, ATHANT 57, 1970; M. Conti, "La Sophia di 2 Petr. 3, 15", Rivista Biblica Italiana 17, 1969, 121–38; H. Conzelmann, "Paulus und die Weisheit", NTS 12, 1965–66, 231–44; J. J. A. van Dijk, La Sagesse Suméro-Accadienne, 1953; A. M. Dubarle, Les Sages d'Israël, 1946; L. Dürr, Das Erziehungswesen im Alten Testament und im antiken Orient, 1932; W. Eltester, "Gott und die Natur in der Areopagrede", Festschrift für Rudolf Bultmann, BZNW 21, 1957, 202–27; and "Schöpfungsoffenbarung und natürliche Theologie im frühen Christentum", NTS 3, 1956–57, 93–114; A. Feuillet, "Jésus et la Sagesse divine d'après les Évangiles Synoptiques; Le 'Logion Johannique' et l'Ancien Testament", RB 62, 1955, 161–96; and Le Christ. Sagesse de Dieu d'après les Épîtres Pauliniennes, 1966; J. Fichtner, Die altorientalische Weisheit des Alten Testaments in ihrer israelitisch-jüdischen Ausprägung, BZAW 62, 1933; J. de Finance, "La sophia chez S. Paul", RSR 25, 1935, 385–417; G. Fohrer, Die Weisheit im Alten Testament, BZAW 115, 1969; H. Gese, Lehre und Wirklichkeit in der alten Weisheit, 1958; and "Weisheit", *RGG*³ VI 1574 ff.; H. O. Gibb, "Torheit" und "Rätsel" im Neuen Testament, 1941; J. Güttmann, Die Philosophie des Judentums, 1933; P. Heinisch, Die persönliche Weisheit des Alten Testaments in religionsgeschichtlicher Beleuchtung, 1923; H. J. Hermisson, Studien zur israelitischen Spruchweisheit, 1968; P. van Imschoot, "Sagesse et Esprit dans l'Ancien Testament", RB 47, 1938, 23–49; E. Käsemann, "Die Legitimität des Apostels", ZNW 41, 1942, 33 ff.; J. C. Lebram, "Die Theologie des späten Chokma und häretisches Judentum", ZAW 77, 1965, 202–11; and "Nachbiblische Weisheitstraditionen", VT 15, 1965, 167–237; J. Leclant et al., Les Sagesse du Proche-Orient Ancien, 1963; B. L. Mack, Logos und Sophia, StUNT 10, 1973; J. Marböck, Weisheit im Wandel, 1971; S. Plath, Furcht Gottes, 1962; O. Rickenbacher, Weisheitssperikopen bei Ben Sira, Orbis Biblicus et Orientalis 1, 1973; M. Saebø, 'a'wīl, THAT I 77 ff.; ḥokmāh, THAT I 557–67; k 'šīl, THAT I 836 ff.; and nabāl, THAT II 26–31; H. Schlier, "Kerygma und Sophia", EvTh 10, 1950–51, 481 ff. (reprinted in Die Zeit der Kirche, 1956, 206 ff.); H. H. Schmid, Wesen und Geschichte der Weisheit, BZAW 101, 1966; C. Spicq, "La Vertu de Prudence dans l'Ancien Testament", RB 42, 1933, 187–210; W. Staerk, "Die sieben Säulen der Welt und des Hauses der Weisheit", ZNW 35, 1936, 232–61; R. Stecher, "Die persönliche Weisheit in den Proverbien, Kap. 8", ZKT 75, 411–51; U. Wilckens, "Kreuz und Weisheit", KuD 3, 1957, 77 ff.; and Weisheit und Torheit. Eine exegetisch-religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu 1 Kor. 1/2, BHTh 26, 1959; H. Windisch, "Die göttliche Weisheit der Juden und die paulinische Christologie", in Neutestamentliche Studien für G. Heinrici, 1914, 220–34; G. Ziener, "Die theologische Begriffssprache im Buche der Weisheit", Bonner Biblische Beiträge 11, 1956, 109–13; and "Weisheitsbuch und Johannesevangelium", Biblica 348, 1957, 416 ff.; W. Zimmerli, "Zur Struktur der alttestamentlichen Weisheit", ZAW 51, 1933, 177–204.

Witness, Testimony

μαρτυρία	μαρτυρία (martyria), testimony, testifying, attestation; μαρτυρέω (martyreō), bear witness, testify; μαρτύριον (martyrion), testimony, evidence, proof; μαρτύρομαι (martyromai), testify, bear witness, affirm; μάρτυς (martyς), a witness; διαμαρτύρομαι (diamartyromai), charge, adjure, bear witness to, testify of; καταμαρτυρέω (katamartyreō), bear witness against, testify against someone; συμμαρτυρέω (symmartyreō), testify in support, confirm; ψευδομαρτυρέω (pseudomartyreō), bear false witness; ψευδομαρτυρία (pseudomartyria), false witness; ψευδομάρτυς (pseudomartyς), one who gives false testimony.
-----------------	---

CL 1. (a) The noun martyria means making an active appearance and statements as a witness (martyς), the earliest form of the basic noun being martyros in Homer, then later Aeolic martyr. martyria, denoting the confirmation of a fact or an event, is attested from Hom. Od. 11, 325 onwards, and cognate with mermēros, that which requires many minds, going back with this word to the common Indo-European root smer*, to be mindful of, from which merimnaō, to be concerned, may also be formed (cf. Lat. memor, mindful of). Its lexical content may be more precisely defined as reflective, interrogative recollection, re-call, i.e. calling up into consciousness something one has experienced which cannot be ignored or forgotten, and which is now in this sense brought to the notice of others, in order to impart to them by means of appropriate statements the content of this experience: that which has been experienced shall become evident by means of the testimony (cf. Plato, Symp. 179b).

(b) From the 5th cent. B.C. there are found the derived vbs. martyreō, to bear witness, to be a witness for something, or to confirm something to someone's advantage by giving evidence (Hdt., 8, 95), or to testify that something is the case (Heracl., 34; Soph., Ant. 515; OC 1265), and martyromai, to call someone as a witness (Plato, Phlb. 12b). Also found are the nouns martyrion for the evidence, the proof, which, by contrast with the act of giving evidence, refers more to the content of the statement (Hdt., 2, 2; 8, 55) or to a piece of evidence (a victor's crown, Plato, Leg. 12, 943; a document or deeds; even objects such as tombs and archaeological finds as proof of earlier settlements; also quotations from famous authors or poets), and martyς for the witness himself (evidenced in the earliest inscriptions). The gods can be invoked as witnesses in the form of oath (→ Swear; e.g. Pindar, Pyth. 4:167, of Zeus); but men can also be summoned or brought forward as witnesses to confirm a claim or to illuminate some fact (Plato, Grg. 471c; Leg. 836c; Rep. 364c).

Of the compounds symmartyreō, to be a witness with someone, testify in support, is already found in Soph. and Thuc. From Plato, Leg. 3, 680d, and Xen., Hell. 7, 135, it means to confirm in the sense of the correspondence of a second or further piece of evidence which is added to one already given. katomartyreō means to give evidence against someone (4th cent., Lysias and Isoc. onwards); diamartyromai to call in as a witness, then (Xen., Hell. 3, 2, 13) to certify, to attest, and even to urge strongly, to conjure (Diod. Sic., 18, 62, 2). The pseudomartys, the one whose statement does not accord with the truth, but who twists or covers it up, and the pseudomartyria, testimony which is incorrect or falsified, are also mentioned by Plato (Grg. 472b, where he cites the Sophists by way of example, Diels-Kranz, II, 300, 10; 398, 25 f.); likewise the cognate vb. pseudomartyreō, to bear false witness (Leg. 9, 939c). Thus on functional grounds the statement has become dissociated from the recollection, and the relationship from the championing of truthfulness.

2. (a) The original setting of the word-group in the Gk. world is clearly the legal sphere. Witnesses appear to give evidence in a trial in respect of events now lying in the past (cf. the analysis in 1(a)), or are called in as so-called formal witnesses in order to provide substantiation in the future, for legal transactions or for solemn confirmation in the finalizing and signing of agreements; in general these are mentioned by name and add their own signatures immediately below the text. The martyria in a trial is to be given freely, i.e. without constraint or against one's better knowledge (such as by torture), and is normally distinguished from the oath itself as a substantiation of one's statements by invocation of the gods when obvious proof is lacking (cf. the description of Anaximenes of Lampsacus in Aristotle, Rhetorica ad Alexandrum, referred to in TDNT IV 476 n. 10). martyria is thus initially always action; but it can then take on the sense of martyrion, evidence, as the content of the statement made, whereas the latter can never have the sense of an action. The invocation of the gods as witnesses has its place, where human witnesses or given circumstances cannot be adduced. Thus in Plato, Ap. 31c, Socrates offers his poverty as evidence that he did not teach for the sake of profit. The words of the group originally always stood – in the legal sphere as in the wider world of public and private relationships – for “the establishment of events or actual relations or facts of experience on the basis of direct personal knowledge” (H. Strathmann, TDNT IV 478).

This is typical for the rational structure of Gk. thought. Only in grammar can one still see that the witness with his testimony always appears for and thus at the same time against someone (dat. of person; what he testifies is in the acc. or in a hoti clause). In primitive conceptions of the witness he combines his mental powers with the person for whom he is testifying, in order to help him to victory, thus interceding more for the person than – in the strict sense – for the case.

(b) Even before Aristotle, who in Rhet. 1, 15 submitted a different analysis, a proximate and additional use of the word had established itself, by which the martyria was no longer intended to substantiate something objectively given, but instead expressed moral or philosophical convictions. This use of the word can already be perceived in Plato's Apology with reference to Socrates, but it acquired its great importance primarily from the time of the Stoics. The Cynic or Stoic philosopher regarded himself as a witness called to give evidence on behalf of divine truth, in that he testified to the truth of his ideas and doctrines by his conduct in adverse circumstances – his endurance of suffering, and his acceptance of his conditions as training, not allowing himself to be shaken by them (cf. especially Epictetus, Dissertationes 1, 29, 46 ff.; 3, 22, 86 ff.). This kind of martyria is of course not identical with the later Christian concept of martyrdom, even though death may well be included.

OT 1. (a) It is immediately apparent in the LXX that the commonest member of the word-group is the noun martyrion (in total over 290 instances), by far the greater part of these cases being found in Exod. and Num., and 45 in Lev., Here as in some passages in the Chronicler (e.g. 1 Chr. 9:21; 23:32; 2 Chr. 5:5; 24:6), it may refer to the two tablets with the Sinaitic commandments (dyo plakes tou martyriou, Exod. 31:18; 32:15). It is also frequently used of the skēnē tou martyriou, the → tent of the testimony (AV, “the tabernacle of the congregation”; Exod. 29:4, 10 f.; 40:2 ff.; Lev. 4:4 ff.; Num. 4:25 ff.; cf. also the kibōtos tou martyriou, the box or ark of the testimony, Exod. 40:3; 5:21; Lev. 16:2; Num. 4:5). martyrion has here a sense which accords with its later usage in cl. Gk., namely that of the piece of evidence which calls to mind a particular event, or of the deeds (such as the founding of the → covenant or of the → Law).

The Heb. mō'ēd, rendered c. 130 times by martyrion in combination with skēnē, tent, means the time or place of appointment, implying that at this place Yahweh wished to meet his covenant-people. It is the Heb. noun ēdūt, rendered equally (some 35 times) by martyrion in the phrase kibōtos tou martyriou, ark of the testimony, that denotes the solemnly given and accepted ordinance, the law with its recognized obligations. In that the same Gk. noun assimilated both meanings, its meaning almost inevitably had to shift from the act of encounter to the place of evidence, and from thence to the observance of the Law (the tablets standing as pars pro toto for the totality of the covenant ordering). Only where one could still hear the ring of the Heb. word could any knowledge – even for the Jews of the Diaspora – of the original intention, namely, the revelatory speaking of God, be retained. Strathmann has argued (TDNT IV 482) that in some places this translation completely distorts the sense of mō'ēd (1 Sam. 13:8, 11; 20:35), and that in others there has been a false reading of the Heb. word (Mic. 7:8; Prov. 29:14; Amos 1:11; Zeph. 3:8; Isa. 37[30]:20; Job 15:34).

While instances such as Gen. 31:44 (the covenant stele of Laban and Jacob) and Jos. 22:27 f.; 24:27 have the meaning of a monument, the material memorial, there is another usage of martyrion which, by virtue of the context, comes closer to the original intention of mō'ēd, and which occurs only in two small groups of instances: first, Hos. 2:12(14) and Wis. 10:7, where the desolations in the land are (a piece of) evidence for men's guilt and the ensuing judgment; and, secondly, passages in the Pss., namely the 23 attestations in Ps. 118(119). In this probably post-exilic writing, which is also stamped with the spirit of Deuteronomic and Wisdom thought (possibly the expression of a stronger tendency to individualize piety), the “document” character recedes behind that of “testimony”, not only in the sense of the Torah as a given and fixed law, but especially as advice (almost at times personally addressed to the individual), as direction for his way of life, which the psalmist loves (v. 119), marvels at (v. 129) and will observe (vv. 88, 146, 167 f.). martyrion, as the embodiment and expression of the covenant, is here the means of knowing Yahweh.

(b) With 7 canonical and 5 apocryphal attestations, martyria is used comparatively rarely for the same equivalent Heb. words. Indeed, in 1 Sam. 8:24 Heb. mô'ed would be better rendered by some temporal designation such as kairos, point of → time (art. kairos), whereas Prov. 12:19; 25:18 and Sir. 34(31):23 f. describe the act of giving testimony, which can be characterized as truthful, lying or unjust. The noun martys (54 occurrences, rendering of Heb. 'ed), on the other hand, is used in the classical sense for one who gives testimony on the basis of observation, or who in the legal sense is enlisted to confirm a state of affairs, an agreement. Examples include the contract of Boaz in Ruth 4:9 ff., where the elders of the town are called as witnesses, and especially the procedural stipulations in Deut. 17:6 f.; 19:15 ff.; Num. 35:30, whereby a decision may only be given on the basis of the evidence of more than one witness. In the agreement between Laban and Jacob (Gen. 31:44 ff.), and also in Samuel's rendering of account (1 Sam. 12:3 ff.) Yahweh the Lord is named and invoked as witness (cf. Jer. 42[49]:5; cf. Job 16:20; Ps. 89[88]:37; also Wis. 1:6). Similarly in the prophetic oracle, Jer. 36(29):23, Yahweh comes forward as a witness against Israel. On the whole, however, even these passages remain within the realm of statements which substantiate human behaviour. This is the reason why, especially in the Pss. (27[26]:12; 35[34]:11) and Prov. (e.g. 12:17, 19; 14:5, 25) and also in Isa. 8:2, the central question – as with martyria itself – is that of the trustworthiness or mendacity of the witnesses. The latter is abominated and stands under severe threat of punishment or even divine threat of judgment (cf. Exod. 23:1; Deut. 19:16 ff.). Only in the later chapters of Isa. does another understanding occur, when in Isa. 43:10, 12; 44:8 the members of the nation are ordered to come forward as witnesses amongst the nations to the uniqueness and righteousness of Yahweh. Even though the context takes the form of an eschatological lawsuit, the Servant Songs (Isa. 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12) suggest something like a missionary rôle for the nation.

(c) Of the verbal forms the simple martyreō is attested only 17 times: for legal testimony (Num. 35:30; Deut. 19:15, 18); but also for the commemorative function of a monument (Gen. 31:46 ff.) and the Song of Moses (Deut. 31:19, 21), which, as a document of the covenant, could become an indictment against those who break it. katamartyreō (occurring 5 times) is used in 1 Ki. 21(20):10, 13; Dan. 6:25[24]; and Prov. 25:18 in the sense of consciously false evidence, leading to the condemnation of the accused (in Job 15:6 by Eliphaz for the indictment which Job's own statements present against him). The meaning of epimartyromai, which is similarly used for hā'ed (1 Ki. 2:42[3:1]; Neh. 9:29 f.; 13:15, 21; but also Amos 3:13; Jer. 32[39]:25), comes from the way that men are given cause to recall some previous directive, are obliged to confirm it, and thus are admonished or warned. pseudomartyreō means to bear deliberate false testimony only in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:16; Deut. 5:17[20] for 'anâh, to answer). The most important compound remains diamartyromai (equally used for hā'ed), which originally meant to call up or to enlist someone as a witness (thus Deut. 4:26; 31:28; 2 Ki. 17:13; Jer. 32[39]:10; Mal. 2:14), but is thus also used for the passing on and enjoining the people of the instructions received from Yahweh (Exod. 18:20; 19:10, 21 in commands to Moses, but also Neh. 9:26, 34). It can then have the sense both of to warn, to exhort, to testify on oath (e.g. in the name of God, Ps. 50[49]:7), and also of to certify, to promise (e.g. Zech. 3:6[7]).

2. (a) The analysis of the use of the word shows that, apart from the special case of the use of martyrion for Heb. mô'ēd (see above, 1 (a)), the words of this group essentially remain within the framework already adumbrated in classical Gk., or at least are not aware of the understanding shaped by the Stoics. One is a witness for something one has experienced, or one is enlisted as such for an event. It is something extraneous, something one has experienced or something entrusted to one for which someone may testify. Particularly where God is mentioned or invoked as witness, the partisanship of the witness for the right of the covenant can be clearly felt. The idea of testimony or of a witness derived from uncertifiable subjective convictions is not known in the OT, and also has no place in Judaism. Philo and Josephus, who follow the Gk. legal usage (cf. TDNT IV 487 f.), both (possibly consciously) forgo the doubtful expansion of skēnē and kibōtos by tou martyriou. In rabbinic usage hē'īd designates the teaching activity of the rabbis, and is cognate with the expression for → proclaim (for individual details cf. R. Asting, Die Verkündigung des Wortes im Urchristentum, 1938, 513 ff.). (For rabbinic teaching see A. A. Trites, The New Testament Concept of Witness, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 31, 1977; 231–39.)

(b) The thought of suffering involved in bearing witness to one's faith even to the point of death and the high esteem paid to martyrdom were widespread in Judaism (cf. the Books of the Maccabees, especially 4 Macc. 18:11 ff.; Mart. Isa.; Josephus, War 2, 151 ff.; and also the collected rabbinic material in SB I 221 ff.). Nevertheless, one must still note that terms like martys, martyria or martyreō and even martyrion were manifestly never used for such heroes of faith (cf. H. Strathmann, TDNT IV 487 f.). In his detailed and careful analysis, N. Brox has demonstrated conclusively that "the Old Testament and later Judaism are excluded as the place of origin of the title of martyr", as it developed in the early history of Christianity, and also that "no real equivalence between martyrs and prophets ... can be found" (Zeuge und Märtyrer, 1961, 172).

NT The word-group first acquired its specific importance in biblical theology in the NT, more precisely, in Acts and the Johannine literature.

Even a statistical survey of occurrences exhibits these emphases. Thus of the 76 instances of the vb. martyreō, 43 are found in John and the Johannine Epistles alone, a further 4 in Rev., 11 in Acts and 8 in Heb., whereas only 6 fall to Paul and only 2 to the Synoptics. Of the 37 instances of martyria, 21 belong to John and the Johannine Epistles, and 9 to Rev., whereas the word is entirely lacking in Paul and Heb. With 35 instances, the noun martys is found a total of 13 times in Acts, 9 in Paul (including 3 in the Pastorals) and 5 times in Rev. Of the compounds, epimartyreō is attested only in 1 Pet. 5:12 alongside parakaleō, to exhort in the sense of to remind; katamartyreō only in Matt. 26:62 (par. Mk. 14:60) and Matt. 27:13 in the questions directed to Jesus as to whether he did not wish to express an opinion with regard to the evidence borne against him; and symmartyreō is used exclusively by Paul in Rom. 2:15; 8:16; 9:1, expressing a confirmatory, reinforcing or accusatory co-testimony of the spirit or of human conscience. Finally, of the 15 cases where diamartyreō is used, 9 are in Acts, where the vb. is used as a special expression for → proclamation – as it is, incidentally, also in 1 Thess. 4:6, and 3 times in 1 Tim. 5:1 and 2 Tim. 2:14; 4:1. (For a fuller survey of these terms see A. A. Trites, op. cit., 66–77.)

1. The legal use of the word, common to cl. Gk. and the LXX, dominates the few examples in the Synoptics, of which, as well as the instances of katamartyreō already mentioned, the 4 occurrences of martyria (Mk. 14:55, 56, 59; Lk. 22:71) and the 2 passages with martys (Mk. 14:63 par., Matt. 26:65) also occur in the account of the trial of Jesus, and each time are related to the (false) evidence produced there. The quotations from Deut. 19:15 (Matt. 18:16, martys; Jn. 8:17, martyria) and Deut. 17:6 (Heb. 10:28; cf. 2 Cor. 13:1; 1 Tim. 5:19) are to be understood in the same sense; similarly the mention of witnesses in the proceedings against Stephen (Acts 6:13; 7:58). The colouring is altogether negative.

2. Paul's use of the words is also closely linked to the LXX usage. He uses martyreō in Rom. 10:2; 2 Cor. 8:3; Gal. 4:15; Col. 4:13 in speaking of the zeal of the Jews and the loving care of the church ("I bear them witness"). In 1 Cor. 15:15 Paul writes: "We are even found to be misrepresenting [pseudomartyres] God, because we testified [emartyrēsamen] of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise if it is true that the dead are not raised." In Rom. 3:21 he calls the law and the prophets those who testify to God's → righteousness. On the other hand, he uses the noun martys only in Rom. 1:9; 2 Cor. 1:23; Phil. 1:8; and 1 Thess. 2:5, 10 in contexts where he calls God as witness of his actions and speech (1 Thess. 2:10, you and God). But Paul is probably also the first to give the noun martyrion a new meaning and content, when he says in 1 Cor. 1:6: "Even as the testimony [martyrion] of Christ was confirmed among you." It can no longer here be a matter of a document, or of a piece of evidence or recollection giving encouragement or warning; the word is used in the sense of the → gospel, the proclaimed message of salvation in Christ. This is established by 1 Cor. 2:1 ("proclaiming to you the testimony of God [katangellōn hymin to martyrion tou theou"]") and also by 2 Thess. 1:10. In 2 Cor. 1:12 the word stands for the witness which his own → conscience bears him.

3. In the Synoptic Gospels a further expansion of the conceptual area of witness over and above the legal usage can be recognized. While according to Mk. 1:44 par. Matt. 8:4 and Lk. 5:14, the sacrifice of the healed man is offered eis martyrion, for a testimony, i.e. in recognition and as proof that the healing had taken place (according to Moses' regulations, Lev. 13:49; 14:2–32), the same formulation in Matt. 10:18 (the sending out of the Twelve) – the arrest and the trial of the disciples would be eis martyrion to the Jews and Gentiles (cf. similarly Mk. 13:9; Lk. 21:13) – can scarcely be understood only in the sense of an accusation. It can include the point that such tribunals would provide opportunities for testifying to Christ in public. Tangible evidence for the prosecution (for a place in God's judgment) is provided by the dust which the rejected messengers of Jesus are to shake from their feet and to leave behind (Mk. 6:11 par. Lk. 9:15), as in Lk. 11:48 (cf. Matt. 23:31). By their behaviour, men become witnesses against themselves.

4. A new aspect of the concept of being a witness is revealed by Luke in Acts. Whereas martyreō is used in the sense of human attestation for good conduct, i.e. to confirm some situation (Acts 16:2; 22:5, 12), or for someone's good name (Acts 6:3, those who cared for the poor; 10:22, Cornelius; 26:5, Paul), and whereas martys is used in Acts 6:13 and 7:58 of the (false) witnesses brought against Stephen in accordance with the requirements of the Jewish law, martyrēsai occurs for the first time in Acts 23:11 without an obj., meaning "to bear witness" in the sense of proclaiming Christ. Paul is to continue in Rome to bear witness to his Lord. This corresponds exactly with the meaning of martyrion in Acts 4:33 (“with great power the apostles gave their testimony”) and takes up that conception of martys, witness, which is found for the first time in Lk. 24:48 (i.e. on the border-line between the Gospel and Acts). It is repeated almost immediately in Acts 1:8 in the commission of the risen Lord. For Luke it is the → apostles, the disciples, who have been commissioned by Jesus with the proclamation of the message of the kingdom, who are witnesses. They are more precisely defined in Acts 1:22 as witnesses of the → resurrection of Jesus (cf. Acts 2:32; 3:15; 13:31; 26:16 – Paul, because the risen Lord met him) and of his deeds (also predicted in Acts 22:15 of Paul). Thus Luke is no longer using the word witness for witnesses of facts, but specifically for the witnesses of the risen Lord, who by this very qualification are authorized and legitimated as his witnesses among the nations. From this two things become clear: first, that their way, the way of a witness, is a way of rejection, → suffering, and possibly also of death (“Stephen, the faithful witness”, Acts 22:20); second, that it is distinguished not by the later understanding of martyrdom, i.e. of one who bears witness to the point of death, but by the full → proclamation of the message of Christ. For this testimony to Jesus as the Christ (Acts 18:5), the proclamation of the grace of God (Acts 20:24), the urgently wooing address of the gospel of Christ, Luke likes to use diamartyromai (Acts 4:20; 8:25; 28:23).

5. The discovery from the statistical survey that the words of this group are most frequently used in the Gospel of John and the Johannine Epistles suggests that the concept of witness has also a more central theological significance for this writer than for all the others (cf. R. Asting, op. cit., 697 f.). The very phrase diamartyreō enōpion tou theou, “I testify in the presence of God”, as it is found three times in the Pastorals (1 Tim. 5:21; 2 Tim. 2:14; 4:1), had reinforced the binding obligation to make known the message and will of God along the lines of the simple diamartyreō of Acts, used side by side with other expressions for “proclaim”, in that the rôle of the apostles is marked out as those who are acting for and before God as his representatives. John, who summarizes the content of the Christ-event and of the gospel in the concept of the logos (→ Word, art. logos), now in particular adopts the vb. martyreō and the noun martyria (i.e. both the words of the group which denote action), in order to express the event of the divine communication of revelation in all its aspects. This observation is also supported by the fact that he abandons the noun martyrion, which was more of a material designation, in exactly the same way that, though he is aware of the witnesses, he does not make use of the word martys, witness, so as to be able to concentrate attention on the event. martys occurs first in Rev. (5 times, see below (c)), and the compounds are also entirely lacking here.

(a) John too is aware of the classical use of the word in the sense of human attestation or testimonial. This is shown in Jn. 2:25, where Jesus is said not to need other men’s testimony concerning a man in order to form an opinion; as also in Jn. 18:23, where he challenges the temple guard who struck him to give proof of his improper speech; in Jn. 12:17, where the people bear witness to the resurrection of Lazarus; and in Jn. 3:28, where John the Baptist calls his disciples as witnesses to the fact that he had not given himself out to be the messiah. This is also true of the citation of Deut. 19:15 in Jn. 8:17, even though this rule from the law is then in v. 18 put into the service of Jesus’ testimony to himself. All the instances of vb. and noun in 3

Jn. (vv. 3, 6, 12), relating to Gaius and Demetrius, are also commendations of praiseworthy conduct within the lines of faith.

(b) But it is precisely against this background that the specific character of the Johannine concept of witness is brought into relief in its three aspects: witness is testimony to or of Christ (i) in pointing to Jesus (John and the Scriptures), (ii) in Jesus' testimony to himself and (iii) in reference to Jesus in the proclamation of the disciples.

(i) Much more strongly in Jn. than in all the other Gospels the figure of John the Baptist is delineated as that of the forerunner, the final prophet. To point to the Coming One, the Expected One, and finally to the One who is already present – this is his destiny and ultimate significance. “He came for a testimony [eis martyrian], to bear witness to the light, that all might believe through him” (Jn. 1:7; cf. v. 8). This is amplified in Jn. 1:15, 32 and Jn. 1:19 ff. John's martyria mentioned there is formulated in Jn. 1:34 in the form of a thesis: “And I have seen and have borne witness that this is the Son of God.” In Jn. 3:26 it is once more confirmed from the mouth of John's adherents (“to whom you bore witness”), and in Jn. 3:31 f. precisely pointed and directed in the claim that “he who comes from heaven . . . bears witness to what he has seen and heard.” This first aspect of the understanding of witness as that which points to Jesus (to which is probably also to be reckoned the remark in Jn. 5:39 from Jesus' own mouth that the real intention of the → Scriptures is to testify to him, Jesus, as the Revealer) finds its legitimating conclusion in the testimony of the Johannine Jesus in Jn. 5:33. John the Baptist carried out his witnessing activity en aletheia, on behalf of or in accord with the truth. Thus witness here is no longer substantiation of verifiable events but proclamation which points to Jesus as the Revealer of God.

(ii) One of the central, paradigmatic discussions in John's Gospel concerns the truth of that which Jesus testifies of himself, or, put another way, the question as to who this Jesus is. Linguistically it is characterized by the expression martyreō peri, to testify with reference to (mostly oneself). Against the → Pharisees, who maintain according to Jn. 8:13 that, because he is testifying to himself, his martyria cannot be true (with v. 17 cf. Deut. 19:15), is set Jesus' word in v. 14. When he says something about himself, this martyria is true, because he knows where he has come from and where he is going. John does not wish this testimony of Jesus – i.e. his claim to be the Revealer, the One in whom God's will and nature can be perceived, and who thus as the → light is the → life of men, giving meaning and basis to human existence – to be understood as self-glorification of Jesus on his own account. Indeed, this is expressly repudiated by Jesus in 5:31: “If I bear witness to myself, my testimony is not true”, in apparent tension to Jn. 8:14. His legitimation, however, does not come about through men, by means of human logical modes of proof, but “the works that I do bear me witness” (Jn. 5:36; cf. 10:25). It is another witness (Jn. 5:32; cf. 10:32). “The Father who sent me has himself borne witness to me” (Jn. 5:37; cf. also Jn. 6:65). In Jn. 5:39 the Scriptures are then named as witnesses. What is meant is finally expressed in the trial scene before Pilate: “I have come to bear witness to the truth” (Jn. 18:37); and with reference to the source of this witness in Jn. 3:11: “we speak of what we know, and bear witness to what we have seen.” Jesus himself is the mediator of the testimony, i.e. of the revelation of God to the world (kosmos, Jn. 8:14) which hates him, because he removes its claims to autonomy, and thus rejects his testimony (Jn. 3:11, 32). Therefore, it is not a matter here of witness borne to verifiable matters of fact, but – along the lines of the prophets, even if in the linguistic clothing of gnosticism – of God’s self-communication in Jesus, requiring response. Brox says that “the distinguishing mark of the Johannine theology of witness” is that “the legitimation of the testimony and the evidence for its truth . . . consist in the call to a non-verifiable authorization by means of revelation” (op. cit., 71). In form there certainly is a correspondence with men’s demands for legitimation, but the confirmatory testimonies which are brought into play provide no proof in the customary sense, but affirm the very thing for which proof is required. “The object of faith makes itself known only to faith” (R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 266). The criterion for the message is the content itself.

(iii) Formally related to the Johannine use of logos, → word, this testimony of Jesus, for those who have accepted it and thus confirmed (sealed, Jn. 3:33) the truth of God, becomes testimony about Jesus. This is the case first of all in Jn. 4:39, where the → Samaritans confirm that their way to faith began with the testimony, the account of the personal experience which the woman at the well gave concerning him. The event of which one has experience still plays a part here. But the thought is extended in a typically Johannine way when, in Jn. 15:26, the Paraclete, the Spirit, is named as the One who testifies to Jesus. He opens the world’s eyes to the truth of God and the truth about itself. Jesus immediately expands this in the phrase “and you also are witnesses” (Jn. 15:27; → Advocate). 1 Jn. 1:2 (“we saw [heōrakamen] it, and testify to [martyroumen] and proclaim [apangellomen] to you the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest to us”) and 1 Jn. 4:14 (“and we have seen [tetheametha] and testify [martyroumen] that the Father has sent the Son as the Saviour [sōtēra] of the world”) are likewise extensions of this thought. Similarly, 1 Jn. 5:6, speaking of the witness of the → Spirit, takes up Jn. 15:26. 1 Jn. 5:10 (“He who believes in the Son of God has the testimony in himself”) is given added precision in the statement in v. 11 that the testimony of the → knowledge and the message of faith is this, “that God gave us eternal life and this life is in his Son.” Here too the terminology is that of the testimony of something experienced, but this experience is not that of the senses, but being caught up into faith. The Gk. words for “see” are no different here.

(c) This martyria of Jesus Christ as the revelation of the significance of Jesus, communicated and accepted in faith, is for the seer of Revelation identical with the logos tou theou, “the Word of God” (Rev. 1:2, 9; in 12:11 both are also used and connected together). The martyria is more precisely qualified as the pneuma tēs prophēteias, “the Spirit of prophecy”, which could mean testifying to what has been here revealed concerning the future. The thought is that to be touched by the testimony of Jesus Christ places one in the service of witness. It obliges one to pass it on, and reveals that there is an inherent power in the martyria, by means of which God does not merely give men intellectual knowledge, but also sets them in motion. The martyria allows one to share in the way, but also in the suffering and persecution of Christ, as the allusion in Rev. 6:9 to those who have been killed shows (cf. also the persecution by the → dragon in Rev. 12:17 with the persecution of the child in Rev. 12:4). That the martyria draws people who are grasped by it into Christ’s life is also expressed in Rev. 12:11 by the way that they are promised triumphant victory (cf. Rev. 20:4). In Rev. 1:5, for the only time in Rev., Jesus is specifically called ho martys ho pistos, “the faithful witness” (cf. Rev. 3:14, the → Amen along with the same title). As well as in Rev. 6:9, the first roots of the later conception of martyrdom are outlined in the way that the Antipas who has been killed in Pergamum is similarly called ho martys mou ho pistos in 2:13, just as the two witnesses in Rev. 11:3, though invincible for the time of their commission, are then (v. 7) killed by the beast, and the woman of Rev. 17 is drunk with blood of the witnesses of Jesus. To be sure, it is still not so much one's death, but one's appearance as a trustworthy witness of Jesus that stands in the foreground. Hence, one may not cite the martyr's death as the characteristic of witnesses, particularly as in Rev. 17:6 saints (hagioi) are mentioned with the martures as having been similarly put to death on account of their faith (for details cf. Brox, op. cit., 102 f.).

6. The Epistle to the Hebrews is distinguished from the other writings of the NT in that it uses the vb. martyreō exclusively in the pass. and chiefly in Heb. 11. The one who bears witness, confirming the faith of the one named, is God himself – here concealed behind the pass. verbs (Heb. 11:2, 4, 5, 39). The men whose fate bears all the signs of the martyrdom of faith obtain a witness, i.e. are recognized by God. It is in accord with this that these, who have been accredited on account of holding firm to the hope of their faith, are in Heb. 12:1 called a “cloud of witnesses” for the church of the present time.

L. Coenen

7. It is fitting to ask what is the value of the witness-theme for the church in the last third of the twentieth century. First, the frequent use of the witness-theme in the NT stresses the importance of the historical foundations of the Christian religion. The principal events of the public ministry of Jesus were wrought in the presence of his chosen companions and apostles. They had been present in Jerusalem during the final week, and were in a position to attest the facts of his trial, crucifixion and burial. Above all, they were competent witnesses to vouch for the fact of his resurrection.

For both Luke and John the Jerusalem apostles occupy a special place in holy history, because they have been with Jesus from the commencement of his public ministry. In the Apocalypse the stress seems to fall on Christ, “the faithful and true witness”, who serves as the archetype for the faithful band of believers who must maintain the same testimony even at the sacrifice of life itself. A similar note is struck in the Pastorals, where Timothy is reminded of the “good confession” of his Lord before Pontius Pilate and exhorted to offer the same type of witness in his own day (1 Tim. 6:12 f.). In the Book of Acts the factual content of the apostolic testimony receives particular attention, especially in the speeches (→ Proclamation). The testimony rests upon the great acts of God in Jesus Christ, and the resurrection forms the very core of this.

In other words, for all the major NT writers the historical facts of Christian origins are of paramount importance. This is patently true of the four Evangelists, who felt it necessary to set out the life of Christ in the form of Gospels (cf. A. Barr, “The Factor of Testimony in the Gospels”, ExpT 49, 1937–38, 401–8). It is certainly true of Paul, who declared the basic facts of the gospel to be “of first importance”, and appended a list of witnesses to the risen Christ (1 Cor. 15:1–8). In fine, it was of supreme significance to the New Testament writers that the apostolic teaching was not based on a collection of → myths, but on the experience of eyewitnesses.

In the light of the NT's repeated insistence on the rôle of eyewitnesses and the subsequent stress on the historical nature of the events which the witnesses report, one must raise the question: Has historical scholarship taken this factor sufficiently seriously? Certainly current preoccupation with form criticism, redaction criticism, audience criticism and the like must not blind our eyes to the NT's unmistakable stress on those who were the actual witnesses of the primary events. Unless the testimony of these eyewitnesses can be impugned as spurious, misrepresented or erroneous, their evidence of Christian origins must be taken seriously. It may be questioned, for instance, whether Bultmann's demythologizing programme has taken sufficient account of the presence of eyewitnesses in the earliest strata of gospel tradition (for recent critiques of Bultmann's demythologizing see, inter alia, C. H. Pinnock, "Theology and Myth", Bibliotheca Sacra, 128, 1971, 215–26, and C. Brown, "Bultmann Revisited", The Churchman 88, 1974, 167–87). In fact, the importance attached to eyewitnesses in the NT strengthens the case for the life, death and resurrection of Jesus, and hence buttresses the historical foundations of the Christian faith. In a day of widespread scepticism about Christian origins this contribution is both timely and significant (cf. P. Carnley, "The Poverty of Historical Scepticism", in S. Sykes and J. P. Clayton, eds., Christ, Faith and History, 1972, 165–89).

In the second place, the witness-theme is particularly pertinent to a bewildered, questioning age. Ours is unquestionably a time of religious as well as cultural pluralism; to be convinced of this one has only to read the works of Francis Schaeffer, John Macquarrie and H. R. Rookmaaker (F. A. Schaeffer, Escape from Reason, 1968, and The God Who Is There, 1968; J. Macquarrie, Twentieth Century Religious Thought, 1966; H. R. Rookmaaker, Modern Art and the Death of a Culture, 1970). Theological ideas from a wide range of sources have been thrown into the contemporary melting pot and are being vigorously debated. This is precisely the type of situation in which the NT writers make abundant use of witness imagery and terminology. The claims of Christ were being hotly contested, then as now, and in such a milieu the language and thought forms of the Old Testament controversy sprang naturally to mind.

The Fourth Gospel provides the setting for the most sustained controversy in the NT. Here Jesus has a lawsuit with the world. His witnesses include John the Baptist, the Scriptures, the words and works of Christ, and later the witness of the apostles and the Holy Spirit. They are opposed by the world, represented by the unbelieving Jews. John has a case to present, and for this reason he advances arguments, asks juridical questions and presents witnesses after the fashion of the OT legal assembly. The same observation is true of the Book of Acts, though Luke develops his case somewhat differently from John.

All of this material is suggestive for twentieth-century apologists. The person and place of Jesus in the present pluralistic theological climate is still very much a contentious issue. The claims of Christ as the Son of God are currently widely disputed. In such an environment a brief must be presented, arguments advanced and defending witnesses brought forward, if the Christian case is to be given a proper hearing. To fail to present the evidence for the Christian position would be tantamount to conceding defeat to its opponents. That is to say, the controversy theme, so evident in the NT, appears to be highly pertinent to the missionary task of the church today.

In the third place, it is noteworthy that faithful witness often entails suffering and persecution. In the Book of Revelation, for instance, Christians are about to enter a time of severe persecution, and some of them will be brought before the courts and sentenced to death. For this reason the seer of Patmos encourages them to “hold” to the “testimony of Jesus”. Under such circumstances words with forensic overtones are naturally given their full weight in John’s message of encouragement. Metaphors drawn from the lawcourt are never far from the author’s mind, as a study of chs. 11, 12, 18 and 19 confirms (cf. A. A. Trites, The New Testament Conception of Witness, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 31, 1977, 154–74).

Thus it is not surprising that wherever Christians have faced opposition and hostile lawcourts for the sake of their testimony, the Book of Revelation has been a source of inspiration. As Christ had conquered suffering and death, so they too would conquer and share his victory over the forces of evil. As their Lord had witnessed faithfully even unto death, they also must bear unflinching testimony.

The Synoptic accounts of anticipated persecution are also instructive. Here the idea of witness is certainly very much a live metaphor (A. A. Trites, “The Idea of Witness in the Synoptic Gospels – Some Juridical Considerations”, Themelios 5, 1968–9, 18–26). Hauled into courts by their opponents, Christians will be told what to say in the hour of crisis by the Holy Spirit. The very fact of standing before kings, councils and governors would offer unprecedented opportunities for witnessing. Though believers would often be condemned in earthly lawcourts, in heaven the Son of man would acknowledge them and reverse the unjust judgements pronounced against them.

Similarly in the Fourth Gospel and Acts when the apostles are witnessing for Christ in the face of antagonism and hostility, they do not witness in their own strength but rather in the convincing power of the Spirit. They are reassured that the Spirit is active in challenging the world with the truth of what they say. John underscores the inner witness of the Spirit (cf. I. de la Potterie, “La Notion de Témoignage dans Saint Jean”, in J. Coppens et al., eds., Sacra Pagina, 1959, II, 194–96; J. C. Hindley, “Witness in the Fourth Gospel”, SJT 18, 1965, 321–23; and T. Preiss, “The Inner Witness of the Holy Spirit”, Interpretation 7, 1953, 268), while Luke in Acts focuses on the outward manifestation of the Spirit’s work in signs and wonders which confirm the apostolic testimony (cf. L. Cerfaux, “Témoins du Christ d’après le Livre des Actes”, Recueil Lucien Cerfaux, 1954–62, II, 157–61; W. C. van Unnik, “The ‘Book of Acts’ – the Confirmation of the Gospel”, NovT 4, 1960, 26–59; A. Rétif, “Témoignage et Prédication Missionnaire dans les Actes des Apôtres”, Nouvelle Revue Théologique 73, 1953, 152–65).

All this witness material provides a challenge to faithfulness and a note of encouragement, both of which are as relevant to hard-pressed twentieth-century Christians as to their first-century counterparts.

Finally, something must be said about the importance of the witness motif for contemporary preachers and communicators of the Christian message. In this connection three features may be mentioned.

First, witnesses are passionately involved in the case they seek to present. They have been apprehended by it, and so they have an inner compulsion to plead its merits with others. Like their first-century predecessors, they cannot but speak of what they have seen and heard.

Secondly, witnesses are held accountable for the truthfulness of their testimony. Perjury was, and still is, a serious offence punishable by heavy penalties. This solemn sense of being responsible under God for speaking truthfully appears in Paul, who four times declares, "God is my witness". Applied to preachers, this means that they are driven back to the Scriptures as the standard whereby their witness is to be judged.

Thirdly, witnesses must be faithful not only to the bare facts of the Christ-event, but also to their meaning. This entails presenting Christ and his message in the significance which genuinely belongs to them. "What that character is lies to our hand in the NT Scriptures. . . . To be faithful witnesses we must ever keep before us and (in the course of our regular congregational preaching) before our hearers, the fully rounded, finely balanced, many-sided yet unitary, significance of Christ" (N. Alexander, "The United Character of the New Testament Witness of the Christ-Event", in H. Anderson and W. Barclay, eds., The New Testament in Historical and Contemporary Perspective, 1965, 32 f.; cf. A. M. Hunter, The Unity of the New Testament, 1943).

→ Advocate, → Confess, → Deny, → Judgment, → Law, → Proclamation, → Righteousness, → Truth

(a). E. L. Allen, "Controversy in the New Testament", NTS 1, 1954–55, 143–49; F. I. Anderson, "The Socio-Juridical Background of the Naboth Incident", JBL 85, 1966, 46–57; A. Barr, "The Factor of Testimony in the Gospels", ExpT 49, 1937–38, 401–8; J. M. Boice, Witness and Revelation in the Gospel of John, 1970; H. J. Cadbury, "Roman Law and the Trial of Paul", in F. J. Foakes Jackson, K. Lake and H. J. Cadbury, The Beginnings of Christianity, V, 1933, 297–355; G. B. Caird, A Commentary on the Revelation of St. John the Divine, 1966; R. P. Casey, "Appended Note on martyrs", in F. J. Foakes Jackson, K. Lake and H. J. Cadbury, op. cit., V 30–37; D. R. Catchpole, "You Have Heard his Blasphemy", TB 16, 1965, 10–18; and The Trial of Jesus: A Study of the Gospels and Jewish Historiography from 1770 to the Present Day, 1970; J. Chapman, "We Know that his Testimony is True", JTS 31, 1930, 379–87; H. Danby, "The Bearing of the Rabbinical Code on the Jewish Trial Narratives in the Gospels", JTS 21, 1920, 51–76; S. de Dietrich, "'You are My Witnesses' – A Study of the Church's Witness", Interpretation 8, 1954, 273–79; J. Downing, "Jesus and Martyrdom", JTS New Series 14, 1963, 279–93; J. H. Eaton, "The King as God's Witness", ASTI 7, 1968–69, 24–40; W. H. C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church from the Maccabees to Donatus, 1965; E. M. Gershfield, "Questio Quid Iuris – Some Thoughts on Jewish Law", Harvard Theological Review 61, 1968, 60–67; J. M. Gilchrist, "On What Charge was St. Paul Brought to Rome?" ExpT 78, 1966–7, 264 ff.; J. C. Hindley, "Witness in the Fourth Gospel", SJT 18, 1965, 319–37; W. L. Holladay, "Jeremiah's Lawsuit with God", Interpretation 17, 1963, 280–87; A. J. Hultgren, Jesus and His Adversaries: A Study of the Form and Function of the Conflict Stories in the Synoptic Tradition, (Dissertation, Union Theological Seminary, New York) 1971; G. Johnston, The Spirit-Paraclete in the Gospel of John, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Studies 12, 1970; L. E. Keck, Mandate to Witness – Studies in the Book of Acts, 1964; J. A. Kleist, "The Two False Witnesses (Mk. 14:55 ff.)", CBQ 9, 1947, 321 ff.; R. Koch, "Witness", EBT III 976–85; G. E. Ladd, The Pattern of New Testament Truth, 1968; T. A. Langford, "Giovanni Miegge on Jesus as a Martyr", Interpretation 18, 1964, 183–90; J. Limburg, "The Root rtb and the Prophetic Lawsuit Speeches", JBL 88, 1969, 291–304; J. Macleod, "The Witness of Moses to Christ", EQ 17, 1945, 5–12; D. A. McKenzie, "Judicial Procedure at the Town Gate", VT 14, 1964, 100–4; H. S. Maine, Ancient Law, 1907; J. W. Malcolm, "Martyria and Authority in the New Testament", (Dissertation, Edinburgh) 1963; T. W. Manson, "Martyrs and Martyrdom", BJRL 39, 1956–7, 463–84; I. H. Marshall, "Martyrdom and the Parousia in the Revelation of John", StudEv IV, 1968, 333–39; R. V. Moss, "The Witnessing Church in the New Testament", Theology and Life 3, 1960, 262–68; D. T. Niles, Whereof We Are Witnesses, 1965; D. E. Nineham, "Eye-witness Testimony and the Gospel Tradition", JTS New Series 9, 1958, 13–25; ibid. 10, 1959, 243–52; ibid. 11, 1960, 253–64; T. E. Pollard, "Martyrdom and Resurrection in the New Testament", BJRL 55, 1972, 240–51; E. Pond, "The Evidence of Testimony", Bibliotheca Sacra 102, 1945, 179–93; D. W. Riddle, "From Apocalypse to Martyrology", Anglican Theological Review 9, 1927, 260–80; H. Riesendorf, "The Meaning of the Verb arneisthai", Coniectanea Neotestamentica 11, 1947, 207–19; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament, 1963; H.

Strathmann, martys etc. TDNT IV 474–514; M. C. Tenney, “The Meaning of ‘Witness’ in John”, Bibliotheca Sacra 132, 1975, 229–41; A. A. Trites, “The Importance of Legal Scenes and Language in the Book of Acts”, NovT 16, 1974, 278–84; “The Idea of Witness in the Synoptic Gospels – Some Juridical Considerations”, Themelios 5, 1968, 18–26; “Martys and Martyrdom in the Apocalypse: A Semantic Study”, NovT 15, 1973, 72–80; “The Woman Taken in Adultery”, Bibliotheca Sacra 131, 1974, 137–46; “Two Witness Motifs in Acts 1:8 and the Book of Acts”, Themelios 7, 1970, 17–22; and The New Testament Concept of Witness, Society for New Testament Study Monograph Series 31, 1977; H. van Vliet, No Single Testimony: A Study in the Adoption of the Law of Deut. 19:15 into the New Testament, Studia Theologica Rheno-Traiectina 4, 1958; J. B. Ward-Perkins, “Memoria, Martyr’s Tomb and Martyr’s Church”, JTS New Series 17, 1966, 20–37.

(b). R. Asting, Die Verkündigung des Wortes im Urchristentum, 1938, 458 ff.; K. Barth, Der Christ als Zeuge, 1934; M. Barth, Der Augenzeuge, 1946; H. J. Boecker, Redeformen des Rechtslebens im Alten Testament, 1964; N. Brox, Zeuge und Märtyrer, 1961; E. Burnier, La Notion du Témoignage dans le Nouveau Testament, 1939; H. von Campenhausen, Die Idee des Martyriums in der alten Kirche, 1936; E. Castelli et al., La Testimonianza, 1972; L. Cerfaux, “Témoins du Christ d’après le Livre des Actes”, Recueil Lucien Cerfaux, Études d’Exégèse et d’Histoire Religieuse, II, 1954, 157–74; J. P. Charlier, “L’Exégèse Johannique d’un Précepte Legal: Jean viii 17”, RB 67, 1960, 503–15; H. Dörrie, F. Paschke, H. Hohlwein and A. Lehmann, “Märtyrer”, *RGG*³ IV 587 ff.; E. Esking, “Das Martyrium als theologisch-exegetisches Problem”, in In Memoriam Ernst Lohmeyer, 1950, 224 ff.; E. Günther, “Zeuge und Märtyrer”, ZNW 47, 1956, 145–61; J. Harvey, “Le ‘Rib’-Pattern”, Requisitoire Prophétique sur la Rupture de l’Alliance, Biblica 43, 1962, 172–96; E. Käsemann, “Ketzer und Zeuge”, ZTK 48, 1951, 292 ff. (reprinted in Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, I, 1968⁵, 168 ff.); F. Kattenbusch, “Die Märtyrtitel”, ZNW 4, 1903, 111–27; R. Koch, “Témoignage d’après les Actes”, Masses Ouvrières 129, 1957, 16–33; ibid. 131, 1957, 4–25; E. Leisi, Der Zeuge im attischen Recht, 1908; M. Lods, Confesseurs et Martyrs, 1948; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht, FRLANT 46, (1955) 1963²; P. Marcel, “Le Témoignage en Parole et en Actes”, Revue Réformée 9, 1958, 36–47; C. Masson, “Le Témoignage de Jean”, Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 38, 1950, 120–27; P. H. Menoud, “Jésus et ses Témoins”, Église et Théologie 23, 1960, 7–20; O. Michel, “Biblisches Bekennen und Bezeugen”, EvTh 2, 1935, 231–45; and Prophet und Märtyrer, BFChTh 37/2, 1932; R. Morgenthaler, Die Lukanische Geschichtsschreibung als Zeugnis: Gestalt und Gehalt der Kunst des Lukas, I–II, 1949; W. Nauck, “Die Tradition und der Charakter des ersten Johannesbriefes”, in Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament, ed. J. Jeremias and O. Michel, 1957; E. Peterson, Zeuge der Wahrheit, 1937; I. de la Potterie, “La Notion de Témoignage dans S. Jean”, Sacra Pagina 2, 1959, 193–208; A. Rétif, “Témoignage et Prédication Missionnaire dans les Actes des Apôtres”, Nouvelle Revue Théologique 73, 1951, 152–65; and Foi au Christ et Mission, 1953; R. Schippers, Getuigen van Jezus Christus, 1938; J. Smend, “Der Zeugnischarakter der christlichen Verkündigung”, ZST 13, 1936, 489–517; H.-W. Surkau, Martyrien in jüdischer und frühchristlicher Zeit, 1938; B. Trepanier, “Contribution à une Recherche sur l’Idée de Témoin dans les Écrits Johanniques”, Revue de l’Université d’Ottawa 15, 1945, 5–63; A. Vanhoye, “Témoignage et Vie de Dieu selon le Quatrième Évangile”, Christus 16, 1955, 155–71.

Woe

ouai

ouai (ouai), woe, alas.

CL & OT ouai (Lat. vae) is an onomatopoeic exclamation of pain or anger (Arrianus).

In the LXX ouai, which occurs 69 times, usually represents the Heb. hōy, occasionally ōy, and rarely ī, hō, hī, and hōwāh, all deriving from roots meaning to howl; e.g., ī otherwise means a jackal, from its nocturnal cry like the scream of an infant. hōy, like the other Heb. terms, is used to express grief (Prov. 23:29), despair (1 Sam. 4:7), lamentation (1 Ki. 13:30), dissatisfaction (Isa. 1:4), pain (Jer. 10:19), a threat (Ezek. 16:23), or simply to attract attention (Isa. 55:1).

NT In the NT ouai, more often than not, expresses sympathetic sorrow rather than condemnation. But the latter is more evident in Matt. 11:21 (= Lk. 10:13), where Jesus reproached the cities of Chorazim (mentioned only here), Bethsaida (Jn. 1:44), and even Capernaum, his headquarters (Matt. 4:13), for their utter lack of response when he was active in their midst for so long. The strength of Jesus' condemnation of self-sufficiency and pride can be gauged from his comparison of the probable public reaction in ancient Tyre and Sidon had the citizens of those notoriously wicked cities (Isa. 23) been given similar opportunities of witnessing his mighty signs of the presence of the kingdom of God. Indifference is spiritually more deadly than violence and sensuality. In Matt. 18:7 (absent from the parallel passage in Mk. 9:42–48), "Woe to the world!" is not so much denunciation as warning and lamentation: "Alas for the world!" – i.e., for men in general (Lk. 17:1). Jesus foresees the inevitability of temptations to sin (skandala, causes of stumbling). True, they are a means of testing true believers (1 Cor. 11:19), but the responsibility of the individual remains. He must neither succumb himself nor be the cause of stumbling in others. The context of this saying (Matt. 18:1–6, 10) indicates that Jesus had selfish ambition specifically in mind, a motive which leads to trampling on one's fellows, hurt feelings, depression, and misery. The weak, in particular, are liable to suffer. To be the cause of injuring the spirit of another is very easy, and it is very culpable.

The seven woes upon the scribes and Pharisees in Matt. 23:13 ff. (four recur in Lk. 11:42–52) are denunciatory. Scribal teaching and exposition of Scripture were obscuring the real issues of belief and conduct. Casuistry was making it virtually impossible for men to fulfil the law of God and to devote themselves to that fidelity which leads to the kingdom of heaven (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, 1972, 311). Yet the undertone of sorrow is not absent: it is made explicit in Jesus' closing lament over Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37–39). He was well aware of the large number of ordinary people the Pharisees were misleading. The first woe (23:13) is directed against the lawyers who blocked men's way to the kingdom of heaven. By their misinterpretations, the scribes had hidden and lost the key to the true meaning of Scripture, and so to the knowledge of the way of salvation (Lk. 11:52; Hos. 4:6). The second woe (Matt. 23:15) condemns the lengths to which these men went in order to secure converts from among Gentiles, but converts not so much to Judaism as to their own sectarian brand of Pharisaism (Josephus, Ant. 20, 40). Wherever they succeeded, the fanaticism which is not unusual in converts produced a proselyte twice as formal and hypocritical as those who turned him into a Pharisee in the first place. Jesus' reference to the effort needed to make a single convert implies that the Pharisees' missionary exertions met with limited response. Hellenistic Judaism, more liberal in outlook, had much greater success.

The third woe (Matt. 23:16–22), again directed against Pharisaic teaching, exposes the casuistry which subverted morality: there are not two kinds of truth, one important and the other not. Bad enough that men should be led to think that unless they swear an oath, they may make use of half-truths and misleading statements without censure. Yet more destructive of morality is the teaching that even after an oath men need not tell the truth if the oath has not been taken in a particular way. Pharisaic distinctions about oaths were not only wrong in themselves, but perverse in principle. Even if a distinction were allowed, an oath by the temple, the house of God, ought to be regarded as more binding, not less, than an oath by something which happened to be in that building. To swear by heaven was to employ a euphemism for the name of God himself. Every oath was made before God.

The fourth woe (23:23 f.) referred to Pharisaic scrupulosity in the application of the law of tithing (Lev. 27:30–33; Deut. 14:22–29) down to the minutest details. The context in the Mosaic law was concerned with the three main crops of grain, wine, and oil, not with small aromatic herbs used in flavouring food. Of itself, such scrupulosity was, at best, an unnecessary burden. But it drew condemnation from Jesus because it ill contrasted with the Pharisees' total lack of concern over far weightier principles of morality – justice, mercy, and faith.

The fifth woe (23:25 f.) condemned the punctilious observance of ritual purifications in the kitchen (matters of scribal tradition, and not of Mosaic law) to the neglect of plain moral obligations (Lk. 11:39). A vessel externally clean may contain what has been grasped by robbery and greed. Conversely, when applied to man's life, if the inside were clean, i.e. that man is right with God, then what is outside, his outward actions and behaviour, will also be pure before God. The thought of the sixth woe (23:27 f.) is applied differently in Lk. 11:44. In Matthew's version the whitened tombs appear clean and attractive on the outside, but their interiors are full of foulness; such were the Pharisees. Luke refers to the whitewashing of graves on the 15th Adar before Passover, so that no one might unwittingly get too close to them and so become ceremonially unclean and disqualified from taking part in the festival. People were contaminated by the Pharisees through not being aware of their true character. The seventh woe (Matt. 23:29–33 = Lk. 11:47 f.) condemns the Pharisees' hypocrisy in building fine tombs and monuments, as works of supererogation and by way of reparation, to honour prophets murdered by their forefathers, while at the same time plotting to do away with the living prophet in their midst. Judgment would not be delayed much longer, for the Pharisees of the day would soon complete the works of sin begun by those before them (Matt. 23:32), for sons inherit the character of their fathers. The destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersal of the nation would be the inevitable consequences (A. Plummer, An Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew, 1909, 316–21).

In Matt. 24:19 (= Mk. 13:17; Lk. 21:23) ouai expresses pity and compassion for those who on account of family responsibilities would be hindered in their escape from the doomed city of Jerusalem. The woe concerning the fate of Judas (Matt. 26:24, Mk. 14:21, Lk. 22:22) has acute sorrow uppermost: "Alas for that man!" But the divine wrath is also an element, for the expression "that man", applied to one still in the supper-room, suggests that severance from Christ had, in effect, already taken place: Judas was putting himself outside God's mercy. Jesus utters four woes, found only in Luke (6:24–26), to warn those who do not follow him. The repeated ouai expresses his sadness at what he knows is the inevitable end of any who continue to carry on blindly in self-sufficiency. Such men may be rich in worldly terms – wealth in itself is no necessary bar to discipleship (Matt. 27:57; Lk. 8:3) – but in what really matters, the things of the spirit, Jesus is aware that the self-centred are bereft of true assets (Isa. 65:13). The fourth of these woes is a reminder that worldly wealth attracts flattery from those who curry favour, but is no indicator of merit.

In 1 Cor. 9 Paul speaks of his personal liberty in the gospel, including (v. 15) the liberty not to make use of his undoubted right (v. 14) to receive support from the Corinthian church while he ministered among its members. But in one respect he had no liberty. Preach he must. The compulsion he felt to proclaim the gospel of Christ was such that he could in one phrase describe it in terms of both an inward divine constraint (→ Necessity, art. anankē) and an outward burden pressing upon him (cf. Isa. 8:11; Jer. 20:9). To preach the gospel was part and parcel of the very fibre of his life and nature. ouai for him if he did not do so. The meaning is not that God would punish him, but that for Paul to be false to the trust given to him, and to carry the memory of that faithlessness for ever, would be the greatest misery imaginable.

In Jude 11 the writer utters a prophetic woe upon heretical teachers, whom he describes in terms of the sins and consequent fates of Cain, Balaam, and Korah – the classic examples of the disastrous effects of jealousy, greed, and pride. In contemporary Judaism Cain, beyond being the first murderer, personified a wide spectrum of evil, including selfishness, self-sufficiency, and a powerful influence over the lives of other men in godlessness and sensuality (Philo), and violence, lust, greed, and blasphemy (Josephus). The Jerusalem Tg. on Gen. 4:7 represents Cain as the first sceptic: “There is neither judgment nor Judge, nor is there any other world than this. The good receive no reward, nor will vengeance be inflicted on the evil. The world was not created in mercy, nor is it governed in mercy.” A 2nd-cent. gnostic sect called themselves Cainites because they regarded the God of the OT as responsible for the world’s evil, and so exalted Cain and others who resisted such a deity. The inclusion of Balaam reflects not the apparently favourable light of Num. 22–24, where he declines to prophesy except as the Lord directs, but as the unprincipled character known to later Judaism (Philo, Josephus; SB III 771) as the prototype of mercenaries who shrink from nothing for financial gain. Such are doomed to hell (Pirke Aboth 5:29). The choice of Korah, a flagrant example of blasphemous insubordination and its fate (Num. 16), may have been prompted by information reaching Jude that the false teachers were defying church overseers and spreading unrest among the Christian community. See J. N. D. Kelly, The Epistles of Peter and of Jude, 1969.

As befits the culminating book of the Bible in which ultimate issues are starkly portrayed, Revelation includes ouai several times. In Rev. 8:13 the threefold warning of ouai from an eagle corresponds to three trumpet-blasts about to be sounded in succession by three angels which announce further drastic judgments to fall upon an unbelieving world. The symbol of an eagle (aetos) warning the world is not found in Jewish apocalyptic writings, but if aetos means, as it may, vulture, Hos. 8:1 is a near parallel: “Set the trumpet to your lips, for a vulture is over the house of the LORD” (cf. Lk. 17:37). After the devil is expelled by Michael and his angels, the inhabitants of heaven can well rejoice. But a loud cry of ouai gives sympathetic warning that heaven’s deliverance means a redoubling of the devil’s wrath against the earth (Rev. 12:12). In Rev. 18 ouai, alas, occurs in a threefold chorus of self-pity wailed by national leaders (18:9), traders (18:11), and merchant sailors (18:17; cf. Ezek. 27:29 ff.) on the spectacular collapse of the mighty commercial city of Babylon. The ouai is not an expression of concern for the suffering of the inhabitants, but of utterly self-centred grief because the source and means of financial profit have been swept away. The sin of Babylon was not in trading as such, but in the misuse of commerce to seduce mankind to adopt gross materialism and mammon-worship. See G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation, 1974. N. Hillyer

Woman, Mother, Virgin, Widow

In biblical times, depending on the station in life a woman occupied, whether she was single or married, childless or widowed, her social significance varied considerably; and this is reflected in the use of the words dealt with here. gynē, which can stand for mistress, maid, fiancée, wife or widow, is a general designation for every female in contrast to the male. If a woman is called mētēr, mother, she has a certain social position of honour; the word is also often used metaphorically. The widow (chēra) is thus the embodiment of peculiar poverty and indigence; in the NT the word may also denote a certain standing in the community. The young, still unmarried woman is called parthenos. In this the emphasis may lie, on the one hand, on her fully-matured youth and, on the other hand, on her innocence and purity.

γυνή

γυνή (gynē), woman; γυναικάριον (gynaikarion), a little woman, contemptuously a silly woman; γυναικεῖος (gynaikeios), female.

CL 1. gynē, woman, female being, occurs in Mycenaean Gk., and especially from the time of Homer, with numerous derivations and composites. Its provenance is disputed. In profane Gk. gynē denotes woman (a) in contrast with man (→ Man, art. anēr); (b) in contrast with goddesses; (c) wife, fiancée, widow, also concubine; (d) mistress; (e) maid; (f) the female among animals. gynē in the voc. is used as an address with no irreverent secondary meaning (Homer, Sophocles and others).

2. In the Gk. world the attitude to women extended from the striking disrespect for the Athenian woman (education befits only the courtesan) through the freer and more highly esteemed status of the Dorian woman to the pronounced high estimate of women in Sparta. "The general rule in this matter is that the further we go west the greater is the freedom of woman" (A. Oepke, gynē, TDNT I 777). In regard to the status of women, the Graeco-Hellenistic environment of the NT shows in its great diversity strong parallels in detail to the general oriental picture, in which, as compared with the OT, the cultic significance of women is often in evidence (e.g. the offering of chastity by priestesses, whether as unblemished virginity or as sacral prostitution).

OT 1. In the OT gynē, woman, stands for the Heb. 'iššāh in the vast majority of instances, though some 14 other translations are found in isolated passages. The woman is subject to the authority of man (father, brother, husband, → Marriage). Her worth, as also her honour, lies in bearing children (cf. Deut. 25:5–10, levirate marriage, → Marriage, art. gameō OT 5; Gen. 24:60; Lev. 19:3; 1 Sam. 1:6; Ps. 113[112]:9). Childlessness is a curse (Gen. 29:21–30:24). Polygamy is an encumbrance, though it is evidenced, e.g. in the patriarchs (→ Abraham), → David and → Solomon. Excluded from all official cultic business (1 Sam. 1:3 ff.; cf. Exod. 23:17), woman bows readily to idolatry. On the other hand, she may move freely (cf. 1 Sam. 1:9 ff.; 2:1 ff.). In contrast with the rest of the oriental (religious) world, she is recognized as a person and as a man's partner. The former point finds its highest expression in the story of Ruth, the Moabitess, which has apologetic intentions. The latter point is given its foundation in the account of the creation of man as male and female (Gen. 1:27 f.; cf. 2:18–25). Wisdom is personified as a woman (e.g. Prov. 1:20 f.; 8:1–3; Wis. 7:12–22; Eccl. 1:6–20).

H. Vorländer

2. In later Judaism man was understood to have been originally androgynous. Support for this view might be claimed from the story of woman being made out of one of man's ribs (Gen. 2:21 ff.). Commenting on Gen. 5:2, Rabbi Simeon taught that "God does not make his abode in any place where male and female are not found together; nor are blessings found save in such a place, as it is written: 'And he blessed them and called their name Man on the day that they were created.' Note that it says them and their name, not him and his name. The male is not even called man until he is united with the female" (Zohar, quoted by D. S. Bailey, Sexual Relation in Christian Thought, 1959, 272). Karl Barth has argued that the image of God in which man was created is man as male and female (CD III, 1, 183–206; cf. J. J. Stamm, "Die Imago-Lehre von Karl Barth und die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft", in Antwort. Karl Barth zum siebzigsten Geburtstag, 1956, 84–98; and P. K. Jewett, Man as Male and Female: A Study in Sexual Relationships from a Theological Point of View, 1975). The exegetical basis for this interpretation is to be found in Gen. 1:26 f.: "Then God said, 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the birds of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creeps upon the earth.' So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them." The plurality expressed in v. 26a is not a plural of majesty but an expression of the divine plurality which is reflected in the mutual relationships of human existence as male and female. In v. 27b the image is defined in terms of God creating them. The idea of a helper "meet for" man (Gen. 2:18) means a "partner". "What is sought is a being resembling man but different from him. If it were only like him, a repetition, a numerical multiplication, his solitariness would not be eliminated, for it would not confront him as another but he would merely recognise himself in it. Again, if it were only different from him, a being of a wholly different order, his solitariness would not be eliminated, for it would confront him as another, yet not as another which actually belongs to him, but in the way in which the earth or tree or river confronts him as an element in his sphere, not as a fellow-occupant of this sphere fulfilling the duty allotted within it. To be created good, man needs a being like him and yet different from him, so that in it he will recognise himself but not only himself, since it is to him a Thou as truly as he is an I, and he is to it a Thou as truly as it is an I" (CD III, 1, 290). In the light of this concept of the image of God and the story of Adam's rib (Gen. 2:21–24), Dwight Hervey Small speaks of God creating "a 'woman-sized void' in man, a void which none of the animals nor even another man could fill" (Christian: Celebrate Your Sexuality, 1974, 143).

Barth himself is aware of the limitations of this concept of the image of God and the need for clarification (cf. CD III, 1, 196). He points out that the fact that the image of God in man corresponds to the bisexuality of animals belongs to the creatureliness of man rather than to the divine likeness. In man the image is found in two different individuals, whereas in God it is found in the one divine being. Moreover, there is a threeness in the divine Trinity, whereas there is a duality in the image in man and a threeness in the recurring cycle of parent, children and grandchildren. P. K. Jewett, who welcomes Barth's insight in seeing the image of God in terms of man as male and female, thinks that Barth's discussion not only suffers from occasional overstatement but that Barth tends to slide into identifying this relationship exclusively with that between husband and wife (op. cit., 46; cf. CD III, 1, 312 f., 317 f.).

On the various questions connected with marriage → Marriage; → Divorce; → Separate. It is frequently stated that under the OT law the wife was no more than a possession. The neighbour's wife could be coveted, like his ox, ass or any other possession (Exod. 20:17; Deut. 5:21). Even Ruth, whose character stands out in the story, was finally bought along with the field that Boaz redeemed (Ruth 4:5, 10). Although women were members of the → covenant people of Israel, they could not receive the covenant sign of → circumcision. A father or husband could nullify a woman's vows (Num. 30). Although the husband had the right to divorce (Deut. 24:1–4), the wife had no similar reciprocal rights. On the other hand, Deut. 24:5 prescribes that a man should not be eligible for military service for a period of one year after taking a wife. But even here the emphasis falls on the man's happiness. In the OT the price of the bride became a dowry (Gen. 34:12; Exod. 22:15 f.). The structure of patriarchal society is reflected in Exod. 20:12; cf. Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16. Num. 27:6 shows awareness of a daughter's right of inheritance. A wife differed from material possessions in that she could not be sold.

From time to time in Israelite history women played a significant part, and could even be prophetesses. Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron, is so described (Exod. 15:20). Deborah was a prophetess who evidently also judged the people (Jdg. 4:4). She gave a prophetic commission to Barak to defeat the army of Sisera (Jdg. 4:6), and celebrated the triumph with the song of Deborah (Jdg. 5:1–31). Huldah, the prophetess, was consulted by king Josiah in time of crisis (2 Ki. 22:14–20). The contexts make it clear that both Deborah and Huldah were married. The accounts of the deliverances of such prophetesses indicate that "prophetess" was more than an honorary title, given to the wives of prophets (cf. Isa. 8:3). Other women who played a prominent part in history for good or ill were Esther, the Hebrew wife of the Persian king Ahasuerus whose actions saved her people, and Jezebel, the wife of king Ahab who led Israel into Baal worship (1 Ki. 18–22).

Jewett points out that especially in early times women associated freely with men (op. cit., 87; cf. Rebekah, Gen. 24:10 f.). A daughter could inherit the possession of her father, if he died without a male heir (Num. 27:1 f.), though she had to marry within her own tribe to retain the inheritance (Num. 36). In cases of marriage the father's consent was essential, although Rebekah was consulted (Gen. 24:58). The account of Saul giving his daughter, Michal, to David points up Saul's dubious motives and the unhappy consequences (1 Sam. 18:17 ff.; 25:44; 2 Sam. 3:13; 6:16 f.). Failure to produce an heir was a mark of reproach (cf. Pss. 127[126]:7 ff.; 128[127]:3 ff.; Isa. 54:1 ff.) which finds classic expression in the stories of Sarah and Hannah. In both cases the sons that were subsequently born according to the promise of Yahweh, Isaac and Samuel, became his instruments of salvation for his people. But in both cases the wives had suffered much. Sarah had resorted to offering Abraham her maid, Hagar (Gen. 16:1–6; → Abraham; cf. also Rachel and Bilhah, Gen. 30:1–13). Hannah's life had been made wretched by Elkanah's other wife, Peninnah (1 Sam. 1:3–8). Polygamy, which was not forbidden by the law, was practised in NT times (→ Marriage, art. gameō or 7).

Hannah had free access to the house of the Lord (1 Sam. 1:3 f.; cf., however, 2 Chr. 8:11), but in Herod's temple women were allowed only as far as the Court of Women (see the description of the temple under → Temple, art. to hieron OT). Josephus designates the area by the same word used elsewhere by the Greeks for a harem (gynaikonitis; Josephus, War 5, 199; cf. Plut., Cato Minor 30, 2, 819d). The woman required monthly purification (Lev. 15:19–31), and twice as long after the birth of a daughter as after the birth of a son (Lev. 12:2–5; cf. Lk. 2:22). In the synagogues women began to be segregated from men from the 3rd cent. B.C. onwards. This process was intensified after the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 (cf. Jewett, op. cit., 90 f.; Jeremias, op. cit., 374). Any male member of the synagogue might be asked by the ruler to read from the law or the prophets, but the woman was to preserve strict silence, "The woman does not read out of the Torah for the sake of the honor of the congregation" (Megillah 23a [Baraita]; quoted from Jewett, op. cit., 91). Women were commonly bracketed with slaves and children by the rabbis (J. Leipoldt, Die Frau in der antiken Welt und im Urchristentum, 1962, 56). Women, slaves and children were not invited to pronounce the benediction at meals (Berakoth 3:3; 7:2). Rabbi Eliezer ben Hyrkanos could even say that he who teaches his daughter the law teaches her foolishness (Sotah 3:4). Conversation with women was discouraged (Erub. 53b; Aboth 1:5; cf. Jn. 4:9, 27). "May the words of the Torah be burned, they should not be handed over to women" (T. J. Sotah 10a, 8; cf. TDNT I 781). Jewett sees perhaps the most striking rabbinic depreciation of women in the saying of Rabbi Judah ben Elai (c. A.D. 150): "One must utter three doxologies every day: Praise God that he did not create me a heathen! Praise God that he did not create me a woman! Praise God that he did not create me an illiterate person!" (Tosefta Ber. 7, 18; cf. T. J. Ber:13b; cf. op. cit., 92; J. Leipoldt, op. cit., 58).

C. Brown

NT In the NT gynē means (a) a woman, female being (Matt. 9:20; Lk. 13:11, in contrast with → man Acts 5:14); (b) wife (Matt. 5:28, 31 f.; 1 Cor. 7:2 ff.); also someone betrothed (Matt. 1:20, 24; cf. Deut. 22:23 f.). gynē in the voc. is common as an address (e.g. Matt. 15:28; Jn. 2:4; 19:26; see above, CL 1). Besides gynē there are thēlys, female (also as a noun) in Mk. 10:6, and with a special meaning of maiden (cf. Mary in Matt. 1:23; but cf. Gal. 4:4), parthenos, virgin and → chēra, widow. The hapax legomena gynaikarion, which is a diminutive of gynē, little woman, but used contemptuously for a silly woman, and gynaikēion, female, occur in 2 Tim. 3:6 and 1 Pet. 3:7 respectively.

H. Vorländer

1. Women in the Gospels. (a) The Parables. The parables of Jesus often deal with the life and conduct of women (Matt. 13:33 par. Lk. 13:20 f., the woman and the → leaven; Lk. 15:8 ff., the lost coin; Matt. 24:40 f. par. Lk. 17:35, the women grinding at a mill). In the first two of these parables the part of the woman in the parable represents the action of God the Father. In the latter it counterbalances the illustration of the men in the field or in a bed, indicating that men and women have the same status in relation to salvation. Lot's wife serves to illustrate the dire need for wholehearted commitment, not turning back for material things in the hour of judgment (Lk. 17:32; cf. Gen. 19:26). It is not without significance that the allusion draws on the action of a woman to illustrate a danger that can happen to men. This teaching is immediately followed in Lk. 18:1–8 by the parable of the importunate widow who, by her persistence in petitioning the unjust judge, gains vindication. The parable of the wise and foolish virgins, drawn from Jewish marriage customs, illustrates the need to be ready for the coming of the Son on the part of both men and women (Matt. 25:1–3). Jesus himself spoke to women in public; unconcerned about Jewish rules, he even taught them (Lk. 10:38–42, the visit to the house of Mary and Martha; Jn. 4:7–27, the woman of Samaria; note the astonishment of the disciples that Jesus was talking with a woman in v. 27).

(b) Healing. Jesus gave proof of his compassion and power in his healing of women no less than of men: Peter's wife's mother (Matt. 8:14 f. par. Mk. 1:29 ff., Lk. 4:35 f.); Jairus's daughter and the woman with the issue of blood who, because of her plight not only suffered much but would have been ritually unclean and cut off from the community (Matt. 9:18–26 par. Mk. 5:21–43; Lk. 8:40–56); and the Syro-Phoenician woman and her daughter (Matt. 15:21–28 par. Mk. 7:24–30). In Lk. the widow of Nain's son was raised to life out of pity for his mother (Lk. 7:11–17; cf. 1 Ki. 17:17–24; 2 Ki. 4:32–37); in Jn. Lazarus was raised in response to his sisters, Mary and Martha (Jn. 11:1–44).

(c) Followers of Jesus. Jesus' gift and call to divine sonship were intended for the poor and the lost and in a special way for women upon whom he conferred a new dignity. Even in his infancy the faith of Anna is placed by Luke alongside that of Simeon (Lk. 2:25–38). We do not find women disciples in the circle of the Twelve (→ Apostle). But this may well be due to the Twelve being chosen as the counterpart to the twelve sons of Jacob as heads of the twelve → tribes. However, women were to be found among the followers of Jesus; they were more prominent than the men in their love, care and courage after the crucifixion (Matt. 27:55 f. par. Mk. 15:40 f., Lk. 23:49; Matt. 28:1 ff. par. Mk. 16:1 ff., Lk. 24:1 ff.). Lk. describes the preaching ministry of Jesus in the following terms: "Soon afterward he went on through the cities and villages, preaching and bringing the good news of the kingdom of God. And the twelve were with him, and also some of the women who had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities: Mary, called Magdalene, from whom seven demons had gone out, and Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, who provided for them of their means" (Lk. 8:1–3). This latter point suggests that the traditional rôle of the man as the provider was here reversed.

Mary Magdalene or Mary of Magdala is one of the most prominent women who followed Jesus. Magdala was an important fishing, shipbuilding, agricultural and trading centre. Situated at the south end of the Plain of Gennesaret, it had a large Gentile population. Later rabbis ascribed its fall to its licentiousness (Midrash on Lam. 2:2). It is mentioned in Matt. 14:34; Mk. 6:53. Some scholars are reluctant to identify Mary with the prostitute who anointed Jesus' feet and found forgiveness from Jesus in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk. 7:36–50). It is conceded that Jesus had cast out "seven demons" from Mary (Lk. 8:2; cf. Mk. 16:9). But it is pointed out that there is no necessary connexion between the moral state of Magdala and that of Mary, and that Mary is introduced in Lk. 8:2 in a formal way with no apparent allusion to what has just been described. The "seven demons" could express the serious and prolonged nature of her plight (cf. Lk. 11:26). On the other hand, the way in which Mary is introduced in Lk. 8:2 might well be Lk.'s modest and cryptic way of identifying Mary and of expressing the new beginning that she had found in Jesus. Her past was now a nameless past; she had found a new identity.

Mk. 15:40 f. mentions the ministry of the women followers of Jesus in the Marcan account of the crucifixion: "There were also women looking on from afar, among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the younger and of Joses, and Salome, who, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and ministered to him; and also many other women who came up with him to Jerusalem" (cf. Jn. 19:25). Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and Salome are mentioned by Mk. as those who came to anoint the body of Jesus (Mk. 16:1; cf. Lk. 23:55–24:11). They were the first to be told of the resurrection. Lk. 24:10 omits Salome, but mentions Joanna "and the other women" who told the apostles, "but their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they did not believe them" (Lk. 24:11). In Matt. 28:1 Mary Magdalene "and the other Mary" are the first witnesses. The account in Jn. 20:1–18 mentions Mary Magdalene alone, who then told Peter and the disciple whom Jesus loved. In the Synoptic accounts, the women do not actually see the risen Christ but the empty tomb and the angelic messenger. But in Jn., Mary meets the risen Christ, supposing him to be the gardener, though she is forbidden to attempt physical contact with him. "Jesus said to her, 'Do not hold me, for I have not yet ascended to the Father; but go to my brethren and say to them, I am ascending to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God'" (Jn. 20:18).

Mary of Bethany, the sister of Martha, figures in two sets of stories. Lk. 10:38–42 describes how Jesus entered an unnamed village, where he was received by Martha. Her sister "sat at the Lord's feet and listened to his teaching". Martha, distracted "with much serving", rebuked Mary but was in turn rebuked by Jesus: "Martha, Martha, you are anxious and troubled about many things; one thing is needful. Mary has chosen the good portion, which shall not be taken away from her." Jn. 11:1–12:8 describes the raising of Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, at Bethany, a village to the east of Jerusalem. Here too Martha appears as the more active and voluble sister (cf. Jn. 11:20 ff., 39; 12:2; with 11:31 ff.; 12:3). In Lk. Mary sat at the feet of Jesus; in Jn. she anointed his feet and wiped them with her hair (Jn. 11:2; 12:3).

Mk. 14:3–9 also describes an anointing at Bethany in the house of Simon the leper during the last week of Jesus' life. Whereas Jn. 12:4 ff. specifically mentions Judas' complaint that the ointment could have been sold for three hundred denarii and the money given to the poor, Mk. 14:4 does not identify the source of the complaint. Both evangelists record Jesus' interpretation that the poor will always be with the disciples, but that the act of anointing had been done beforehand for Jesus' burying (Mk. 14:6–9, which concludes "And truly, I say to you, wherever the gospel is preached in the whole world, what she has done will be told in memory of her"; cf. Jn. 12:7 f.). There are differences of detail (in Mk. she anoints Jesus' head; in Jn. the feet), but there can be no doubt that it is the same incident that is described. The account in Matt. 26:6–13 is substantially the same as in Mk. except that an exact price is not put upon the value of the ointment. The anointing which in the first instance was an act of love is construed by Jesus as symbolic of a wider meaning. It anticipates his death, and it also has a messianic character. The title Christ means the anointed one (→ Jesus Christ, art. Christos); and kings and priests were anointed by having oil poured over their heads (→ Anoint, arts. aleiphō and chriō). Elsewhere

Jesus emphasized the intrinsic connexion between his messiahship and his death (cf. Matt. 16:13–23 par. Mk. 8:27–33, Lk. 9:18–22). He had been anointed at the beginning of his ministry by the → Spirit at his → baptism (Lk. 4:18; cf. Isa. 61:1; Acts 4:27; 10:38; Heb. 1:9; cf. Ps. 45:7). He now received this unprecedented anointing in the house of a leper at the hands of a woman at the beginning of his passion. By linking the act with his death, Jesus was further underlining the character of his messiahship.

The accounts give rise to a number of historical and critical questions. The identification of Mary Magdalene, Mary of Bethany and the unnamed woman of Lk. 7:36–50 was widely accepted in the western church from the sixth century. The woman in the Matthean and Marcan stories is also unnamed. But if Jn. is correct in naming her as Mary, one of the daughters of the house, Matt. and Mk. may have suppressed her name out of a Jewish reticence. It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that Simon and Lazarus were one and the same person (the former name meaning “Asked of God”, and the latter “God has helped”). But J. N. Sanders is more likely to be right in taking Simon the leper to be the father of Martha and Mary (“‘Those whom Jesus Loved’ (John xi. 5)”, NTS 1, 1954–55, 29–41). It may be that the disease of which Lazarus died was leprosy, perhaps contracted from Simon the leper, which might supply a reason for Lazarus’ premature death and give added point to the remark of Jn. 12:39. Further, Lazarus might have served as a model for the parable in Lk. 16:19–31, which, if Lazarus was suffering from a skin disease coming under the general description of leprosy, might explain his sitting at the gate of the rich man full of sores (v. 20) and the allusion to someone rising from the dead (v. 31). If the two Marys are the same, the name Mary Magdalene might be an allusion to her former way of life as a kind of prodigal daughter (cf. Lk. 15:11–32, with Martha as the one who stayed at home). It may be noted in passing that the house referred to in Lk. 10:38 was Martha’s. Lk. himself gives no indication of where the house was. It may have been in Galilee, or it may have been the one at Bethany mentioned in Matt. 26:6, Mk. 14:3 and Jn. 12:1. Although Simon was a common name, the circumstances may suggest that Simon the leper (Matt. 26:6 par. Mk. 14:3) was the same as Simon the Pharisee (Lk. 7:36, 40, 43 f.). If Lk. 7:36–50 is the same story as in the other Gospels, only set in a thematic rather than a chronological context, it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that the woman concerned was none other than Mary Magdalene “from whom seven demons had gone out” and who is later mentioned in her sister’s house but who here is actually coming home but is not acknowledged by her own father. Henceforth, she found healing, forgiveness and new life in Jesus. On the other hand, there may have been two anointings, the first by the woman (probably Mary) in Lk. 7 and the second in the last week of Jesus’ life. If it was Mary in both instances, the first was an act of love at a time which was a crisis for her, and the second was an act of love expressing her devotion to Jesus at a time which was a crisis for him.

For → Mary, the mother of Jesus, and the mothers of the disciples → mētēr. Also mentioned among the followers of Jesus is Mary the wife or daughter of Clopas (Jn. 19:25; cf. Mk. 2:14; 3:18; Lk. 24:18).

(d) The Sayings of Jesus. If Jesus’ parables and actions lifted women to a status equal to that of men, and if in the gospel narratives certain women stand out, the sayings of Jesus make it clear that it is not because of their sex that women or men are important. It is their relationship to Jesus that matters. When told of the presence of his mother and brothers, Jesus replied, "Here are my mother and brothers! Whoever does the will of God is my brother, and sister and mother" (Mk. 3:34 f.; cf. Matt. 12:46–50; Lk. 8:19 ff.; Jn. 15:14). In reply to the woman in the crowd who said, "Blessed is the womb that bore you, and the breasts that you sucked!" Jesus answered, "Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and keep it!" (Lk. 11:27 f.). The particularity of divine grace is illustrated by the fact that "there were many widows in Israel in the days of Elijah, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when there came a great famine over all the land; and Elijah was sent to none of them but only to Zarephath, in the land of Sidon, to a woman who was a widow" (Lk. 4:25 f.; cf. 1 Ki. 17:18–16). In response to the weeping of the women of Jerusalem as Jesus went to the cross, he turned to them and said, "Daughters of Jerusalem, do not weep for me, but weep for yourselves and for your children. For behold, the days are coming when they will say, 'Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bore, and the breasts that never gave suck!'" (Lk. 23:28 f.; cf. 21:23 f.). The story of the widow's mite (Mk. 12:41–44 par. Lk. 21:1–4) illustrates the devotion of the most depressed class of the community compared with that of the rich. It is not the relative amount that counts but the whole-hearted commitment. The story of the woman taken in adultery is not in the best manuscripts, but is regarded by many as an authentic tradition which found its way into the Gospel (cf. R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John, Anchor Bible, I, 1966, 335–38 and the literature referred to there). The story may well illustrate the tendency to judge without a fair and proper hearing, just as the Jewish leaders had been barely restrained from judging Jesus in this manner (cf. Jn. 7:51; Deut. 17:6; Exod. 23:1). Sin is not condoned (Jn. 8:11). But none of the men was able to condemn, when confronted with the challenge, "Let him who is without sin among you be the first to throw a stone at her" (Jn. 8:7).

In Matt. 21:31 f. Jesus asserts that prostitutes and tax collectors will enter the kingdom of heaven before the religious leaders, for they repented at the preaching of John the Baptist. The bracketing of these two classes together implies the lowest depths of degradation to which male and female could sink. But whilst sin is never condoned, the saying illustrates how the social outcasts find not only acceptance, but places of honour in the kingdom. A tacit witness to this is the genealogy of Matt. Although it is based on male descent, it contains the names of four women all of whom were involved in sexual irregularity: Tamar who had intercourse with her father-in-law (Matt. 1:3; cf. Gen. 38); Rahab the harlot (Matt. 1:5; cf. Jos. 2:1); Ruth the Moabitess who was thus not a true Jewess and who obtained her husband by lying with him on the threshing floor (Matt. 1:5; cf. Ruth 3:6–18); Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah, with whom David committed adultery (Matt. 1:6; cf. 2 Sam. 2:2–5). In addition Mary herself was suspected by Joseph of having committed intercourse with another man (Matt. 1:18 ff.).

2. Paul and Acts. (a) The Status of Women. Gal. 3:28 asserts that, "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus." Some scholars take this to be an allusion to an early baptismal formula (cf. parallels in 1 Cor. 12:12 f. and Col. 3:9 ff.; R. Scroggs, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 966). Scroggs comments: "To enter the Christian community thus meant to join a society in which male-female roles and valuations based on such roles had been discarded. The community was powerless to alter role valuations in the outside culture, but within the church, behavior patterns and interrelationships were to be based on this affirmation of equality." Similarly, P. K. Jewett regards the text as "the Magna Carta of humanity" (op. cit., 142). "Salvation does not alter the ordinance of creation; rather it redeems it. . . . In Christ the man and the woman are redeemed from false stereotypes, stereotypes which inhibit their true relationship. Thus redeemed, they are enabled to become what God intended them to be when he created Man in his image – a fellowship of male and female. The restoration of this true fellowship of the sexes is one of the ways we 'put off the old man and put on the new man who is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of Christ' (Col. 3:10)" (op. cit., 142 ff.).

In the light of Eph. 5:25, Jewett asks how many rabbis had ever said that a man should love his wife as Yahweh loved Israel (op. cit., 145). For a former rabbi, Paul acted in a revolutionary way. He could greet by name women in the Roman congregation (Rom. 16:6, 12, 15), naming Priscilla even before her husband (Rom. 16:3). In Rom. 16 he mentions by name no less than seven Christian women, and the letter may well have been carried by Phoebe, a deacon of the church of Cenchreae (Rom. 16:1 f.). As a rabbi, Paul should hardly have deigned to address women, where no men were present, but he did so unhesitatingly at Philippi (Acts 16:13). The church there evidently began in the house of Lydia (Acts 16:15, 40), and women evidently played a dominant, though not always salutary, part in its life (Phil. 4:2). At Thessalonica and Beroea women were among the prominent members of the church (Acts 17:4, 12).

The question arises whether there is not a tension between this strand of Paul's teaching and the hierarchical view of woman's subordination to man in the light of 1 Cor. 11:2–16; 14:34 f.; 1 Tim. 2:11–15 and Tit. 2:4 f. (cf. Jewett, op. cit., 111–49). In the first of these passages, Paul develops a hierarchical doctrine of headship. Scroggs sees an irreconcilable contradiction if kephalē, head, is taken to mean "ruler" or "superior authority". But kephalē may also mean "source", e.g. the source of a river. "Since a remark in 1 Cor. 11:12 suggests that Paul is thinking of Gen. 2, where man is said to be the source of woman, that may also be the point in 1 Cor. 11:3. Belief in Christ as the agent of creation (e.g. 1 Cor. 8:6) would explain the associated statement that Christ is man's head (i.e. source). Such an interpretation would make 1 Cor. 11:3 consistent with all Paul's other statements and actions" (op. cit., 967; for fuller discussion of this passage → Head, art. kephalē NT3). Similarly, in 1 Tim. 2:11–15 Paul's premise is the ontological priority of the male (→ Adam, art. Heua). On the basis of this priority Paul adopts what for him is a personal rule: "I permit no woman to teach or to have authority over men; she is to keep silent" (2 Tim. 2:11). The precise wording should be noted. Paul is here stating his own position and practice which corresponds to his inherited Jewish position and for which he finds grounds in the order of creation and the fall. The question to be asked is whether the inferences that Paul draws here are to be regarded as universally normative in the light of cultural and educational changes, even by those who regard the premises of the argument as an expression of the ontological structure of human relationships. 1 Cor. 14:34 f. likewise expresses the practice which Paul personally follows and wishes to see followed in the churches.

With regard to the rôle of women in public worship and teaching, Paul followed

Jewish practice, seeing a reason for it in the structure of creation. The question may be asked how he envisaged the outworking of his understanding of man and woman in Christ in relation to → marriage. (On the question of divorce and separation → Divorce, art. apostasion, and → Separate, art. chōrizō.) At first sight, he might appear to teach an uncompromising subordinationism, if certain passages are taken out of context, e.g. “Wives, be subject to your husbands, as in the Lord” (Eph. 5:22; cf. Col. 3:18). But in the light of Paul’s teaching as a whole there is a dialectical tension and paradox in his instructions. For in Eph. the teaching is prefaced by the general instruction: “Be subject to one another out of reverence for Christ” (Eph. 5:21). Moreover, it works out the way in which husbands are to love their wives in terms of two analogies: loving the wife as oneself (v. 28), reflecting the second great commandment (Matt. 22:39 par. Mk. 12:31; cf. Lk. 10:27; Lev. 19:18) and the one-flesh doctrine of marriage (v. 31; cf. Gen. 2:24); and the pattern of Christ (vv. 25, 32). “Husbands, love your wives, as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her” (Eph. 5:25; cf. Col. 3:19). In other words, the headship and lordship of Christ does not consist in authoritarianism. Rather, it is expressed precisely in self-giving. For Paul, Christ’s lordship was exercised precisely in taking the form of a servant (cf. Phil. 2:7; Mk. 10:45). Likewise, the husband’s headship is to be exercised in the same self-giving in which he lives out his new nature in Christ. The headship consists in a renunciation of all authoritarianism; the only subjection that it is to demand is self-subjection for love of the wife. Entirely in line with this position is the statement in 1 Cor. (the same epistle which speaks of the headship of the man) that “the wife does not rule over her own body, but the husband does; likewise the husband does not rule over his own body, but the wife does” (1 Cor. 7:4). The idea of the wife actually ruling over the husband appears to be unparalleled in previous Jewish thinking, and contradicts Paul’s alleged misogyny. The thrust of Paul’s teaching is therefore caught in the dynamic paradoxes of mutual subjection and the thought that the headship of the husband is to be realized in utter self-sacrifice for the loved one, in a way that applies to marriage the self-sacrifice of Christ.

Relevant to the discussion of marriage relationships is the paraenetical passage in 1 Thess. 4:3–8 which treats sexual ethics in the wider context of sanctification (on this whole passage see E. Best, The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, BNTC, 1972, 158–70; H. Baltensweiler, “Erwägungen zu 1. Thess. 4;3–8”, ThZ 19, 1963, 1–13; W. Vogel, “Eidenai to heautou skeuos ktasthai. Zur Deutung von 1. Thess. 4.3 ff in Zusammenhang der paulinischen Eheauffassung”, ThBl 13, 1934, 83 ff.; C. Maurer, skeuos, TDNT VII 365 ff.). The RSV translates skeuos in v. 4 as “wife”: “that each one of you know how to take a wife for himself in holiness and honour.” skeuos normally means “vessel” and ktasthai may mean to “possess”, hence the passage has been understood to mean that Paul is urging the men among the Thessalonian believers that sanctification also involves knowing how to possess their sexual organs or their bodies. They are not to be dominated by lust and sexual licence like the heathen (v. 5). Rather, they are to practise monogamy and refrain from adultery (v. 6) and immorality in general (v. 3; for the meaning of porneia → Discipline; and → Separate, art. chōrizō NT). Tertullian and Chrysostom took skeuos to mean body, but Theodore of Mopsuestia and Augustine took it to mean wife (TDNT VII 365), and Best favours this interpretation in view of the fact that ktasthai in the present tense normally means to gain or acquire, and no one could be said to gain his body (op. cit., 161). skeuos is used of the women in 1 Pet. 3:7 and of men (2 Tim. 2:21; Acts 9:15; cf. Rom. 9:21 ff.). Maurer adduces rabbinic evidence for "vessel" (Heb. kēlf) being used of women in sexual contexts, and suggests that ktasthai here corresponds to the Heb. ba'al 'iššâh, to become lord or master of a wife (cf. Deut. 21:13; 22:22; 24:1; Isa. 54:1 which have specific reference to sexual intercourse; cf. also Isa. 62:5; Gen. 20:3; Prov. 30:23). The thought, therefore, would be parallel to 1 Cor. 7:2 ff., where Paul urges marriage as the divinely appointed provision for man's sexual needs. If it be pointed out that Paul seems to be concerned here with male sexual needs rather than the concerns of the woman, the reason for this appears to be that it was precisely the male sexual needs and lack of sanctification that constituted the problem at Thessalonica. But if 1 Thess. was among the first, if not the first of Paul's letters, and Eph. among the last, it could be that we can trace a development in Paul's teaching culminating in his vision of the marriage relationship as a mirror of the relationship of Christ and the church.

(b) The Ministry of Women. Some of the passages already alluded to have touched on the ministry of women in the early church. Even before Pentecost women were among those who "devoted themselves to prayer" with the disciples (Acts 1:14; cf. 12:12). The first convert at Philippi was Lydia who was baptized with her household (Acts 16:14 f.). At Thessalonica and Berea women of high standing were among the first converts (Acts 17:4, 12). As a believer the woman is an adelphē, sister (→ Brother, art. adelphos). Among the women who were fellow-workers with the apostles were Priscilla, the wife of Aquila (Acts 18:2, 26; Rom. 16:3 f.), and Phoebe, "a deaconess of the church of Cenchreae" (Rom. 16:1), Cenchreae being the port of Corinth. 1 Cor. 16:19 refers to the church in the house of Aquila and Priscilla, and they are included in the greetings of 2 Tim. 4:19. The house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, served as a place of meeting for the church (Acts 12:12). Alongside the male diaconate there was also a female one; or perhaps more accurately the early church saw the emergence of both men and women as deacons. At first this ministry was evidently of a free character with no titles attached. Acts 9:36 mentions Tabitha at Joppa, whose name meant Dorcas or Gazelle; "She was full of good works and acts of charity." Part of her work consisted in making coats and garments (v. 39). Lydia's hospitality was part of her service (Acts 16:15). Paul's use of the masc. term diakonos not only suggests the existence of an order of women deacons but also that the women were included in the same order as male deacons. This explanation would make the best sense of the injunction to women in 1 Tim. 3:11 which occurs in a discussion of the qualities required in deacons: "The women likewise must be serious, no slanderers, but temperate, faithful in all things." Although some scholars think that this refers to the wives of deacons and others think that the question cannot be decided with certainty (cf. M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 58), the use of diakonos for Phoebe and the fact that Paul is talking about diakonoī both before and after v. 11 suggests that he is also talking here about women deacons, and that men and women alike could be deacons. A separate order of widows (1 Tim. 5:39; cf. Tit. 2:3 ff.; → chēra) seems also to be indicated. The nature of the work of the deacon is not clearly defined. It would seem that teaching and oversight fell to the episkopoi, "bishops", and presbyteroi, "elders" (→ Bishop). The etymological link between diakonos and the vb. diakoneō, 'to serve', implies some form of service, which judging from the activity of the Seven in Acts 6 and that of Tabitha and Lydia may have had a strongly practical character (→ Serve, art. diakoneō).

The rôle of women in worship at Corinth was evidently a source of much dispute. On the question of the veiling of women in worship → Head, art. kephalē NT 3. The question of the propriety of women praying or prophesying with their heads uncovered (1 Cor. 11:5, 13) implies that women took part in the charismatic worship at Corinth. However, Paul's attitude here is in keeping with his Jewish and OT background. In ch. 11 he urges the veiling of women, stating that this is the practice which "we recognize" (v. 15). In ch. 14 he gives his ruling: "As in all the churches of the saints, the women should keep silence in the churches. For they are not permitted to speak, but should be subordinate, as even the law says. If there is anything they desire to know, let them ask their husbands at home. For it is a shameful thing to speak in church. What! Did the word of God originate with you, or are you the only ones it has reached?" (1 Cor. 14:33b–36). H. Conzelmann sees this passage as an interpolation which interrupts the flow of the argument (1 Corinthians, Hermeneia, 1975, 246). He regards it as "a reflection of the bourgeois consolidation of the church, roughly on the level of the Pastoral Epistles: it binds itself to the general custom" (cf. 2 Tim. 2:11; see above (a)). (That the passage is an interpolation is argued on purely textual grounds by G. Zuntz, The Text of the Epistles, 1953, 17.) Others see in Paul's attitude the residue of a rabbinic, Jewish outlook which falls short of Paul's insights into the status of women in Christ (for further discussion see G. Fitzer, Das Weib schweige in der Gemeinde, ThEH New Series 110, 1963; S. Aalen, "A Rabbinic Formula in 1 Cor. 14, 34", StudEv, II, 1, TU 87, 1964, 513–25). In this case Paul's attitude might be comparable with that of Peter on the question of circumcision, where Peter had not fully worked out the implications of the gospel for his stance (cf. Gal. 2:11 ff.). On the other hand, Paul's pronouncement may be seen as a ruling which was valid in the social, cultural, educational and church setting of his time but which no longer obtains today. In this case his recommendations might be comparable with his views which elsewhere he regards as his opinion (1 Cor. 7:25). An alternative view interprets this passage as a ruling about the maintenance of order, which has nothing to do with directions about teaching. The operative words are: "if they wish to learn anything" (1 Cor. 14:35). Paul is aiming at "the prevention of self-willed speaking" which is quite different from the praying and prophesying by women which Paul allows (1 Cor. 11:5; cf. G. Delling, TDNT IX 43). Similarly, 1 Tim. 2:12 might be interpreted not as an absolute prohibition of women teaching but as a repudiation of allowing them to domineer and lay down the law. The hapax legomenon authentēin can mean both to have authority over and to domineer (cf. Arndt, 120).

What light does the NT shed on the question of the ministry of women today? The type of answers that are given often depend upon the type of questions asked. If we ask what are the formal precedents or the explicit statements of the NT we have already shaped the answer: the formal precedents are limited to the rôle of a number of women among whom Phoebe is classed as a deacon, and Paul's express pronouncements seem to exclude not only the ordination of women but the possibility of women leading public worship. Similarly, a blank answer is obtained if we ask what the NT says about the ordination of women. In point of fact, the NT says nothing about the ordination of men in terms of investing them with a lifelong status and authority. In speaking of ministry, the NT lays its emphasis on gifts and functions which are not necessarily exercised in every given church situation (cf. 1 Cor. 12:4–31; Rom. 12:4–8; Eph. 4:11 ff.). Deacons existed at Philippi (Phil. 1:1) and in the churches served by Timothy (1 Tim. 3:8–13), but there is no evidence of them in the other Pauline Epistles. The Seven were called into being for a particular ministry in the Jerusalem church (Acts 6), but when the particular need passed, the ministry was evidently not perpetuated. Subsequently Philip became an evangelist (Acts 21:8; cf. 8:4 ff. and Stephen's preaching in 6:8 and 7:1–60). The variety and flexibility of ministry in the NT in the light of the needs of the situation and the gifts exercised in any given church would suggest that this is the pattern and precedent to be followed in thinking about ministry today. We should not ask whether there is a formal precedent but whether there is a gift of the Spirit and a need. With regard to the ministry of women we should not try to reproduce their rôle in the first-century milieu. We should rather ask what is their status in Christ, and what gifts and opportunities has the Spirit given to women in the church today.

3. Peter. The injunctions to wives and husbands in 1 Pet. 3:1–7 are comparable with those in Col. 3:18 f. and Eph. 5:21–33. Wives are to be submissive to their husbands. Character rather than outward adornment should be their true beauty. The thoroughly Jewish and OT character of the teaching is epitomized by the example of Sarah's obedience (v. 6; cf. Gen. 18:12). But this is counterbalanced by v. 7: "Likewise you husbands, live considerately with your wives, bestowing honour on the woman as the weaker sex [skeuei, lit. vessel; cf. 1 Thess. 4:4], since you are joint heirs of the grace of life, in order that your prayers may not be hindered." There are further affinities with Paul in the use of skeuos, vessel, for the wife. The relationship of married life to prayer echoes 1 Cor. 7:5. The reference to giving honour may be compared with Paul's statement that the wife rules over the husband's body (1 Cor. 7:4), and the picture of man and woman as "joint heirs of the grace of life" recalls the assertion of Gal. 3:28 that in Christ "there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus."

4. Hebrews. In the great chapter on faith, women are singled out as examples among the great heroes of the OT. They include Sarah who received power to conceive (Heb. 11:11 [on which see further F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 299–302]; cf. Gen. 17:19; 18:11–14; 21:2; cf. also Rom. 4:19; 9:9; 1 Pet. 3:6), Rahab the harlot who "did not perish with those who were disobedient, because she had given friendly welcome to the spies" (Heb. 11:31; cf. Jos. 2:1–21; 6:22–25), and the women who "received their dead by resurrection" (Heb. 11:35; cf. 1 Ki. 17:17–24; 2 Ki. 4:25–37).

5. Revelation. In the Letters to the Seven Churches the church at Thyatira is accused of tolerating "the woman Jezebel, who calls herself a prophetess and is teaching and beguiling my servants to practise immorality and to eat food sacrificed to idols" (Rev. 2:20). The OT allusions recall 1 Ki. 16:31; 2 Ki. 9:22, 30; Num. 25:1. Jezebel's name does not apparently occur in later Jewish writings. J. M. Ford sees it as a nickname for some person who supported false prophets, as did Queen Jezebel in the time of → Elijah (Revelation, Anchor Bible, 1975, 403).

Elsewhere woman or women constitute an important symbol in Rev. (cf. 9:8; 12:1, 4, 6, 14–17; 14:4; 17:3, 4, 6 f., 9 f., 18; 19:7; 21:8). In ch. 12 the vision of the woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, wearing a crown of twelve stars, and giving birth to a son, recalls the story of Mary giving birth to Jesus, escaping from Herod with the infant Jesus into Egypt (cf. Matt. 2:1–23). Having failed to destroy the child, “the dragon was angry with the woman, and went off to make war on the rest of her offspring, on those who keep the commandments of God and bear testimony to Jesus” (Rev. 12:17). (Similar imagery, in reference to the birth of a “wonder of a counsellor” (cf. Isa. 9:6) in the Qumran community, is used in 1QH 3:7–10.) But the image of the woman also represents the community of the people of God (cf. Isa. 54:5; Jer. 3:6–10; Ezek. 16:8; Hos. 2:19 f.; 2 Esd. 9:38–10:59). Isa. 66:7 uses the picture of Zion in birth-pangs. Yahweh is pictured as the husband of Zion, Jerusalem or Israel (Isa. 54:1, 5 f.; Jer. 3:20; Ezek. 16:8–14; Hos. 2:19 f.) who is a mother (Isa. 49:21; 50:1; 66:7–11; Hos. 4:5; Bar. 4:8–23), and who is in the throes of birth (Mic. 4:9 f.; Isa. 26:16 ff.; Jer. 4:31; 13:21; Sir. 48:19). The celestial imagery may recall Jdg. 5:31; Pss. 89(88):36; 104(103):2; Isa. 60:1; Jer. 15:9; Sir. 26:16 (cf. J. M. Ford, op. cit., 195 f.). By contrast the harlot, → Babylon, is in a situation comparable with that described by Jeremiah in depicting the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 15:5–9). In the picture of the new Jerusalem God takes the place of the sun (Rev. 21:22). The vision in Rev. 12 depicts the conflict of the people of God, modelled on OT imagery of Zion and Israel as the people of God and also on the history of Jesus himself. Although the adversary is mighty and capable of causing great devastation, he will ultimately fail.

In Rev. 21:2 f. the church is pictured as the new Jerusalem after the first earth and heaven have passed away, coming like a bride from heaven for her husband. (The bride is the wife of the → Lamb (Rev. 21:9; cf. Eph. 5:32). The thought resumes the picture of the marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev. 19:7 ff.; cf. Ps. 118[117]:24; and the Targum to Ps. 48 which pictures Jerusalem as a bride and the Targum on Cant. which sees the assembly of Israel as a bride; J. M. Ford, op. cit., 361). By contrast Babylon, the symbol of godless civilization, is a harlot who has by now been judged (Rev. 17:1–18).

C. Brown

μήτηρ

μήτηρ (mētēr), mother.

CL 1. A high estimation of motherhood and parenthood can be traced everywhere in antiquity. Already in pre-historic times (this is shown by numerous finds of small images of expectant mothers with pronounced sexual characteristics), man was aware of the close relationship between human life and that of the earth itself. The earth became the great mother who gives everything and then in death takes everything back into herself. Thus in many regions the oldest figures of the gods are earth mothers (cf. mother earth, mater terra, magna mater). Such mother-deities, which are represented anthropomorphically, play a great part in the popular religions of the East. Veneration of them often led to cultic prostitution, in order to gain an immediate share in their life-controlling powers, as in the Canaanite cult of Astarte (see OT below). Yet the picture of the mother deity can also be spiritualized and civilized and be detached from the highly erotic domain of the figure of Venus, as in the case of the Egyptian goddess, Isis, the embodiment of the true wife and mother. On the other hand it can assume the cruel and bloody traits of an Artemis or a Kali. We find in the mother-deities the whole gamut of female possibilities (cf. G. van der Leeuw, Religion in its Essence and Manifestation, 1963, I, 91–100).

2. In Gk. philosophy the mother-concept is used in a metaphorical sense, when e.g. Plato speaks of matter as the “mother of all” (Tim. 50d; 51a; or the “nurse”, Tim. 49a; 52d). In his speculations about → wisdom, Philo designates wisdom the “mother of the world and of the logos” (Ebr. 32). In general he often uses the expression in a metaphorical sense.

OT In the LXX ēm is translated over 300 times by mētēr.

(a) In the OT we find again and again traces of the mother-deities of the heathen world. The prophets fought a ceaseless battle against the Canaanite Astarte cult. The worship of the goddess of fertility was bound up for the most part with cultic prostitution (cf. among other passages 1 Sam. 31:10; 2 Ki. 23:13; also Jdg. 2:3; 10:6). Cultic “unchastity” became a symbol of apostasy from Yahweh (Hos. 4:13 ff.; cf. Rev. 17:5).

(b) A maternal judicial praxis possibly still operated in special formulations, e.g. “the son of thy mother” in place of brother (Jdg. 8:19; 9:1–3; Pss. 50[49]:20; 69[68]:8), the “mother’s house” (e.g. Gen. 24:28), or when the mother sought a wife for her son (Gen. 21:21). Nevertheless, the world of the OT still bears the stamp of the patriarchate, and the judicial regard for the female line of descent as that of hereditary succession is not stressed. Thus, for instance, a mother who has borne sons enjoys in the world of the patriarchate, a world dominated by men, a special position of honour among mothers and women.

(c) Motherhood is also guarded in the Fifth Commandment (Exod. 20:12). The death penalty rests upon any who strike or curse father or mother (Exod. 21:15, 17). Nevertheless, despite firm parental ties, it is still stressed that a man should leave father and mother and cleave to his wife (Gen. 2:24).

(d) The OT repeatedly gives prominence to women who played a special part in politics (e.g. 1 Ki. 15:13; 2 Ki. 3:13; Jdg. 5:7) or in the history of God’s people (so Sarah, Rebekah, Ruth, Hannah, Bathsheba, → gynē OT).

(e) The concept was also carried over into the preaching of the prophets: the people of God is called the mother of Israel, and is entrusted to God (as to a husband) (Jer. 50:12). In Hosea she becomes an adulteress (Hos. 2:4, 7), in Ezek. 16:15 a harlot. Isa. 50:1 takes up the figure: Israel is the mother whom God divorces for the sins of her children (cf. Jer. 50:12). Finally, the picture of a mother is carried over to the capital city → Jerusalem, to Mount Zion, about which the people cluster as children about their mother (2 Sam. 20:19; cf. Gal. 4:26); for mother the LXX has here mētropolis. 2 Esd. (A.D. 100) calls the earthly Jerusalem “the mother of us all” (10:7).

Only in two places (Isa. 49:15, gynē, and 66:13) does the OT liken God’s conduct to the action of a woman. In the OT creaturely distance from Yahweh forbade any deifying of what is motherly, and any sexually orientated presentation of God’s likeness. On the other hand, → wisdom is personified as a woman (Prov. 1:20 f.; 8:1–3; cf. Wis. 7:12–22; Sir. 1:6–20).

NT In the NT mētēr occurs 84 times (72 in the Gospels alone). The concept of the mother or of motherhood is never exalted to a religious symbol or used in mythological presentations.

1. In the Gospels, besides explicit and particular mention of many mothers, we find the whole gamut of the natural relationship between mother and child.

(a) According to the Synoptic tradition, Jesus accepted the Fifth Commandment (Exod. 20:12; cf. Deut. 5:16; Exod. 21:16; Lev. 20:9) in all its absoluteness, even in respect of the consequences of its violation (Matt. 15:4 par. Mk. 7:10). Pharisaic softening of the commandment is firmly rejected (Matt. 15:5 f. par. Mk. 7:11 f.; → Gift, art. korban). Nevertheless, as in the OT, the relationship of a man to his wife and that of a wife to her husband is given precedence over that to a mother, and thereby the natural detachment from the parental home is confirmed (Gen. 2:24; Matt. 19:5 par. Mk. 10:7 f.; cf. Eph. 5:31; → Separate, art. chōrizō NT).

(b) Jesus clearly delineates the limits of parental power which denies the claims of God. For the sake of the → kingdom of God adherence to the parental home has to be put aside (Matt. 10:34; more strictly in Lk. 12:53).

2. In Paul, as in the whole of the NT, respect for motherhood is an obvious manifestation of divinely-given life (cf. Rom. 16:13; 1 Thess. 2:7). That Paul nowhere mentions his own mother is not remarkable. He is able to compare his pastoral endeavours for the new Christians with those of a mother, just as he can also call himself a father who has begotten faith in them (Gal. 4:19; Phlm. 10). He praises Timothy's mother Eunice and grandmother Lois (2 Tim. 1:5), and urges him to treat the older women like mothers and the younger ones like sisters (1 Tim. 5:2). The → Jerusalem that is above is our mother in contrast to the present Jerusalem that is in bondage, like Hagar and Mount Sinai (Gal. 4:26 f.; cf. Isa. 54:1; → Parable, art. parabolē NT 9). By contrast Rev. 17:9 describes → Babylon as "mother of harlots and of earth's abominations".

3. The status of the mother of Jesus. (a) For all his respect for his mother (at the age of twelve he was subject to her after his visit to the temple, Lk. 2:51) and all his care for her (i.e. during the crucifixion, Jn. 19:26 f.; cf. Matt. 27:55 f.; Mk. 15:40 f.; Lk. 23:49), there remains a clear distinction between Jesus and his mother (cf. Lk. 2:49). He prevented her, when she would have hampered him in his messianic office (Matt. 12:46 ff. par. Mk. 3:31 ff., Lk. 8:19 ff.), and also at the time of the wedding at Cana (Jn. 2:4). Lk. 11:27 f. is also significant. Jesus turned the personal adulation for his mother into a general injunction: "Yes, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it" (cf. W. Michaelis, mētēr TDNT IV 643).

(b) The status of Mary in early Christendom is in accord with Jesus' attitude. After the resurrection she retires completely and in the rest of the NT is named only once (Acts 2:14).

(c) "In primitive Christianity the mother of Jesus was far less important than the mother of the founder in other religions" (W. Michaelis, ibid.). The Roman Catholic madonna-cult is supported by statements about the virgin birth made at a time subsequent to the NT, and imposes further layers on the various ideas already present in the NT regarding the mechanics of the incarnation (divine begetting at the baptism in Matt. 3:17, Mk. 1:10, Jn. 1:33, but also in Lk. 3:22 – fatherlessness and motherlessness; a begetting by Joseph – brought forward by opponents). The Catholic notions of the "mother of God" and of the "queen of heaven", though later than the NT, point to much earlier religio-historical roots in the East (cf. CL above).

(d) Mary's psalm, the Magnificat, is given in Lk. 1:46–55. Lk. also relates the story of the → angel Gabriel's visit (Lk. 1:26 ff.) and the family relationship between Mary and Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist (Lk. 1:5–25). Matt. records Joseph's reaction to Mary's pregnancy (Matt. 18:1–25), the visit of the magi to → Bethlehem and the flight into Egypt (Matt. 2:1–23). Lk. records the birth in Bethlehem, the visit of the shepherds, the circumcision and presentation in the temple, and the visit of the twelve-year-old Jesus to the temple (Lk. 2:1–52).

4. Other mothers mentioned are: the mother of the sons of Zebedee (Matt. 20:20; 27:56); Mary (Matt. 27:56 par. Mk. 15:40); Mary, the mother of John (Acts 12:12); the mother at the death-bed (Mk. 5:40 par. Lk. 8:51); the widow of Nain (Lk. 7:12, 15); Herodias (Matt. 14:8, 11 par. Mk. 6:24, 28). The expression "from his mother's womb" occurs in Matt. 19:12; Lk. 1:15; Acts 3:2; 14:18; Gal. 1:15 (cf. Pss. 22[21]:10; 71[70]:6; Jn. 3:4).

E. Beyreuther

παρθένος

παρθένος (parthenos), maiden, virgin.

CL The provenance of the word parthenos, maiden, is uncertain. The evolution of its meaning seems to resemble that of Jungfrau in German, where the primary meaning is simply a girl who is attaining or has attained the age of a woman. Later Jungfrau narrows in sense and means one who has as yet not been touched by a man. As in many centres of culture, virginity was esteemed highly among the Gks. In religion it is a characteristic of many goddesses; its origin has often to be sought in the mother-deities of pre-historic Mediterranean cultures. The chief figures are Artemis (Lat. Diana), a daughter of Leto, and Athene (Lat. Minerva), a daughter of Zeus, who alone was not born of a woman, a fact that may also have determined her other name Parthenos – her temple in Athens is called the Parthenon. In apparent variance with virginity, these goddesses, especially Artemis, were often the guardians of birth, motherhood, and the fertility of the land and of animals. Here the emphasis lies less upon chastity than upon youthful vitality with its magical power, and so the original character of a mother-deity again makes its appearance. In the later veneration of Mary there are many traces of the heathen cult of the divine mother and maiden.

OT 1. Heb. has two words for maiden: 'almâh and b'ṭûlâh and also na'ṛâh, a young girl. The occurrence of parthenos in the LXX is restricted in the Heb. canon to the translation of these three words. In 44 out of 50 passages in the NT b'ṭûlâh is rendered by parthenos; in 3 passages a translation is lacking. Joel 1:8 has nymphê, bride. Est. 2:2 has korasia aphthora, innocent girls, and v. 19 korasia parthenika, virgin-like girls. b'ṭûlâh always means an untouched maiden; like a young man, she is the embodiment of hope (cf. Amos 8:13; Isa. 24:4; Lam. 1:18), and so the word can serve as a designation of → Israel (cf. Amos 5:2; Jer. 18:13; 31:4, 21) and → Jerusalem, the daughter of Judah (Lam. 1:15) and of Zion (e.g. Lam. 2:13).

On the other hand, 'almâh is used for a young girl or a woman at the age of puberty (cf. Prov. 30:19) until she gives birth to her first child. 'almâh is translated by neanis, girl, maiden, young married woman in Exod. 2:8; Ps. 68(67):25; Cant. 1:3;

6:8(7). Only twice is 'almâh translated by parthenos (Gen. 24:13; Isa. 7:14). In Gen. 24:13 'almâh denotes a virgin, for virginity is mentioned expressly in v. 16. In Isa. 7:14 it may be questioned whether a virgin as such is implied, otherwise b^etûlâh would have stood there (cf. O. Kaiser, Isaiah 1–12, 1977, 100 ff.; G. Fohrer, Das Buch Jesaja, I, 1966², 113 ff.). Even so, it has been debated on linguistic grounds whether b^etûlâh must mean a virgin in the strictest technical sense (cf. G. J. Wenham, “B^etûlâh ‘A Girl of Marriageable Age’”, VT 22, 1972, 326–48; J. M. Ford, “The Meaning of Virgin”, NTS 12, 1965–66, 293–99). On the quotation of this Isa. passage in Matt. 1:22 f. → God, art. Emmanouël. In contrast with the LXX interpretation, other Gk. translations have neanis instead of parthenos, which like the Heb. does not necessarily imply virginity. In Gen. 24:14, 16, 43, 55; 34:3 (twice) na^arâh is translated by parthenos.

2. In the OT accounts of long-barren women (Sarah, → Abraham, art. Sarra; and Hannah, 1 Sam. 1 and 2) becoming pregnant through divine intervention, there is never any thought of excluding male, human agency. The same holds good for the birth of John the Baptist in Lk. 1. Rabbinic Judaism also is unacquainted with any other notion, and the messiah is always viewed as one to be begotten of a human father like all men (SB I 49). Only in Hellenistic Judaism, where extra-Judaic influences were stronger, do other ideas appear to have come in; yet here also we find no trace of the idea that the messiah was to be born of a virgin.

NT 1. parthenos occurs 3 times in Matt. 25:1–12, once in Acts, 5 times in 1 Cor. 7, once in 2 Cor. 11, and once in Rev. General usage becomes apparent in the parable of the Ten Virgins (Matt. 25:1, 5, 11). In Acts 21:9 unmarried daughters are meant. Mary is called a parthenos indirectly only in Matt. 1:23 and directly only in Lk. 1:27. Virgins are discussed in Paul’s teaching on marriage in 1 Cor. 7:25, 28, 36 ff. (→ Marriage, arts. gameō and hyperakmos; → Separate, art. chōrizō). That hardly holds good for Rev. 14:4, which probably, as with 2 Cor. 11:2, bears a metaphorical meaning, i.e. chaste. Lk. 2:36 speaks of Anna living with her husband seven years from her parthenia, virginity.

2. (a) By parthenos Rev. 14:4 probably means those who, in contrast with the promiscuous and idolaters (“not to defile oneself with women” has then a metaphorical sense), are able to devote themselves entirely to the → Lamb. In 2 Cor. 11:2 Paul hopes that, as a paranymphios (cf. Gen. 24), he may be able to present to the coming Lord a bride who meanwhile has not cast about for another Jesus.

(b) The precise meaning of parthenos in 1 Cor. 7 is debated (cf. H. Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians, Hermeneia, 1975, 131 f.). Some scholars think that the term refers to women who are married but whose spiritual ideals caused them to live as virgins. Paul describes this situation in 1 Cor. 7:1–7. That he is thinking of such women in vv. 25 ff. is doubtful, on the grounds that he does not call the women in vv. 1–7 parthenoi, and the fact that his advice in the two cases is different. In vv. 1–7, when the couples are actually married, he recommends normal married sexual relations; in vv. 25–38, where the couples are evidently not married, he commends the unmarried state to those who have the gift for it. W. G. Kümmel, on the other hand, following G. Schrenk, TDNT III 60 f., thinks that Paul has in mind the relation of a man to his betrothed who is a virgin in the ordinary sense (H. Lietzmann, An die Korinther I–II, enlarged by W. G. Kümmel, HNT 9, 1969⁵, 33 f.). The exegesis depends in part upon one's opinion of the gnosis in Corinth (cf. W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971).

(c) Where the NT speaks of Mary as a virgin, it has in mind the period up to the birth of Jesus. The statements regarding Jesus' supernatural conception (his birth is not supernatural: Lk. 2) are limited to the nativity narratives in Matt. and Lk. Mk., which is the earliest Gospel, and Jn. do not refer to it. Matt. and Lk. have different aims. Lk. 1:35 clearly bases Jesus' divine sonship on a miracle that went beyond the experience of Elizabeth (v. 36; cf. above OT 2). On the other hand, Matt. wishes to parry Jewish attacks upon the tradition regarding Jesus' origin that were already being made. There is added the quotation from Isa. 7:14 (cf. above OT 2) and with it, in a way that is typical of him, Matt. indicates the fulfilment of OT prophecy (→ Jesus Christ; → Fullness, art., plēroō NT 1; → God, art. Emmanouēl).

3. It is remarkable how in Matt., apart from the Isa. quotation, Mary is called gynē (Matt. 1:20 and 24, where tēn gynaika sou/autou "your/his woman" has the connotation of "wife"; cf. the different readings of Lk. 2:5). The genealogy of Matt. denotes not Mary's natural but her legal relation to Joseph, since for the sake of his Davidic sonship Jesus must pass legally for a son of Joseph (v. 16; cf. Lk. 3:23). But earlier witnesses to the Christian tradition such as Paul and Mk. make no explicit reference to the virgin birth. Gal. 4:4 speaks of God sending forth his Son, "born of woman, born under the law." According to Rom. 1:3, Jesus was genomenou ek spermatis Dauid kata sarka, lit. "made of the seed of David according to the flesh." That Mary is here regarded as of the house of David does not necessarily contradict Matt. 1:16 and Lk. 3:23, if we remember that by marriage Mary was brought into the house of David. For further discussion → Son, arts. on the Virgin Birth and the Genealogies of Jesus. According to Rom. 1:4, one of the proofs of Jesus' divine sonship is the → resurrection (→ Determine, art. horizō).

O. Becker, C. Brown

χήρα

χήρα (chēra), widow.

CL chēra, which occurs frequently after Homer, is fem. of the adj. chēros, deprived, and means a woman deprived (of her husband), i.e., a widow.

OT 1. The Heb. 'almānāh, translated in the LXX by chēra, connotes not only the death of the husband but also the ideas of loneliness, abandonment and helplessness. The meaning of the word thus shows clearly that widows are regarded in a special way as in need of protection. In conformity with this, they are often mentioned in the OT in association with → orphans and strangers (e.g. Exod. 22:21, 24; Deut. 10:18; 24:17, 19 ff.; 26:12 f.; 27:19; Jer. 22:3). Their generally straitened condition had its basis in the social and legal status of women (→ art. gynē, OT) at that time, especially in certain regulations of the law of → inheritance.

2. Yahweh executes widows to himself. They should put their trust in him (Jer. 49:11), for he executes judgment for them (Deut. 10:18; Ps. 68[67]:5; Prov. 15:25; Mal. 3:5) and upholds them (Ps. 146[145]:9). Therefore, his people also are called to maintain the widows' rights and to have compassion on them. Otherwise, they will bring down his wrath upon themselves. Thus in the solemnity of worship the people are bound in duty to fulfil Yahweh's righteous will: "Cursed be he that perverts the justice due to the sojourner, the fatherless, and the widow" (Deut. 27:19; cf. also Exod. 22:22 f.; Deut. 10:18; Isa. 1:17–23; 10:2; Jer. 7:6; 22:3; Zech. 7:20).

3. Accordingly, in the OT various laws are given which ease the condition of the widow: her clothes should not be taken in pledge (Deut. 24:17); in the third year the → tithe should be for her benefit (Deut. 14:29; 26:12 f.). The gleanings of the field etc. should be left for widows (Deut. 24:19 ff.; cf. Ruth 2:2). It is explicitly stated that widows are to be invited to the sacrificial meals and to the feasts (Deut. 16:11, 14) and thus have their place in the congregation. According to Lev. 22:22 f., the widowed daughters of priests have a share of the offering if they return childless to their fathers. For the Maccabean period cf. 2 Macc. 3:10; 8:28, 30, and in rabbinic Judaism further allowances for widows were made (cf. Ben-Zion Schereschewsky, "Widow", Encyclopaedia Judaica XVI 491–95).

Nevertheless, complaint about the unjust and merciless treatment of widows pervades the OT (see inter alia Isa. 1:23; Ezek. 22:7; Mal. 3:5; Job 22:9; 24:21; Ps. 94:6; Wis. 2:10).

4. A plethora of legal questions, above all about the right of inheritance, arises when the remarriage of widows is considered. The OT assumes its possibility and in rabbinic Judaism it is even encouraged; but not before three months after the death of the husband (SB I 47). There are two restrictions. (a) A high priest may not marry a widow (Lev. 21:14), or (in rabbinic Judaism) anyone "who becomes a widow in the time of her betrothal" (SB I 3; cf. II 393 ff.). (b) From the earliest times there are indications that a widow could be made an heiress to properties (1 Chr. 2:24 LXX; cf. Ezek. 22:10; also Gen. 35:22; 2 Sam. 16:20 ff.; 1 Ki. 2:13 ff.). A vestige of this right of inheritance of the sons or agnates is the levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5 ff., → Marriage), which remained until the NT period. According to it, a man was in duty bound to marry the widow of his deceased brother if the marriage had been without sons (in rabbinic Judaism, without children; cf. Matt. 22:24 and SB I 886 f.). The first son of this marriage then counted as a son of the deceased brother.

5. Isa. uses chêra in a metaphorical sense for → Babylon: "Now therefore hear this, you lover of pleasures, who sit securely, who say in your heart, 'I am, and there is no one besides me; I shall not sit as a widow or know the loss of children': These two things shall come to you in a moment, in one day; the loss of children and widowhood shall come upon you in full measure, in spite of your many sorceries and the great power of your enchantments" (Isa. 47:8 f.; cf. Rev. 18:7). But for Israel there stands, as the new divine covenant, the promise that the reproach of her widowhood (chêreia, – the exile is meant) will no more be remembered (Isa. 54:4).

NT 1. The NT speaks of the straitened circumstances of the widow: cf. her importunate legal action (Lk. 18:1 ff.), the abuse of her trust (Mk. 12:40 par. Lk. 20:47), her poverty (Mk. 12:41–44 par. Lk. 21:1–4).

2. The NT churches recognized their responsibility for the widow. The strongest expression occurs in Jas., where all outward veneration of God in worship is contrasted with it: "Religion [thrêskeia] that is pure and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit orphans and widows in their affliction" (Jas. 1:27). In the church at Jerusalem there was at an early date an organized provision for widows (→ Mercy; → Poor; → Possessions). The murmuring of the Hellenistic group because their widows, as compared with those of the Hebrews, were being put at a disadvantage, led to the choice of seven men from the Hellenistic section who were charged with the care of these widows (Acts 6:1 ff.).

3. In the later NT period, the regulation regarding widows in 1 Tim. 5:4–16 is instructive. Here a distinction is drawn between widows and “real widows [ontōs chēraī]” (vv. 3, 5, 9, 16). The “real widow” is left alone (v. 5), the church provides for her (v. 16); on the other hand, if the widow has relations, they are in duty bound to care for her (vv. 4, 16). The real widows were included in a roll of widows (v. 9). From the conditions of admission it appears certain that the widows who were enrolled received at the same time an office in the church. They had to be over sixty years old (v. 9), to have been the wife of only one man (v. 9; this may refer to polygamy or the second marriage of a divorcée, rather than to a widow: → Man, art. anēr NT 3). She must be “well attested for her good deeds” (v. 10), i.e. the bringing up of orphans, hospitality, readiness for humble service and helpfulness when face to face with those in straitened circumstances. Presumably these good works were the responsibility of a community of widows. Young widows were refused for they would be ensnared too easily by laziness etc. (v. 13). Those enrolled also seem to have taken a decision not to marry again; in the case of younger widows this had to be taken into consideration, and this may have been the reason for excluding them. “When sensuality leads them away from Christ, they then wish to marry. And then they are condemned, because they have broken their first pledge [i.e. the decision made in faith to remain a widow]” (J. Jeremias in Die Briefe an Timotheus und Titus usw., NTD III 1937³, 28). This does not involve rejection in principle of another marriage, as is explained in v. 14: “So I would have younger widows marry. . . .” Here we have the attitude of the second Christian generation. It is different from that in 1 Cor. 7:8, where Paul says to the unmarried and to widows that “it is well for them to remain single as I do.” Such statements may have been determined by the expectation that the parousia was near (→ Present). In the meantime an order of widows had emerged.

S. Solle

→ Adam, → Discipline, → Divorce, → Father, → Image, → Marriage, → Separate, → Son, → Virtue, art. Haustafeln

(a). J. J. von Allmen, “Women and the Threefold Ministry”, The Churchman 86, 1972, 89–99; O. J. Baab, “Woman”, IDB IV 864–67; D. S. Bailey, Sexual Relation in Christian Thought, 1959; K. Barth, CD III, 1, 183–206; R. T. Beckwith, “The Office of Women in the Church of the Present Day”, The Churchman 83, 1969, 170–83; E. Best, The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, BNTC, 1972, 158–70; E. P. Blair, “Martha”, IDB III 287 f.; “Mary”, IDB III 288 ff.; and “Mary Mother of Jesus”, IDB III 290–93; K. Bliss, The Service and Status of Women in the Churches, 1952; G. G. Blum, “The Office of a Woman in the New Testament”, The Churchman 85, 1971, 165–74; P. A. H. De Boer, Fatherhood and Motherhood in Israelite and Judean Piety, 1974; M. Boucher, “Some Unexplored Parallels to 1 Cor 11, 11–12 and Gal 3, 28: The New Testament and the Role of Women”, CBQ 31, 1969, 50–58; N. P. Bratsiotis, ἡ, ἡσῶν, TDOT I 222–35; C. M. Breufole, “The Religious Status of Women in the Old Testament”, Biblical World 35, 1910, 405–19; R. E. Brown, The Virginal Conception & Bodily Resurrection of Jesus, 1973; W. Brueggemann, “Of the Same Flesh and Bone (Gn 2, 23a)”, CBQ 32, 1970, 532–42; P. Brunner, “The Ministry and the Ministry of Women”, Lutheran World 6, 1959, 247–74 (cf. also the reply by A. Paulsen, ibid. 7, 1960, 231 f.); G. B. Caird, “Paul and Women’s Liberty”, BJRL 54, 268–81; J. B. Carol, ed., Mariology, I–II, 1955–57; Concerning the Ordination of Women, published by the World Council of Churches, Department of Faith and Order and Department of Cooperation of Men and Women in Church, Family and Society, 1964; J. Daniélou, The Ministry of Women in the Early Church, 1961; E. Deen, All of the Women of the Bible, 1955; G.

Delling, parthenos, TDNT V 826–37; K. P. Donfried, “The Allegory of the Ten Virgins (Matt 25: 1–13) as a Summary of Matthean Theology”, JBL 94, 1975, 415–28; G. E. Duffield, ed., Why Not?, 1972; D. Edwards, The Virgin Birth in History and Faith, 1943; M. S. Enslin, “The Christian Stories of the Nativity”, JBL 59, 1940, 317–38; M. S. Ermath, Adam’s Fractured Rib: Observations on Women in the Church, 1970; F. C. Fensham, “Widow, Orphan and the Poor”, JNES 21, 1962, 129–39; J. M. Ford, “The Meaning of Virgin”, NTS 12, 1965–66, 293–99; G. von le Fort, The Eternal Woman, 1962; M. D. Gibson, “Phoebe”, ExpT 23, 1911–12, 281; Gender and Ministry, Church of England, Central Advisory Council for the Ministry. A Report Prepared for the Church Assembly, 1962; H. Graef, Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion, I–II, 1963–66; R. W. Graham, “Women in the Pauline Churches: A Review Article”, Lexington Theological Quarterly 11, 1976, 25–34; H. A. Hoffner, ‘almānāh, TDOT I 287–91; W. L. Holladay, “Jeremiah and Women’s Liberation”, Andover Newton Theological Quarterly 12, 1972, 213–23; P. K. Jewett, Man as Male and Female: A Study of Sexual Relationships from a Theological Point of View, 1975; E. Koffmann, “Woman”, EBT III 985–91; D. M. Lake, “Woman”, ZPEB V 950–55; G. W. H. Lampe, “Church Tradition and the Ordination of Women”, ExpT 76, 1964–65, 123 ff. (cf. the replies by J. Pretlove, ibid., 294, and L. Hodgson, “Theological Objections to the Ordination of Women”, ibid., 77, 1965–66, 210–13); G. van der Leeuw, Religion in its Essence and Manifestation, I–II, 1963; L. Legrand, The Biblical Doctrine of Virginity, 1963; J. J. Lilly, “Jesus and his Mother During the Public Life”, CBQ 8, 1946, 52–57, 197–200, 315–19; H. Lockyer, All the Women of the Bible, 1967; R. Loewe, The Position of Women in Judaism, 1966; J. G. Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1932²; E. M. MacDonald, The Position of Women as Reflected in the Semitic Codes of Law, 1931; J. McHugh, The Mother of Jesus in the New Testament, 1975; T. Maertens, The Advancing Dignity of Women in the Bible, 1969; G. J. C. Marchant, “Evangelicals and the Ordination of Women”, The Churchman 87, 1973, 289 ff.; W. Meeks, “The Image of the Androgyne: Some Uses of a Symbol in Earliest Christianity”, History of Religions 13, 1974, 165–208; C. Maurer, skeuos, TDNT VII 365 ff.; W. Michaelis, mētēr, TDNT IV 642 ff.; T. O’Meara, Mary in Protestant and Catholic Theology, 1966; P. S. Minear, The Interpreter and the Birth Narratives, 1950; W. Moll, The Christian Image of Women, 1967; H. Oberman, The Virgin Mary in Evangelical Perspective, Facet Books Historical Series 20, 1971; A. Oepke, gynē, TDNT I 776–89; J. Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1908; J. Pedersen, Israel, I–II, 1926, 46–96; J. O’Rourke, “Women and the Reception of Orders”, Revue de l’Université d’Ottawa 38, 1968, 290–98; I. J. Peritz, “Woman in the Ancient Hebrew Cult”, JBL 17, 1898, 111–48; W. E. Phipps, Was Jesus Married?, 1970; R. C. Prohl, Woman in the Church: A Restudy of Woman’s Place in Building the Kingdom, 1957; R. Reuther, ed., Religion and Sexism, 1974; H. Riesenfeld, “The Ministry in the New Testament”, in A. Fridrichsen, ed., The Root of the Vine: Essays in Biblical Theology, 1953, 123–27; C. C. Ryrie, The Place of Women in the Church, 1958; and The Role of Women in the Church, 1968; J. N. Sanders, “Those Whom Jesus Loved”, NTS 1, 1954–55, 29–41; D. H. Small, Christian: Celebrate Your Sexuality, 1974; M. Schmaus, “Mariology”, Sacramentum Mundi III 376–90; G. Schrenk, skeuos, TDNT V 365 ff.; and thelō, TDNT III 60 f.; R. Scroggs, “Paul and the Eschatological Woman”, Journal of the American Academy of Religion 40, 1972, 283–303; and “Woman in the NT”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 966 ff.; G. Stählin, chēra, TDNT IX 440–65; R. T. Stamm, “The Status of Women Workers in the Church”, The Lutheran Quarterly 10, 1958, 139–60; K. Stendahl, The Bible and the Role of Women: A Case Study in Hermeneutics, Facet Books Biblical Series 15, 1966; V. Taylor, The Historical Evidence for the Virgin Birth, 1920; S. Terrien, “The Omphalos Myth and Hebrew Religion”, VT 20, 1970, 315–38; and “Toward a Biblical Theology of Womanhood”, Religion in Life 42, 1973, 322–33; M. Thurian, Marriage and Celibacy, Studies in Ministry and Worship 10, 1959; and Mary, Mother of All Christians, 1963; W. D. Thomas, “The Place of Women in the Church at Philippi”, ExpT 83, 1971–72, 117–20; M. E. Thrall, “The Ordination of Women to the Priesthood”, Theology 57, 1954, 330–35; and The Ordination of Women to the Priesthood: A Study of the Biblical Evidence, Studies in Ministry and Worship 7, 1958; R. Tiemeyer, The Ordination of Women: A Report Distributed by Authorization of the Church Body Presidents, as a Contribution to Further Study, Based on Materials Produced through the Division of Theological Studies of the Lutheran Council in the U.S.A., 1970; P. Trible, “Depatriarchalizing in Biblical Interpretation”, Journal of the American Academy of Religion 41, 1973, 30–48; and “Woman in the OT”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 963–66; C. H. Turner, The Ministry of Women, 1919; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 19–40; C. J. Vos, Woman in Old Testament Worship, 1968; W. O. Walker, “1 Corinthians 11:2–16 and Paul’s Views Regarding Women”, JBL 94, 1975, 94–110; L. M. Weber, On Marriage, Sex and Virginity, Quaestiones Disputatae 16, 1964; G. J. Wenham, “B’rūlāh, ‘A Girl of Marriageable Age', VT 22, 1972, 326–48; J. W. Wenham, "The Blessed Virgin Mary – An Evangelical Point of View", The Churchman 86, 1972, 27–38; C. Wessels, The Mother of God, Her Physical Maternity: A Reappraisal, 1964; H. W. Wolff, Old Testament Anthropology, 1974; Women and Holy Orders, Report of a Commission Appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, 1966; F. Zerbst, The Office of Woman in the Church: A Study in Practical Theology, 1955.

(b). A. Adam, Christus und die Frau, 1951; H. Baltensweiler, Die Ehe im Neuen Testament. Exegetische Untersuchungen über Ehe, Ehelosigkeit und Ehescheidung, ATHANT 32, 1967; and "Erwägungen zu 1. Thess. 4.3–8", ThZ 19, 1963, 1–13; G. Beer, Die soziale und religiöse Stellung der Frau im israelitischen Altertum, 1919; G. G. Blum, "Das Amt der Frau im Neuen Testament", NovT 7, 1964, 142–61; K. Bornhäuser, "Die Geburts- und Kindheitsgeschichte Jesu", Beiträge zur Förderung der christlicher Theologie, 2. Reihe, 23, 1930, 38–45, 82–87; J. Bottéro, "La Femme dans l'Ancien Israel", in Histoire Mondiale de la Femme, I, 1965, 224–47; J. Coppens, "La Soumission de la Femme à l'Homme d'après Gen. 3, 16b", Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 14, 1937, 632 ff.; P. Cruvellier, "La Droit de la Femme dans la Genèse et dans le Recueil de Lois Assyriennes", RB 36, 1927, 350–76; G. Delling, Paulus' Stellung zu Frau und Ehe, BWANT 4, 5, 1931; M. Dibelius, Jungfrauensohn und Krippenkind, Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften 4, 1931–32 (reprinted in Botschaft und Geschichte, I, 1953, 1 ff.); A. Dietrich, Mutter Erde, 1925³ (new impression 1938); J. Doller, Das Weib im Alten Testament, 1920; H. Donner, Die soziale Botschaft der Propheten, 1963; G. Erdmann, Die Vorgeschichten des Lukas- und Matthäus-Evangeliums, 1932; A. Feuillet, "La Dignité et le Rôle de la Femme d'après quelques Textes Pauliniens", NTS 21, 1974–75, 157–91; G. Fitzer, Das Weib schweige in der Gemeinde. Über den unpaulinischen Charakter der mulier-taceat-Verse in 1. Korinther 14, ThEH 110, 1963; B. Gärtner, "Das Amt, der Mann und die Frau", in Signo Crucis, 1963; E. von der Goltz, Der Dienst der Frau in der christlichen Kirche, 1914²; E. Gössmann, Die Frau und ihr Auftrag, 1961; and Mann und Frau in Familie und Öffentlichkeit, 1964; F. C. Grant and W. von Soden, "Muttergottheiten", *RGG*³ IV 1227 ff.; H. Greeven, "Das Hauptproblem der Sozialethik in der neueren Stoa und im Urchristentum", Neutestamentliche Forschungen, 3. Reihe, 4, 1935, 113 ff.; S. Gutknecht, Das Motiv der Jungfrauengeburt in religionsgeschichtlicher Beleuchtung, (Dissertation, Greifswald) 1952; S. Hanson, "Mutter", BHHW II 1262 f.; M. Hengel, "Maria Magdalena und die Frauen als Zeugen", in Abraham unser Vater. Festschrift für Otto Michel, Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Spätjudentums und Urchristentums 5, 1963, 243–56; L. Hick, Die Stellung des heiligen Paulus zur Frau im Rahmen unserer Zeit, 1957; H. Holzinger, "Frau und Ehe im vordeuteronomischen Israel", Wellhausen-Festschrift, 1914, 227 ff.; N. J. Hommes, "Taceat Mulier in Ecclesia", Arcana Revelata, Festschrift Grosheide, 1951, 33–43; F. Horst, H. Greeven et al., "Frau", *RGG*³ II 1067 ff.; H. Jordan, Das Frauenideal des Neuen Testaments und der ältesten Christenheit, 1909; E. Kähler, "Zur 'Unterordnung' der Frau im Neuen Testament. Der neutestamentliche Begriff der Unterordnung und seine Bedeutung für die Begegnung von Mann und Frau", ZEE, 1959, 1–13; Die Frau in den paulinischen Briefen unter besonderer Berücksichtigung des Begriffes der Unterordnung, 1960; and Das Amt der Frau in der Kirche. Colloquium. Theologische Blätter des theologischen Konvents der Bekenntnisgemeinschaft der Evangelisch-Lutherischen Landeskirche Hannover 1, 1962; A. Kalsbach, Die altkirchliche Einrichtung der Diakonissen bis zum ihrem Erlöschen, 1926; F. Kattenbusch, "Die Geburtsgeschichte Jesu als Haggada der Urchristologie", ThStKr 102, 1930, 454–74; P. Ketter, Christus und die Frauen, I–II, 1944–49; C. von Kirschbaum, Die wirkliche Frau, 1949; L. Kösters, "Maria, die Mutter Jesu", LTK VI 886 ff.; J. Kühlwein, 'iššâh, THAT I 247–51; 'almânâh, THAT I 169–73; and 'em, THAT I 173–77; M. J. Lagrange, "La Conception surnaturelle du Christ d'après Saint Luc", RB 23, 1914, 60–71, 188–208; E. Laland, "Die Martha-Maria-Perikope Lukas 10, 38–42", StTh 13, 1959, 70–85; R. Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I–II, 1964; F. J. Leenhardt, La Place de la Femme dans l'Église d'après le Nouveau Testament, 1948; F. J. Leenhardt and F. Blanke, Die Stellung der Frau im Neuen Testament und in der alten Kirche, Kirchliche Zeitfragen 24, 1949; J. Leipoldt, Die Frau in der antiken Welt und im Urchristentum, 1962; M. Löhr, Die Stellung des Weibes zu Yahve-Religion und Kult, 1908; J. Michl, K. Rahner, A. Müller and H. Schauerte, "Maria", LTK VII 25 ff.; K. Neulinger, Frauengestalten des Neuen Testaments, (Dissertation, Vienna) 1950; H. Norden, Die eheliche Ethik der Juden zur Zeit Jesu, 1911; A. Paulsen, Mutter und Magd, 1938²; W. Philipp, "Muttergottheit", EKL II 1469 ff.; H. Preisker, Christentum und Ehe in der ersten drei Jahrhunderten, 1927; H. Räisänen, Die Mutter Jesu im Neuen Testament, 1969; G. Reidick, Die hierarchische Struktur der Ehe, 1953; K. H. Rengstorff, Mann und Frau im Urchristentum, 1954; A. Rosenbergl, Die Erhebung des Weiblichen. Ordnung und Ausstand der Frau in unserer Zeit, 1959; M. Rosseels, Der Frau aber geziemt es zu schweigen, 1964; and Die Frau im Aufbruch der Kirche, 1964;

K. Rückert, "Die Begriffe parthenos und aparchē in Apk. 14,4,5", ThQ 68, 1886, 391–448; ibid. 69, 1887, 105–32; H. Rusch, Töchter des Glaubens, 1960; O. Schilling and J. Weilner, "Mutter", LTK VII 707 ff.; A. Schlatter, Marienreden, (1927) 1951³; K. L. Schmidt, "Die jungfräuliche Geburt Jesu Christi", ThBl 14, 1935, 289–97; A. Schulz, "Alma", BZ 23, 1935–36, 229–41; C. Seltmann, La Femme dans l'Antiquité, 1956; J. J. Stamm, "La Prophétie d'Emmanuel", Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie, New Series 32, 1944, 97–123; A. Steinmann, Die jungfräuliche Geburt des Herrn, 1926³; L. Stöcker, Die Frau in der alten Kirche, Sammlung gemeinverständlicher Vorträge 47, 1907; W. Türck, "Die Stellung der Frau in Elephantine", ZAW 41, 1928, 166 ff.; P. Tischleder, Wesen und Stellung der Frau nach der Lehre des heiligen Paulus, NTAbh 10, 3-4, 1923; W. Vogel, "Eidenai to heautou skeuos ktasthai. Zur Deutung von 1. Thess. 4.33 ff. in Zusammenhang der paulinischen Eheauffassung", ThBl 13, 1934, 83 ff.; J. Weerda, "Mariologie", *RGG*³ IV 767 ff.; W. Wiesner, "Jungfraugeburt", EKL II 496 ff.; L. Zscharnack, Der Dienst der Frau in der ersten Jahrhunderten der christlichen Kirche, 1902; H. Zschokke, Die biblischen Frauen des Alten Testaments, 1882.

Word, Tongue, Utterance

Word and language are the means by which man enters into an intellectual relationship with his environment, especially with his fellow men. More than a mere cipher, a word or a concept is, for the ancients, a means of ordering phenomena and ideas, and at the same time a bridge for communication, and a way of gaining mastery or influence, as is expressed particularly in the forms of → curse and → blessing. Formally and structurally a word appears as language (glōssa, strictly speaking, a tongue), while acoustically it is perceived as a sound or voice (phōnē; → Quiet). That a word does not merely denote a thing, but stands for it, and can be virtually identical with it, is shown perhaps most powerfully in the noun rhēma, whereas the aspect of order, and the fixing and systematization brought about by words, can be most clearly observed in the most comprehensive group associated with logos. Because words, as the shape and form in which one expresses one's thinking, count as one of the highest distinguishing characteristics of human beings, the Bible also speaks of the self-communication of God in the category of the word, right up to the Johannine identification of God with the logos, in such an all-embracing way that any tension with the activity of God is excluded. Appended to this survey of NT terminology is a study of language in the light of contemporary philosophy and linguistics, entitled Language and Meaning in Religion.

γλῶσσα

glōssa (glōssa), tongue, language, speech; ἑτερόγλωσσοσ (heteroglossos), speaking a foreign language, of alien speech.

CL The noun glōssa, tongue, language, speech, may be cognate with glōchin, a point. Originally it meant the tongue of humans and animals in the physiological sense (Homer, Od. 3, 332), the organ of taste and speech. Figuratively glōssa stands for the faculty of speech, utterance, and also language, dialect (Homer, Od. 19, 175; Hdt., 1, 57). It can also denote an obscure linguistic expression which requires explanation (Aristotle, Poet. 21p 1457b 1 ff.).

OT In the LXX glōssa also appears in the form glōtta. In about 100 of the some 160 instances it stands for the Heb. lašōn or the Aram. lišān, tongue, language. It means the tongue as the physical organ in humans and animals (Exod. 4:10; Jdg. 7:5); figuratively it denotes the faculty of speech, language (Gen. 11:7). In the poetic and prophetic books of the OT and in Sir., the tongue is in particular the organ of sinful man – the tool of falsehood and evil, of arrogance and godlessness (Job 15:5; Ps. 140[139]:4; Prov. 6:17; Isa. 3:8; Jer. 9:2, 7). Sins of the tongue are like a lash (Job 15:5), like a sword and bow and arrows (Ps. 57[56]:5), or like a poisonous snake (Ps. 140[139]:4), causing disaster and destruction, and undermining a man's relationship with God and his neighbour. It is because "death and life are in the power of the tongue" (Prov. 18:21) that the admonitions to keep one's tongue from evil (Ps. 34[33]:14), and with one's tongue to intercede for justice and truth (Pss. 35[34]:28; 37[36]:30; Prov. 15:4) and to praise God (Pss. 51[50]:16; 126[125]:2; Sir. 31:30) are so urgent.

NT In the NT use of the word (attested 52 times) the chief theological emphasis lies in Acts (6 times) and 1 Cor. 12 and 14 (3 and 14 times respectively), where the tongues of fire which rested on the disciples (Acts 2 and 3) are a picture of the baptism with fire of the Holy → Spirit, and the speaking "in other tongues" is an accompanying sign of the working of the Spirit (→ Pentecost). By contrast the rich man in torment wanted Lazarus to cool his tongue (Lk. 16:24).

For the rest, the NT use of the word links on to that of the LXX (often in quotations: Acts 2:26 = Ps. 16:9; Rom. 3:13 = Pss. 5:9; 140:3; 14:11 = Isa. 45:23; Phil. 2:11 = Isa. 45:23; 1 Pet. 3:10 = Ps. 34:13), whereby glōssa characterizes the tongue as a part of the body (Lk. 16:24; Rev. 16:10), as the organ of speech (e.g. Lk. 1:64; Mk. 7:35; 1 Jn. 3:18; Jas. 1:26), and, along with dialektos, idiom, dialect, as language, turn of speech, dialect (Acts 2:11). In Rev. glōssa is used 7 times in the summary phrase "tribes, languages, peoples and nations" (Rev. 5:9; 7:9; 10:11; 11:9; 13:7; 14:6; 17:15; cf. also 16:10) to denote the totality of → peoples and nations in God's eyes (→ Tribe).

1. The tongue, the organ of speech, reveals man's inmost self. It can be subject to demonic binding (Mk. 7:33, 35; but cf. also Lk. 1:64). Under the power of the → Evil One the out-working of sin is revealed in many various ways through the tongue (cf. Jas. 1:26; 3:5 f., 8; 1 Pet. 3:10 = Ps. 34:13; 1 Jn. 3:18). But even here Jesus proves his saving power. With the individual, as with the redeemed community, the renewing power of the Holy Spirit is made known with the tongue, and by it God's praise is spread abroad. The universal confession of Christ as Lord by every tongue (Phil. 2:11) "is no utterance of personal piety but the sign of a new aeon already begun in the Church and the world" (R. P. Martin, Philippians, New Century Bible, 1976, 102).

2. The phenomenon at Pentecost of speaking in tongues or glossolalia (a word of Gk. origin but not found in the NT), is regarded in the NT as a fulfilment of OT prophecies (Acts 2:16–21 = Joel 2:28–32; 1 Cor. 14:21 = Isa. 28:11 f., though the latter has a negative implication) and as a mark of the dawning of the age of salvation. There is no reflection on OT parallels or similar religio-historical manifestations, although Paul, for example, is obviously aware of the existence of mystic and ecstatic manifestations in Hellenism (1 Cor. 12:2).

(a) The quotation in 1 Cor. 14:21 from Isa. 28:11 f. (en heteroglōssois, by people of foreign tongues), which originally referred to a foreign human language, is applied by Paul to the glossolalia, which the unbelievers do not understand. In Corinth members of the congregation were impelled by the Holy Spirit to give voice to inarticulate and enthusiastic prayer, praise and thanksgiving in the Spirit (1 Cor. 14:14 ff.). This speaking in tongues was the outflow of an elemental possession of the individual and a distinct form of personal worship (1 Cor. 14:2, 28b). Since this praising and praying in tongues was not understood by others, speaking in tongues did not contribute to the edification and strengthening of the congregation (1 Cor. 14:5). ([Ed.] Paul can even say that tongues are a sign for unbelievers [1 Cor. 14:22]. The quotation from Isa. 28:11 f. regards the presence of speakers of foreign tongues as a sign of judgment. This could imply judgment on the church, if all spoke in tongues with no one to interpret. At any rate the outsiders would conclude that they were mad [v. 23]. But prophecy is able to work graciously by convicting of sin and leading to repentance and true worship [vv. 24 f.]

Paul did not forbid the speaking in tongues (1 Cor. 14:39b); indeed he himself practised it freely (1 Cor. 14:18). But he urgently exhorted examination, discipline and restraint (1 Cor. 14:14 ff.). In the congregational gatherings, speaking in tongues is only to be given scope when, by means of additional interpretation inspired by the Spirit, it contributes to their edification (1 Cor. 14:26 ff.). Prophecy, i.e. proclamation of the gospel inspired and filled by the Spirit, is to have unconditional priority over glossolalia (1 Cor. 14:19), which Paul cites last of all in the list of gifts (1 Cor. 12:10). Paul nowhere intimates that glossolalia is an indispensable proof of the reception of the Spirit, or that the gift of glossolalia raises those members who have received it to a higher level of Christian living. Speaking in tongues must never contribute to the exaltation or self-assertion of pious people, but only to the glory of God. ([Ed.] On the need for interpretation → further Prayer, art. entynchanō NT. In the case of the interpretation of tongues, it would seem that Paul is not thinking of interpretation in the sense of translating one language into another, which would presume that "tongues" had a coherent scheme of grammar, syntax and vocabulary. Rather, interpretation here seems to be more akin to discerning what the Spirit is saying through the one who is speaking in tongues.)

(b) According to Luke's account in Acts 2, the bestowal of the Spirit in Jerusalem was linked with "speaking in other tongues"; together the disciples proclaimed the great deeds of God (Acts 2:4, 11), and at the same time the Holy Spirit caused many to understand this proclamation in their own language. Even if the tradition does not give us any absolutely clear picture of the events at Pentecost, at least it makes plain that God's Spirit effected an exceptional speaking and hearing of the gospel, which led to the formation of the original community. When later in Caesarea the first pagans received the Holy Spirit and became members of the church, they also shared in the gift of grace of worshipping and praising God "in other tongues", as again later the disciples of John the Baptist who became believers in Ephesus (Acts 10:46; 19:6). (→ further Pentecost; → Other, art. allos, heteros NT 2.)

(c) These manifestations were undoubtedly of different kinds, since for Jerusalem, Luke describes the speaking in tongues as a preaching of the gospel (apophthengesthai, to declare openly, to address someone enthusiastically, Acts 2:4, 14) directed to men in foreign languages or at least dialects; in Caesarea, Ephesus and Corinth, however, it was probably a case of praise and worship addressed to God in inarticulate tones. What is common is the conviction that these phenomena are rooted, not in the excitability of human piety, but in the work of the Holy Spirit, and that it is to the glorification and worship of God that they contribute.

H. Haarbeck

λόγος

λόγος (logos), word, utterance, meaning; λέγω (legō), collect, count, say; λογικός (logikos), intellectual, rational, reasonable, spiritual; λόγιον (logion), saying; λόγιος (logios), eloquent, cultured; ἄλογος (alogos), irrational, without speech; λαλέω (laleō), to talk, chat, speak.

CL In the secular Gk. world, the word logos had already assumed a central significance for speculative thought long before its own terminology was more precisely defined. This became even more important at the time when the word was being adopted – precisely on account of the breadth of its basic meaning – as a technical term by the various developing sciences in Greece of the 5th cent. B.C. Grammar, logic, rhetoric, psychology and metaphysics, theology and mathematics gave it a different sense, even within the same branch of science.

1. Early Usage. The word logos, from the root leg-, to collect, to pick up, to recount, to speak, means word, discourse, language, account. In Homer, who uses it only in Il. 15, 393 and Od. 1, 56 in the plur., its meaning is not distinguished from mythos (→ myth) and epos, which dominate the same lexical field. But the post-Homeric usage differentiates the meanings. It reserves epos for epic literature based on the Homeric metre, and mythos to characterize fictitious stories, and then fictitious tales of the gods, which though poetically shaped, have an inner content of truth (first in Hdt., 2, 45). The area thus, so to speak, left free to denote that which is meant by “speech”, “word”, is occupied by a new post-Homeric word constructed on a Homeric root, rhēma, whereas logos, only weakly attested, stays restricted to the meaning of discourse (Xen. in Diels-Kranz I, 127, 9) or the theme of a discourse (Theognis, 1055).

2. Philosophical Usage. (a) The decisive change in the use of the word logos begins with Heraclitus (c. 500 B.C.). For him logos can mean discourse, didactic discourse, i.e. teaching (Frag. 1), word (Frag. 87), and even reputation (Frag. 39). But at the same time, it can also mean relation, proportion (Frag. 31), meaning (Frag. 50), common universal law (Frag. 2), truth (Frag. 1). It is worth noting with this breadth of meaning that Heraclitus has the whole field of meaning in mind in each individual use of the word: the words which contrast the objects with one another, the relationships which exist simultaneously between the objects, the law which underlies these relationships – a common law, in fact, including human beings as well – and the demand which grows out of this law, common to all men, for appropriate behaviour. It becomes clear from this that Heraclitus was not concerned with a philosophical system, but with getting hold of the unity of the One and the All (Frag. 50) through the existence of the universal law of proportion which underlies continuous change. logos for him is thus the instrument of thought, expressing both the thought-process and its conclusion, and also its consequences for the thinker (Frag. 2).

Since the logos, “unlike myth, which the god places in the soul of the poet as an inner truth . . . is directed to that which is existent and material”, it embraces “the whole empirical breadth of everything which one has ascertained by the use of eyes and ears” (Schadewald, Antike, 155). These conclusions are founded on the meaning of the verb legō, which underlies logos, and which denotes the activity of collecting, carefully selecting, cataloguing in succession, and arranging together in an orderly sequence. Thus originally it had nothing to do with talking or speaking. Everything that man sees he explores with his mind and relates together; this relationship, according to Heraclitus, is the logos of individual objects, contained in the objects themselves, and exhibiting a law common to all existents (Frag. 2). He is therefore able to say “the One is All” (Frag. 50). The world represents for him a reciprocal relationship between the objects and with the whole, into which man himself is drawn, on account of which he is also capable of reason. Hence he recognizes universal laws within himself (psychology) and the laws of his own being in the world-whole (metaphysics). This “world-whole”, however, still remains “world”. It must not be interpreted transcendently; in fact, the thought of transcendence does not yet exist.

The precision with which Heraclitus expounded his teaching inevitably provoked opposition. If he himself had also required people to listen to nature (Frag. 112), his contemporary Parmenides combined with the word logos (with which he soon equated the term noēma, thought, Parmenides, Frag. 8, 50) the idea of pure thought undisturbed by the senses (Frag. 7, 4 f.). Parmenides thus transplanted the realm of the logos to the other side of the deceptive world of appearances, in the world of pure Being. In the world of appearances itself there is only the insoluble struggle of opposites with one another (→ Truth).

Three things become evident for the first time in the logos-concept: (i) antithetical argument (Parmenides regards himself as consciously opposed to Heraclitus in his thought: cf. Frag. 6, 4 f.); (ii) dualism (Parmenides divides Heraclitus’ “Whole” [Frag. 50] into two equal and clearly divorced spheres); (iii) the narrowing down of the concept of logos to the subjective sphere of the activity of thinking and the thought itself (Parmenides, Frag. 8, 50, where he even gives preference to the word noēma).

(b) At the same period (the middle of the 5th cent.), the teaching of the Sophists spread throughout Greece. This was an intellectual movement which stirred Greek society at all levels, and can be characterized by the following view-points: (i) reflection is directed towards man and towards the relationship between the individual and society; (ii) knowledge of the necessity, but also the possibility, of educating people to play a sensible part in political life; (iii) the conviction that the logos, discourse – accomplished by elucidation and criticism of poets (especially Homer) – made this possible.

In the confrontation over these three themes, the word logos took on the meaning of the individual method of argument, which was able to deal with the most varied problems in a totally disinterested manner, the only important thing being to defend one’s own proposition. The reason why this appeared possible was the conviction that every logos already contained the counter-logos (Protagoras in Diels-Kranz II, 266, 15 f.). Antithetical argumentation is thus recognized as the basic principle of debate. As compared with Parmenides, it was the world of here-and-now reality, which he had so devalued, which gained exclusive interest. This is reflected in the inductive method, which had likewise become the victim of severe condemnation by Parmenides.

It was now possible for debates on a particular theme to take place (dissoi logoi), through two-sided, mutually contrasted discourses concerning Good and Bad, Beautiful and Ugly, Truth and Falsehood (Diels-Kranz II, 405 ff.; even personified on stage by Aristophanes, Nubes 889–1104).

Dexterous manipulation of arguments made it possible to turn a “lesser”, i.e. a disreputable, unjust matter into the “better” (ton hēttō logon kreittō poiein), as, by a sophistic twist, Socrates in his trial was charged with having done (Plato, Apol. 18b).

However, it was not only the totally value-free meaning of logos, adapted to purely individual aims, which characterized the time of the Sophists. At the same period people saw a great force in the logos, a potentiality for everything great and significant. Gorgias (Diels-Kranz II, 290, 17 ff.) names it a great ruler, who can effect “most divine” (theiotata) works in the smallest body. Isocrates (3, 7) ascribes to it a pedagogic power by which the bad are reproved and the good are praised; he almost goes as far as to assign a civilizing power to the logos (cf. TDNT IV 82), since nearly everything that man has created has been created by the logos (15, 254). Here is the expression both of an enthusiasm that is typical of this period of enlightenment; but also of a recognition of value-conceptions that has an almost missionary trait. It is, however, significant that, according to the self-same Gorgias (Diels-Kranz II, 277, 39), the Sophistic art of oratory did not operate with empirical knowledge, by contrast with other skills (the word “knowledge” is expressly rejected in the sentence), but only with words (dia logōn), whereby the real truth of the matter was left out of account by the speaker. The activity of discussing (dialegesthai), in the Sophistic understanding, accordingly brings to light no more than thesis and antithesis. It is in the implementing of the discussion itself that there lies the value for which one is striving. It was possible for a Sophist to break off with a remark such as “Now it is time to turn to something else” (Plato, Prt. 361e), without any loss of face.

(c) Socrates turned against this Sophistic separation of word and content, with two basic considerations in mind: (i) since the world itself is ordered, the material objects of the world can only be expressed univocally; (ii) the activity of conversation (dialegesthai) takes place in the true sense of the word only when the intention is to reach agreement, the koinos logos, the common foundation of human community. He viewed discussion as a community-producing activity, so long as in the struggle for truth “all knowledge drives irresistibly towards realization” (R. Stenzel, “Socrates”, Pauly-Wissowa, III, 831). Socrates himself behaved in just such a way in prison (Plato, Crito 46b and c). The purpose of discussion for him is not talking for talking’s sake (logoi heneka logou, Plato, Crito 46d; cf. above 3 (a)), but the process of reflection through dialogue, which discovers the logos of things.

(d) Plato, whose thought was more concerned with the concept of Ideas or → Forms, added nothing decisively new to the philosophical understanding of logos. Even with Aristotle no new ground is broken in the use of the logos-concept in the problem of the interpretation of the world and man’s relation to and in it. Rather, the Socratic-Platonic concept is systematized, and understood in a specialized and limited way. Man alone of living beings has logos, because his actions are determined by the word, and he himself is capable of speech and understanding (Pol. 1, 2p, 1253a, 9 f.; and Eth. Nic. 1, 6p, 1098a, 4 f.).

(e) Reviewing the development of the concept of logos so far, it is clear that no further development can take place along the lines of understanding that have been marked out. Heraclitus' general universal law and the Sophists' individual oratorical ability are the extremes beyond which one cannot go within the frame of reference provided by the existing understanding of logos. A fundamentally new orientation of thought, namely, the thesis that ethics is the basic problem for man, was provided by the Stoics, who confronted the Gk. starting-point of knowledge with the formulation of their question: How must I live in order to be able to be happy? Nevertheless, here too the complex of ideas from which the answer is worked out is denoted as the logos. It is instructive that in a philosophy which was no longer orientated along either national Gk. or political, or ontological lines, the logos-concept yet retained the power to serve as a designation for the "Most General". This "Most General" is, however, now no longer won by perception but set by conviction. The logos in this thinking is the expression for the ordered and harmonious purposiveness of the world (TDNT IV 84). It is equated with → God, or (as in Chrysippus, the second head of the Stoa, c. 250 B.C.) combined with God; it is the constitutive principle of the cosmos, which extends right through matter. In that the world is viewed as a unity and allowed to become an unfolding of the logos, a high degree of spiritualization is conceded to it. There is no room here for the Socratic conception of the active search for truth, which is necessarily followed by its re-enactment in society, although there is for the Heraclitean sense of the world-whole. For the Stoics the latter is not, of course, to be found in the world independent of thought, but derives from a specific point of origin in the Logos-God. Attempts are certainly made to bridge the gap between both realms by the idea of development; but a dichotomy or dualism is still presupposed, which – despite Parmenides – cannot be derived solely from Gk. thought.

A thorough intellectual organization of the world and the definition of man's location in it – a fundamental pre-condition for ethics – is undertaken on the basis of Aristotelian schematization. There are, on the other hand, the seminal, the seed-bestowing Logoi (spermatikoi logoi) which permeate the whole world and bring about the continuity of all growth and occurrence and thus its meaningful course. Furthermore, there is a right Logos (orthos logos) or universal law which bestows on man the power of knowledge and thence of moral behaviour. Corresponding with the dual conceptuality of the word logos (thinking and saying) a distinction is made between the inner Logos (thinking), given by the God-Logos, and the Logos ordained for articulation (speaking) – a regression vis-à-vis Plato's formulation that thinking is a dialogue with oneself (Plato, Soph. 263e).

(f) The secular Gk. intellectual beginnings brought late fruits to maturity in Neo-Platonism, a philosophical system of the 3rd cent. A.D. As in the Stoa, the Logos is here conceived as a force which invests material objects with shape, form and life (TDNT IV 85 f.), and is even bracketed together with → life (zōē; Plotinus, Enneads 6, 7, 11). Plotinus (A.D. 205–c. 269) asks: what is the Logos? His answer runs: It is as it were an emanation from spirit and soul (the components of the intelligible world) into the material world, and by means of this emanation the whole world, right to the last – even an already dead – little piece of matter is permeated by the Logos (cf. Enneads 3, 8, 2; TDNT IV 85). This process is thought of as a continuing, that is to say, not as a once-for-all, historical event. It represents in its combined association of intelligible and real world an overcoming of Stoic dualism. It is true that the Logos-component, which produces all the many and varied phenomena, is also here called logos spermatikos. But this is now no longer understood (as with the Stoics) in a biological and scientific sense as the “moisture in the seed”, but as a spiritual quality, Number, Measure or Logos.

Finally, as in Stoic doctrine, man is able to raise himself out of the delusion of reality by means of his own logos. But this process no longer leads in a Gk. sense to knowledge, with ethical behaviour as a consequence. Rather, it leads from the logoi (i.e. above and beyond the intelligible world) and sight (epi tēn thean), to the vision which is no longer Logos, but which creates a relationship with that which was earlier and is more than the logos (Enneads, 9, 4 and 10). However, with this conception of the goal of vision as the disclosure of a trans-logical reality, the realm of secular Gk. thought (for which the whole world is divine, but not yet divided into real and intelligible) is evidently left behind.

